roll only, findings held to support judgment, though there was no express finding of inability or impracticability of return of goods.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Suit by J. Macowsky against R. S. Irvine and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Marshall, of San Francisco (Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone for a money judgment in favor of plaintiff for the contract price of a new Ampico piano agreed to be sold by defendant to plaintiff in consideration of payment of an aggregate of $1,800, made up as follows: Jewelry, valued at $755; second-hand piano valued at $400; and cash in the sum of $645. The judgment also contained a proviso that upon full payment of the amount adjudged due plaintiff, with maintenance charges, defendant shall be entitled to the return of the piano in controversy.

The complaint set out two causes of action, the first for money had and received in the amount of $1,800; and the second a statement of a cause of action for rescission of the contract to purchase on the ground of misrepresentation and fraud in "dressing up" and delivering a five year old piano instead of the new one agreed to be purchased by plaintiff, with a statement of notification of rescission on discovery of the fraud, offer to return the piano delivered under the contract, and demand for return of the jewelry, secondhand piano, and cash given in payment. The prayer is for a money judgment of $1,800, interest from discovery of the fraud, and costs of suit.

Defendant demurred to the complaint generally and for misjoinder of an action for money had and received with an action for rescission of a contract. The demurrer was overruled, defendant answered, the court made findings in favor of plaintiff on all the allegations of the complaint for rescission with the exception, save by reference, of the actual making of the contract, and with an additional finding setting out the refusal of defendants to return the property and money delivered in payment of the piano or to recognize any claim of plaintiff. The concluding finding declares that by reason of the facts defendants are indebted to plaintiff for money had and received in the sum of $1,800.

As conclusions of law the court determined that plaintiff recover from defendant $1,800, with interest from the rescinding date—alleged as date of discovery of fraud—and costs of suit. It further concluded that upon full payment of the amount awarded plaintiff, together with payment of any sums necessarily expended or incurred by plaintiff in insuring, storing, moving, or maintaining said piano from the date of judgment, defendant shall be entitled to a return of the Ampico piano described in the complaint. Judgment was accordingly entered.

Argument is made by appellant that the findings and the judgment support neither the cause of action for money had and received, nor for rescission of contract. It is further argued that the action of money had and received is an improper one, and that though the court evidently viewed the action as one for rescission, the findings and judgment fail to accomplish the result to be effected by such an action, namely, restoration of the parties to the status they held before entering into the contract on which rescission was sought.

[1] The appeal being on the judgment roll alone, we are limited in our review to a determination of the question: Do the findings support the judgment; or, stated in its parts: (1) Does the complaint state a cause of action; (2) are the findings within the issues; (3) is the judgment supported by the findings; and (4) does reversible error concerning a matter of law appear on the face of the record? Norton v. Newerf, 45 Cal. App. 10, 187 P. 57.

[2] The complaint was in two counts, the first for the full amount of value parted with by the plaintiff in cash, jewelry, and Baldwin piano as for money had and received; and the second a statement of a cause of action for rescission on the ground of fraud; the prayer of the complaint being for a money judgment in the sum of $1,800.

[3, 4] The contract being rescinded, the plaintiff could sue on common count to recover money paid or property delivered thereunder. Note, 30 L. R. A. 50, 53, and cases cited. That the same transaction was stated in two counts, the one giving the widest equitable powers to the court and including by construction the cause set out in the first count and proper at common law, stamps both, if necessary to a holding, with the Code definition of "claims arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, * * *" and therefore causes of action proper to be joined under section 427, Code of Civil Procedure. In this action the first count treated both money and property given under the contract as money had on the theory of definite allowances having been made for the articles given in exchange. The contract being rescinded, the proper action was by declaration of the cause in equity and suit on the implied promise to repay by the defaulting party of money received, or for the value of goods. The causes were consistent and not improperly joined. Even if plaintiff's legal cause of action were defectively stated, the presumptions attaching to the regularity of the proceedings and to support the judgment will sustain the finding of indebtedness on part of the defendants as made in the exercise of the court's equitable powers and to do full justice between the parties. The rule in such cases is one of justice and equity, not of procedure. 6 R. C. L. pp. 939, 942, and cases cited; Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 147, 94 P. 238, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066; Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 511, 47 P. 369, 52 P. 797.

The complaint, then, sufficiently stated a cause of action for rescission, and the first count, if defective, might be wholly eliminated and the same relief given.

[5] The contract price of the Ampico piano, and the amounts allowed for the jewelry and Baldwin piano, together with the money paid, passing from plaintiff to defendant for such contract amount, were admitted by the pleadings. There being no issues raised thereon, findings as to such facts were unnecessary, and they may be considered as facts found to support the judgment, and as true valuations. Sutherland, Code Pleading, § 1169.

[6] It is true that there was no finding in terms of the inability or impracticability of a return of the goods to plaintiff to put the parties in statu quo, urged here as an absolute necessity, by defendant and appellant. There is, however, a finding of fraud by defendants, and there are also findings that plaintiff demanded and defendants refused the return of the goods. This court will not presume error, but will, if possible, construe the findings to support, rather than defeat, the judgment. Especially will it do so where, as here, fraud clearly appears and the appellant comes before us on a bare judgment roll. The finding of demand and refusal of return may then be construed as a finding of inability or impracticability of return of the goods, and the finding of indebtedness of $1,800 as the court's alternative method of awarding substantial justice. On this construction the findings support the judgment. With the liberal rule of interpretation advocated by our Codes, we hold that reversible error does not appear. This being so, the judgment should be, and is, affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

PEOPLE v. MACE. (Cr. 802.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

1. False pretenses ⇨7(5) — Certain false promise held not false pretense warranting conviction.

Defendant's false promise that upon obtaining a loan from prosecuting witness he would make final payment upon X-ray machine and certain medical and surgical instruments and secure title thereto, and thereafter immediately make and execute a chattel mortgage upon the X-ray machine and the instruments to prosecuting witness as security for the loan, held not in itself a false pretense warranting conviction.

2. False pretenses ⇨49(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for obtaining money by false pretenses.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for obtaining money by false pretenses.

3. Criminal law ⇨747—Determination of conflict in testimony is exclusive province of jury.

Determination of conflict in testimony is exclusive province of jury.

4. False pretenses ⇨49(1)—What proof is admissible as corroborative evidence, stated.

In a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, the circumstances connected with the transaction, the entire conduct of accused, and his declarations to other persons held proper matters to consider as furnishing corroborative evidence contemplated by law.

5. False pretenses ⇨7(1)—When suppression of fact is a "deceit."

Under Civ. Code, § 1710, subd. 3, the suppression of a fact by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact, is a "deceit."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deceit.]

6. False pretenses ⇨7(1)—"False pretense" defined.

A "false pretense" may consist in any act, word, symbol or token calculated and intended to deceive and may be made either expressly or by implication, the form of words in which the pretense is couched being immaterial; the pretense being within the statute if the words create as intended the impression that defendant is making a representation as to a present or past fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, False Pretense.]

7. False pretenses ⇨9 — That indebtedness upon accused's home was of public record held not to charge lender of money with knowledge thereof.

The fact that the indebtedness upon the home of accused was of public record does not charge prosecuting witness who loaned money to accused with knowledge thereof or of its amount.

8. False pretenses ⇨6—Written list of accused's debts used upon application to prosecuting witness for loan held not "false token."

A written list of accused's debts, which he used in applying to prosecuting witness for a loan, held not a "false token."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, False Token.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

R. D. Mace was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The false pretenses alleged in the indictment are that the defendant—

"did * * * pretend and represent to the said H. L. Preston that he, the said R. D. Mace, wanted to borrow from him, the said H. L. Preston, the sum of $1,200, for the purpose of making a final payment upon a certain X-ray machine, and certain medical and surgical instruments, then and there in the possession of him, the said R. D. Mace; that he, the said R. D. Mace, was solvent; that his liabilities did not exceed the sum of $2,000; that it was his present intention, and that he would, upon receiving the said sum of $1,200 from the said H. L. Preston, as aforesaid, make final payment upon said X-ray machine and certain medical and surgical instruments aforesaid, and secure title thereto, and that upon receiving title thereto he would immediately make and execute a chattel mortgage upon said X-ray machine and said medical and surgical instruments aforesaid to him, the said H. L. Preston, as security for said loan of said sum of $1,200."

The grounds urged for a reversal are: First, "that so much of the representation as is in the nature of a promise is, standing alone, insufficient to warrant a conviction"; second, that the evidence is insufficient to show that the defendant made any of the alleged representations of facts; and third, that the testimony of the prosecuting witness that such representations were made is entirely uncorroborated. The first contention need not be further noticed than to state that the trial court correctly instructed the jury that the alleged false promise was not such a false pretense as would warrant a conviction.

defendant is a physician and surgeon, and, at the time of the trial, was of the age of 35 years. He located in Ukiah in 1921, and practiced medicine there until March, 1923, Whether he continued thereafter to practice at that place does not appear and is immaterial. He resided in the state of Colorado for two years prior to coming to California. At the time of the alleged false representations, the defendant owed debts contracted while in Colorado in the sum of more than $1,000 and a total indebtedness of about $16,000. He testified that the amount thereof was about $14,000. Preston is the only witness who gave direct testimony that any of the alleged false pretenses were made by the defendant. He testified positively that the defendant stated that he owed but $2,000. Appellant contends that later in his testimony the witness so qualified such positive statement as to destroy the force thereof, and that, considering the testimony of the witness as a whole, it does not appear therefrom that any alleged false statement of fact was made by the defendant. In order to determine the question thus presented it is necessary to quote extensively from Preston's testimony, maintaining the sequence in which his various statements were made at the trial, even though doing so requires repetition. He testified as follows:

"Q. * * * It is alleged in the indictment that he (defendant) secured the sum of $200 in money and a $1,000 Liberty bond on or about the first day of December, 1923, from you under certain alleged misrepresentations. Tell * * * the facts and circumstances attending that matter. A. Well, about the first of November, 1923, or the latter part of October, 1923, Dr. Mace, the defendant, came to my chambers in the courthouse here in Ukiah and wanted to borrow $2,000, and when he came in he asked me if he could close the door, that he wanted to talk to me about a private matter and didn't want anybody to hear it, or know anything about it, * * * and he sat down and we talked quite awhile over his financial condition, and he stated to me he was buying, or rather paying for an X-ray outfit and some surgical and medical instruments in San Francisco, and that he lacked sufficient money to make the payments, and if I would loan him $2,000, why that would put him on his feet, and he would go down to San Francisco and pay off the balance of the indebtedness on his X-ray outfit and other medical and surgical instruments, the technical names of them I don't remember, and then come back and give me a mortgage on them. * * * I didn't have that much money on hand, and I said, 'I am expecting some money in about the first of December, could you wait 30 days, until the first of the month,' and he said, 'yes,' that he could stand them off until that time; and either that same day or the next day, I gave him a check for $200 to make the urgent payments that were to be made on the outfit, so I understood, and then he was to hold them off for 30 days with the assurance that he would have the balance of the money for them the first of December.

* * * I didn't see him any more until about the first of December, when he came back after the balance of the money, and we had another talk and I told him, 'Doctor, I haven't gotten in the money I expected, and it is pretty hard for me to give you the balance of that $2,000, * * * could you get along on less?' And he said, 'yes.' I says, 'How about another thousand; would that fix you up?' And he says yes, that would be fine, that his collections had been better, and that he could make it on a thousand dollars—be all he needed. So I didn't have the $1,000 in money, so I went to my safe and got a $1,000 Liberty bond, and I gave him that. * * * I gave him back the note I had taken previously for the $200, and took his note for $1,200; * * * but I am getting a little ahead of my story. I says, 'It may take two or three days to send this bond through the bank to the city, and it may not bring $1,000.' It had some coupons on it, and I says, 'I will cash it and get you the money on it,' and he says, 'No, I will take the bond; the bond is as good as money to me,' and he insisted that I give him the bond; and I gave him the bond; and I says, 'When you find out the value of that bond, come back and I will credit it on the back of this note,' and he said he would. And then he said he would go down to the city at the first conversation and also the last conversation * * * and finish the payments on his X-ray outfit and other lamps and one thing another and come back and give me a mortgage. * * *

"Q. On the first occasion, * * * did you and he talk over his financial condition? A. Yes; quite thoroughly, I thought.

"Q. What did he say his financial condition was at that time? A. Well, he told me that $2,000 would put him on his feet; that would pay up his indebtedness, and he would be able then, out of his practice and income from his practice, to save $100 a month, and that would go towards payment of my indebtedness.

"Q. Did he tell you or show you a list of his liabilities, what he owed? A. Yes, he had a piece of paper, * * * I don't know whether I had it in my hands or not; I thought I had it but I don't find it, but he had a paper there with the figures and what he owed, and he made some figures on it while we were talking.

"Q. Did he mention the name of any people he owed? A. Yes, mentioned the name of O'Connor Furniture Company in Santa Rosa, and Floyd Banker, the automobile man, and these people in San Francisco, the Victor X-Ray machines, or Victor X-Ray Company, I don't remember which it was.

"Q. And he represented to you, did he, that the sum of $2,000 would put him on his feet? A. So he said.

"Q. That was what his representations were? A. That's what he owed as I understood it. * * * He told me also, 'I can get this money from Mr. Albertson, but I don't want anybody to know I have to borrow money, and I have been doctoring Mr. Albertson and hated to go there and * * * I hesitated to come to you but I thought I could trust you.' * * * He said he could get it through Mr. Albertson or from him. * * * Never saw him any more until after he filed his petition in bankruptcy. I may have seen him around town or in court on some matter but never to talk to. * * *

I believed that $2,000 would put him on his feet. * * *

"Q. And you relied upon those statements? A. I did.

"Q. And otherwise would you have given him the money or Liberty bond? A. I would not. * * *

"Q. And you relied in part upon the representation that it was his intention to execute the mortgage? A. Yes; sure.

"Q. And you relied in part that it was on the representation that he owed $2,000 and no more? A. Certainly. * * * He told me if he got the $2,000 that would put him on his feet and he could pay these people and give me a mortgage and out of his earnings, over and above his living, he could save $100 a month, and that would go to me until the note was paid."

Cross-examination:

"Q. And he (defendant) had in his hand a paper showing a list of certain creditors you say? A. Yes; and the amounts he owed. * * *

"Q. Did he say anything to you about owing upon his house over here? A. I think that was mentioned.

"Q. You knew he owed $9,000 on his house? * * * A. I did not. * * *

"Q. And that the public records of this county showed he owed $9,000 on his house? A. I didn't know anything of the kind until your schedule in bankruptcy. I didn't examine the records. * * *

"Q. You knew, however, that he did owe something on his house? A. I supposed he did.

"Q. Was that included in the $2,000? A. I don't know whether it was or not; I don't think it was. * * * He told me, in his very words, that the $2,000 would put him on his feet, and then he would commence paying me back.

"Q. And didn't tell you that $2,000 was all he owed? A. That's the way I understood it; what that means—put him on his feet. * * *

"Q. Didn't he say $100 he could save would enable him to pay you and pay Banker? A. No; I don't think he did. He said that Banker was easy on him, and I don't remember how much, but I understood it was not very much.

"Q. You knew he owed on the car? A. He talked about that. * * * He would set aside $100 and whether he would pay Banker too—I guess he would. * * *

"Q. * * * Did he tell you that he could save $100 and pay off Banker and pay you? A. I think he did.

"Q. When he told you that he owed $2,000, * * * did that include Banker? A. I don't know whether it did or not. * * *

"Q. And all he said that made you believe he owed only $2,000 was the fact he said $2,000 would put him on his feet? A. Well, that and what he had on the statement and all of the conversation, * * * from his own conversation and all of his talk.

"Q. * * * Was there anything said about a chattel mortgage in the December conversation? A. * * * I think so.

"Q. Are you positive? A. I am not sure; no. * * * I couldn't swear, but I think there was; nothing said he was not going to give me one, I will say that. * * *

"Q. Did you ever mention the mortgage to him (after the December meeting)? A. Never had an opportunity. I was away the biggest part of January and all of February, and came back the first of March. * * * I think I was away a week or ten days (in December); I am not sure. * * *

"Q. And during none of that time that you were here in the month of December did you call Dr. Mace up and ask him why he didn't give you the mortgage? A. No; I trusted him."

Redirect examination:

"Q. And * * * when he was talking to you, * * * he had a list in his hand? A. He had it on the desk making figures on it while talking. We talked there for an hour.

"Q. And he discussed his financial situation from a reading of that list? A. Absolutely; went over his entire proposition from the time he came here. * * *

"Q. And, as I take it, you talked it over carefully and he represented he didn't owe anyone except those he mentioned to you from the list? A. Absolutely, * * * I says, 'Whatever the Liberty bond brings under a thousand I will credit that on the note,' * * * and he said, 'I will attend to this.' He was very anxious to get his mitts on the bond."

Recross-examination:

"Q. * * * His promise to go to San Francisco and pay off the outfit and come back and give you a chattel mortgage * * * and his representation that $2,000 would put him on his feet, those were the two things that induced you, and were the sole inducing factors, to get the money? A. Well, I guess that's about right. I was sorry for the fellow and thought he was telling the truth and trying to help him. * * *

"Q. * * * His promise to give you a chattel mortgage and his statement that $2,000 would put him on his feet, * * * were those the only representations that you relied on? A. Well, I guess that's about all."

Redirect examination:

"Q. And if you believed from his list and from what he told you, that he owed more than $2,000 and that would not have put him on his feet, would you have let him have the money? A. Absolutely not. * * *

"Q. And all these things combined, all his representations, caused you to part with your money? A. I guess so; those were the main representations, and in the whole transaction I relied upon what he told me as being truthful, and I let him have the money. * * *

"Q. * * * Do you remember an occasion when B. M. Bucknell was in your chambers and yourself was there and also Dr. Mace? A. I remember it. * * * It was just a day or two after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, * * * along the second, third, fourth or fifth of March. * * * I says, 'Doctor, this is a great surprise to me. * * * Why didn't you come to see us and tell us you were going through bankruptcy and give us an opportunity to protect ourselves? You have sold your place before you went into bankruptcy and collected all you could collect and left us in the dark,' or words to that effect, and I said, 'You didn't tell me anything about owing $16,- 000; why didn't you tell me that?" and he says, "I don't know, I should have told you but I didn't; I see I made a mistake now."

Relative to the conversation last mentioned, Bucknell testified:

"Judge asked him (defendant) why he didn't tell him that he owed this $16,000 at the time he wanted that loan. * * * He said nothing, only he said he didn't know why he didn't."

M. H. Iverson, an attorney at law, testified that, as a representative of Preston, he had an interview with the defendant on the 7th of March, 1923, and that the latter stated that he did not promise to give Preston a mortgage to secure payment of the note for $1,200 and said: "I couldn't give a chattel mortgage on the machines at that time, because I owed more than that on them;" that the promise to give a chattel mortgage was conditional upon securing a loan of $2,000; that in his conversation with the defendant the witness "had mentioned an X-ray machine and some kind of lamp."

At the time of obtaining the money from Preston, the defendant was indebted to Bucknell in the sum of $1,500 on two unsecured promissory notes, $1,000 to a bank in Ukiah on a note indorsed by Bucknell, $400 as indorser on a note to another Ukiah bank, $341 to a contractor there, $217 on an open account with a druggist, more than $1,000 to creditors in Colorado, $359.21 on an open account with the Victor X-Ray Corporation of San Francisco, a balance of $593.20 on a lease contract for the purchase of quartz lamps from the same corporation, $1,942 on a lease contract for the purchase of furniture from O'Connor Furniture Company of Santa Rosa, $600 on a lease contract for the purchase of an automobile from Floyd Banker of Ukiah, $7,700 on a contract for the purchase of defendant's home; and various other smaller sums on running accounts with business men and firms in Ukiah. Payments had been made on all these contracts, and it may be inferred that in every case the value of the property exceeded the balance unpaid thereon, and that, therefore, such balances were not liabilities in the ordinary sense of unsecured debts. The defendant testified that his wife sold her equity in the home, and it is therefore to be inferred that it belonged to her and was of greater value than the balance due thereon. All the other property held by defendant under the contracts mentioned was redelivered to the sellers thereof. The defendant collected all moneys due him on account which he was able to collect, during the month of February, 1924, and, according to his testimony, at the time he filed his petition in bankruptcy, there remained due him on accounts about $2,000, the value of which does not appear. These uncollected accounts were his only assets. Since his general, unsecured debts amounted to more than $5,000 at the time of the alleged false pretenses, it follows that he was then insolvent.

Shortly after obtaining the $1,200 from Preston, the defendant paid the Victor X-Ray Corporation the sum of $100 and made such additional purchases as to increase his indebtedness to that corporation to a total of $1,249.53. He entered into a new agreement with the corporation, by the terms of which he held the property so purchased and the aforesaid quartz lamps under lease contract for the purchase of the same, title to be transferred to him upon payment of the $1,249.53. He also gave another person a mortgage on the X-ray machine as security for a prior debt and an additional loan to him of $100 in cash.

[3] It is unnecessary to set out in detail defendant's testimony in denial of that given by the prosecution. At most it only creates a conflict in the evidence, the determination of which was within the exclusive province of the jury. The defendant denied having represented that he was solvent or that he owed but $2,000, but testified that he told Preston that his pressing debts amounted to that sum. After stating some of the debts which he told Preston he owed, he testified:

"I stated I owed at that time about $600 on the car and $500 and something on the quartz lamps, and would like to pay those two items off so I would only have my house and furniture. I was buying the furniture and house on contract, and, if I could eliminate my payments on the quartz lamps and the automobile, it would give me a leeway to work on, which I figured would take about $1,100, and the other, the balance of $900 was to go to paying pressing claims of indebtedness to surgical houses and the Commercial Bank and private individuals in town here."

[4] The defendant's statement to Preston that, after payment of the debts enumerated, "I would only have my house and furniture," evidently meaning that he would have only them to pay for, implies that he represented that $2,000 would pay his other debts. The defendant testified that his indebtedness to William Langford in Colorado was one of his pressing debts, and that he paid him $150 out of the money he received from Preston, yet he did not mention this debt to Preston. Preston's testimony is further corroborated by that of Bucknell that the defendant stated "he didn't know why he didn't" tell Preston that he owed $16,000, by defendant's conduct after obtaining the money and by all the attending circumstances shown by the foregoing testimony of defendant and other witnesses. "In this class of cases the circumstances connected with the transaction, the entire conduct of the defendant, and his declarations to other persons are proper matters for the consideration of the jury, and may be looked to to furnish the corroborative evidence contemplated by the law." People

v. Wymer, 53 Cal. App. 204, 206, 199 P. 815, 816. See, also, People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 553, 564, 36 P. 952; People v. Haskins, 49 Cal. App. 640, 644, 194 P. 43.

From Preston's testimony as a whole, it fairly appears that the defendant made representations which were calculated and intended to create the belief that he was solvent, and that $2,000 would pay his debts, and that the prosecuting witness so believed and was thereby induced to part with his property. It is true that, after stating positively that the defendant made such representations, in answer to questions asked him on cross-examination as to whether defendant's promise to give a chattel mortgage and his statement that $2,000 would put him on his feet were not the "sole inducing factors," the prosecuting witness replied, "I guess that's about right," and to a similar question, "I guess that's about all," but his prior and subsequent testimony, as herein set out, shows that he relied on all the statements made by defendant in their lengthy conversation relative to the defendant's financial affairs, including the written list of liabilities. The defendant had put the interview upon a confidential basis, saying, "I don't want anybody to know I have to borrow money, * * * but I thought I could trust you." According to defendant's testimony, Preston said "he was trying to help me as he knew how hard it was for a young fellow to get a start, as he had done it himself and understood how hard it was."

[5-8] Under such circumstances common honesty and fair dealing required and Preston was justified in assuming that the defendant would make a full disclosure of his financial condition, and, when the defendant made a list of his debts, such statement implied that he did not owe other debts. "The suppression of a fact, by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact" is a deceit. Civ. Code, § 1710, subd. 3. It is not necessary to sustain the charge that the defendant should have stated expressly that he was solvent or that $2,000 would pay his debts, if all of his statements together reasonably created a belief to that effect. "A false pretense may consist in any act, word, symbol, or token calculated and intended to deceive. It may be made either expressly, or by implication. * * * The form of words in which the pretense is couched is immaterial; if they are intended to create and do create the impression that defendant is making a representation as to a present or past fact, the pretense is within the statute." 25 C. J. 610. While the defendant's false statement that he needed the money to finish making payments on the purchase price of the X-ray machine, and his false promise that he would use the money to make such payments and then give Preston a mortgage upon it and other property, coupled with his subsequent acts of mortgaging the X-ray machine to secure money from another person, and increasing the existing incumbrance upon the other property, are not of themselves sufficient to sustain the charge, they tend strongly to establish the fraudulent intent necessary to constitute the crime. The fact that the indebtedness upon defendant's home was of public record did not charge Preston with knowledge thereof or of its amount. People v. Henninger, 20 Cal. App. 79, 128 P. 352; People v. Bowman, 24 Cal. App. 781, 142 P. 495. In the foregoing discussion, the written list of the defendant's debts, used upon the application for the loan, has not been treated as a false token, as it clearly is not such. From a consideration of all the evidence it cannot be said that it is insufficient to justify the verdict.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

COPE v. FLANERY, County Auditor.
(Civ. 2835.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 26, 1925.)

1. Counties $\Leftrightarrow$ 206(1)—Allowance of claim for work conclusive.

Where engineer and county board of supervisors entered into contract for construction of bridge, and plans were before the board, and engineer presented claim for work performed, whether work had been done as contemplated in contract was exclusively for board to determine, and in absence of any allegation of fraud when claim was allowed, question as to performance of services is no longer an open one.

2. Counties $\Leftrightarrow$ 126—Payment to construction engineer held not contingent on adoption of plans, or on final erection of bridge.

Under a contract between county board of supervisors and an engineer for construction of a bridge, providing in part that certain sum was to be paid engineer on a certain date, or on such earlier date that plans and specifications may be adopted by said board, held, that it contemplated that such sum was to be paid on date stated on account of services performed and contracted to be performed, and such payment was not intended to be contingent upon adoption of plans and specifications by board, nor upon final erection of bridge, and, if board abandoned construction of proposed bridge, county would be liable in an action on quantum meruit for services performed by engineer.

3. Counties 113(6)—Board of supervisors held authorized to empower engineer rather than county surveyor to prepare plans for bridge; "privilege."

Pol. Code, § 4041, providing that it shall be "privilege" of board of supervisors to reject all bids for construction of bridge, and order it built under supervision of county surveyor, held to import a discretionary power, authorizing board either to employ an engineer to prepare plans, etc., for construction of bridge and to erect same or have work done under supervision of surveyor, there being nothing in sections 4214, 4219 to the contrary; "privilege" being "a right * * * not enjoyed by all, a special right or power conferred or possessed by one or more individuals" (quoting Words and Phrases, Second Series, "Privilege").

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by Erle L. Cope against H. C. Flanery, as Auditor of the County of Sutter. Judgment for defendant, and petitioner appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Lawrence Schillig, of Yuba City, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. By this action the petitioner sought a writ of mandate against the defendant, as auditor of the county of Sutter, commanding and directing the defendant to issue a warrant upon the treasurer of said county in favor of the petitioner, based upon a claim previously allowed by the board of supervisors of said county.

It appears from the transcript that the petitioner, a construction engineer, and the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter, on or about the 5th day of December, 1922, entered into a certain written contract for the preparation and submission by the petitioner to said board of supervisors of plans and specifications for the construction of a certain bridge mentioned in said contract, and further providing that the plaintiff should superintend the construction thereof. This contract is in the following words and figures:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 5th day of December, 1922, by and between Erle L. Cope, of Berkeley, California, and A. E. Schellenger, acting for and on behalf of the county of Sutter and in the capacity of chairman of the board of supervisors of Sutter county, witnesseth:

"That whereas, it is necessary to extend the Nicolaus bridge from the present truss spans westerly to the river levee; and whereas, at a regular meeting of the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter held on the 15th day of November, 1922, said board of supervisors decided to build this extension of reinforced concrete and instructed Erle L. Cope to prepare plans and specifications for and to have borings made for said bridge; and whereas, at a regular meeting of said board held on the 5th day of December, 1922, the chairman of the board was authorized to enter into a contract with Erle L. Cope, civil engineer, to draw plans and specifications and to superintend the construction of said bridge: Now, therefore, said Erle L. Cope hereby agrees to and with said county of Sutter to draw all plans and specifications and superintend the construction of a reinforced concrete bridge from the end of the present truss spans of the Nicolaus bridge westerly to the river levee, said bridge to be complete in all respects, including approaches, and to be in accordance with the requirements of the state reclamation board. Said plans and specifications to include copies not exceeding fifteen (15) in all, and to be complete with drawings and working plans in all respects for receiving bids for such construction.

"It is understood that by superintendence is meant that said Erle L. Cope shall make a visit to said bridge during the building thereof as often as required, and that he will at all times give his advice to said board concerning the construction of said bridge. And it is further understood that the inspectors on construction shall be selected by and work under the direction of said Erle L. Cope, and shall be paid by the county of Sutter. It is further agreed that if said board chooses to make alterations or extensions in connection with said bridge that said Erle L. Cope will provide plans and specifications for such work and shall superintend the same.

"And said county of Sutter, acting by and through the chairman of said board, hereby agrees that if said Erle L. Cope shall fulfill all the terms and agreements of his employment herein contained, then it will pay said Erle L. Cope six (6) per cent. of the cost, said cost is understood to be the lower of engineer's estimate or accepted bids of said bridge with approaches as follows, to wit: Two thousand (2,000) dollars on February 6, 1923, or on such earlier date that plans and specifications may be adopted by said board of supervisors, two thousand (2,000) dollars on June 4, 1923, and the balance thereof monthly when payment is made for labor or materials, in the proportion that said payments bear to the total cost of the work.

"In witness whereof, said parties have hereunto set their hands this 5th day of December, 1922. Erle L. Cope, A. E. Schellenger, as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Sutter."

After the execution of this agreement it appears that the petitioner prepared plans and specifications for the construction of a reinforced concrete bridge according to the terms of said agreement, and also filed with said board of supervisors supplementary plans and specifications. These plans and specifications have not been rejected, nor does it appear from the transcript that said plans were, prior to the beginning of this action, finally approved or adopted by the board of supervisors. After the preparation and presentation of the plans and specifications contemplated in said written agreement, and the presentation of the same to the board of supervisors of said county, the petitioner, on or about the 6th day of February, 1923, presented, and the board of supervisors of said county allowed, the petitioner's claim for the sum of $2,000 for and on account of the first payment for the work performed and to be performed by the petitioner under the written agreement hereinbefore set forth. Upon presentation of said claim, so allowed by the board of supervisors, to the defendant, as auditor of said county, the defendant refused to draw his warrant upon the treasurer of said county for the payment thereof. Upon the trial of this action in the court below, the defendant had judgment and the petitioner appeals.

The findings of the court show that, at the time of the approval of said claim by the board of supervisors, and at the time of the beginning of this proceeding, there were sufficient funds in the county treasury of the county of Sutter to the credit of the said board of supervisors, and available and applicable to said payment, if the same constituted a legal and proper charge against the county; that the board of supervisors of said county by the execution of said contract had not incurred any indebtedness or liability exceeding, for the fiscal year of July 1, 1922, to July 1, 1923, the income and revenues provided for such year. The court also found that during said period of time, there was a duly elected, qualified, and acting county surveyor of the county of Sutter. After making the findings to which we have referred, the court drew its conclusions of law that the petitioner take nothing by reason of this action. The validity or invalidity of the agreement is not referred to in the conclusions of law, and the conclusions of the court in relation thereto can only be inferred from the fact that the defendant was awarded judgment.

Though not set forth in the findings and conclusions of the trial court, it would appear from the argument of counsel for respondent that the court arrived at its judgment upon the theory that the contract had not been performed sufficiently to entitle the petitioner to the first payment therein provided, or that the contract was invalid and gave the petitioner no rights therein as against the county of Sutter. The agreement referred to specifies the work to be done in the orderly course which would be pursued in the event of the building of the contemplated bridge. The plans and specifications are to be presented. The plans were to include certain numbers of copies, together with completed drawings and working plans, complete in all respects for the receiving of bids for such construction. The contract does not in express terms provide for the date when such plans and drawings were to be presented to the board of supervisors, but there appears to be no question, as appears from the transcript, that the plans, drawings, specifications, etc., were presented to the board of supervisors as contemplated by said agreement prior to the 6th day of February, 1923. Upon that date the board of supervisors, having the plans and specifications before it, and being conversant with the work performed by the plaintiff, or petitioner, allowed him the amount of the first payment provided for in said agreement.

It is contended in this particular that this first payment was made contingent upon the adoption of the plans and specifications by the board of supervisors, and much stress is laid upon the wording of the clause in the agreement which reads: "Two thousand (2,000) dollars on February 6, 1923, or on such earlier date that plans and specifications may be adopted by said board of supervisors." It would seem that the construction contended for would necessitate the reading of this clause of the agreement as though it were written as follows: $2,000 on February 6, 1923, provided that the plans and specifications presented by the petitioner had been adopted, or, if such plans and specifications are adopted prior to that date, then, upon the date of such adoption. We do not very well see how the construction contended for by the respondent, that the payment provided for in the agreement to be made on February 6, 1923, is in any manner contingent upon the adoption of the plans and specifications by the board of supervisors. The more reasonable construction, and what we think was contemplated by the parties entering into the same, was and is that $2,000 was to be paid upon that date on account of the services performed and contracted to be performed.

[1] The claim as presented purports to be for engineering work on the bridge mentioned in the contract. The plans, drawings, etc., were before the board of supervisors. Whether the work had been done as contemplated was a matter exclusively for the board of supervisors to ascertain and determine, and, in the absence of any allegation of fraud, when action has been taken thereon by the board of supervisors, and the claim allowed, the question as to the performance of the services is no longer an open one. In McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 P. 113, quoting from the syllabus, the law is thus stated:

"Where a claim for services, which, if performed, is a legal charge against a county, has been duly presented to the board of supervisors of the county, regularly considered, allowed, and ordered paid, the action of the board is, in the absence of fraud, conclusive, and the auditor cannot lawfully refuse to draw his warrant therefor upon the treasurer upon the ground that such services were never rendered, and he may be compelled by writ of mandate to draw such warrant."

This court, in Carmichael v. Riley, 56 Cal. App. 409, 205 P. 478, in considering the allowance of a claim by a reclamation board, states the rule in relation to the action of such boards as follows:

"Having reached the conclusion that the district was bound by the terms of the agreement, it follows that the allowance by the board of petitioner's claim is conclusive upon the question of the district's negligence as well as of the compensation due petitioner therefor. Colusa County v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373; McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 P. 113; McConoughey v. Jackson, 101 Cal. 265, 40 Am. St. Rep. 53, 35 P. 863; McBride v. Newlin, 129 Cal. 36, 61 P. 577; County of Santa Cruz v. McPherson, 133 Cal. 282, 65 P. 574; County of Alameda v. Evers, 136 Cal. 132, 68 P. 475; County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 105 P. 125; Victors v. Kelsey, 31 Cal. App. 796, 161 P. 1006."

In the recent case of Nightingale v. Williams, as Auditor, etc. (Cal. App.) 233 P. 807, the court said:

"The determination of the council on the question of the performance of the work is a determination of an issue of fact, which, if the legal * * * procedure has been followed, will be taken as conclusive by the courts."

[2] It is true that the contract contemplated considerable future work after the date of February 6, 1923, such as the superintendence of the construction of the contemplated bridge according to the plans and specifications, as finally adopted by the supervisors. It would further appear that the construction contended for by the respondent would lead to the conclusion that no part of the compensation agreed to be paid the petitioner would become due or payable to him until the contemplated bridge had been finally finished. We do not think that the contract is susceptible of such construction, nor do we think that the parties thereto contemplated that no compensation was to be made to the petitioner until the proposed structure had been finally completed. There does not appear to be anything in the contract making the first payment set forth therein contingent upon the final erection of the bridge. We think, under the terms of the contract, if the board of supervisors finally conclude to abandon the construction of the proposed bridge, the county, nevertheless, would be liable upon an action quantum meruit for the services performed by the petitioner, if the contract is one which the supervisors had authority to execute. That the board of supervisors might have made the first payment contingent, in any event, upon the adoption of the plans and specifications presented by the petitioner, does not necessitate the conclusion that the board of supervisors has done so, because that course would have been a better business one. The board has found that the engineer has performed certain services; that those services are worth the sum of $2,000. No question of good faith on the part of the board of supervisors is presented to us for consideration.

We think, under the contract, the board had a legal right to consider the petitioner's claim and make the findings at which it arrived. Having done so, we are bound by that conclusion. We may further add that the findings of the court show the action of the board of supervisors was not a payment for unperformed services, or for services that might never be performed. We think the board had jurisdiction to take into consideration the fact of the reasonable value of engineering services in preparing plans, specifications, and drawings for the contemplated bridge, and it cannot be reasonably argued that the board, in allowing the claim, was making a donation. The board, in the allowance of the claim, also was in a position to take into consideration the prospective cost of the structure to be erected, and to determine whether the payments provided for under the contract on certain dates would, or would not, amount to a sum in excess at 6 per cent. of the cost of building the proposed bridge. The length of the structure, its width, its height, and the different elements entering into the plans were all before the board of supervisors, and were matters for them to consider, and, nothing appearing in the transcript to the contrary, it must be assumed by this court that the findings of the board of supervisors were amply supported by the facts appearing before it at the time of the allowance of the claim.

[3] The vital question in this case really is: Did the board of supervisors have power to employ any one, other than the county surveyor, to prepare plans, specifications, drawings, etc., for the construction of the contemplated bridge, and also provide for the erection thereof, under the superintendence of the construction engineer so employed? Section 4041 of the Political Code, so far as it applies to this case, and as governing the powers of the board of supervisors, reads as follows:

"The boards of supervisors, in their respective counties shall have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law: * * *

"5. To lay out, maintain, control, construct, repair and manage * * * bridges within the county, unless otherwise provided by law, and to grant franchises and licenses to collect tolls thereon. * * *

"7. Whenever the cost of construction of any bridge * * * shall exceed the sum of five hundred dollars, such work shall be done by contract, and any contract therefor shall be void unless the same shall be let as hereinafter provided. The board of supervisors shall adopt plans and specifications, strain sheets and working details therefor, and must advertise for bids for the performance of the said work in a newspaper of general circulation published in the county for at least twenty days * * * and said board shall award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder * * * provided, that for the construction of any bridge * * * if the board of supervisors shall be advised by the county surveyor or engineer that the work can be done for a sum less than the lowest responsible bid, it shall then be their privilege to reject all bids and to order the work done or structure built by day's work, under the supervision and direction of the said surveyor or engineer. * * *

"41. To do and to perform all other acts and things required by law not in this title enumerated, or which may be necessary to the full discharge of the duties of the legislative authority of the county government."

The argument in this case circles around the proviso clause, which authorizes the board, in the event that it shall be advised by the county surveyor that the work can be done for less than the lowest responsible bid, it shall then be the privilege of the board to reject all bids and to order the work done by day's labor under the direction of the county surveyor or engineer. The word "engineer" appears in the section, as amended by the Legislature, providing for the appointment of county engineers instead of election of surveyors, but that amendment has been held inoperative in the case of Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 P. 120. The section must be read as though only the word "surveyor" occurred therein. It will be noted that the Legislature has used the word "privilege," which imports the idea that the board of supervisors, under the contingencies provided for, may exercise the right of having the bridge constructed by day labor and not under contract. The term "privilege" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as "a peculiar benefit, favor or advantage." "A right * * * not enjoyed by all; a special right or power conferred or possessed by one or more individuals." 3 Words and Phrases, Second Series, 1206. A number of other definitions of this word is there given, none of which hold the work to be mandatory in its signification. We think the language used imports a discretionary power, and vests in the board of supervisors authority, either to proceed by contract, or to have the work done by the employment of day laborers, as to the board may seem most advantageous. A somewhat analogous question was considered by the Supreme Court of this state in Woolwine v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 388, 188 P. 569, the question being as to the authority of the board of supervisors to employ some one other than the district attorney to manage certain litigation. In deciding the question, the court said:

"Section 4041 of the Political Code, relating to the powers of supervisors, declares that they shall have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law, 'to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party, and, by a two-thirds vote of all the members, may employ counsel to assist the district attorney in conducting the same.' Subdivision 16. Under this provision it has become the settled law of the state that the board of supervisors has power to employ an attorney, other than the district attorney, to prosecute or defend an action to which the county is a party. * * * 'Whether, in any particular case, such employment shall be made is addressed to the discretion which they are to exercise in behalf of the public interests. If, in their opinion, the interests of the county require such employment it is their duty to secure the services of a competent attorney therefor.'"

In support of this rule, a number of authorities are cited. In Nickerson v. San Bernardino, 179 Cal. 518, 177 P. 465, the court, in considering the powers of the board of supervisors and the lack of authority on the part of the courts to control their actions in certain cases, thus states the law:

"When the Legislature has committed to a municipal body the power to legislate on given subjects or has committed to it judgment or discretion as to matters upon which it is authorized to act, courts of equity have no power to interfere with such a body in the exercise of its legislative or discretionary functions."

The question under consideration in the Nickerson Case, supra, was that of purchasing land for a hospital site, and it was urged upon the court that the board of supervisors had acted illegally in buying too large a tract, and in answer to this, the court further said:

"All these matters were committed by the statute solely to the board, and their determination involved both legislative action and the exercise of discretion, neither of which was subject to review or control of any court. Whether, in the exercise of legislative powers, a board acts wisely or unwisely is no concern of the courts. They cannot enter the board room and substitute their judgment for that of the board nor interfere at all with its action unless the board is exceeding its legislative powers, or its judgment or discretion is being fraudulently or corruptly exercised."

The various sections found in article 1, chapter 8, tit. 2, pt. 4, of the Political Code, under the title of Department of Public Works, show clearly that the Legislature did not contemplate that a county surveyor would in every case, or even in any case, be a competent construction engineer. The language of the Legislature must be construed in the light of that which is common knowledge to every one; i. e., there is a vast difference between surveying land, making plats, and running lines, marking boundaries, and the building of bridges, such as now are and were being erected when the provisions of the Code under consideration were adopted. Entirely different are the qualifications required for an ordinary surveyor, as contemplated by section 4214 of the Political Code, and a construction engineer competent to erect large structures, or bridges, where tensile strength, resistance to climatic conditions, the consideration of all the various qualities of materials entering into the structure must be known in advance, and the weight or load capable of being carried thereby accurately determined in order to safeguard the interests of all who may use the same. These very facts necessitate the vesting in the board of supervisors the discretionary power included in the word "privilege."

Section 4214 of the Political Code, to which we have adverted, specifies that the surveyor must be a licensed land surveyor of the state, and must make any survey that may be required by order of court, or of the board of supervisors, etc. There is nothing in the section which contemplates the possession of any of the qualifications necessary to perform the services contemplated by the agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter. The making of field notes and plats of surveys, and the filing of them in certain offices, where they may be preserved for the benefit of the public, carries with it nothing that imports the possession of technical skill requisite to perform the services required of a construction engineer. Nor, do we think, that section 4219 of the Political Code trenches at all upon the powers of the board of supervisors. That section has to do with the duty of surveyors as they may be imposed by the board of supervisors. The section reads:

"The surveyor shall make such surveys of county roads, and perform such other engineering work as the board of supervisors may direct. All such maps and field-notes of surveys shall be filed in the office of the surveyor, and the same shall thereafter be and remain the property of the county. It shall be the duty of the surveyor to advise the board of supervisors regarding all engineering work, and to perform such engineering work * * * as may be required by the board of supervisors."

The subject there dealt with is that of county roads, with which there is connected some engineering work, such as the filling up of depressions, leveling down hills, etc. That the whole section has in view the making of field notes and matters of that kind is clearly shown by the second sentence, which, as we have seen, refers to maps, field notes of surveys, etc., being filed. There is not one word about building plans, the erection of structures of any kind, or the determining of any of the factors entering therein by the surveyor. That the surveyor may be consulted does not necessitate that his advice be followed. It is simply a matter of legislative discretion with the supervisors.

The respondent calls our attention to the case of McCarthy v. Board of Supervisors, 15 Cal. App. 576, 115 P. 458, where the power of the board of supervisors to follow the advice of the county surveyor and have a bridge built by day's work was considered. As we read that case, instead of sustaining the contentions of the respondent, it simply exemplifies what we have herein been setting forth, that the board of supervisors, under the provisions of section 4041 of the Political Code, may have certain work in relation to bridges, wharves, chutes, and shipping facilities done by day work, under the supervision of the county surveyor, instead of by contract. It may further be noted that the board is given absolute power in the employment of persons qualified to prepare plans, specifications, strain sheets, and working details, and when the work is done by contract, to entirely dispense with the services of the county surveyor. This to us necessarily implies the power of the board to employ some one competent to determine whether the structure contracted to be erected is being built according to the plans and the materials used therein, of the kind and quality, tensile strength, etc., called for by the specifications.

While the briefs show, the transcript does not set forth, the magnitude of the work to be undertaken by the board of supervisors in the instant case, but it is readily conceivable that the extent and character of the work about to be undertaken is of such importance that the board of supervisors, in the exercise of a wise discretion, might determine to exercise their privilege in the first instance, as to the employment of some one competent to superintend the work from the initial step to its final completion and also to determine that no one would be better qualified to perform such duties than the engineer, who has drawn the plans, strain sheets, working details and had calculated the tensile strength of the materials required, what their composition should be, and the various qualities of all the building material that should enter into the structure.

The fact that the board of supervisors might, after entering upon the work and the advertising for bids, have concluded to discontinue further proceedings, is not, we think, a determinative factor in this case. The board of supervisors of Sutter county, as we have shown, had the right to employ the plaintiff to perform certain labors for the benefit of the county, and the board of supervisors has determined that services of the value of $2,000 have been performed by the plaintiff for the county of Sutter. This finding is conclusive. In view of what has been said, we think the following premises laid down by the appellant sound: The contract is valid as within the authority of the board of supervisors; under the contract $2,000 was payable on February 6, 1923; the supervisors, in approving the claim, took all proceedings required by law; their approval of the claim was conclusive on the courts that petitioner had performed sufficiently to entitle him to this payment; petitioner, in presenting plans and specifications, had done all that he was required to do by February 6, 1923; that there is neither allegation nor element of fraud entering into this proceeding.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and it is further ordered that the trial court enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and issue its mandate requiring and commanding the defendant, as county auditor of the county of Sutter, to draw his warrant in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000.

1. Executors and administrators ⇨464—Remedy against heirs of executor failing to account for assets is by proceeding to compel accounting.

Where executor, who is indebted to estate, or retains or fails to account for moneys or assets, dies before administration is completed or before distribution is made, the estate's remedy against his heirs is by proceeding to compel accounting under Code Civ. Proc. § 1639, despite section 1447.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨464—Probate court held without jurisdiction, as against heirs, to set off distributive share of their ancestor as executor, against his debt to estate.

Probate court, on petition for settlement of surviving executor's accounts and for distribution, held without jurisdiction, as against heirs of deceased executor, to appropriate his distributive share as legatee, or the commissions earned by him, to the extinguishment of his debt to the estate, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1639, despite section 1447.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Abraham Everstine Clary, deceased. From a decree of the superior court, directing a distribution, certain heirs appeal. Reversed.

Griffen, Boone & Boone, and Edward T. Taylor, all of Modesto, for appellant.

Grant & Bailey, of Woodland, for respondent.

HART, J. The facts of this controversy are: That Abraham Everstine Clary died testate in the county of Yolo, state of California, on the 3d day of November, 1920. Surviving him were his wife Johanna and six children. Two of his sons, Edward F. Clary and Charles M. Clary, were nominated in his last will as executors thereof, qualifying as such on the 6th day of December, 1920, and jointly acting as such until the 4th day of April, 1921, when Charles M.

Clary died intestate in the county of Monterey, state of California. From the last mentioned date E. F. Clary continued as sole executor of said will.

The will of Abraham E. Clary provided that all the property of the estate was to go to the children of the deceased in equal shares, subject, however, to the right of the widow, Johanna, to the income from all the property during her life and "in case the income was insufficient for her care then the property was to be applied for her support, the estate not to be distributed until the death of the widow." On the 23d day of June, 1921, approximately two months after the death of Charles M. Clary, the widow of Abraham passed away.

Charles M. Clary left surviving him his widow, two sons, and a daughter. Cecil M. Clary, son of Charles M., deceased, after due proceedings in the superior court of Monterey county, was appointed and later qualified as the administrator of the estate of Charles M. It having been determined, after the usual proceedings in such cases had been taken, that the estate of Charles M. was less than the sum of $2,500 in value, the whole of the same, on her application, was by the court set apart and assigned to his widow. Code Civ. Proc. § 1469.

Subsequent to the making of the decree by the superior court of Monterey county in the estate of Charles M. Clary, setting apart the whole of his estate to his widow, the real and other property belonging to the estate of Abraham E. Clary was sold and converted into cash, and at the time said estate was distributed by the decree of the superior court of Yolo county to the beneficiaries named in the will to succeed thereto upon the death of the widow, the executor, E. F. Clary, had in his hands in cash the sum of $7,544.58.

Immediately following the death of Abraham E. Clary, and prior to the death of Charles M. Clary, a promissory note for the sum of $3,000, dated August 1, 1918, in favor of said Abraham, and signed by said Charles M. Clary, was found by E. F. Clary, the other executor, among the effects of Abraham, said note at all times subsequent to the time it was so found remaining in the hands of said E. F. Clary. Said note was made payable "one day after date to the order of A. E. Clary." Neither the note, nor the indebtedness it represents, was ever at any time included in any inventory of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, nor in any account of an executor as an asset of his estate, except in the final account. Nor was there any appraiser appointed to appraise the property of the estate of A. E. Clary until the 3d day of October, 1921, when one J. D. Musgrove was appointed sole appraiser of said estate, and qualified as such on the 28th day of October, 1921. No inventory was filed in the estate of A. E. Clary prior to January 9, 1922, nine months, approximately, after the death of Charles M. Clary.

As to said promissory note, the petition for settlement of the final account and distribution of the estate of Abraham E. Clary states:

"That he (E. F. Clary, sole executor) filed inventories of all property which has come to his hands, except that at the time of the death of said Charles M. Clark he was indebted to the estate of A. E. Clary on a promissory note for $3,000, on which had been paid $700 on account of principal, and $125 interest, leaving then due and owing from said Charles M. Clary to the estate of said Abraham Everstine Clary, * * * the sum in excess of $2,000; that your petitioner is informed and believes, and therefore avers, that it was the duty of the said Charles M. Clary to inventory his said indebtedness to said estate as cash in his hands, but through inadvertence or ignorance of the law the said Charles M. Clary did not so inventory said note, and the same does not appear in the inventory of said estate."

Payments on principal and interest on the note were indorsed on the back thereof; the last payment on principal having been made on November 21, 1921, and on account of interest on January 2, 1920.

It is admitted that no demand was ever made upon C. M. Clary by his coexecutor to settle or pay said note or indebtedness to the estate of A. E. Clary, and that no claim based upon said note was ever filed or presented to the estate of said C. M. Clary, deceased; nor was there any attempt ever "made to collect the indebtedness alleged to have arisen from the note prior to the filing of the petition for final distribution four years and three months after the note became due"; that "no other steps were taken at that time, with the exception of petitioning the court that the executor be allowed to retain the interest of C. M. Clary (in the estate of A. E. Clary) on account of said indebtedness"; that "no discharge of record has been entered discharging the said Cecil M. Clary as administrator of the estate of C. M. Clary."

Written objections and exceptions were interposed by the heirs of Charles M. Clary, deceased, to the final account, report, and petition for distribution of the estate of A. E. Clary, deceased. Among the grounds of objection to said account, etc., was and is that A. E. Clary, prior to his and C. M. Clary's death, released the latter from all obligation to pay said note. It was also objected that the note and indebtedness thereby evidenced was barred by subdivision 1, section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The jurisdiction of the superior court sitting in probate to hear and determine the matter thus presented was also challenged.

Evidence, both oral and documentary, was taken, and the court found as to said note and indebtedness against all the claims made by the heirs of C. M. Clary in their exceptions to the settlement of the final account, and found in particular that said A. E. Clary was the owner and holder of said note, upon which there was due the sum of $2,965.91 at the time said C. M. Clary qualified as executor, and upon which nothing had been paid. The court further found that the sum total of all the commissions earned by the executors of the will of A. E. Clary for their services as such was $498.28, of which amount one-fourth, to wit, the sum of $124.57, was earned by C. M. Clary while acting as a joint executor of said will.

As to the promissory note and the indebtedness remaining unpaid thereon, the court decreed:

"That it was the duty of the said Charles M. Clary, upon accepting the appointment of joint executor of the said last will and testament of Abraham Everstine Clary, deceased, to have inventoried, as 'cash then in his hands,' the amount of his indebtedness to the said Abraham Everstine Clary, or his estate, which he did not do."

The court further decreed:

"That but for such indebtedness, aggregating $2,965.91, the said Charles M. Clary, or his heirs at law, or successors in interest (the contestants herein), would have been entitled to receive upon the distribution of said estate the sum of $1,257.50 as his distributive share, together with the further sum of $124.51 hereinabove allowed as his share of the commissions earned by the executors of said estate, aggregating $1,382.07, which sum should be retained by said Edward Ferguson Clary, executor, and be and is hereby set off against his (said Charles M. Clary's) said indebtedness of $2,965.91 to the estate of Abraham Everstine Clary, deceased."

The contention of the respondent is that, inasmuch as the indebtedness of C. M. Clary to A. E. Clary existed at the time the former qualified and so accepted his appointment as executor of the will of the latter, said indebtedness, upon acceptance by C. M. Clary of such appointment, became, under the terms of section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, money and assets of the estate of A. E. Clary in the hands of C. M., as such executor; that it was within the jurisdiction of the superior court, in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction and on the hearing of the petition for the settlement of the final account and for a decree of distribution, to require an accounting of such assets; that, if the same be not thus accounted for, the court is authorized, in its decree settling the final account, to adjudge that C. M. Clary was and is indebted to the estate of A. E. Clary to the extent of said indebtedness, and further adjudge and decree that the distributive share of said C. M. Clary in said estate and his commissions for his services as such executor be retained by the estate as an offset to or in recoupment of said indebtedness. As seen, the court below adopted that view of the case, and upon that theory, as to said indebtedness, made and entered its decree. Section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The naming of a person as executor does not thereby discharge him from any just claim which the testator has against him, but the claim must be included in the inventory, and the executor is liable for the same, as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due."

Counsel for the respondent cite a number of cases from other jurisdictions which declare it to be the rule that—

"If a legatee under a pecuniary bequest or a distributee is indebted to the estate, the amount of the debt may be retained from the legacy or distributive share, and the balance, if any, paid by him to the legatee or distributee in full of his claim; and the same rule is applicable to the assignees of the legatee or distributee, or to persons otherwise succeeding to his interest. This is often spoken of as a right of set-off, but it is said that, strictly speaking, it is a right of retainer." 11 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1170, and cases named in the footnotes.

This right, it is said in some of the cases, is founded on the principle that the administrator or executor has an equitable lien on the share of the distributee or legatee until the latter has discharged the obligation which he owes to the estate. Holmes v. McPheeters, 149 Ind. 587, 49 N. E. 452. And "it is an equitable right of its own nature, and not at all dependent upon any statute." Webb v. Fuller, 85 Me. 443, 27 A. 346, 22 L. R. A. 177.

In our state there are cases which hold that the superior court, sitting in probate, has jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of the title to money or other personal property which has come into the possession of an executor or administrator in his official capacity, and which, in fact, belongs to the estate, but which such executor or administrator claims to be the owner of in his individual capacity and adversely to the estate. Stevens v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 148, 150, 99 P. 512; In re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 391, 44 P. 734; Estate of More, 121 Cal. 609, 54 P. 97; Estate of Walker, 125 Cal. 242, 57 P. 991, 73 Am. St. Rep. 40; Estate of Thomas, 140 Cal. 397, 73 P. 1059; Estate of Pease, 149 Cal. 167, 170, 85 P. 149; Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 P. 269; Estate of Emerson, 175 Cal. 724, 167 P. 149; In re Loheide, 17 Cal. App. 475, 120 P. 56.

It will be noted, however, that in all the last above named cases the issue arose during the course of administration of the estate and while the executor or administrator was still alive and acting as such executor or administrator, and involved the question whether the executor or administrator had accounted for all the assets of the estate coming into his possession as such officer; the question always being raised by the heirs, the devisees, or legatees by objections to the petition praying for the settlement of the account of the executor or administrator. There is, though, a much more forceful reason why the course pursued by the court below as to the alleged indebtedness of C. M. Clary to the estate of A. E. Clary cannot be approved, and that reason is to be found in the fact that the Legislature of 1905 took occasion to prescribe specifically in section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure the course to be followed in the matter of the settlement of the estates of deceased persons where the situation is similar to that presented here. That section reads:

"If any executor, administrator or guardian dies, his accounts may be presented by his personal representatives to, and settled by, the court in which the estate of which he was executor, administrator or guardian is being administered, and, upon petition of the successor of such deceased executor, administrator or guardian, such court may compel the personal representatives of such deceased executor, administrator or guardian to render an account of the administration of their testator or intestate, and must settle such account as in other cases."

In King v. Chase, 159 Cal. 420, 115 P. 207, the Supreme Court had occasion to consider the purpose and scope of the above section. It appears that one Levi Chase, in the year 1896, was appointed as executor of the estate of his deceased wife, Cornelia Chase. Levi entered upon the discharge of his duties as such executor and continued so to act until his death on the 30th day of May, 1906. Subsequently Charles A. Chase, as the executor therein named, caused to be filed for probate the will of Levi Chase, and letters testamentary were issued to him. In August, 1906, the court in which was pending the administration of Cornelia Chase's estate appointed Charles W. King administrator with will annexed of said estate. King, as such administrator, brought an action against Charles A. Chase, as executor of the will of Levi Chase, "and individually, to obtain an accounting of the property belonging to the estate of Cornelia A. Chase, which came to the possession of defendant as executor of the will of Levi Chase, and for the recovery of such property when ascertained and determined." A trial of the issues was had, and findings were made to the effect that a large sum of money and certain specific personal property belonging to Cornelia's estate were in the possession of Levi Chase, as executor of Cornelia's will before and at the time of his death, and that the same passed into the possession and control of Charles A. Chase, as executor of the will of said Levi Chase. Judgment passed in favor of King, as administrator of Cornelia Chase's estate and against Charles A. Chase, as executor of Levi's will, compelling the latter to turn over to said Charles A. King, as administrator of Cornelia's estate, all the money and personal property in his (Charles A. Chase's) possession, as executor of Levi's will. Charles A. Chase, as executor, etc., appealed. In disposing of the case on appeal, the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Sloss, said at pages 422 and 423 (115 P. 208):

"Prior to 1905, when section 1639 was adopted, the statutes of this state contained no provision authorizing the superior court sitting in probate to settle such accounts. Nor was any such power conferred on the probate court, as that court existed under the Constitution of 1849. For this reason, it was uniformly held that a bill in equity to compel the executor or administrator of an executor or administrator to settle the account of his testator or intestate with the estate in which the decedent had been acting was the appropriate, as it was the only, procedure. Bush v. Lindsey, 44 Cal. 121; Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594; In re Thompson, 101 Cal. 349 (35 P. 991, 36 Pac. 98, 508); Vance v. Smith, 124 Cal. 219 (56 P. 1031); Slater v. McAvoy, 123 Cal. 437 (56 P. 49); Zurfluh v. Smith, 135 Cal. 644 (67 P. 1089); Guardianship of Wells, 140 Cal. 349 (73 P. 1065). The power of a court of equity to entertain a suit of this character is, in these cases, based upon the very ground that there is no other method of compelling the accounting. Thus, in Bush v. Lindsey, 44 Cal. 121, the court said: 'We are referred to no provision of the probate act which authorizes the probate court to cite the administrator of an administrator to settle the account of his intestate with the estate of which he was the administrator, and, after a careful examination of the act, we find none which confers that authority. The power must be lodged in some tribunal to require such an account to be taken and settled; and if the probate court does not possess it, it must reside in the district court, as a branch of its equitable jurisdiction.' So, in Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594, the court states that 'there is no provision of the statute providing for the settlement of the account of an administrator who dies before rendering an account. It is because of the absence of such statutory provision that the right and duty to compel such accounting belongs to a court of equity.' * * * While the power of the court, sitting in probate, was limited, under the pre-existing law, to a settlement of the accounts of a living administrator or executor, this statute extends the authority to cover the entire field of accounting by executors or administrators, so long as the estate itself remains subject to the jurisdiction of the court. That this is a wise and reasonable provision is not to be doubted. The court which has taken charge of the administration of the estate of a decedent is the proper forum for the determination of all questions incidental to that administration. The settlement of the accounts of the personal representative appointed to conduct the administration is one of the principal functions of the probate court."

See, also, In re Philbrook, 47 Cal. App. 678, 683-4, 191 P. 77; Estate of Randall, 188 Cal. 329, 333, 205 P. 118.

In the case of In re Smith, 108 Cal. 115, 40 P. 1037, Robert Smith died testate in the year 1891, and named his sons, John A. and William R., as executors. Both qualified, both were beneficiaries under the will, and both, after service, died before settlement of their accounts. In 1893, and after the death of the executors just named, one Robert Cardiff was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and subsequently in the same year filed his final account. The court found that during the executorship of John A. Smith he received $264.65, moneys of the estate, and disbursed the sum of $17.50, leaving in his hands at the time of his death $247.15, belonging to the estate of deceased which was never paid over. The court said:

"When John A. died his estate went into probate. His brother William continued as executor of the father's estate, but presented no claim against the estate of the brother. When William in turn died the time for presenting claims against the estate of John A. had expired. The court distributed to the estate of John A. the three-tenths of the residue of the personal property devised to him and did not deduct the two hundred and forty-seven dollars and fifteen cents from his distributive share. John A. held the estate's money as trustee, and upon his death, being indebted to his beneficiary, the estate, its position became no better than that of any other creditor unless it was able to pursue the precise trust fund. Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 23, 89 Am. Dec. 141; Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal. 436. It was the duty of William, as surviving executor, to have presented a claim against his brother's estate or to have compelled an accounting of his brother's trust in equity. In re Allgier, 65 Cal. 230; Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594. The court had no power to deduct the amount from the share of the estate of John A. upon distribution. Assets cannot be collected upon distribution (In re Cook, 77 Cal. 232, 233, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267), and the two hundred and forty-seven dollars and fifteen cents was not an advance to the devisee, so as to bring this case within the principle of Estate of Moore, 96 Cal. 522."

In re Smith was decided in the year 1895 and prior to the enactment of section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] It will be observed from the decision that, even before the enactment of section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court had no power in settling the final account of the deceased to deduct from the distributive share of the executor of such estate, who was also a legatee or a distributee therein, the amount of any money or debt he might have retained or owed the estate arising during the course of his administration thereof as executor.

Counsel for the respondent contend that the case of In re Smith is not in point here, for the reason that in that case an attempt was made "to charge the administrator with a liability which did not exist against him at the time of his appointment, but which arose out of facts occurring during his administration," whereas in the instant case the executor was indebted to the testator or his estate at the time he accepted the appointment of executor, upon the happening of which event the debt became "money in his hands" for which he was liable to the estate by virtue of the provisions of section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We can perceive no real distinction between the two situations. In both cases the executor was indebted to the estate by reason of having failed to account for certain moneys coming into his possession and belonging to the estate as part of the assets thereof. The only difference between the two is that in this case the money was assets in the hands of the executor only in contemplation of law, while in the case of In re Smith the money was actually in his hands. There is nothing in the language of section 1447 which would justify the conclusion that any other course to obtain an accounting at the hands of the heirs of C. M. Clary for the money which was theoretically in said Clary's possession as executor than that prescribed by section 1639 should be resorted to. In both cases it is nothing less than a failure of the executor to account for certain assets of the estate, although in such a case as this there may be circumstances which would justify a less rigorous enforcement of the obligation to account than where the assets are or were actually in the hands or possession of the executor as such. In other words, the provision of section 1447 that a debt by the executor to the deceased is to be regarded as money in his hands for which he is liable to the estate, being a mere fiction of law, "can only subsist with justice, and should not be allowed to work injustice, either by charging the administrator with contempt or embezzlement, in not paying over moneys not received" where he is not able to pay. Estate of Walker, 125 Cal. 242, 57 P. 991, 73 Am. St. Rep. 40. But, at any rate, whatever might have been the rule of procedure in such a case as the one we have here prior to the enactment of section 1639, or whatever may be the procedure in such cases in other jurisdictions, it is certainly thoroughly established by said section that, where the heirs of an executor are proceeded against to account for any moneys or assets which their ancestor, as executor, failed to account for in his administration of the estate, the proceeding for such accounting must be inaugurated under said section of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] If it should be necessary to decide, as the above-mentioned Eastern cases declare, that, where an executor or administrator, who is also a distributee or legatee of the estate of the will of the deceased or an heir, has retained or not accounted for some of the assets of the estate, or is indebted to the estate, the estate may be vested with an equitable lien upon the distributive share or legacy of such executor or administrator, still, where such executor or administrator has died before the completion of the administration of the estate or prior to the distribution thereof, leaving heirs, the proper mode for the determination of the matter as against such heirs, or it may be correct to say, for the enforcement of such lien as against such heirs, is now that prescribed by section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At all events, a consideration of the provisions of section 1639 compels the conclusion that the court below in this proceeding was without jurisdiction, as against the interests of his heirs, to appropriate the distributive share of C. M. Clary in the estate of his father or the commissions earned by him as executor to the extinguishment of his indebtedness to said estate.

There are other questions raised, which, in view of the conclusion at which we have arrived herein, we do not think it is necessary to discuss.

That portion of the decree of the court below appealed from is reversed.

We concur. FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

NOTE BY THE COURT.—After the filing of the above opinion on January 29th, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of the Claire A. Cates, Executrix of the Estate of Alton M. Cates, Deceased, v. Mary B. Cates, Administratrix of the Estate of Horace G. Cates, Deceased, 232 P. 972, appeared in the San Francisco Recorder of January 30th. That case, while different from this in the facts, nevertheless discusses and therein applies the principle underlying section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore we now cite the Cates Case as in support generally of the conclusion arrived at in the instant case.

71 Cal. App. 134

PEOPLE v. ONE 1924 STUDEBAKER SPORT AUTOMOBILE (LUND-BLADE, Intervener).
(Civ. No. 5136.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⇨246—Forfeiture of seller's interest in automobile used in transportation of intoxicating liquors held not authorized.

Neither Wright Act nor Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.) authorizes forfeiture of seller's interest in automobile sold under conditional contract of sale, and used in transportation of intoxicating liquors, for seller's lack of reasonable diligence in ascertaining use to which car is put.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⇨251—Seller's rights under contract of conditional sale of automobile sought to be forfeited held not lost by delay.

Seller of automobile under conditional contract of sale, which automobile was sought to be forfeited for use in transportation of intoxicating liquors, held not to lose any right therein by waiting 17 days before declaring vendee in default for nonpayment of installments under contract.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⇨245—Wright Act adopted only penal provisions of Volstead Act.

Wright Act adopted only penal provisions of Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.).

4. Intoxicating liquors ⇨246—Forfeiture of automobile for use in transportation of intoxicating liquors held not authorized as against innocent seller.

Forfeiture of automobile, sold under conditional contract of sale for use in transportation of intoxicating liquors, and payment of net proceeds of sale into county treasury held not authorized under Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.) or Wright Act as against seller, who had no knowledge of such illegal use.

5. Intoxicating liquors ⇨246—General equitable jurisdiction to abate nuisances does not include power to forfeit innocent seller's interest in automobile used to transport liquor.

General equitable jurisdiction to abate nuisances does not include power to order sale of automobile used by buyer under conditional sale in transporting intoxicating liquors, and payment of proceeds into county treasury, as against innocent seller.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against one 1924 Studebaker sport automobile, model Big Six, engine No. 29991, etc., to establish a nuisance and sale under the Wright Act, in which Fred H. Lundblade intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and the intervener appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; RICHARDS, J., dissenting.

W. Ernest Dickson, of Eureka, for appellant.

Arthur W. Hill, Dist. Atty., and J. J. Cairns, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Eureka, for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This action was brought against a Studebaker automobile seized under the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) because it was being used in the transportation of intoxicating liquor. The complaint set out the fact of illegal use by Gilbert Whetstone, the registered owner, and his conviction for the offense; that F. H. Lundblade was the legal owner of the automobile. It was prayed that the court fix a time and place for a hearing of the matter and prescribe the notice to be given to the registered and legal owners and also to the holders of liens and other interests therein, and that upon the hearing a decree be made adjudging the said automobile to be a common nuisance, and directing its sale by the sheriff of the county, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of costs, and the "balance to be disposed of as provided by law."

Upon notice to the legal owner, Fred H. Lundblade, he intervened in the action, and set forth in his pleading that he was the legal owner of the automobile and had sold the same to Whetstone upon conditional contract of sale, upon which only $451 had been paid, leaving a balance unpaid of $1,692. It is then alleged that Whetstone has defaulted in his payments under the contract, and under its provisions the legal owner elects to declare the entire balance of the purchase price due and payable, and to take possession of the automobile, etc. Intervener prayed that, if an order of sale of the car be made, it be conditioned upon receiving a bid for at least the amount due the intervener, and that, if such amount could not be obtained, the car be returned to the intervener.

[1, 2] The trial court found, substantially, all the foregoing facts, and also found that the legal owner had no knowledge of the illegal use of the automobile. It also found that the legal owner was guilty of laches is not exercising reasonable diligence to ascertain the use to which the automobile was being put and also in not declaring the purchaser in default and recovering possession of the automobile on December 10, 1923, when the purchaser was first in default under his contract, and in permitting said purchaser to use said automobile for 17 days thereafter, or until December 27, 1923.

These two latter findings cannot have any legal force or effect, and are immaterial here because it cannot be seriously contended that a seller of automobiles is bound to be "reasonably diligent" to ascertain the use to which each car he sells is put or suffer a penalty of forfeiture of his interest in the same. No provision of the Wright Act nor of the National Prohibition Enforcement Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, §§ 10138¼ et seq.) is authority for this position, and, certainly, no general rule of law would warrant it. Also a vendor does not lose any rights by waiting 17 days before declaring his vendee in default under his contract under any general rule of law with which we are familiar. Indeed, the district attorney of Humboldt county, representing the people in this action, admitted in oral argument before this court that the findings just mentioned do not strengthen or give support to the judgment which we are reviewing.

[3, 4] However, from the foregoing findings of fact, the trial court concluded that the automobile should be sold at public auction by the sheriff, and that the net proceeds of the sale should be paid into the treasury of Humboldt county.

The intervener has appealed. It is admitted by the respondent that no penal provision contained in the Volstead Act authorizes the judgment, and that, on the contrary, said act expressly provides for reimbursement of lienholders in the event of the sale of property used in transportation of intoxicating liquor, where such lienholders had no knowledge of the illegal use. It is settled that the Wright Act adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act. People v. Buttulia (Cal. App.) 233 P. 401. Respondent contends that the method provided in the Volstead Act for disposition of the proceeds of a sale is a procedural provision, and is not a part of the Wright Act. We think this reasoning is "beside the mark." The situation merely presents a case where it is sought to enforce an extreme penalty against an innocent owner of an automobile, which penalty is not only not provided in the Volstead Act, but is expressly denied therein, and, consequently, is not a penalty under the Wright Act.

Respondent, being unable to escape the logic of this situation, takes upon appeal a new theory. Respondent concedes that no statutory power is given to forfeit the interest of an innocent lienholder or person situated as is the appellant here, but maintains that, under the general equitable power of courts to abate nuisances, the trial court had the power to sell this automobile which had become a nuisance by reason of its use. To concede that the trial court had this general power does not solve the problem before us. The appellant is not disputing the power of the trial court to order the automobile sold and thus abate the nuisance. He is merely demanding that, after the nuisance is abated by the sale of the property, the court continue its equitable jurisdiction to do equity and order the net proceeds paid to the owner of the property who has been guilty of no fault and who has fallen under the provisions of no statute penalizing him.

[5] None of the cases relied upon by respondent discuss the disposition of the proceeds of a sale made to abate a nuisance under the general powers of a court of equity. The obvious answer to respondent's contention is that the nuisance was abated by the sale, which ended the power of the court, except to return the money to the persons entitled by law thereto. A general equitable jurisdiction to abate nuisances does not include a general power of forfeiture without warrant of law.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J.;
NOURSE, J.

BOGNUDA v. PEARSON et al. (Civ. 2756.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Jan. 31, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐607(1) — Transcript held not available on appeal, where not complying with statutory requirements.

Where judgment was entered March 5, notice of appeal was filed April 2, notice requesting clerk to prepare transcript of testimony was filed June 6, and certificate of clerk of court dated December 3 stated that settlement of bill of exceptions was not pending, transcript was not prepared as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and could not be considered on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇐612(4)—Trial court's certificate to transcript held insufficient.

Trial court's certificate to transcript must comply substantially with Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, requiring judge to certify to truth and correctness thereof, and certificate reciting that transcript is "hereby settled, allowed, and approved in accordance with the provisions of the statute" was insufficient to be considered on appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⇐616(3)—Instructions, to be reviewable on appeal, must be authenticated by trial court, or parties must stipulate they were instructions given.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 670, 953a, instructions do not constitute part of judgment roll, but must be included in reporter's transcript, and where they are included in clerk's transcript, in order to be reviewable on appeal, they must be authenticated by trial court, or parties must stipulate that they were instructions actually given.

4. Appeal and error ☞938(3)—Instructions presumed given at appellant's request.

In absence of anything in transcript prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, to show at whose request instructions were given, presumption is that they were given at appellant's request.

5. Appeal and error ☞1—Manner of preparing records or transcripts on appeal is statutory, and statute must be complied with.

Manner of preparing records or transcripts on appeal is statutory, and statute must be complied with.

6. Appeal and error ☞648—Where appellate court considered appeal, it was too late to be relieved from default in preparing transcript.

Where appellate court considered appeal, it was too late to be relieved from default in preparing transcript, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, by application under section 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by J. Bognuda against Elizabeth B. Pearson and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Belieu, of Willows, for appellants.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff sued the defendants to secure a judgment for damages in the aggregate sum of $8,000, alleged to be the extent, measured in money, of the injury alleged to have been inflicted upon the crops of alfalfa growing on certain lands of plaintiff in Glenn county and upon said lands by the alleged acts of the defendants in causing said lands to be flooded with water. The complaint specifically describes those acts, and the answer likewise denies each and all of the averments of plaintiff's pleading. The cause was tried by a jury, who awarded the plaintiff damages in the sum of $4,000. Judgment was entered accordingly. The defendants appeal from said judgment, and in the preparation of the record on appeal attempted to proceed according to the method prescribed by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The respondent contends that the appeal, in so far as the same is supported or supposed to be supported by the clerk's transcript or record on appeal, is not reviewable, for the reason that said transcript was not prepared and is not authenticated as required by said section 953a. The contention is sound and must be sustained. In fact, the attorney representing the appellants has not, in his brief or otherwise, attempted to combat the position taken by the respondent that, for the reason above stated, the clerk's transcript on appeal cannot be reviewed. From this we might assume that the attorney for the appellants clearly appreciates the impregnable force of the objection. But the objection should, of course, be herein considered. Section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"Any person desiring to appeal from any judgment, order or decree of the superior court to the Supreme Court or any of the District Courts of Appeal, may, in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions pursuant to the provisions of section 650 of this Code, * * * file with the clerk of the court from whose judgment, order or decree said appeal is taken, or to be taken, a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed therefrom, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, * * * be made up and prepared. Said notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree, or if a proceeding on motion for new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof."

Said section further provides that, upon receiving said notice, it shall be the duty of the court to require a stenographic reporter to transcribe fully and completely the phonographic report of the trial. The section then proceeds to define the duties of the stenographic reporter under the order of the court and to specify the matters to be contained in the transcript, the preparation thereof to be completed and filed with the clerk of the court by such reporter within 20 days after said notice has been filed with said clerk. Thereupon the clerk of the court must forthwith give the attorneys appearing in said cause notice that said transcript has been filed, and that within five days after receipt of said notice said transcript will be presented to the judge for approval.

"At the time specified in the notice of the clerk to the attorneys said transcript shall be presented to the judge for his approval, and the judge shall examine the same and see that the same is a full, true and fair transcript of the proceedings had at the trial, the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections and exceptions of counsel and matters to which the same relate. The judge shall thereupon certify to the truth and correctness of said transcript and the same shall, when so settled and allowed, be and become a portion of the judgment roll and may be considered on appeal in lieu of the bill of exceptions now provided for by law."

[1] The transcript herein discloses that the judgment was entered on the 5th day of March, 1923, and that the notice of appeal was filed April 2, 1923. The notice required by the above section, stating that the defendants intended or desired to appeal from the judgment, and requesting that a transcript be prepared or made up as above indicated, does not appear in the record. With the transcript, however, upon a sheet of paper separate and apart from the transcript itself, is the certificate of the clerk of the court to the effect that the notice for the transcription of all the proceedings had at the trial, including the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, rulings, etc., was not filed with said clerk until June 6, 1923, and that at the date of the certificate (December 3, 1923) there was not pending the matter of the settlement of any bill of exceptions. It is only necessary to compare these facts with respect to the preparation or attempted preparation of the transcript with the requirements of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, specifying the time within which the steps thereby made necessary to be taken to perfect a record on appeal under the provisions thereof, to make it very clear that the reporter's transcript was not prepared as required by said section and for that reason is not available for the purposes of this appeal. In other words, the reporter's transcript cannot be considered in the determination of this appeal. See Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 70, 165 P. 13; Morey v. Paladini, 187 Cal. 727, 203 P. 760; In re Barney, 191 Cal. 18, 21, 214 P. 853.

[2] Furthermore, the certificate of the judge purporting to authenticate the correctness of the reporter's transcript does not conform to the requirement of section 953a in that particular. The judge's certificate is that said transcript "is hereby settled, allowed, and approved in accordance with the provisions of the statute," while said section provides that the judge shall "certify to the truth and correctness of said transcript." It goes without saying that the reporter's transcript must be authenticated substantially as the statute requires; otherwise, it cannot be considered in connection with the disposition of the appeal which it is designed to support. See Williams v. Lane, 158 Cal. 39, 109 P. 873. Obviously, the reviewing courts must be furnished with legal evidence of the fact that what are brought to them as records on appeal are in truth the transcripts or other proper reproductions of all that took place at the trials, or so much thereof as it may be desired shall be reviewed.

The appellants object to certain instructions embraced within the court's charge to the jury. These assignments cannot be reviewed. With the record is a written stipulation by the parties, upon a sheet of paper separate from the transcript, that the instructions of the court, "as copied and compared by the clerk, and numbered pages 35 to 54, inclusive, may be inserted in the clerk's transcript on appeal," and that the clerk's certificate as to the number of the pages of his transcript may be corrected accordingly. It was further therein stipulated that "this stipulation is not intended to waive any other objections to said transcript."

[3] The instructions of the court do not constitute a part of the judgment roll. Code Civ. Proc. § 670. They must be inserted and included in the reporter's transcript. Code Civ. Proc. § 953a; Tracy Brick & Art Stone Co. v. Wurster, 44 Cal. App. 652, 656, 187 P. 125. Where, however, they are included in the clerk's transcript, and so may be treated as a part of the record on appeal, the instructions, to be subject to review on appeal on objection that they misstate the law applicable to the case, must be authenticated or certified by the judge as the instructions which were actually given upon the trial of the cause, or in the absence of such authentication, there must be a stipulation by the parties that they were the instructions so given. Tracy Brick & Art Stone Co. v. Wurster, supra. The instructions in the clerk's transcript here are not certified by the trial judge as the instructions submitted to the jury by the court, nor is there a stipulation of the parties to that effect.

[4] But there is still another obstacle in the way of reviewing the objections to the instructions in this case in the fact that there is nothing to indicate or show at whose request the instructions were given—whether at the request of the plaintiff or the defendants. The presumption is, therefore, that they were given at the request of the defendants. Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 5, 57 P. 664; Sutter Butte Canal Co. v. Am. Rice & Alfalfa Co., 182 Cal. 549, 553-554, 189 P. 277. It results from the foregoing considerations that there is nothing left before us which is reviewable but the judgment as supported only by the judgment roll. No error appears on the face of the judgment roll, and none is claimed. The complaint states facts sufficient to disclose a cause of action against the defendants for the relief sought, and is invulnerable as against the special objections thereto as set forth in the demurrer.

[5, 6] It is clear from the foregoing that there is open to this court, in disposing of this appeal, no other course than that of affirming the judgment. Of course, it is always to be deprecated where a cause on appeal cannot be considered and disposed of upon the merits of the controversy. But the mode and manner of preparing records or transcripts on appeal is of statutory origin, and the requirements of the statute as to the preparation of such records or transcripts must be complied with, although, in many instances, the reviewing courts, always preferring to dispose of cases on the merits thereof, have stretched the rules regulating the matter of taking appeals almost to the "breaking point" to avoid denying to litigants, in such cases, the right to have their complaints against the result reached below reviewed and passed upon. Perhaps the defendants in this case, by seasonable action, might have been relieved from their default in the matter of the preparation of a transcript on appeal under section 953a by an application for such relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This course, though, they did not adopt, and it is now too late to put in motion the proceeding authorized by the last named section for the purpose of securing such relief. Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 71, 165 P. 13; Morey v. Paladini, 187 Cal. 727, 731, 203 P. 760; In re Barney, 191 Cal. 18, 21, 214 P. 853.

The judgment is affirmed.

FORREST v. FINK. (Civ. 4763.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 30, 1925. Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

1. Trial $\S$ 296(4,5)—Instruction held not erroneous as stating that plaintiff had right to diminish speed of his machine without warning, in view of other instructions.

In action for injuries when plaintiff's machine was struck from the rear by defendant's machine, instruction held not erroneous as stating that plaintiff had right to diminish speed of his machine without giving a signal or warning of his intention to do so, in view of other instructions.

2. Highways $\S$ 172(1)—Motor Vehicle Act relating to giving of signals construed.

Motor Vehicle Act, $\S$ 20n (St. 1919, p. 216) requiring one driving on highway, turning, stopping, or changing course, to plainly signal his intention to other vehicles, would not require driver of vehicle on every deviation from a direct course ahead to look back to ascertain condition of traffic behind him.

3. Trial $\S$ 295(1)—Verdict should remain, if instructions as a whole do not mislead jury.

Verdict should remain, if instructions as a whole do not mislead jury.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(1)—Any error in overruling objection held not to require reversal, where no showing of miscarriage of justice.

In action for injuries when plaintiff's machine was struck from the rear by defendant's machine, any error in overruling defendant's objection to proceeding with trial until plaintiff had complied with Workmen's Compensation Act, $\S$ 26, relating to serving notice on his employer of pendency of action, was of procedure, and would not require a reversal in view of Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, where there was no showing that defendant had suffered prejudice amounting to miscarriage of justice by omission complained of.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 909(1) — Appellate court would presume that giving of notice under Workmen's Compensation Act was regular.

In action for injuries when plaintiff's machine was struck from rear by defendant's machine, in which defendant admitted that insurance carrier of plaintiff's employer was notified of pendency of action as required by Workmen's Compensation Act, $\S$ 26, by written notice of some form, appellate court would presume, where notice was not made a part of record, that giving thereof had been regular.

6. Evidence $\S$ 314(2)—Testimony of medical witness as to what statistics showed concerning injuries similar to those received by plaintiff held not objectionable as hearsay.

Testimony of medical witness as to what statistics showed concerning result of injuries similar to those received by plaintiff held not objectionable as hearsay, since his answer would be assumed to have been a conclusion reached after a judicious comparison of all that he had read or learned on subject.

7. Evidence $\S$ 536—Witness, to qualify as an expert, must be skilled in his business or profession.

Witness, to qualify as an expert, must show himself to be skilled in his business or profession.

8. Evidence $\S$ 558(1)—Opinion of expert witness subject to most rigid cross-examination.

Opinion of an expert witness as well as its source may be subjected to most rigid cross-examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Mortimer Smith, Judge.

Action by Frank Forrest against Henry Fink. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is defendant's appeal from a judgment obtained by plaintiff in an action wherein plaintiff recovered damages for injuries sustained by him in a rear-end collision between an ambulance he was driving and another automobile driven by the defendant.

The facts are as follows: The accident occurred about 10 o'clock in the morning, September 16, 1922, while the ambulance was being driven by plaintiff along Foothill boulevard, a short distance west of San Leandro creek in the county of Alameda. This boulevard is about 70 feet wide, and just east of the point of collision there is a curve in the road, which was negotiated by the ambulance at a speed estimated by various parties as between 5 and 25 miles an hour. Shortly thereafter the machine operated by defendant followed at a speed estimated as being in excess of 30 miles an hour and by one witness as 40 miles per hour. There is a conflict in the evidence regarding the circumstances which occurred immediately preceding and at the time of the accident. Defendant contends that the ambulance slowed down sharply or stopped, without giving signals of an intention to do so. Other testimony is to the effect, that, if there was any diminution of speed at all, it was a gradual slowing up of the ambulance before a stop. At any event, the automobile driven by defendant collided with the rear end of the ambulance causing plaintiff's head to bump against the plate glass front of the ambulance and fracture his skull.

"You are instructed that the driver of the ambulance had a legal right to operate the same on the highway in question as slowly as he desired, and that he had a legal right to diminish the speed of his automobile without giving any signal or warning of any kind to vehicles approaching from the rear of his intention to do so, provided he may do so without accident to a vehicle following, that is, if the vehicle following be not so close that to do so would be dangerous. The Motor Vehicle Act of this state provides that signal must be given to vehicles following in the rear only before turning, stopping, or changing the course of the vehicle which is preceding."

Appellant's objection to this instruction is that the jury was advised that under the circumstances stated in said instruction respondent had the right to diminish the speed of his machine without giving a signal or warning of his intention to do so. In view of the other instructions given, which must be read in connection with the one complained of, we think the jury was correctly and fully instructed upon the subject.

Section 20n of the Motor Vehicle Act provides that one driving on the highway shall ascertain if there is sufficient space for turning, stopping, or changing his course, and, "if the movement or operation of other vehicles may reasonably be affected" thereby, he shall give plainly visible signal to the person operating said car. "A practical and reasonable construction of this provision [subdivision 'n' of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 216)] would not require the driver of a vehicle upon every deviation from a direct course ahead to look back to ascertain the condition of traffic behind him. This particular situation would be covered by his duty to use ordinary care, and whether or not he did so would be for the jury to decide upon the particular circumstances of the case" (Noce v. United Railroads, 53 Cal. App. 512). This becomes doubly apparent when it appears that the trial court instructed the jury that, if plaintiff failed to comply with the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California, "and said failure or omission so to comply contributed directly to the happening of the collision," then the verdict should be for defendant, if said failure or omission was the proximate cause of the accident. The jury was also instructed that it is the duty of a driver about to stop a motor vehicle or to abruptly or suddenly check its speed to extend his hand and arm as provided by law, and that a failure so to do is prima facie evidence of negligence when an accident results. This latter instruction, we think, covers the situation precisely, and, if the instructions as a whole do not mislead the jury, the verdict should remain. Garrette v. Grangers' Business Ass'n, 58 Cal. App. 396, 208 P. 1010. Finally an instruction was given, which, after stating a hypothetical case, upon which plaintiff might recover, contained this qualification:

"If you shall also find that the plaintiff, F. Forrest, carelessly and negligently or carelessly or negligently slowed the speed of the automobile without making any sign as required by law, and that said negligence on his part proximately caused and contributed to the happening of the accident, then your verdict shall be in favor of defendant."

We are of the opinion that the instructions, as a whole, embodied a correct and full exposition of the law upon the subject in controversy.

[4, 5] The next contention urged by appellant is that the trial court erred in overruling defendant's objection to proceeding with the trial of the case until plaintiff had complied with section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1919, p. 920) relating to serving notice upon his employer of the pendency of the action. The section requires either an employer or employee when bringing an action for damages to notify the other by registered mail of such fact, and of the name of the court in which such suit is brought, "filing proof thereof in such action, and, if the action be brought be either, the other may, at any time before the trial on the facts, join as party plaintiff, or must consolidate his action, if brought independently." Evidently the only benefit inuring to a defendant under this statute is to prevent a duplication of action against him for the same tort. The service of the notice upon the employer and the filing of proof thereof are not jurisdictional, but, as was said in Van Zandt v. Sweet, 56 Cal. App. 164, 204 P. 860, the failure to give such notice would be ground for continuance until such time as the notice should be given. It would therefore appear in the present case that the error committed, if any there be, was one of procedure, which would not require a reversal of the judgment, unless it has been shown by appellant that by the omission complained of he has suffered prejudice amounting to a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const. Cal.; Lutz v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 179 Cal. 401, 177 P. 158. In view of the state of the record before us, it is apparent that no such showing has been made. In the first place, respondent claims that, before the conclusion of plaintiff's case, proof that notice had theretofore been given the employer was filed, and from which it is claimed it appeared that the insurance carrier, who was the real party in interest, so far as the effect of such notice is concerned, had actual notice of the pendency of the action and had consented to their interest being represented by plaintiff's counsel. While it is true, as appellant points out, such notice or proof of notice is not made a part of the record of the case, nevertheless appellant admits that some sort of document had been filed, but in this respect contends that the same was ineffectual, either in form or procedure, to meet the requirements of the statute. Inasmuch as appellant admits that the insurance carrier was notified by the service of some form of written notice, and in view of the fact that the notice itself is not made a part of the record before us, so as to show, as appellant claims, it was totally insufficient for any purpose, we must, in the absence of such evidence to the contrary, presume that the giving of such notice has been regular. In Hulbert v. All Night and Day Bank, 29 Cal. App. 765, 157 P. 546, the court held that, even though a contention is made that an individual should be made a party litigant was technically correct, nevertheless, under certain circumstances, the case was one to which the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution should be applied. That would seem to be a more serious fault in the conduct of the case than the one appearing in the case at bar, because here, if the appellant has any doubts as to his status in connection with the employer or the insurance carrier, he may still protect his interest by causing said notice to be served upon either or both of them any time before final judgment.

[6-8] Appellant's final contention is that the trial court erred in permitting a medical witness to testify as to what statistics showed concerning the result of injuries received similar to those received by plaintiff. The particular testimony to which reference is made followed a question by counsel for plaintiff as follows:

"Have you made a study of the statistics relative to brain tumors, the percentage of cases of brain tumor which give a previous history of either a fracture of the skull or brain injury?"

Objection was made on the ground of hearsay, which objection was overruled. His reply was:

"Yes, 27 per cent. of them gives a history of such injury."

Later the witness said:

"Well, of course, he may get over this. The chances are two to one from statistics that I have already quoted that he will not. He may go on the way he is now, and he may get a good deal worse."

The point is made that the doctor, instead of giving his own opinion, fortifying it by his reading, if he wished, based his entire answer upon the statistics, which are admittedly hearsay. Appellant relies upon the case of Bailey v. Kreutzmann, 141 Cal. 519, 75 P. 104, as supporting his contention that the testimony in question constitutes ground for reversal. In that case the experts were allowed to recite instances from specific medical reports and authors, which purported to prove certain facts. This would clearly be hearsay. Likewise it would clearly be irrelevant on direct examination to educe testimony on other particular cases, even though similar, as this would be a violation of the rule that the testimony must be confined to the point in issue. It is clear that the witness, to qualify as an expert, must show himself to be skilled in his business or profession, but there is no precise rule as to how that skill must be acquired. He may be an expert through knowledge derived from the study of the subject only. 2 Jones' Commentaries on Evidence (Horwitz) § 368. The same author says:

"The opinion of physicians and surgeons may be admitted to show the physical condition of a person, * * * the effect of disease or of physical injuries upon the body or mind, * * * the probably future consequences of an injury, when the consequences anticipated are such as in the ordinary course of events may be reasonably expected to happen, and are not merely speculative or possible." Section 378.

An expert witness might reasonably be expected to rely, to a great extent, upon the statistics he has studied, which must be taken into consideration with his observation and experience. This, apparently, was the view taken by the court in Healy v. Visalia, etc., R. R. Co., 101 Cal. 585, 36 P. 125, in which the court said:

"The witness was asked as an expert what would be likely to be the result of certain injuries to the brow or forehead. This question sought to obtain from him his own opinion of these results, and the fact that he was called as an expert assumed that his opinion was based, not merely upon the empirical knowledge which he had gained through his own practice, but also that which he had acquired in the study of his profession. * * * As an expert it was competent for him to give the grounds upon which he based his opinion, as well as the opinion itself, and the fact that his opinion was based upon information derived from his reading did not make it incompetent for him to so state."

In the case at bar the witness referred to "statistics," while in Healy v. Visalia, etc., Co., supra, reference was made to "cases on record." We feel that the situation here is entirely different from allowing medical or scientific books to be read to the jury or seeking to influence them by opinions or theories contained in such books. His answer must be assumed to have been a conclusion reached by him after a judicious comparison of all that he had read or learned upon the subject, and upon his opinion, as well as its source, he could be subjected to the most rigid cross-examination. Healy v. Visalia, etc., R. R. Co., supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

ATKINSON v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4860.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 31, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 1, 1925.)

1. Carriers ⇨316(4)—Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur held applicable in favor of passenger as against carrier.

In action for death of passenger, when street car in which he was riding struck a truck, as against street railroad, doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was applicable in favor of passenger.

2. Carriers ⇨321(21)—Use of word "presumption" in doctrine on res ipsa loquitur instead of "inference" held not fatal.

In action for death of passenger, when street car in which he was riding struck a truck, use of word "presumption" in instruction on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur instead of "inference" held not fatal.

3. Negligence ⇨121(2)—Doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" stated.

Doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" relates merely to probative force of evidence, and does not dispense with necessity of defendant's negligence, and when case is finally submitted to jury weighing presumptions, proofs, and all evidence, burden of proof is still on plaintiff to establish affirmatively defendant's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Res ipsa loquitur.]

4. Carriers ⇨316(4)—Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur held applicable in action for death of passenger in so far as specific acts of negligence alleged in complaint were concerned.

In action for death of passenger when street car in which he was riding struck a truck, plaintiff who pleaded specific acts of negligence of street railroad was entitled to application of rule of res ipsa loquitur in so far as such specific acts of negligence alleged in complaint were concerned.

5. Trial ⇨296(7)—Giving of general and specific instruction on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur held cured by other instruction.

In action for death of passenger, in which plaintiff pleaded specific acts of negligence, that court gave two instructions on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, one general in form and other applicable to particular acts of negligence pleaded, did not constitute error, in view of full instruction on burden of proof.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1068(1)—Giving of general and specific instruction on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur held not erroneous, in view of verdict.

In action for death of passenger, in which plaintiff pleaded specific acts of negligence, that court gave two instructions on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, one general in form and other applicable to particular acts of negligence pleaded, did not constitute error, where verdict of jury was not based on any other act of negligence than those alleged.

7. Carriers ⇨321(21)—Instruction that proof of injury to passenger casts burden of proof on carrier alone held not erroneous.

In action for death of passenger when street car in which he was riding struck a truck, instruction that proof of injury to passenger cast burden of proof on carrier alone held not erroneous, where it was doubtful as to which of defendants' negligence was cause of passenger's injury.

8. Carriers ⇨321(21)—Instruction held not erroneous as requiring carrier to disprove negligence by preponderance of evidence.

In action for death of passenger when street car in which he was riding struck a truck, instruction that proof of injury to passenger casts burden of proof on carrier alone held not erroneous as requiring street railroad to disprove negligence by a preponderance of the evidence.

9. Trial ⇨295(1)—All instructions are to be considered together.

In determining effect of a particular instruction, all instructions are to be considered together.

10. Appeal and error ⇨1048(6)—Cross-examination of motorman, relative to reasons for leaving employment of street railroad, held harmless.

Cross-examination of motorman of car, involved in accident, relative to reason for leaving employment of street railroad, if error, held harmless, where on direct testimony he stated that he left on his own accord, and where court later at defendant's request with consent of plaintiff fully instructed jury to disregard entire matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Margaret Atkinson, as administratrix of the estate of John J. Atkinson, deceased, against the United Railroads of San Francisco and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; MYERS, C. J., and LENNON and WASTE, JJ., dissenting.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The decedent, John J. Atkinson, was killed while riding as a passenger on one of the street cars operated by the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco, when said car collided with an automobile truck belonging to the codefendants George Sharetz & Sons. Plaintiff, as the administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, commenced this action for damages, charging that the wrongful death of her husband had been caused by the joint and concurring negligence of said defendants. The collision occurred on Third street, between Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third streets, San Francisco, on June 26, 1920. The negligence charged against the street car company was that its car was being carelessly operated at an excessive rate of speed, in violation of the municipal ordinance, and without any notice or warning of its approach; and, as against the codefendants, it was alleged that they carelessly and without notice or warning of any kind operated said truck from one side of Third street to the other in front of said street car. The action was tried before a jury, resulting in a verdict for the sum of $22,700 in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco; the owners of the truck were absolved from liability. The defendant United Railroads of San Francisco has appealed.

The evidence, bearing upon some points, is conflicting, but the sufficiency thereof, to sustain the verdict, is not challenged; four of the five points urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment consisting of attacks upon the instructions, while the fifth point is an assignment of error pertaining to the admissibility of evidence. The circumstances leading up to the collision are as follows: Shortly after the noon hour, on Saturday, the day of the accident, Atkinson, the decedent, boarded a south-bound car of the defendant company on Third street, some distance north of the intersection of Third and Twenty-Second streets, which car was then, with a number of others, standing on a loop or curve, near the Union Iron Works, for the purpose of allowing passengers to board the same. There was also a string of empty street cars standing on the north-bound tracks, on Third street, between Twenty-Second and Twenty-

Third streets, waiting to take the loop, and which obscured the view of the motorman of the south-bound cars, from observing north-bound traffic on the easterly side of Third street. At this particular time the easterly side of Third street, between the north-bound cars and the curb, was practically blocked by parked automobiles, thereby making it necessary for north-bound traffic on Third street to proceed to the left of those empty street cars. This situation made it dangerous for the south-bound street cars to travel fast or without warning between Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third streets. Respondent's evidence shows that, notwithstanding the situation described, the motorman of the crowded car on which decedent was riding applied the propelling power of the car in full when he left the loop, and, as the car approached Twenty-Second street, its speed increased, on account of the descent in grade, so that when it passed Twenty-Second street it was running without any warning at the rate of between 30 and 40 miles an hour. Before it reached Twenty-Third street it collided with the broad side of the truck, demolishing the front end of the car and resulting in the decedent's death. The evidence further shows that the truck at the time of the collision was attempting to turn around on Third street, in order to return to Twenty-Third street, and that the motorman observed said truck at a considerable distance before the collision. The truck had proceeded up Third street, on the easterly side thereof, until it had almost reached the most southerly end of the string of empty street cars standing on the north-bound tracks, but, being unable to make a turn at Twenty-Second street, owing to a torn-up condition of the street at that intersection, and being unable also to proceed farther northerly on the easterly side of Third street, because that side of the street was blocked with standing automobiles and street cars, the driver attempted to make the turn at the point indicated, which was some 300 feet north of the intersection of Twenty-Third street, when the collision occurred.

[1] The first contention made by appellant is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, first, for the reason that it was a question for the jury to determine which instrumentality was the proximate cause of the injury. It is insisted by appellant that before the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be declared to the jury it must appear as a matter of law that appellant had exclusive control of the causative force, and that the accident could not plausibly have happened without defendant being negligent; also that it must clearly appear that the immediate cause of the accident is under the control of appellant or those for whom it is responsible, and that, where the immediate cause of the injury is only a consequence of an act controlled by the defendant, and not the act itself, the presumption of negligence does not arise, because the proximate cause of the act is then brought in question. In support of this contention appellant cites and relies on the case of Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co. & Nat. Brewing Co., 134 Cal. 549, 66 P. 787, 55 L. R. A. 608, wherein it is claimed the court held that in a suit against two defendants arising out of a collision between a car and a brewing company's wagon there was no presumption or inference of negligence against either defendant.

This same question has been before the courts of this state on several occasions since Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., supra, was decided, and this contention has been, we think, definitely determined adversely to appellant's views. In those later cases the ruling in Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., supra, has been uniformly interpreted to mean that under the circumstances therein presented no presumption of negligence arises against both defendants, which, obviously is a different proposition than holding, as appellant contends, that there is no presumption of negligence against either defendant; and in those later cases the doctrine has been made clear that under such circumstances a presumption or inference of negligence does arise as against the carrier on whose instrumentality the injured party was riding at the time he received his injuries. For instance, in the case of Houghton v. Market Street Ry., 1 Cal. App. 576, 82 P. 972, it was said:

"Appellants, however, contend for a rule which we think is not sustained by authority or reason—namely, that no presumption of negligence arose against either defendant, citing Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 549, 66 Pac. 787. That case went no further than to decide that no presumption of negligence arose against both defendants; it appearing that the injury occurred to a passenger on the railway company's car in a collision with the defendant brewing company's wagon. That a presumption of negligence arose as against the defendant railway company in the present case, see * * * Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 280, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171, 70 Pac. 169. * * * Sullivan v. Market Street Ry. Co., 136 Cal. 479, 69 P. 143."

The case of Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 P. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171, was an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a car of the Los Angeles Traction Company and one of the Los Angeles Railway Company. The court, in discussing the case of Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., supra, said:

"It was held that no presumption of negligence arose in a suit against the railway company and the owner of the wagon as between themselves. The trial court refused to instruct the jury, at plaintiff's request, that a presumption of negligence arose against both defendants. * * * But the question now here was not decided. * * * The question now here is as to the presumption against the proprietor of the vehicle occupied by the plaintiff. Clearly the rule applies to such proprietor. * * * If the fault or negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury was attributable to some other vehicle under other and independent control, the defendant could so show, and that would be a good defense, but the presumption of defendant's negligence arises regardless of the fact that the injury may have been caused by some other agency. The instruction did not shift the burden of proof of the whole case to defendant. It was nothing more than saying that, upon the particular issue, plaintiff has established negligence on defendant's part, and defendant must meet this proof by 'showing that the injury was without any negligence on its part.'"

This language was quoted with approval in Housel v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 167 Cal. 245, 139 P. 73, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 665. It is therefore plain, we think, that "as against the carrier it appears to be settled by the decisions in this state that under such circumstances as appear here the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable in favor of the passenger." Housel v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra.

[2] We believe the use of the word "presumption" in said instruction, instead of the word "inference," was not fatal thereto. It is true, as appellant points out, in the recent case of Dowd v. Atlas Taxicab & Service Co., 187 Cal. 523, 202 P. 870, the court held that the trial court was justified in modifying a proposed instruction, in that particular, before it was given to the jury; but the court did not go so far as to hold that the use of the word "inference" was essential to the soundness of said instruction; and, inasmuch as the form used in the present case has been expressly approved in numerous previous cases which are hereinafter cited, we are of the opinion that the giving of the same in the form complained of did not have the prejudicial effect upon the jury appellant attributes to it. Meyer v. McNutt Hospital, 173 Cal. 156, 159 P. 436; Wyatt v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 170, 103 P. 892; Housel v. Pacific Electric Co., supra; Steele v. Pacific Elec. Co., 168 Cal. 375, 143 P. 718; Osgood v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 P. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171; McCurrie v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 P. 324; Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146.

[3-6] Appellant's next point relates to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The case was presented to the jury, so far as the evidence was concerned, in the same manner as if it were an ordinary action for damages, based upon negligence; the plaintiff having assumed the burden of proof upon all affirmative allegations set forth in the complaint, and the trial court having fully instructed the jury that the burden was upon plaintiff to prove those allegations before she was entitled to a verdict. However, along with the other instructions given, the court instructed the jury, in effect, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied, and gave two instructions upon that subject; one being general in form and the other applicable to the particular acts of negligence pleaded. Appellant contends that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur did not apply, and that it was therefore error for the court to instruct the jury that it did. This contention is grounded upon the claim that respondent, in her complaint, pleaded specific acts of negligence; that consequently she excluded from the case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and lost the right to have the jury instructed upon that subject. As sustaining such contention appellant cites and relies principally upon the recent cases of Connor v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A. L. R. 1462; Marovich v. Central California Traction Co., 191 Cal. 295, 216 P. 595, and McKeon v. Lissner (Cal. Sup.) 223 P. 965, which cases, it may be said in passing, were the first ones decided in this state wherein there was an enforcement of the rule that allegations of specific acts of negligence precluded the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and all of those cases were decided after the trial of the instant case. In so far as appellant is concerned, it was alleged in the complaint that it "negligently and carelessly, and without any notice or warning, ran and operated said street car along the south-bound track maintained by defendant * * * at a greater speed than fifteen miles per hour, in violation of section 3" of the municipal ordinance. Appellant's codefendant was also charged with concurring negligence in the operation of its truck, and it was then alleged that the concurring negligence of both defendants constituted the proximate cause of the injuries. Answering appellant's contention, respondent disputes the assertion that the allegations of negligence contained in said complaint were confined to specific acts, and in this regard claims that both general and specific acts of negligence are alleged, and that the situation is therefore controlled by the decision in Roberts v. Sierra Ry. Co., 14 Cal. App. 183, 111 P. 519, 527, wherein it was held that allegations of specific acts of negligence do not preclude reliance upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, where general negligence is also alleged. In support of such claim respondent endeavors to point out that the allegations in this complaint are comparatively as general in form as those employed in numerous other cases wherein the courts of this state have held that application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was proper. Sallee v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 40 Cal. App. 51, 180 P. 74; Zerbe v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 56 Cal. App. 583, 205 P. 887; Murray v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 49 Cal. App. 462, 193 P. 596; Bourguignon v. Peninsular Ry. Co., 40 Cal. App. 689, 181 P. 669; Lippert v. Pacific Sugar Co., 33 Cal. App. 198, 164 P. 810; Soto v. Spring Valley Water Co., 39 Cal. App. 187, 178 P. 305. However that may be, we think that the question of whether or not the complaint also contained allegations of general negligence becomes immaterial, in view of the conclusion we have reached that under the circumstances revealed by the record the instructions complained of were not prejudicial, in that they could not have applied to any other acts of negligence than those specific acts pleaded, and that so far as those acts were concerned plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

Upon investigation of the adjudicated cases upon this question it will be ascertained that a sharp conflict of authority exists in reference to the extent to which the court should go in the enforcement of such rule. In some states the courts have gone so far as to establish, and have attempted to follow, an absolute rule to the effect that, where specific acts of negligence are pleaded, the right to rely upon the presumption resulting from the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is totally lost. Cooper v. Century Realty Co., 224 Mo. 709, 123 S. W. 848; Roscoe v. Metropolitan Street Ry. Co., 202 Mo. 576, 101 S. W. 32; May v. City of Hannibal, 186 Mo. App. 602, 172 S. W. 471; Byland v. E. I. Du Pont de Nemours, 93 Kan. 288, 144 P. 251, L. R. A. 1915F, 1000; Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Leonard, 126 Ill. App. 189. And this is so even though the complaint also contains allegations of general negligence. May v. City of Hannibal, supra. In other states the courts have gone almost to the other extreme in holding that plaintiff is in no wise deprived of the benefit of such doctrine merely because he has made allegations of specific omissions of duty. Walters v. Seattle R. & S. R. Co., 48 Wash. 233, 93 P. 419, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788; Washington-Virginia R. Co. v. Bouknight, 113 Va. 696, 75 S. E. 1032, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 546; McNamara v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 202 Mass. 497, 89 N. E. 131; Cassady v. Old Colony, etc., Ry. Co., 184 Mass. 156, 68 N. E. 10, 63 L. R. A. 285; Nashville I. Ry. v. Gregory, 137 Tenn. 422, 193 S. W. 1053.

But a third class of cases is found in still other jurisdictions wherein a qualified rule is adopted and followed, which is to the effect that, where plaintiff makes specific allegations of negligence, he must rely for his recovery upon, and he is limited to, such specific acts of negligence, and cannot recover for any other negligent act, but he is not deprived of the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur so far as those specific acts of negligence are concerned. In other words, it is held in substance that the allegation of specific acts of negligence, while not depriving plaintiff of the benefit of said doctrine, relieves the carrier from the burden of disproving or meeting any other negligent acts than those alleged, for the reason that, having specified the acts of negligence, plaintiff will be confined to them and not allowed to prove or to recover upon other causes than those alleged. Palmer Brick Co. v. Chenall, 119 Ga. 842, 47 S. E. 329; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Sheeks, 155 Ind. 74, 56 N. E. 434; Southern Ry. Co. v. Adams, 52 Ind. App. 322, 100 N. E. 774; Louisville & S. I. Traction Co. v. Worrell, 44 Ind. App. 480, 86 N. E. 78. Thompson on Negligence (volume 6, § 7643) states this modified rule as follows:

"The plaintiff, in an action for personal injuries, is not deprived of his right to rely upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur by reason of having averred the particular act of negligence complained of, where such act is the one which the legal inference of negligence tends to establish,"

—and gives as authority the case of Galagher v. Edison Illuminating Co., 72 Mo. App. 576, which case is apparently a modified view of the absolute rule announced in other cases in that same state.

In adopting a rule for this state, we are of the opinion that it was not intended to declare an absolute and unqualified rule, that is, one so drastic as to deny plaintiffs in all cases, and under all circumstances, the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, merely because they have voluntarily gone further than the law required them to go, in particularizing the specific acts of negligence upon which they relied for a recovery; but that it was intended that the more liberal rule should be followed which restricts plaintiff, in his proof and recovery, to the specific acts alleged, and relieves the defendant from the burden of exculpating himself from any other acts of negligence than those alleged, but which does not, so far as those particular acts of negligence are concerned, deprive plaintiff of the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. This conclusion is based, primarily, upon the fact that admittedly the rule, as enforced in this state, is not without qualification, for in Connor v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., supra, it is said:

"However, where the explanation leaves it doubtful as to whether or not the ultimate cause of the injury is the negligence of the party charged, it is proper to instruct the jury as to the res ipsa loquitur doctrine." Zerbe v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 56 Cal. App. 583, 205 P. 887.

And again, in Roberts v. Sierra Ry. Co., supra, wherein it is held that, notwithstanding allegations of specific acts, the presence of additional allegations of general negligence justifies the application of said doctrine. Secondly, we find nothing in the holding or the reasoning of any of the three cases relied upon by appellant which conflicts with the liberal rule we believe was intended to be declared and followed.

The case of Connor v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., supra, was one wherein the judgment was reversed, not because the trial court instructed the jury that the doctrine of presumed negligence did apply, but because of its refusal to instruct the jury that such doctrine did not apply; and such doctrine did not apply for the obvious reason that the statement of plaintiff's cause of action and the proof offered in support thereof showed that the accident was caused by negligent acts which did not give rise to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. In Marovich v. Central California Traction Co., supra, five specific acts of negligence were charged in the complaint. A verdict was awarded to plaintiff. Upon appeal it was held that there was no evidence whatever offered in support of one of those alleged acts; although two of the others were proved, the court held, as matter of law, that neither constituted negligence; and of the remaining two the court said that there was no sequential relationship between them and the injury. The giving of the instruction upon presumed negligence was therefore erroneous because it allowed the jury to base its verdict upon some element of damage not pleaded, and perhaps not proved.

The case of McKeon v. Lissner, supra, was reversed mainly because it was alleged that the injuries were received as a result of the failure of defendants to keep an elevator and the apparatus for operating the same in order and repair; whereas the proof showed that the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries was the failure to have the hallway leading to the elevator properly lighted, and that act of negligence was not pleaded. It therefore appeared that the verdict was doubtless rendered against the defendant, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, for a specific act of negligence with which defendants were not charged in the complaint, and which, if true, did not give rise to the application of that doctrine.

Analyzing the record of the case at bar in the light of the three cases last above mentioned, we do not find present here any of the reasons which there invoked the operation of the rule and caused the reversals therein. Here the specific acts of negligence charged were that the car was operated at an excessive and dangerous rate of speed and without warning of its approach; the proof, so far as our attention has been called, was confined to those specific acts; appellant was not called upon to meet any other act of negligence than those alleged in the complaint. Notwithstanding the giving of the two instructions upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the trial court, in other instructions, clearly stated to the jury the specific acts of negligence alleged in the complaint, and which plaintiff would be required to establish before she was entitled to a verdict. Its instructions as to acts of negligence were restricted to the specific acts alleged. Later, it instructed the jury as follows:

"The burden of proof rests upon plaintiff to establish the negligence alleged in the complaint by a preponderance of evidence. If, therefore, you find that the evidence does not preponderate in favor of the plaintiff upon the issue of negligence, I instruct you that the plaintiff has not made out a case, and your verdict must be in favor of defendant. United Railroads of San Francisco. If you find that the evidence as to negligence on the part of the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco does not preponderate in favor of the plaintiff, but is equally balanced both in weight and quality, I instruct you that the verdict must be in favor of the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco."

And again in the following language:

"In civil cases, and, of course, you understand this is a civil case, the affirmative of the issue must be proven. The affirmative here is upon the plaintiff as to all affirmative allegations of the complaint. Upon the plaintiff, therefore, rests the burden of proof of such allegations."

In the case of Connor v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., supra, the situation was different. There "no instruction was given to the jury defining negligence or informing them that for the plaintiff to recover it must be shown that the injuries received by him were the proximate result of the negligence of the defendants nor was any instruction given upon the measure of damages." It is therefore manifest, we think, that the jury in the instant case could not have based its verdict against appellant upon any other act or acts of negligence, real or imaginary, than those alleged and proved; and, as before stated, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is admitted; counsel for appellant in their closing brief saying:

"At the outset of this reply brief we desire to state that no contention has heretofore been made nor is any contention now made that the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to justify the verdict."

In this regard the case is clearly distinguishable from Marovich v. Central California Traction Co., supra, because there, as above pointed out, the evidence was held to be entirely insufficient, upon any one of the five specific acts alleged, to justify a verdict for the plaintiff. In the present case, if the elements of violated signals, or defective brakes or other equipment, or any other independent specific act of negligence, had become an issue, a different situation might be presented. True, there was some evidence offered by respondent to the effect that the motorman abandoned his post, but such evidence cannot be considered as showing an independent act of negligence; it was merely incidental to and directly connected with the charge that the car was operated at a careless and dangerous speed. Appellant was consequently not required to exculpate itself from any acts of negligence other than those alleged. The instant case, in this respect, is not analogous to McKeon v. Lissner, supra, for there, as stated in the opinion:

"The defendants were brought into court upon notice that they were charged with negligence in respect of the repair of the elevator, and in no other respect whatever. They were never notified that any other or different claim would be made against them. Under these circumstances, to tell the jurors, after the close of the trial, that if they should find that the defendants were negligent in the matter of lighting the hallway they should return a verdict for plaintiff, would be to authorize a verdict against the defendants upon a claim against which they had never been called upon to defend themselves. This, in effect, is what was done by the giving of the res ipsa loquitur instructions. If plaintiff desired to rely upon this additional claim of negligence, she should have notified the defendants thereof by pleading it in her complaint. Cary v. L. A. Railway Co., 157 Cal. 599, 603, 108 Pac. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329."

Furthermore, it must be conceded that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur relates merely to the probative force of evidence. It does not dispense with the necessity of evidence of defendant's negligence. In other words, the presumption merely aids the plaintiff in the discharge of his burden. 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7641, and cases cited. From proof of certain facts presumptions may arise, but those presumptions are merely evidence, like other proof in the case, and, when the case is finally submitted to the jury, weighing presumptions, proofs, and all the evidence, the burden of proof is still upon the plaintiff to establish affirmatively the negligence of the defendant. Wiley et al. v. Bondy, 23 Misc. Rep. 658, 52 N. Y. S. 68. In the case at bar the trial court, as heretofore shown, fully instructed the jury upon the question of burden of proof. For the reasons stated, it must be held that respondent was entitled to the application of the rule of res ipsa loquitur, in so far as the specific acts of negligence alleged in the complaint were concerned, and, it appearing from the state of the record before us that the verdict of the jury was not based upon any other act of negligence than those alleged, that no error was committed in the giving of said instructions complained of.

[7, 8] Appellant also objects to instruction XIV, wherein it was stated that proof of injury to a passenger casts the burden of proof upon the carrier alone. In view of the language in Connor v. A., T. & S. F. Ry., supra, that where the explanation leaves it doubtful as to whether or not the ultimate cause of the injury is the negligence of the party charged, it is proper to instruct the jury as to the res ipsa loquitur doctrine, we think the instruction complained of was properly given, and that the instruction did not have the effect, as appellant contends, of compelling appellant to overcome or disprove negligence by a preponderance of evidence. McCurrie v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 561, 55 P. 324; Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 P. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171; Roberts v. Sierra Ry. Co., supra. It related merely to the establishment of a prima facie case. Upon the subject of burden of proof the jury was fully instructed, as the instructions heretofore quoted will show.

VERNON v. PLUMAS LUMBER CO.

[9] Instruction XV is attacked for the alleged reason that said instruction assumed there was an absence of evidence showing that the death of decedent was caused without negligence on the part of appellant. While this form of instruction, if standing alone, might be subject to criticism (Scarborough v. Urgo, 191 Cal. 341, 216 P. 534), the fault therein disappears when it is read with the other instructions, and all are considered together. Boa v. S. F., etc., Ry. Co., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2. And, besides, the form of instruction here given has been in several cases expressly upheld. Murray v. United Railroads, 49 Cal. App. 462, 193 P. 596.

The contention is also made that the court erred in giving instruction LI, claiming that it was an instruction upon a question of fact. In the case of Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 166 P. 18, the court said that—

"The duty of stopping, looking, and listening made incumbent upon one about to cross the right of way of a steam railroad is not the rule governing the rights of foot passengers and vehicle drivers in venturing upon, crossing, or using the tracks of a street railroad."

When the instruction complained of is read in connection with instruction XXXIII, it is entirely free from the vice asserted.

[10] The final contention of appellant is that error was committed because counsel for respondent was allowed to ask certain questions of the motorman of the car involved in the accident relative to reasons for his leaving the employment of the appellant company. Counsel for appellant had already elicited from the witness the evidence that he had left appellant's employ "of his own accord," and respondent's counsel therefore claimed the right to cross-examine him upon the subject. Assuming that there was transgression committed by respondent's counsel in this respect, we think it was not serious, in view of the fact that the court later, at appellant's request, with the consent of respondent, fully instructed the jury to disregard the entire matter.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; ST. SURE, J.

1. False imprisonment ☞8—Delay in taking plaintiff before magistrate held to constitute false imprisonment.

Where defendant's agents, who twice arrested plaintiff without warrant, instead of taking plaintiff before magistrate as required by Pen. Code, §§ 145, 849, each time placed him in jail while they consulted attorneys, and then repaired to the magistrate's office, though the magistrate was accessible, there was such unnecessary delay in taking plaintiff before magistrate as constituted false imprisonment.

2. False imprisonment ☞8—Unreasonable delay in bringing prisoner before magistrate constitutes false imprisonment.

A prisoner is entitled to a hearing within a reasonable time after his arrest, and an unreasonable delay in bringing him before magistrate constitutes false imprisonment.

3. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Trial court's conclusion on conflicting facts conclusive on appeal.

In an action for malicious prosecution, where defense rested upon disputed facts, conclusion of trial court upon such facts is conclusive on appeal.

4. Malicious prosecution ☞64(2)—Finding of want of probable cause sustained.

In an action for malicious prosecution, evidence held to sustain finding that defendant's agents did not act in good faith upon advice of counsel, nor state all facts in case, and were not advised that a criminal prosecution would lie, and that there was no probable cause for prosecution.

5. Malicious prosecution ☞20—Advice concerning civil rights held properly excluded in action for malicious prosecution.

In action for malicious prosecution, for interference with defendant's timber rights by operation of plaintiff's mining claim, evidence as to advice received by defendant from forestry service of the United States held properly excluded, since advice concerning civil or equitable rights would have no bearing in a criminal action.

6. Appeal and error ☞233(1)—Objection to misjoinder of actions not taken in statutory manner not available on appeal.

An objection to misjoinder of actions, not taken in manner provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 434, is not available on appeal.

7. False imprisonment ☞36—Imprisonment and following prosecutions not merged as respected damages.

That arrests and false imprisonment without warrant and without being promptly taken before magistrate were followed by prosecutions based on complaints and warrants, in which plaintiff was again arrested, did not merge the wrongs or deprive plaintiff of right to recover for each period of incarceration and for the malicious prosecutions following.

8. Malicious prosecution ⚖️69—In awarding damages, trial court justified in considering punishment plaintiff would have received had he been found guilty.

In action for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, trial court in awarding damages was justified in considering punishment plaintiff would have received had he been found guilty of charges alleged against him by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by W. P. Vernon against the Plumas Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, and M. C. Kerr, of Quincy, for appellant.
L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment awarding the plaintiff the sum of $1,650 damages, for and on account of four causes of action, two for unlawful arrests and two for malicious prosecution. It appears from the transcript that, on or about the 3d day of January, 1918, the plaintiff, W. P. Vernon, with others, located a certain placer mining claim named the "Questionnaire" situated in Plumas county, state of California; that in this location notice the claim was described as being situated in range 11 east; in October of the same year, upon having a survey made of the claim, it was discovered that the claim was really situated in range 12. Thereupon, and on the 9th day of that month, a new location was posted and recorded correctly describing the range in which the claim was situated. It also appears that from the date of the original location the plaintiff continued in possession of said mining claim, performed annual work thereon, and proceeded to some extent with the development thereof. This work was continued from time to time by the plaintiff down to the time of the occurrences constituting the gravamen of this action. Some time between the 3d day of January, 1918, and the 1st of October, 1918, the defendant lumber company purchased from the United States, through its forestry service, the timber situated on certain lands in Plumas county. The area on which the timber purchased was situated embraces the mining claim of the appellant. Nothing was done by the appellant toward removing the timber situated on the plaintiff's mining claim until early in the spring of 1923, when the defendant began making preparations to remove said timber, and built a logging road and log landing in a certain ravine below the point where the plaintiff had theretofore been engaged in mining, and down which ravine the waters used by him in his mining operations had flowed and would naturally flow. It does not appear that the plaintiff knew anything of the construction of this road or of the logging dam.

Early in the month of May, 1923, the plaintiff returned to his mining claim and prepared to again work thereon, and, in doing so, turned water from the source of his supply through a ditch theretofore constructed by him conveying water to his diggings. On the 17th, while the plaintiff was at work, he discovered that water being used by him had been turned out of this ditch, and upon inquiry plaintiff was advised by one McDonald, the wood's foreman of the appellant, that he (McDonald) had turned the water out of the plaintiff's ditch and away from the plaintiff's diggings. Upon being advised of this fact, the plaintiff on the following day, May 18th, called at the office of the appellant and inquired of I. M. Johnson, the manager of appellant, if the water used by him in his mining operations would cause appellant any injury. It appears that Mr. Johnson refused to discuss the matter with the plaintiff, but threatened to have the plaintiff arrested and taken to Quincy if he turned any water into that ravine and also told the plaintiff that he had "no business up there." Plaintiff returned to his mine and resumed work thereon, and while so engaged on the mine on May 19th he was arrested by Roy M. Johnson, an employee of the appellant, and son of I. M. Johnson. The arrest was made without any warrant having been issued for the apprehension of the respondent and without any complaint having been filed against him and while the plaintiff was engaged in working on the mining premises claimed as his property. Following this arrest, the plaintiff was taken to Quincy and, as found by the court, imprisoned in the county jail at Quincy for the period of three hours, during which time I. M. Johnson consulted an attorney named M. C. Kerr and the district attorney of Plumas county, and then went to the office of a justice of the peace at Quincy, swore to a complaint against the plaintiff, secured the issuance of a warrant of arrest, and thereafter the plaintiff was arrested under said warrant; the plaintiff, being allowed to go on his own recognizance, returned to his mining claim and again resumed operations thereon, and on the morning of May 21, 1923, he was again arrested by the said Roy M. Johnson without any warrant, taken to the town of Quincy, and detained at the county jail for the period of two hours, during which time the said I. M. Johnson swore to a second complaint, procured the issuance of a second warrant, and the plaintiff was subsequently rearrested under said second warrant. Thus the plaintiff was arrested twice without any warrants and twice after warrants had been issued. It appears also that the plaintiff was detained and held in the custody of the said Roy M. Johnson several hours other and in addition to the time he was confined in the county jail at Quincy. A trial being had upon the first complaint, the plaintiff was acquitted, and the second complaint was thereupon dismissed. Thereafter the plaintiff began this action, founded upon the alleged unlawful imprisonment on May 19, 1923, the alleged unlawful imprisonment on May 21, 1923, the alleged malicious prosecution of plaintiff, by reason of the first complaint sworn to by I. M. Johnson, and the alleged malicious prosecution of plaintiff by reason of the second complaint sworn to by the said I. M. Johnson. Two other grounds were alleged which need not here be considered, as they are in no wise involved in this case. It may be stated that the transcript shows that the arrests made without warrants were made upon the direction and procurement of I. M. Johnson, the manager of the defendant and appellant in this case. The charge of false imprisonment embraced in the plaintiff's complaint rests upon his unlawful detention prior to the issuance of any warrant for his arrest.

"When an arrest is made without a warrant by a peace officer or private person, the person arrested must, without unnecessary delay, be taken before the nearest or most accessible magistrate in the county in which the arrest is made, and an information, stating the charge against the person, must be laid before such magistrate."

Section 145 of the same Code is as follows:

"Every public officer or other person, having arrested any person upon a criminal charge, who willfully delays to take such person before a magistrate having jurisdiction, to take his examination, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

The facts exhibited by the transcript in this case, which we have set forth, show that there was no effort made by the agents of the defendant to comply with the provisions of section 849, supra. Instead of taking plaintiff before the magistrate, he was placed in jail while the acting parties themselves went and consulted two attorneys and then repaired to the magistrate's office. No reason is given whatever why the plaintiff was not taken before the magistrate at the time the persons effecting his arrest went to the office of the magistrate. That the magistrate was accessible clearly appears from the fact that the agents of the defendant went to his office and swore out a warrant. These facts appear in relation to both arrests, they show clearly that there was no necessity for imprisoning the plaintiff either upon the first or the second arrest; that there was no warrant for confining him in the jail; and that it was their duty and within their power to take the plaintiff to the office of the magistrate in Quincy, without first placing him in the county jail. We do not need to decide whether the agents of the appellant brought themselves within the provisions of section 145, Penal Code, further than to state that there is nothing in the record establishing any necessity for the action of the agents of the defendant, in taking the plaintiff to the county jail instead of taking him with themselves at the time they repaired to the presence of the magistrate. Under the circumstances, we do not very well see how the trial court could have come to any other conclusion than that there was an unnecessary delay in taking the plaintiff before the committing magistrate, and therefore that his imprisonment, as found by the trial court, was wholly unwarranted. That the agents of the appellant were ignorant of the provisions of section 849 of the Penal Code does not lessen their duty in such cases, nor obviate the results of the clear showing in the transcript that the plaintiff was unnecessarily confined in the county jail while deliberations were being had as to the further proceedings to be taken. In Keefe v. Hart et al., 213 Mass. 476, 100 N. E. 558, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 716, the Supreme Court, considering similar questions, said:

"It cannot be determined as a matter of law that a delay of an hour and a half, by officers arresting without warrant, in taking the prisoner before a magistrate, was reasonable, since such delay might have been beyond the time of adjournment of the magistrate's court, and involved a further delay; the question becoming one of law only when the facts are agreed."

And the same court in its opinion further said:

"The defendants had no right to detain the plaintiff to enable them to make a further investigation of the charge against him. It was their duty to bring him before the court as soon as reasonably could be done."

[2] The defendant's agents in this case did exactly what the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has said is unlawful to be done under such circumstances. The plaintiff was not only imprisoned while the agents of the appellant were not only not investigating the charge against the plaintiff, but were making efforts to have some charge placed against the plaintiff, and his arrest thereafter effected under a warrant charging him with an offense. In Jackson v. Miller, 84 N. J. Law, 189, 86 A. 50, it was held that the detention in a public place for even an hour of a person arrested without a warrant, by a deputy fish and game warden, upon what seemed to be probable or good cause to believe that the law had been violated, constituted false imprisonment. The rule is well established that a prisoner is entitled to a hearing within a reasonable time after his arrest, and that a delay for an unreasonable time in bringing him before the magistrate for examination constitutes false imprisonment. Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 528, 102 P. 12; Clark v. Tilton, 74 N. H. 330, 68 A. 335; Piedmont Hotel Co. v. Henderson, 9 Ga. App. 672, 72 S. E. 51; Jackson v. Miller, 84 N. J. Law, 189, 86 A. 50; Schoette v. Drake, 139 Wis. 18, 120 N. W. 393. The foregoing clearly establishes that the two charges of false imprisonment preferred by the plaintiff against the defendant in his action for damages are abundantly supported by the law and testimony, and that no other conclusion could have been reached by the trial court.

Are the two causes of malicious prosecution supported by the record? Was there probable cause, and did the defendant's agents act upon the advice of counsel in such manner and degree as relieves the defendant from responsibility?

By way of special defense, the defendant alleged in its answer that it consulted M. C. Kerr, an attorney at law of good standing, having offices in Quincy, Plumas county, state of California, and also the district attorney of Plumas county, and stated to said persons all the facts of the case and was thereupon advised by the said Kerr and the district attorney that a prosecution would lie against the plaintiff and that the defendant acted honestly and in good faith upon that advice and thereupon instituted the prosecutions referred to in plaintiff's complaint. The finding of the trial court was that the agents of the defendant did not act either honestly or in good faith upon the advice of counsel and that the defendant's agents did not state to said persons all the facts in the case, and the defendant's agents were not advised that a criminal prosecution would lie. The court also found that there was not probable cause for the prosecutions herein referred to. In Johnson v. Southern Pac. Co., 157 Cal. 333, 107 P. 611, the court held:

"When there is no conflict in the evidence, the question whether or not the evidence introduced for the plaintiff shows probable cause is always for the court to decide; and it is error in such case, where there is probable cause, to submit any question to the jury."

In 16 California Jurisprudence, 751, § 18, the law applicable to the questions which we are considering is thus set forth:

"The good faith, the belief and the knowledge of defendant are necessarily questions of fact to be determined by a jury, unless established by uncontroverted testimony or admitted by the defendant or his counsel. So whether or not the defendant acted bona fide upon counsel's advice is a question of fact for the jury. The question whether the defendant had or had not probable cause for instituting the proceeding is a matter of law to be determined from the facts established in the case. If the facts are admitted, the question is solely one of law, for the court. If the facts are disputed and the evidence is conflicting, the question of what the facts are is one of fact, and the question as to whether or not the facts found establish want of probable cause is one of law for the court. If, however, there is affirmative evidence of the actual belief of the defendant sufficient to justify a conclusion that he did not in fact believe in the truth of the charge, the question of probable cause to that extent involves a question of fact to be submitted to the jury."

In Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, quoting from page 202, 29 P. 31, 32, we find the questions here presented treated in this manner:

"Appellant contends that he was advised by counsel that there was probable cause for believing respondent guilty of perjury; that he in good faith acted upon such advice; and, therefore, that he is not responsible, even though there may have been no probable cause. In order to avail himself of this defense, it devolved upon the defendant to prove that before receiving the advice he had fairly and fully communicated to his counsel, or at least that his counsel knew, all the facts within defendant's knowledge tending to prove or to disprove probable cause for the prosecution. * * * Did the defendant make the required communication to his own counsel? And did he believe the plaintiff guilty, at the time he made his affidavit to that effect? These questions having been properly submitted to the jury with proper instructions by the court, the verdict necessarily implies that the jury answered one of them, at least, in the negative."

The court then stated that there was evidence tending to prove that the defendant did not fully state to his counsel all the facts within his knowledge, etc.

The asserted superior title to the premises on which the plaintiff was working appears to have been really the basis of the prosecutions instituted against him and this superior claim appears to be based to a considerable extent upon the error which occurred in the plaintiff's first location notice. We do not here assume to consider any question of title other than as the same bears upon the finding of the trial court that there was no probable cause for the action taken by the defendant. The transcript shows that the plaintiff did the necessary annual assessment work upon his mining claim and that he had worked upon his claim every year after its location up to the time of his arrest. The testimony also shows that the defendant's manager had seen the plaintiff working his mining claim.

The testimony in this particular is as follows:

"Q. You knew that he (plaintiff) had been mining in that vicinity before? A. Yes, sir. I had seen him working there.

"Q. And in doing that you knew that he was mining on his own ground? A. I knew he was mining up there.

"Q. And you knew that he mined there with water, and that that water would come down this particular creek where you built your log-way? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you knew that before you built this road and log landing, didn't you? A. Yes."

The testimony of the witness Orr of the United States Forestry Service is illustrative:

"A. I told Mr. Vernon that I would like to have him show me where his claim was, so that if the claim was owned by him or he had a title to it, we could keep off it. Mr. Vernon and Mr. Johnson and I walked up and found this notice on a tree. * * *

"Q. You refer to the notice dated October 9, 1918? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And where did you see that notice at that time? A. He did.

"Q. And what did he say about it; that is, Mr. Vernon? A. He said that was where he had filed the mining location.

"Q. What did you say to him? A. I asked him what date it was.

"Q. And what did he say? A. He said, 'I don't know,' but he says, 'We will look on the claim.' I says, 'All right, we will look,' and it said October 9, 1918.

"Q. And what did you say to him? A. I said, 'Mr. Vernon, if that is the case your timber (claim?) has been taken up since the timber was sold to Mr. Johnson, and under that procedure it would be necessary for us to go ahead and cut the timber to see that Mr. Johnson removed it.' * * *

"Q. And what did he say in reply to that? A. He says, 'I think there is some mistake on this notice and let us check it,' and we checked the description and found it was wrong, and I says, 'I will go into the recorder's office and see if your filing date is right.'"

The question of title appears to have been taken up by the defendant with the Forestry Service of the United States and the following telegram received:

"San Francisco, Calif., May 18, 1923.

"Forest Supervisor

"Quincy California

"Notify owner Questionnaire Claim any interference with timber sale operations will result in legal proceedings Federal Court Recent decision Circuit Court Appeals sustains our position."

This telegram, or a correct copy of it, appears to have been exhibited to the plaintiff by some one of the defendant's agents. The witness then testified:

"A. Mr. Vernon was, at the time I called on him, eating his dinner. He came out, and I handed him a copy of a telegram from the forestry and let him read it, and in the presence of Mr. Erickson and myself he put on his glasses and read it.

"Q. And then did he hand it back to you? A. He did.

"Q. What did he say? A. 'Well, what about it?' was his exact words, and I wanted to find out whether he was going to turn the water in or not, which I asked him.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said he was."

The transcript shows more testimony along the same line, but the whole purport of it exhibits simply a dispute as to who was the owner of the premises, and this apparently was all founded upon the errors in the plaintiff's notices of location and as to what rights, if any, the plaintiff acquired thereunder, also the alleged superior right of the defendant to the unobstructed use of the premises in order to remove the timber standing thereon appears as an actuating motive in all the proceedings.

As to whether the defendant acted upon the advice of counsel, what advice was received, and what was stated to counsel, the appellant relies upon the following:

"Q. And did you tell him what the Forestry Service had done about sending the telegram up? A. Yes.

"Q. And did you tell everything that you knew about this particular incident? A. Yes.

"Q. That caused you to complain against Mr. Vernon? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what did Mr. Kerr tell you? A. He suggested just exactly what I done.

"Q. And what was that, what did he suggest? A. I file a complaint against him for interfering with our operations.

"Q. Now, did you act honestly and in good faith upon the advice of Mr. Kerr? A. Absolutely; yes, sir.

"Q. Were you actuated by malice, hatred, or ill feeling, in swearing out the complaint against Mr. Vernon? A. Never had a word with him in my life and no malice against him whatever.

"Q. And when you acted upon the advice of Mr. Kerr and swore to this complaint, were you actuated by an honest belief that he was guilty of the offense that you charged him with? A. Absolutely.

"Q. When you instituted the criminal prosecution against Mr. Vernon upon the advice of Mr. Kerr, did you honestly believe in good faith that he was guilty of the offense as charged against him? A. Absolutely; yes, sir.

"Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, besides consulting Mr. Kerr before you swore to this complaint on May 19th, did you also consult the district attorney of this county? A. I did.

"Q. Mr. S. C. Young? A. Yes.

"Q. And did you state to Mr. Young all of the facts that you have stated that you stated to Mr. Kerr? A. I did.

"Q. Did Mr. Kerr accompany you to Mr. Young, the district attorney's office? A. He did.

"Q. And was he there during the time you stated the facts to him? A. Part of the time.

"Q. Did the district attorney—what did the district attorney tell you as to whether or not a prosecution would lie against the defendant, against Mr. Vernon? A. If it would what?

"Q. What did the district attorney tell you as to whether or not a complaint would be good against the defendant Vernon, against the defendant Vernon in that proceeding? A. He thought it was all right.

"Q. And who prepared the complaint? A. The district attorney, Mr. Young.

"Q. Now, did you state to the district attorney and to Mr. Kerr all of the facts within your knowledge in respect to this offense? A. Absolutely.

"Q. With which you had charged Mr. Vernon? A. Yes.

"Q. Mr. Kerr, did Mr. Johnson, Mr. I. M. Johnson, consult you on the 19th day of May, 1923, in respect— A. (interrupting). As to the particular date—

"Q. Let me finish my question—in respect to whether or not he could swear to a complaint against Mr. Vernon? A. The date of the first complaint, that the first complaint was filed, Mr. Johnson, according to my best recollection of the thing, was, he called me on the phone in the morning before he came down, and we had some conversation regarding Mr. Vernon turning in some water that was damaging the roadway, etc., and something was said about an injunction being prepared or in the course of preparation by the Forest Department. However, I think that I told Mr. Vernon over the 'phone that I would see him when he came down, and upon his arrival in Quincy he either came to the office or called me up from the Forest Office. I am not sure as to that. At any rate, we were together at the office of the Forest Supervisor of the Plumas National Forest, at the office in Quincy, and in conversation with Mr. Rogers there the matter of this timber sale and the rights under it were discussed, and I don't know whether Mr. Orr was there or not; but, at any rate, there was something came up about there apparently had been some discussion as to this before and Mr. Rogers gave me a letter that was written by Mr. Dechant and giving the citations of the United States and federal citations regarding the rights of a timber purchaser to move timber. Well, I think that was one the things that I went—that the consultation at the Forest Office was as to the fact as to whether or not a timber sale had been made. That was substantiated. Then the matter of destruction of property, and Mr. Johnson informed me that the water had been turned in and was destroying the property and the road, the road of the Plumas Lumber Company. I went with Mr. Johnson to the district attorney's office and was there a portion of the time while Mr. Johnson was giving him the facts concerning the matter, but I wasn't there all the time. I wasn't there the full time and personally don't know who prepared the complaint, but the complaint was afterwards prepared, but from the facts as given to me by Mr. Johnson and looking up the law, I did advise him that he had an action against Mr. Vernon for the injury, or attempted destruction of his property, not of Mr. Johnson's, but of the Plumas Lumber Company, I believe, or Mr. Johnson, under his timber sale."

On cross-examination, after testifying that he had threatened to arrest the plaintiff, the witness I. M. Johnson further testified:

"Q. You knew that he had been mining in that vicinity before? A. Yes, sir; I had seen him working there.

"Q. In that immediate vicinity, when you built your road this year, you knew that he had been working in that canyon for years? A. Yes, sir; I did.

"Q. What did you mean, Mr. Johnson, when you told him if he turned water into that canyon that you would take him to Quincy? A. Simply that I would arrest him for interfering.

"Q. Now, you had your mind made up from the time you had this visit from Mr. Vernon in your office, prior to any arrest at all, that the minute that he turned any water through to mine with, you were going to have him pinched, weren't you? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. What was your motive and reason for instituting both of these criminal prosecutions against Mr. Vernon? A. For protection to our business. We either had to close or stop Mr. Vernon, one or the other.

"Q. Now, then, you testified on direct examination, I think, that the reason you had Mr. Vernon arrested was because you wanted it as a protection to your business, is that right? A. Yes, sir."

[3, 4] There are other portions of the testimony referred to by the counsel for the respective parties, but we think the foregoing is sufficient to justify the trial court in reaching its conclusion in this case, and clearly sets forth that every element of defense tendered in this cause rested upon disputed facts, and therefore that the conclusion of the trial court upon such facts is conclusive here. There is sufficient testimony in the transcript, as set forth, to support the findings of the trial court, even though there is testimony from which the court might have come to a different conclusion. The transcript further shows that the witness Johnson was unable at the time of the trial to detail what facts he had stated either to Mr. Kerr or the district attorney, and the only evidence in relation thereto is such as hereinbefore set forth, which consisted simply of conclusions by the witness Johnson that he had stated all the facts and had honestly stated them and had an honest belief, etc. Whether such facts were all stated or honestly stated, or whether the manager of the plaintiff had such honest belief, were matters for the trial court to determine upon conflicting testimony, and being determined adversely to the appellant, cannot be otherwise determined here. The evidence here set forth is that most favorable to the appellant, and yet we think it clearly sufficient to justify the court in concluding that there was no probable cause. When thoroughly considered, we think the trial court had the right to conclude that the appellant was advised simply as to its civil rights and that the criminality of any acts on the part of the plaintiff were not controlling factors. As stated by the manager of the defendant, the arrest was "for protection of our business." To state it another way, it was the substitution of a criminal prosecution instead of a civil action because that method of procedure would more quickly stop the plaintiff's mining operations. All these matters which the trial court sitting without a jury was entitled to take into consideration we think answers all that the law demands in actions such as the one at bar. In Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, quoting from page 123, 204 P. 578, 580, it is stated:

"The law on the subject of malicious prosecution is well established. In McKenna v. Heinen, 128 Cal. 97 [60 Pac. 668], an action to recover for malicious prosecution, the court said: 'It is well settled that before a plaintiff can recover in an action for malicious prosecution he must establish concurrently that the defendant proceeded in the action brought by him with malice and without probable cause. The question of malice is one for the jury exclusively, but the court must determine, as matter of law, whether the facts and circumstances as they appear, or are found to exist, constituted probable cause. * * * While it is true that malice may be inferred from want of probable cause, the latter can never be implied from malice.' In Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 217, the court defined probable cause as 'a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true.' In Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 144, also an action for malicious prosecution, it was declared: 'The defense must be that he did believe and had reasonable grounds to believe at the time that the accusation he made was well founded.'"

All these necessary facts, as herein stated, being found adversely to the appellant upon conflicting testimony, establish the defendant's liability upon the two causes of action charging malicious prosecutions.

[5] During the course of the trial the appellant sought to introduce evidence that the Forestry Service of the United States had advised the defendant that the rights of the defendant in the premises predominated; that this information was founded upon certain decisions of the federal courts of the United States to the effect that the mere location of a mining claim gives to the person locating the same no title to the timber thereon, etc. This testimony was excluded, and the ruling of the court is assigned as error. The reasons given by the court in excluding the testimony are sufficient and need no elaboration:

"I will sustain the objection. This ruling is based upon the fact that any advice concerning the civil or equitable rights of the parties * * * would have no bearing whatever in a criminal action."

[6] It is further alleged that there was a misjoinder of actions. This objection, however, was not taken in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure and hence is not available here. Section 434, Code Civ. Proc.; Fellows v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 60, 90 P. 137; Ransch v. Arp, 39 Cal. App. 580, 179 P. 694.

[7] We do not find any merit in the contention of the appellant that double awards have been made herein. As we have shown, the allegation of false imprisonment contained in the plaintiff's complaint and in the testimony set forth in the transcript show two distinct arrests without warrants and imprisonment following each of said arrests and thereafter two other distinct arrests upon the issuing of warrants. The damages claimed, found, and allowed by the court were for the imprisonments following the arrests made without warrants and therefore had nothing to do with the causes of action culminating in the charges of malicious prosecutions. The prosecutions were based upon complaints and warrants and were separate and distinct from the previous false imprisonments; that they followed each other in successive events does not in any wise merge the wrongs inflicted or take away from the plaintiff the right to recover damages for both of the periods when he was falsely incarcerated, nor to recover damages for the malicious prosecutions which were thereafter instituted by the subsequent filing of complaints, issuance of warrants, and following arrests.

[8] It is finally urged that the awards allowed by the trial court are excessive. Had the plaintiff been found guilty of the charges alleged against him, he might have been incarcerated in the county jail for a period not exceeding six months or by a fine not exceeding the sum of $500 or both. We think the trial court was justified in taking into consideration such matters in measuring the culpability of the intent of the defendant's agents and what injuries they were attempting to inflict upon the plaintiff.

In Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 366, 184 P. 681, 12 A. L. R. 1007, the court set forth the matters that may be considered in fixing damages, and then said:

"In fixing damages in this class of cases, which is left to the discretion of the jury, and when the verdict has been approved by the trial court, this court is not authorized to grant a new trial upon the ground of excessive damages, except in a case where it is plain that the verdict was not the result of the fair and honest judgment of the jury"—citing a number of cases. "In the latter case it was said: 'The court below had the power to, and no doubt did, carefully weigh and consider the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the verdict was the correct conclusion from all the testimony in the case. It had the power to set aside the verdict, even though the evidence was not conflicting, if convinced that it was unjust, or not in accord with the weight of the evidence. Here we have no such power. The presumptions are all in favor of the correctness of the verdict. To this presumption is added, the sanction of the court below in denying the motion for a new trial.' * * * In the matter of punitive damages it is clear from the authorities that juries have a wider discretion in this regard than they have in the matter of compensatory damages."

[9] The exemplary damages in the instant case amount to the sum of $150, $100 in one case and $50 in the other; the remainder of the awards consisting of punitive damages awarded by the court. In the instant case the trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, and, unless there is some showing to that effect, we are not at liberty to assume that the trial court acted either from passion or prejudice or from any improper motives whatever.

The judgment and order of the trial court are hereby affirmed.

Mortgages ~~§~~316—Junior mortgage lien, extinguished by foreclosure of senior mortgage lien, held revived by junior mortgagor's acquisition of title.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2930, as to after-acquired titles, junior mortgage lien which was extinguished by foreclosure of senior deed of trust, held revived by junior mortgagor's acquisition of title through deed from purchaser at sale foreclosing senior lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Suit by N. P. Jensen against Margaret E. Duke and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant J. H. De Lange and others appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Hazen and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, all of Oakland, for appellants.

Miller, Thornton & Miller and Miller & Thornton, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CABANISS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This appeal, based upon the judgment roll, is from a decree ordering foreclosure of a mortgage held by plaintiff and later herein to be more particularly mentioned.

The facts, informally stated, are these: Plaintiff executed to A. F. Abbott and F. E. Winnegar a trust deed to a certain lot of land as security for $3,750 borrowed by plaintiff from Frank B. Abbott. In August, 1918, plaintiff sold the land to defendant Margaret Duke subject to the trust deed, she giving her note for the purchase price ($1,550), and a mortgage to secure its payment—this being the mortgage plaintiff seeks to foreclose. Plaintiff's debt to Frank B. Abbott not having been paid, on January 3, 1920, the property was validly sold at trustee's sale to him (said Frank B. Abbott); and on January 19, 1920, defendant Margaret Duke purchased the property from Frank

B. Abbott. On April 30, 1920, defendants Margaret and George E. Duke sold and deeded the land to defendants J. W. and J. D. De Lange, who, on the 4th day of June, 1921, executed to the defendant Oakland Title Insurance & Guaranty Company as trustee a deed to secure payment of $3,250 loaned the De Langes by defendant Equitable Life Insurance Company. All the instruments executed in these various transactions were seasonably recorded.

The sole question is: Was the mortgage lien (admittedly extinguished by the trustee's deed to Abbott) revived by his deed to defendant Margaret Duke (mortgagor), thereby restoring the mortgage as a lien enforceable against her and those deriving title or other interest from her.

There is an absolute dearth of authority in California upon the precise question here to be determined, and yet we feel persuaded that plaintiff's (respondent's) position finds support in section 2930 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"Title acquired by the mortgagor subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, inures to the mortgagee as security for the debt in like manner as if acquired before the execution."

Though defendant Margaret Duke lost title by reason of the trust sale to Abbott, she again acquired title under Abbott's deed to her, and the title thus acquired, inures "to the mortgagee as security for the debt in like manner as if acquired before the execution," i. e., of the mortgage. It will be noted that the instant case is brought literally within the words of the quoted section.

It is intimated by appellant that section 2930 of the Civil Code merely re-enacts a common-law rule pursuant to which title acquired by a mortgagor during the life of the mortgage only inures to the benefit of the mortgagee; and that the rule ceases to apply after foreclosure of senior mortgage or trust deed, as the second mortgage is thereby extinguished. Even though section 2930 of the Civil Code be, in a general way, a re-enactment of the rule already quoted, plaintiff's case is within the purview of the statute; and to hold otherwise would involve a strained construction, where every consideration of justice forbids that the mortgagor should hold his title obtained from Abbott free of plaintiff's mortgage lien.

It must also be borne in mind that many cited California cases holding that foreclosure of a senior lien extinguishes subsequent liens applied the doctrine as between a third person purchasing at such a sale and the junior incumbrancer, and therefore these decisions are not to be regarded as authority for our guidance in the instant case.

It may be further suggested that the reason of the rule which absolutely extinguishes junior mortgage lien following foreclosure of senior lien, the purchaser at foreclosure sale and his successors in interest being other than the mortgagor, would seem not to apply as to the mortgagor acquiring the title from foreclosure of the first mortgage, whether he acquired title directly under foreclosure deed or indirectly and as the grantee of a third party foreclosure-purchaser.

It is due appellant's counsel to say that he has cited one case (Plum v. Studebaker, 89 Mo. 162, 1 S. W. 217) which sustains his position, but which, however, we cannot see our way clear to accept as a correct exposition of the law in view of the positive mandate of the statute.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: KNIGHT, J.; ST. SURE, J.

Habeas corpus ⇨11—Writ discharged where petitioner submitted himself to custody for sole purpose of procuring determination of constitutional questions.

Where petitioner withdrew bail and submitted himself to custody for sole purpose of applying for writ to procure determination of constitutional questions, writ will be discharged and petitioner remanded to custody.

Application by M. E. Ortiz for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Walter W. Hoyer, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. M. Friedlander, City Prosecutor, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Petitioner, claiming to be under imprisonment upon a charge of having violated the terms of a certain ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, contends for his release under the writ of habeas corpus. Respondent insists that petitioner is not restrained of his liberty, as that term is to be understood when considering the right to the writ, and that, therefore, the writ must be refused.

Petitioner was taken into custody upon a charge of having violated the provisions of the ordinance. Of this there is no doubt. The undisputed showing of the record is, however, that he was admitted to cash bail in the sum of $20 by the court in which he was charged. Upon the giving of this bail he was released from custody. Later he withdrew the bail and submitted his person to restraint under the charge. Immediately thereafter he made application to this court in the present proceeding for the writ of habeas corpus. He was thereupon here admitted to bail in the sum of $100. This bail he at once gave, and he ever since has been at large.

From these circumstances there is but one inference justly to be drawn: Petitioner withdrew his bail in the nominal sum of $20 and thereupon submitted himself to custody for the sole purpose of making application for the writ of habeas corpus as a means by which to procure the determination of certain constitutional questions, and not at all for the purpose of procuring his release from an irksome restraint. The courts have often been called upon to deal with similar cases. See In re Gow, 139 Cal. 242, 73 P. 145; Ex parte Schmitz, 150 Cal. 663, 89 P. 438; In re Miller, 13 Cal. The principle of these cases exactly fits the present application.

Writ discharged. Petitioner remanded to custody.

PEOPLE v. MACIEL. (Cr. 1150.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 10, 1925.)

1. Homicide ⇨310(1)—Requested instruction in prosecution for assault with intent to murder held proper.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, it would have been proper to have given requested instruction that, in order to justify verdict of guilty of the crime charged, the facts and circumstances proved must be such that, if death had resulted from the shooting, the crime would have been murder and not manslaughter.

2. Criminal law ⇨823(17)—Refusal to give requested instruction as to assault with intent to murder held not reversible error, in view of instructions given.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, refusal of instruction differentiating offense charged from assault with a deadly weapon, held not reversible error, in view of instructions given that to justify a conviction of the greater offense, jury must believe beyond reasonable doubt that accused made assault with intent to murder.

3. Criminal law ⇨829(3)—Refusal to give requested instruction covered in instructions in general language held not reversible error.

Refusal to give requested instruction clearly covered in the instructions given, as to intent to murder as element of assault charged, though in language more general, held not reversible error.

4. Criminal law ⚡312—Specific intent constituting element of offense must be proved, no presumption existing.

Where specific intent is an essential ingredient of an offense, the intent must be proved like any other fact in the case, and no presumption of law arises as to the existence of such intent.

5. Criminal law ⚡568—Presence or absence of specific intent may be inferred from surrounding circumstances.

The presence or absence of a specific intent constituting an element of an offense may be inferred by the jury from circumstances surrounding an unlawful act.

6. Homicide ⚡145—Proof of firing of loaded pistol does not create presumption of law of intent to murder.

Proof of firing of loaded pistol at another does not create presumption of law of intent to murder person fired at.

7. Criminal law ⚡763, 764(10), 823(5)—Instruction as to presumption of intent held erroneous and not cured by others.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, instruction that when act was unlawful the law in the first instance presumed criminal intent, and burden was on accused to show absence of such intent, held unwarranted by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 2, 3, as it referred to specific intent to murder, and not intent to do act actually done, erroneous as trenching on jury's province, and not cured by other instructions requiring intent to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

8. Homicide ⚡348—Instruction as to presumption of intent not harmless.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, intent held not shown so conclusively as to render harmless, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, an instruction that criminal intent was presumed in first instance from doing of unlawful act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Joe Maciel was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant, who was charged with an assault upon one Estaban Rosas with a deadly weapon with an intent to commit murder, was found guilty as charged. He now appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give certain requested instructions, and that one of the instructions given was prejudicially erroneous.

Defendant and Rosas occupied adjoining premises in the city of Tulare. A toilet located in the rear of defendant's premises was used in common by both defendant and the members of the Rosas family. On the day of the alleged offense the two men met as Rosas was on his way to the toilet. A quarrel ensued, in the course of which blows were struck. After a few minutes of fighting, defendant went into his house and procured a pistol. Rosas' version of what followed after the first altercation, reduced to narrative form, is substantially as follows:

"Defendant went into his house, and I proceeded to the toilet. As I came out of the toilet and had taken three or four steps, defendant, who had come out of his back door with a pistol in his hand, fired two shots at me. Neither shot struck me. Though I was unarmed, I went toward him, and he came toward me. We met and I grabbed him by the collar with my right hand, and with my left I tried to take the pistol away from him. Then he fired the third shot. That one struck me. I was about 30 feet from him when he fired the first shot. It was closely followed by the second. I took about 5 steps after the second shot before I reached him. I wasn't afraid when I advanced toward him after the first shot, for I did not believe he would shoot me if I walked toward him. But I thought that if I turned around and went away that then he would shoot me."

Defendant's version of the affair is substantially this:

"When I entered my house after the first altercation Rosas followed me. I took the pistol from under a pillow and ordered Rosas out of the house. After we got outside, and I was turning to re-enter my house, he caught hold of me and pulled me out. A struggle followed, in the course of which the three shots were fired. At no time did I intend to kill Rosas."

The court, in the main, charged the jury fully and fairly as to the law applicable to the case. The learned trial judge, recognizing that the specific intent to murder is an essential ingredient of the offense with which defendant was charged, was at considerable pains to instruct the jurors that, before they could convict him of the greater offense, i. e., of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, they must believe to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt not only that he committed an assault upon Rosas with a deadly weapon, but that he did so with malice aforethought and with the intention of taking the life of Rosas; also, that if the jurors believed that defendant committed an assault with a deadly weapon but had a reasonable doubt that it was made with intent to commit murder, they should find him guilty of the lesser offense of assault with a deadly weapon.

[1,2] The court refused to give the following instruction, asked by defendant:

"You are instructed that in order to justify a verdict of guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, the facts and circumstances proven in a case must be such that, if death had resulted from the shooting, the crime would have been murder and not manslaughter; for if the crime in the case of death would have been only manslaughter, the defendant cannot be convicted of the offense charged, though he might be of assault with a deadly weapon."

This instruction is sound law and might well have been given. People v. Landman, 103 Cal. 577, 37 P. 518. We think, however, that the general instructions given by the court whereby the jury was charged, in substance and effect, that in order to justify a conviction of the greater offense, they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant made the assault with the intent to murder Rosas, were sufficient to advise the jury upon the subject of specific intent. It follows that the refusal to give the instruction was not reversible error.

[3] Three other instructions requested by the defendant were refused by the court. Each of them, if given, would have charged the jury, in substance and effect, that the presence of the specific intent to murder is an essential ingredient of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder. Though these instructions stated the law correctly, their refusal was not error entitling appellant to a reversal. The same proposition—stated, it is true, in language more general than that of the requested instructions—had been clearly announced by the court in the instructions which it gave. The instructions which were given upon the subject of specific intent were neither colorless nor too general. The refusal to state the same proposition in another form was not prejudicial error.

[4-7] We come now to a more serious objection, and one which we are constrained to hold necessitates a reversal of the judgment. The court gave this instruction:

"In every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence, but when the act committed by the accused is of itself an unlawful act, the law, in the first instance, presumes the criminal intent, and the burden of proof falls upon the defendant to show the absence of criminal intent." (Italics ours.)

It is contended, and we think rightly so, that this instruction violates the rule that, whenever a specific intent is an essential ingredient of the offense, no presumption of law can arise as to the existence of such intent, for it is a fact to be proved like any other fact in the case.

The first part of the instruction is based on and is in the language of section 20 of the Penal Code. But the last part is erroneous, and we think it was also prejudicial. If the court had charged the jury that when the act committed by an accused is unlawful the law raises a disputable presumption that the act was intended, and that the person doing it, if he did not voluntarily, also intended the ordinary consequences of his act, the instruction would have stated a rule of evidence substantially as declared in subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. " * * * The effect of these statutory rules of evidence," says the court in People v. Abbott, 2 Cal. Unrep. 387, 4 P. 769, 772, "is that when the act is proved to have been done by the accused, if it be an act in itself unlawful, the law in the first instance presumes it to have been intended, and the proof of justification or excuse lies on the defendant to overcome this legal and natural presumption." See, also, People v. Harris, 29 Cal. 681. Had the court worded its instruction so as to state the law substantially as it is declared in these Code provisions, it would have been properly applicable to the lesser offense of an assault with a deadly weapon; and in that event appellant, if he had desired to limit the instruction to a declaration that it did not apply to the greater offense of an assault with intent to commit murder, would have been obliged to request the court so to declare. People v. Ramirez, 64 Cal. App. 358, 221 P. 960.

But the court did not give the instruction contemplated by subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 1963. Instead, it gave an instruction, the vice of which lies in the fact that it goes beyond the rule that an accused who has done an unlawful act is presumed to have intended to do that act, and broadly asserts that when the act committed by an accused is unlawful the law presumes "the criminal intent," without telling the jury what is the criminal intent which the law presumes in such cases. As used in this instruction, the words "criminal intent" are broad enough to include any and every unlawful intent which is embraced within the crime charged against appellant. Included within the charge is the specific intent to murder Rosas, as well as the intent to do the unlawful act; i. e., the intent to discharge the loaded weapon. The fair interpretation of the language of the instruction is that, from the mere fact that the shots were unlawfully fired at Rosas, if they were so fired, the law raises the presumption that appellant not only intended to discharge his pistol, but that he discharged it with the specific intent to commit murder, and that the burden was cast upon him to show the absence of such specific intent. A jury of laymen would so understand it, beyond any doubt.

Looking at the instruction as the jury unquestionably must have viewed it, it is clearly erroneous, for it trenches upon the province of the jury to pass upon all matters of fact. It is only when the intent is not made an affirmative element of the crime that the law presumes that the act, if knowingly done, was done with a criminal intent. 16 C. J. p. 81. When a specific intent is an element of the offense it presents a question of fact which must be proved like any other fact in the case. It is none the less a question of fact though it cannot be proved by direct and positive evidence. All the circumstances surrounding the act furnish the evidence from which the presence or absence of the specific intent may be inferred by the jury, and no presumption of law can ever arise that will decide it. People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 41, 22 P. 80; People v. Perini, 94 Cal. 573, 575, 29 P. 1027; People v. Landman, supra; People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 295, 39 P. 622; Patterson v. State, 85 Ga. 131, 11 S. E. 620, 21 Am. St. Rep. 152. In Patterson v. State, supra, the court says:

"It [the specific intent] does not require direct or positive proof, but the circumstances must be such as would authorize the jury (and not the court) to infer the intent with which the act was done. * * * Where one is charged with assault with intent to murder, and it is proved that he fired a loaded pistol at another, there is no presumption of law that he intended to murder the person thus fired at."

The vice of the instruction was not cured by what was said in other parts of the charge, to the effect that the defendant could not be convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with an intent to commit murder unless the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the assault was committed with such intent to murder. The force of the objectionable instruction was left untouched, and its meaning was left unchanged and unimpaired. It and the other instructions, when considered together, amounted to no more than this:

"To warrant the jurors in convicting the defendant of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant assaulted Rosas with a deadly weapon, with malice aforethought and with the intention of taking the life of Rosas; but if the evidence shows that defendant unlawfully discharged a loaded pistol at Rosas, that act in itself will be sufficient ground for the jury to infer the existence of such malice aforethought and intent to kill." See People v. Mize, supra.

[8] The erroneous instruction is beyond the reach of the saving grace of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. It would have been otherwise had appellant been convicted of the lesser offense of assault with a deadly weapon. But he was convicted of the greater offense. To constitute the offense of which he was found guilty, the circumstances must be such as to authorize the jury, not the court, to infer the existence of the specific intent to murder. We cannot say, after a consideration of the entire evidence, that if this instruction had not been given the jury ought, nevertheless, to have found appellant guilty of an assault with intent to commit murder. Even if we leave out of consideration appellant's testimony to the effect that at no time did he intend to kill Rosas, the circumstances testified to by the complaining witness do not permit of only one reasonable conclusion. The first shot, according to the evidence adduced by the prosecution, was fired when Rosas was about 30 feet away, and the second when he was within a distance of approximately 5 steps. With respect to those shots the evidence would have warranted the jury in adopting one of two possible theories, if the objectionable instruction had not been given; and whichever of these two theories the jury had adopted, we could not have said that it was not a reasonable inference from all the circumstances of the case. These two possible theories are: First, that when defendant fired the shots he actually intended to kill Rosas, but his marksmanship was so poor that he missed his victim; second, that defendant would have killed his enemy had he dared, but his nerve failed him, and therefore he purposely fired wide of the mark, intending to frighten Rosas, but also intending that neither bullet should reach the object of his wrath. Something akin to this second theory must have been entertained by Rosas; for he testified that he was not afraid to advance toward the defendant after the first shot was fired, because he believed that so long as he faced the accused the latter would not shoot him. Which of the two possible inferences mentioned by us should be deduced from the circumstances, or whether some other possible and reasonable inference should be drawn, was a matter which only the jury could decide. The third shot, the one which wounded Rosas, was fired during the scuffle, and it might be that the jury, but for the erroneous instruction, would have concluded that this shot was fired as the result of an unintentional discharge of the weapon while the two men were grappling with each other. In brief, the circumstances are such that we cannot possibly say that the jury would have brought in the verdict which it did if it had received only proper instructions.

Under these circumstances we would not be justified, even under the liberal provisions of section 4½, in disregarding the error and denying a new trial. Langford v. San Diego, etc., Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 734, 164 P. 398.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

RICHARDS, J. The questions presented for decision upon this hearing arose out of the following state of facts, as they appear upon the face of the record in the main case recently decided by this court (Republic Truck Sales Corp. v. Peak, 229 P. 331), and which may be briefly summarized as follows: The plaintiffs herein commenced this action against the defendant, George Peak, to recover the aggregate sum of $50,075.19 as set forth in the several counts of their complaint, and procured a writ of attachment to issue and be levied upon certain personal property of said defendant. At the time of the issuance and levy of said writ, as appears from the sheriff's return thereon, the said property was in the custody of said sheriff under, and was subject to, two prior attachments issued and levied in actions theretofore instituted by other creditors of said Peak. Subsequent to the issuance and levy of the plaintiffs' said writ, the defendant made a motion to discharge the same and release his said property from attachment thereunder upon the ground that said writ did not conform to, but was in violation of, the provisions of section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The trial court on May 16, 1923, made and entered its order granting said motion, whereupon the plaintiffs took and perfected an appeal from said order. The plaintiffs also, and at the time of taking said appeal, presented and filed, on June 2, 1923, an undertaking to stay proceedings upon said order pending such appeal in the stipulated sum of $50,000 and with a qualified surety. In the charging part of said undertaking the surety thereto bound itself in said sum "that, if the said order appealed from or any part thereof be affirmed, appellant will pay all costs and damages which the defendant may sustain by reason of said attachment in the sum hereinbefore mentioned, and that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court upon this appeal." No objection was made by the respondent, Peak, to the form or substance of this bond, either in the trial court or in this court prior to December 3, 1923. In point of fact, no direct objection was ever made by said respondent to the form or sufficiency of said bond in the form of an application to the trial court, or to this court for relief from the effect of said undertaking, or for the giving of a sufficient undertaking. The matter stood in statu quo until the last-named date, the property of the defendant remaining, so far as the record in the main case or in this proceeding discloses, in the hands of the sheriff, subject to the two prior attachments which had by said sheriff been levied thereon; and in which condition said property still remained and continued up to the time when this court decided the main case, viz., September 23, 1924, holding said attachment to have been valid and reversing the said order of the trial court discharging the same.

On December 3, 1923, however, the plaintiffs and appellants appeared before this court with an application ex parte for leave to file a new and amended undertaking to stay proceedings upon their said appeal, setting forth that its prior undertaking was ambiguous as to the charging part thereof, above quoted, in that the word "appellant" had been inadvertently used therein instead of the word "appellants"; and upon such ex parte application and upon the presentation of a new and amended undertaking correcting said alleged defect, they were permitted by an order of this court to file the same. Thereafter and a few days after the making of said ex parte order the respondent, Peak, filed in this court what he denominated a petition for rehearing, but which this court interpreted to be a motion to vacate said ex parte order, a hearing upon which was accordingly set upon the April, 1924, calendar of this court and the matter was then submitted for decision. In the meantime, the main cause involving the validity of the order of the trial court discharging said attachment came on for hearing, and was submitted to this court for decision, and was by this court decided on September 24, 1924, and such decision became final 30 days thereafter.

By its said decision in the main case this court held that said writ of attachment was properly issued and levied, and that the order of the trial court vacating said writ and discharging said attachment was erroneous, and it accordingly reversed said order; and having done so and its said decision to that effect having become final, it ordered the submission of this particular matter set aside, and the matter placed upon its calendar for the purpose of determining whether or not the questions involved in this particular matter had become moot by virtue of its decision in the main case. This single issue, having been argued by respective counsel, has now been submitted to this court for decision.

We are of the opinion that the questions, raised in this proceeding as to the validity of the original undertaking to stay proceedings upon the order discharging said attachment, and also as to the validity of the subsequent order of this court permitting the filing of a new and corrected undertaking to stay proceedings upon said appeal, have become moot by virtue of our decision in the main case upholding said attachment and reversing the order of the trial court discharging the same. The effect of that decision was to relieve the appellants and their surety from any and all liability upon the original stay bond as well as upon the new and amended undertaking which this court permitted to be filed. If, as the respondent claims, said original stay bond was void, he never did have any right of recovery thereon; and if, as he claims, the ex parte order of this court permitting the appellant to file a new and corrected bond is also void, he is in no better or worse position than he was before. Assuming the original stay bond to be void and our said order as to the filing of the new bond to be also void, what was the position and what were the rights of the respondent after the order discharging the attachment was made, after the appeal from said order was taken and after said alleged void bond to stay proceedings pending such appeal had been given? It is clear that his only and all-sufficient right was that of receiving or of recovering his attached property from the attaching officer, who, after the order discharging the plaintiffs' attachment had been made, had no longer any authority to retain the same under said discharged writ, and who could not justify his further retention thereof because of the giving by the plaintiffs of a void stay bond. The right of recovery of his said property which the defendant then had upon his claim that said stay bond was void, he continued to have down to the date when our decision that the order discharging said attachment was void became final; unless, indeed, the defendant has himself lost that right by delay or failure in its assertion.

So far as the record in this case discloses, the defendant never did assert that right as against the only person against whom it could be asserted, viz., the attaching officer up to the time when our decision in the main case rendering its further assertion impossible, became final, but, on the contrary, he allowed the attaching officer to remain unmolested in whatever possession of said property he had acquired by virtue of the plaintiffs' writ of attachment. Never having asserted whatever right he gained through the making of the order of the trial court discharging said attachment, he is in the precise position in which he would have been if no stay bond had been attempted to be given; he has allowed the property to remain in custodia legis pending the appeal. This being so, and the decision of this court, declaring the order discharging said attachment to have been erroneous, having become final, he is no longer in a position to be either beneficially or injuriously affected by any order which this court can now make in the premises. If this court should decide that its ex parte order permitting the appellants to file a new and corrected bond was void because ex parte or because said original stay bond was void and hence could not be amended, we are unable to perceive how the defendant could in his present situation be in anywise aided or benefited or injured by such a determination; and a like consequence would follow from the opposite conclusion. If this court should grant the respondent's motion and set aside its ex parte order allowing an amended undertaking to be filed, the respondent would be left in the position of having recourse, if he has any at all, to a stay bond which he insists is void and which, if not void, he has lost the right of access to by virtue of our decision in the main case reversing the order to stay the operation of which such original bond had been given. If, on the other hand, we should deny his motion to set aside our ex parte order the same precise result would follow, since his access to either bond has been cut off by our decision in the main case.

The question, therefore, under any possible view of the situation is moot in so far as this respondent is concerned. If there are other parties who have acquired any rights in or liens upon the property, it is sufficient to say that they are not parties to this appeal, and hence are unaffected by any order which this court has made or might make in the premises. The motion is dismissed.

Ex parte HAINES. (Cr. 2730.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 19, 1925.)

1. Escape ⇐13—Legislative intent not to punish escapes by misdemeanants not imputed unless clearly called for by statute.

In view of Pen. Code, §§ 105, 106, making no provisions for punishment of escaping misdemeanants, an intent not to punish such escapes under section 107 as amended (St. 1923, p. 270) should be imputed to Legislature only if all terms of amendment studied together clearly call for such interpretation.

2. Escape ⇐13—Statute providing for punishment of escapes held applicable to both felony and misdemeanor prisoners.

Pen. Code, § 107, as amended by St. 1923, p. 270, declaring escape or attempt to escape from institutions therein named a felony, held applicable to both misdemeanor and felony prisoners in view of Pen. Code, § 105, as amended by St. 1905, p. 723, and section 106, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77; Pen. Code, §§ 17, 19; Juvenile Court Laws (St. 1915, p. 1225); St. 1921, p. 809; St. 1913, p. 857; Pen. Code, §§ 1613, 1388; St. 1921, p. 1621; Pen. Code, § 1600; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1858, 1859, and legislative history in its enactment.

3. Statutes ⇐181(2), 212—Absurd results will not be ascribed to Legislature and inconsistency will not be presumed.

Absurd or unjust results will not be ascribed to Legislature in enactment of statutes if avoidable, and it will not be presumed to have used inconsistent provisions as to same subject in immediate context.

4. Statutes ⇐200, 208—Court not bound by grammatical rules in interpretation and may ascertain meaning from context.

Courts are not bound by grammatical rules in interpretation of statutes and may ascertain meaning of words by context.

5. Statutes ⇐205—Statute construed to give sensible meaning to every part.

Statute should always be so construed as to give a sensible and intelligent meaning to every part and so as to make every provision valid and effective.

6. Statutes ⇐181(1)—Legislative intent being shown, statute must be liberally construed to give effect thereto.

Legislative intent being shown, statute must then be liberally construed to give effect to such intent.

7. Escape ⇐13—Court justified in public interest in adopting construction of statute favoring punishment of all escaping prisoners.

Even if Pen. Code, § 107, as amended by St. 1923, p. 270, providing for punishment of escaping prisoners might be held to be susceptible of a different construction, court would be justified in public interest in adopting construction favoring punishment of all escaping prisoners.

8. Statutes ⇐181(2)—Courts will avoid result contrary to sound sense and wise policy in construction.

Courts will be astute to avoid a result contrary to sound sense and wise policy in construction of statutes.

9. Statutes ⇐183—Manifest reason and purpose of law not sacrificed to literal interpretation.

While intention of Legislature must be ascertained from words used to express it, manifest reason and obvious purpose of law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such words.

10. Constitutional law ⇐70(1)—Kind of punishment presents a legislative and not a judicial question.

Kind of punishment to be inflicted for an escape or attempt to escape from custody presents a legislative and not a judicial question, it being for courts or state board of prison directors to determine, within limits fixed by Legislature, extent of punishment.

In Bank.

Habeas corpus by George Haines directed to the Sheriff of Shasta County to secure release of petitioner. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

See, also, 229 P. 984.

A. J. Ashen, of Sacramento, for petitioner.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Habeas corpus. The facts in the above-entitled matter are stipulated to be as follows:

On or about the 5th day of June, 1924, petitioner, George Haines, was serving a sentence in the county jail of Shasta county, in the city of Redding, under conviction of a misdemeanor, to wit, malicious mischief, and in the custody of an officer, a deputy sheriff, and while engaged in going to county work escaped from the lawful custody of such officer. Subsequently, the petitioner was charged by the district attorney of said county by information with the crime of escaping from the legal custody of an officer, a felony, committed as follows:

"That the said George Haines * * * did on or about the 5th day of June, 1924, at the city of Redding, county of Shasta, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, intentionally, and feloniously escape from the lawful custody of an officer, to wit, a deputy sheriff, while engaged in going to county work. All of which is contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

Petitioner, by virtue of this charge, was imprisoned, detained, confined, and restrained of his liberty by W. W. Sublett, sheriff of the county of Shasta, at the county jail in said county, and it was with regard to this custody that this court granted his petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

It is contended by petitioner that the charge under which he is held and thereby deprived of his liberty does not constitute a public offense, "inasmuch as, at the time of said alleged escape said George Haines was not a prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony, but was a prisoner convicted of a misdemeanor": that section 107 of the Penal Code "applies only to prisoners charged with or convicted of a felony. The gist of said section is, 'Every prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony * * * who escapes or attempts to escape * * * is guilty of a felony and is punishable as provided in section 108 of the Penal Code.' In between the words quoted, there appear several relative clauses, all beginning with the word 'who,' and connected by the disjunctive 'or.' It seems apparent that the relative pronoun 'who' in all of said relative clauses, must relate back to the prisoner mentioned in the first part of the section, to wit, a prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony"; that if it were the intention of the Legislature to make section 107 apply both to misdemeanor and felony prisoners, "then there would absolutely be no reason why it should have inserted after the word 'prisoner' the words 'charged with or convicted of a felony.' It would have, in such case, used the same expression as used in a prior statute, namely, 'every prisoner,' without any qualifying phrase as to the character of the prisoner"; that the Legislature in amending the section in 1923 intended "to provide that a felony prisoner, no matter whether he was confined in the county jail, or in the state prison, or in a county hospital, or in any other place, if he escaped, or attempted to escape, would be guilty of a felony and not, as before said amendment, guilty of a misdemeanor if he escaped from one place, and guilty of a felony if he escaped from some other place"; and that "if it can be said that there is a doubt as to the intent of the Legislature, * * * such doubt is dispelled by an examination of the history of the passage of this amendment * * * the bill as first introduced was broad enough to include both felony and misdemeanor prisoners. The bill as amended the first time was rather ambiguous and probably could have been construed to include both felony and misdemeanor prisoners, but the assembly by its action clearly indicates that it did not approve the including in said bill even by inference misdemeanor prisoners, and therefore by striking out of the word 'or' and inserting the words 'who is' in lieu thereof, showed its intention to make said section 107 as amended to apply only to felony prisoners."

It is conceded by the respondent that if the act of escaping from the custody of the sheriff by a prisoner convicted of a misdemeanor does not fall within the terms of section 107 of the Penal Code as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 270), the sheriff is without authority to hold petitioner for the crime of escaping from his custody since there is no other provision in the penal law of the state which provides a penalty for the act of escaping from the county jail or from the lawful custody of an officer by a prisoner confined or held therein on a misdemeanor charge.

Respondent contends, however, that section 107 is reasonably capable of only one meaning, which is that it applies to all prisoners confined in a county jail, and that the phrase "charged with or convicted of a felony" in said section is merely descriptive of one class of prisoners to whom the act relates. This contention is based upon the following grounds: (1) That prior to the amendment of section 107 in 1923, every prisoner confined in any other prison than the state prison who escaped or attempted to escape therefrom was guilty of a misdemeanor and, if the section as amended applies only to prisoners charged with or convicted of a felony, the existing law has been repealed, which result is not consistent with a sound policy and will lead to mischief. (2) That the legislative intent to include all prisoners is evidenced by the title of the act which discloses that the purpose of such act is to amend section 107, and not to repeal the existing law and enact a new law destroying "all the vital terms" of the section as it stood before the amendment; by the clause relating to a prisoner "who is engaged on any county road or other county work" which clause is inapplicable to a "felony prisoner" for the reason that the law does not provide that prisoners in the state prison may be required to work upon county roads or other county work; that the Legislature is presumed to have known this and therefore to give effect to this language all prisoners must be included within the meaning of the section. (3) That the rule is that statutes must be liberally construed with the object of giving effect to the legislative intent and a sound policy. (4) That the act of escaping is recognized by the common law as malum in se and the fact that the Legislature has raised the crime from a misdemeanor to a felony by the amendment of 1923 can have "no weight in the matter of judicial construction of the law itself."

The sections of the Penal Code relating to escapes from prison are as follows:

"Sec. 105. Every prisoner confined in a state prison for a term less than for life, who escapes therefrom, is punishable by imprisonment in a state prison for a term of not less than one year; said second term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would otherwise have been discharged from said prison." Amendment approved 1905; St. 1905, p. 723.

"Sec. 106. Every prisoner committed to a state prison for a term less than for life, who escapes or attempts to escape while being conveyed to or from or while confined within such prison or while at work outside such prison under the surveillance of prison guards is guilty of a felony and on conviction thereof the term of imprisonment therefor shall commence from the time such convict would otherwise have been discharged from said prison." Amendment approved May 9, 1921; St. 1921, p. 77.

As enacted in 1872, section 107 read as follows:

"Every prisoner confined in any other prison than the state prison, who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

The Legislature in 1923, by "An act to amend section one hundred seven of the Penal Code, relating to escapes and attempts to escape from county jails, city jails, and county hospital, and from the custody of the sheriff," declared section 107 to be amended as follows:

"[1] Every prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony who is confined in any jail or prison or an inmate of any public training school or reformatory or county hospital, [2] or who is engaged on any county road or other county work [3] or who is in the lawful custody of any officer or person, [4] who escapes or attempts to escape from such jail, prison, public training school, reformatory or county hospital, [5] or from the custody of the officer or person in charge of him while engaged on or going to or returning from such county work [6] or from the custody of any officer or person in whose lawful custody he is, [7] is guilty of a felony and is punishable as provided in section one hundred eight of the Penal Code." St. 1923, p. 270.

We have inserted the above numerals in section 107, as amended, for convenience of reference in the discussion of its provisions. Section 105 as amended in 1905, we have seen, relates to the escape of prisoners confined in a state prison who may under that section and sections 13 and 671 of the penal Code to be sentenced to a term of imprisonment ranging from one year to any number of years not less than one or to life, in terms. Section 106 as amended in 1921, it has been indicated, covers the case of a prisoner committed to a state prison who escapes or attempts to escape while being conveyed to or from or while confined within such prison or while at work outside such prison under the surveillance of prison guards. Under this section and sections 13, 18 and 18a of the Penal Code, the minimum punishment would be six months and the maximum five years in the penitentiary.

These sections are directed to escapes or attempted escapes from the state prison, or escapes or attempted escapes while being conveyed to or from or while confined within such prison or while at work outside such prison. By "work outside" undoubtedly means work done for the state as, for instance, work on the state highway and not county work.

[1] It is plain from the terms of sections 105 and 106 that no provision whatever is made therein for the punishment of misdemeanor prisoners who escape or attempt to escape and if petitioner's contention, that section 107 excludes escapes or attempts to escape by such prisoners, be sound, such escapes or attempts to escape by misdemeanor prisoners are not now punishable at all. In the face of such a prospect an intention not to punish escapes or attempts to escape by misdemeanants should be imputed to the Legislature only when all the terms of the amendment studied together clearly call for such an interpretation.

[2] Section 107 before the amendment plainly applied to felony and misdemeanor prisoners, and we have arrived at the conclusion that, although section 107, as amended, now prescribes a felonious penalty, it is still directed to both classes of prisoners. Before proceeding to an analysis of section 107, we will state the respective contentions and arguments of the parties pertinent to the rules of construction applying to this proceeding.

In connection with petitioner's claim that section 107 applies only to prisoners charged with or convicted of a felony, it is urged in his behalf that the amendment is grammatically correct and free from ambiguity; "that where the language of a statute is not ambiguous, but of plain and obvious import, the rule is imperative to follow the language employed in its interpretation"—citing Hawley v. Brumagim, 33 Cal. 394; In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 384, 52 P. 799; Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 384, 55 P. 1060; Smith v. Union Oil Co., 166 Cal. 217, 135 P. 900. To the proposition "that where a statute enumerates the persons or things to be affected by its provisions, there is an implied exclusion of others" McGahey v. Forrest, 109 Cal. 63, 41 P. 817, and People v. Doyle, 13 Cal. App. 611, 110 P. 458, are cited. Matter of Zany, 20 Cal. App. 360, 129 P. 295, is cited by respondent to the effect "that a statute should always be so construed as to give a sensible and intelligent meaning to every part to avoid absurd consequences, and if possible, so as to make every provision thereof valid and effective. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to an absurd consequence. People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69, 124 P. 887. To arrive at the legislative intent in the interpretation of statutes, the original purpose and object of the legislation must be considered. Mackey v. Mott, 25 Cal. App. 110, 142 P. 1082. Statutes must be read and considered in conjunction with the legislative intent, and then be liberally construed with the object in view of giving effect to such intent. Odell v. Rihn, 19 Cal. App. 713, 127 P. 802. A construction or conclusion plainly not contemplated by the Legislature should not be given to a statute if it can be avoided. When a statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions, one leading inevitably to mischief or absurdity and the other consisting of sound sense and wise policy, the former should be rejected and the latter adopted. San Joaquin & K. R. C. & I. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 128 P. 924.

[3, 4] Absurd or unjust results will never be ascribed to the Legislature, and it will not be presumed to have used inconsistent provisions as to the same subject in the immediate context. The courts will be astute to avoid such results. Wells Fargo & Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Jersey City (D. C.) 207 F. 871. In the interpretation of statutes, courts are not bound by grammatical rules, and may ascertain the meaning of words by the context. Cavender v. Hewitt, 145 Tenn. 471, 239 S. W. 767, 22 A. L. R. 755.

"The mere literal construction of a section in a statute ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the Legislature apparent by the statute; and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction it is to be adopted to effectuate that intention. The intent prevails over the letter, and the letter will, if possible, be so read as to conform to the spirit of the act. 'While the intention of the Legislature must be ascertained from the words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious purpose of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such words.' Words or clauses may be enlarged or restricted to effectuate the intention or to harmonize them with other expressed provisions. Where general language construed in a broad sense would lead to absurdity, it may be restrained. The particular inquiry is not what is the abstract force of the words or what they may comprehend, but in what sense they were intended to be used as they are found in the act." Lewis v. Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 376, p. 721.

The Code of Civil Procedure provides:

Section 1858: "In the construction of a statute or instrument, the office of the judge is simply to ascertain and declare what is in terms or in substance contained therein, not to insert what has been omitted, or to omit what has been inserted; and where there are several provisions or particulars, such a construction is, if possible, to be adopted as will give effect to all."

Section 1859: "In the construction of a statute the intention of the Legislature, * * * is to be pursued, if possible; and when a general and [a] particular provision are inconsistent, the latter is paramount to the former. So a particular intent will control a general one that is inconsistent with it."

Section 4 of the Penal Code reads:

"The rule of the common law, that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice."

Concerning the latter section, petitioner contends that "although by section 4 of the Penal Code, the rule of liberal construction of statutes applies to penal statutes, nevertheless, the rule of liberal construction does not mean the enlargement of plain provisions of law."

To this respondent replies:

"In arriving at a proper construction of the statute it is, of course, helpful to recall that the ancient rule that penal statutes are to be strictly construed has no application to the provisions of our Penal Code. People v. Soto, 49 Cal. 67; Snell v. Bradbury, 139 Cal. 379, 73 P. 150. This consideration should serve to dispel any lingering doubt which might be entertained as to the propriety of modification of the literal effect of the words of the enactment by resorting to the history of legislation upon the subject treated, and the general legislative intent relating to that and matters of a similar nature."

The first and second drafts of the amendment under review applied to felony and misdemeanor prisoners. We agree with petitioner that by the final amendment substituting "who is" for "or" between the words "felony" and "confined" as they occurred in the second draft it was intended that the clause "who is" should refer back to the antecedent noun—"Every prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony." And if the section were limited to clauses 1, 4, and 7, and the succeeding words—"who is" in clauses 2 and 3 were not prefaced by the disjunctive "or" denoting classification and exclusion we would be called upon to hold that escapes or attempted escapes of misdemeanor prisoners did not come within the terms of section 107. But, as we shall show, the amendment of the second draft does not exclude from the operation of the clauses 2 and 3 escapes or attempted escapes by misdemeanor prisoners.

The detailed history of the legislation is as follows: On February 1, 1923, Assemblymen Emme and Graves introduced Assembly Bill No. 939. It was read the first time and referred to the committee on judiciary.

Journal of the Assembly 1923, p. 338. The printed bill as introduced is as follows:

"An act to amend section one hundred seven of the Penal Code, relating to attempts to escape and escapes from county jails and city jails and from the custody of the sheriff while at work on any county work.

"The people of the state of California do enact as follows:

"[1] Section 1. Section one hundred seven of the Penal Code [2] is hereby amended to read as follows:

"[3] 107. Every prisoner confined in any jail or prison other [4] than the state prison, and every prisoner who is engaged on [5] any county road or other county work, who escapes or [6] attempts to escape from such jail or other prison, or from [7] the custody of the sheriff while engaged on or going to or [8] returning from such work is guilty of a felony."

On April 3, 1923, by "amendment number one" the title was modified and by "amendment number two" the act was amended as follows:

"On page 1 of the printed bill strike out line 3 following the period, lines 4 to 8, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following: [3] 'Every prisoner charged with or convicted of a felony [4] or confined in any jail or prison or an inmate of any public [5] training school or reformatory or county hospital, or who is [6] engaged on any county road or other county work or who is [7] in the lawful custody of any officer or person, who escapes or [8] attempts to escape from such jail, prison, public training [9] school, reformatory or county hospital, or from the custody of [10] the officer or person in charge of him while engaged on or [11] going to or returning from such county work or from the [12] custody of any officer or person in whose lawful custody he [13] is, is guilty of a felony and is punishable as provided in section [14] one hundred eight of the Penal Code.'" Journal of the Assembly 1923, p. 835.

On April 9, 1923, a motion was made and carried as follows:

"On page 1, line 4, of the printed bill, strike out the word 'or,' preceding the word 'confined' and in lieu thereof insert the words 'who is.'" Id. p. 1012.

The substitution was accordingly made and this was the version of the bill when it passed the Assembly and was ordered transmitted to the Senate. Id. p. 1142. The Senate passed the bill as thus amended with an amendment of the title. Id. p. 1488.

We will now proceed to analyze the amended section. First, as to the question of punctuation. If a comma or colon had been inserted after the words "every prisoner" or a semicolon following the words "county hospital," as those quoted phrases appear in clause 1, there would be no difficulty in construing the terms of section 107 to apply to both felony and misdemeanor prisoners. Clause 1, we have conceded, is confined to felony prisoners; clause 2 just as clearly applies to misdemeanor prisoners; clause 3 includes both classes of prisoners; clause 4 applies either to felony or misdemeanor prisoners for it includes escapes or attempted escapes from "jail," where misdemeanants may be serving a sentence, as well as from the state prison; clause 5 is the counterpart of clause 2 and like that clause refers exclusively to misdemeanor prisoners; clause 6 uses the expression—from the custody of any officer or person—and hence covers both classes of prisoners, and clause 7 makes a violation of any of the other clauses a felony and, under sections 107, 108, 13, and 18a of the Penal Code, imprisonment in the penitentiary may be for any term from 6 months to 10 years and by fine in any amount not exceeding $10,000.

In conceding that clause 1 refers to felony prisoners, we have in mind that such prisoners, unless admitted to bail, are confined in the county jail pending trial after indictment or preliminary examination and after conviction and final judgment until removal to the state prison; or when they are held by other process connected with a felony. But misdemeanor prisoners, other than those punished by fine alone, after conviction and final judgment must be committed to the county jail (see sections 17 and 19, Pen. Code) in execution of the judgment.

While section 107 contains the only provision we have found in reference to the detention of felony prisoners in "any public training school," it is probable that the Legislature had in view prisoners confined in the state reform schools. Minors between 18 and 21 years of age accused by indictment or information of a felony or misdemeanor or convicted thereof may be committed to the Preston School of Industry or to the Whittier State School, or if the offender be a female, to the California School for Girls, as in the statute provided. Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225). For amendments thereto, see Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1536. The statute authorizes the establishment of a reformatory department in the Preston School of Industry wherein regular public school work and employment in useful and productive labor are prescribed. St. 1921, p. 809. According to the statutes of 1913, the girls' department of the Whittier State School was turned over to the board of trustees of the California School for Girls (St. 1913, p. 857), which school is now located in Ventura, Ventura county.

Either adult or minor felony prisoners may, in cases of sickness or injury, be temporarily confined in a county hospital. But with respect to clause 2 we are satisfied there is no provision of law authorizing the employment of felony prisoners "on any county road or other county work." Section 1613 of the Penal Code, however, authorizes boards of supervisors of counties to require prisoners confined in the county jail under a judgment of imprisonment to perform labor on the public works or ways in the county. This clearly refers to misdemeanants, for none other would be confined in a county jail "under a judgment of imprisonment."

Section 1613 was adopted in 1872. In 1911 (St. 1911, p. 688) section 273h was enacted wherein it is provided that offenders sentenced to the county jail in prosecutions under sections 270, 270a, 270b, 271, and 271a of the Penal Code shall be compelled to work upon the public roads or highways or any other public work in the county where such conviction is had. The policy of the law with respect to minors is further shown by the provisions of section 1388 of the same Code, which reads in part:

"Final judgment may be suspended on any conviction, charge, or prosecution of a minor, for misdemeanor or felony, where in the judgment of the court in which such proceeding is pending there is reasonable ground to believe that such minor may be reformed, and that a commitment to prison would work manifest injury in the premises. Such suspension may be for as long a period as the circumstances of the case may seem to warrant, and subject to the following further provisions"—that such minor may be committed to the custody of officers or managers of any strictly nonsectarian charitable corporation conducted for the purpose of reclaiming criminal minors.

This section refers to felony or misdemeanor prisoners, and it may be that the Legislature intended that escapes or attempts to escape from the lawful custody of such officers or managers might in certain cases constitute a violation of section 107. That section refers to "reformatory" in clauses 1 and 4 and "from the custody of any officer or person" in clauses 3 and 6. It may be mentioned in this general connection that the act of 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1621, § 14) relating to the establishment and administration of industrial farms or industrial road camps in the counties of the state and the commitment thereto and the discipline of persons charged with or convicted of public offenses, provided that such farms or camps shall be considered a county jail "for all purposes not inconsistent with the provisions and purposes hereof" and provided (section 13) that persons who escape or attempt to escape therefrom shall upon conviction be imprisoned in a state prison for not less than one year nor more than five years, or in the county jail or industrial farm for not to exceed one year.

It is clear from the foregoing that if section 107 may be construed as having a comma or colon after the words "every prisoner," and a semicolon after the words "county hospital" in clause 1, and clauses 2 and 5 are confined to misdemeanor prisoners, the conclusion is inescapable that the section contemplates escapes or attempted escapes by both felony and misdemeanor prisoners. But without regard to the suggested punctuation, we think the amendment is not open to any construction other than that section 107 as amended covers escapes and attempted escapes of felony and misdemeanor prisoners. Petitioner insists, however, that the action of the Legislature in amending the section clearly shows an intention to confine its provisions to escapes or attempts to escape of felony prisoners.

It will be observed that there is a repetition in clauses 2 and 3 of the words "who is," as used in clause 1, thus indicating a further classification of prisoners—(1) felony prisoners; (2) misdemeanor prisoners; and (3) both classes of prisoners. The same classification is preserved in defining the criminal acts—clause 4 being the counterpart of clause 1, clause 5 of clause 2, and clause 6 of clause 3. Thus considered it is plain that the substitution of the words "who is" for the word "or" between the words "felony" and "confined" in clause 1 had the effect of limiting that clause to felony prisoners, and, as already suggested, if the section were limited to clauses 1, 4 and 7, petitioner's contention would prevail; but in the face of the succeeding provisions, and notably those of clauses 2 and 5, the section considered in its entirety and giving force and meaning to all its provisions is no susceptible of the construction that punishment for escapes or attempted escapes by felony prisoners was the sole purpose of the amendment.

Clause 1 includes escapes from either "jail" or "prison" and in our opinion those terms are to be read distributively throughout the section, for, while felony prisoners may be confined temporarily in a county jail, misdemeanants sentenced to imprisonment must serve their sentence in a county jail, unless lawfully required to do outside work for the county.

Section 1600 of the Penal Code refers to the detention of both classes of prisoners. That section reads:

"A prisoner committed to the county jail for trial or for examination, or upon conviction for a public offense, must be actually confined in the jail until he is legally discharged; and if he is permitted to go at large out of the jail except by virtue of a legal order or process, it is an escape."

Moreover, sections 105 and 106 cover fully the escape of felony prisoners while undergoing punishment or being conveyed to or from the prison, and it cannot be questioned that section 107 was intended, in the contemplation of the Legislature, to take care of all other classifications of escapes or attempted escapes. It is apparent the Legislature realized that felony prisoners would escape or attempt to escape under other conditions than those embraced in sections 105 and 106. Accordingly provision was made in section 107 for such escapes or attempted escapes.

No reasonable theory has been advanced why the Legislature would entirely preclude the conviction and punishment of escapes or attempted escapes by misdemeanor prisoners. To so hold would be to ignore the provisions of the section, especially clauses 2 and 5 thereof. We again repeat that clause 1, read alone, is confined to felony prisoners, for while the sentence of such prisoners must be served in the penitentiary, yet owing to the youth, the illness, or the injury of such prisoners they may be confined in any of the institutions named. But because of the language that follows, particularly that of clauses 2 and 5, it cannot, upon any accepted canon of construction, be held to be limited to persons charged with or convicted of a felony. The repetition of the words "or who is" as they appear in clause 2 in our opinion clearly indicates an intention to limit that clause to prisoners engaged on "any county road or other county work," and the said clause is entitled to the same independent classification as that of clause 1, clause 5, as already suggested, complementing clause 2.

The words "or who is" are also repeated in clause 3, thus indicating a further classification applying to both classes of prisoners. As already stated, we have found no statutory provision under which a felony prisoner, whether charged with or convicted of a felony, may be engaged on county road or other county work, and the conclusion must therefore follow that the provision is directed alone to misdemeanor prisoners. A person charged with a felony is, prior to conviction, presumed to be innocent, and it would appear to be violative of such presumption to exact service pending the determination of the question of guilt. And if a person charged with a felony is convicted and the judgment of conviction becomes final his place is in the penitentiary, not in the county jail. In any event, such service could not, except upon statutory warrant, be exacted from such a prisoner. The result of accepting petitioner's construction of clauses 2 and 5 would therefore be to place the authorization for such work on judicial mandate rather than on statute.

[5-9] In thus interpreting section 107, we have, in our opinion, strictly conformed to the rules of construction found in the provisions of the Codes and as set forth in the respective contentions. A statute "should always be so construed as to give a sensible and intelligent meaning to every part * * * so as to make every provision thereof valid and effective." This we have done in giving effect to clauses 2 and 5. It is plain from those clauses that the Legislature did not fail to provide for misdemeanor prisoners; and the intent being shown the statute must "then be liberally construed with the object in view of giving effect to such intent." Even if the statute might be held to be susceptible of either construction, we are justified in the public interest in adopting the one favoring the punishment of all escaping prisoners. The courts will be astute to avoid a result contrary to sound sense and wise policy. As was declared in the text-book from which we have quoted:

"While the intention of the Legislature must be ascertained from the words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious purpose of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such words." Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, supra.

It cannot be maintained, particularly in view of clause 2, that the section is, when viewed in the light of the interpretation urged upon us by petitioner, "free from ambiguity," for by the language of that clause an obstacle is at once encountered in the provision for escapes or attempts to escape while engaged on county work, thus precluding the conclusion that it was intended to apply to felony prisoners.

Viewed from the angle of petitioner's contentions the section cannot, therefore, be regarded as of "plain and obvious import," because that clause, like the others, must, if possible, be given effect. The freedom from ambiguity and the plain and obvious import ascribed to the section by petitioner cannot be said to inhere in its terms except upon the theory that they apply to both classes of prisoners. And while the substitution of "who is" for "or" in clause 1 does have the effect of confining its operation to felony prisoners, the limitation does not extend to the succeeding clause for the reason that such prisoners would not be engaged on a county road or on other county work, and hence could not commit a breach of custody connected with such work. The point is made that if the Legislature intended that section 107 should apply to misdemeanor prisoners some such phrase as "charged with or convicted of a misdemeanor" would have been employed in the way felony prisoners are described in clause 1. Undoubtedly the soundness of the interpretation we have given to section 107 would be more readily apparent if an expression corresponding with that used in clause 1 had been employed with respect to prisoners charged with or convicted of misdemeanor; but the omission to identify both classes of prisoners by corresponding phrases will not be held controlling if from the context of the statute it clearly appears, as we believe it does, that misdemeanor as well as felony prisoners were intended to come within its provisions.

[10] Petitioner also "contends that there is a strong reason why the Legislature should feel that a misdemeanor prisoner, if he escapes or attempts to escape, should not be guilty of a felony, which would be a greater crime, and subject to a greater penalty, than that for which he is held." It is true that every violation of section 107 is a felony punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. Breach of prison, either by felons or misdemeanants, has always been regarded as a grave offense. The gravity of the original offense is not the only test of suitable punishment for escapes or attempted escapes. A misdemeanor prisoner escaping from a county jail or road camp after conviction of even a minor offense might cause more demoralization among his fellow prisoners than one escaping from the penitentiary. Accordingly, by affixing a minimum term of six months and a maximum term of ten years and a fine in any sum not exceeding $10,000 for escapes or attempted escapes of either class of prisoners, the Legislature has made it possible to regulate the quantity of punishment to meet the needs of every case. It cannot be laid down as a rule binding on the Legislature that a misdemeanor prisoner who escapes or attempts to escape should not be given felonious punishment. The kind of punishment presents a legislative and not a judicial question; it is for the courts or the state board of prison directors, as the case may be, to determine, within the limits fixed by the Legislature, the extent of punishment.

The writ of habeas corpus is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

PEOPLE v. PERRY et al. (Cr. 2712.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1925. Rehearing Denied April 16, 1925.)

1. Criminal law § 622(1)—Separate trial of defendants jointly charged, in sound discretion of trial court.

Motion for separate trial of defendants jointly charged with any crime is, under Pen. Code, § 1098, as amended by St. 1921, p. 90, addressed to the sound discretion of trial court.

2. Criminal law § 622(1), 1166(6)—Refusal of separate trial where one defendant confessed held not abuse of discretion or miscarriage of justice.

Under circumstances, refusal of separate trial in murder case, notwithstanding confession of one defendant, held not abuse of discretion, and, even if erroneous, not to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

3. Criminal law § 369(3)—Evidence tending to connect defendant with crime charged, admissible, though tending to connect with another offense.

Evidence as to theft of an automobile, as tending to connect defendants with the crime charged, murder in the attempt to rob a bank, held admissible, though it tended to connect them with a distinct unconnected offense.

4. Criminal law § 532(2), 1153(6) — Trial court has wide discretion in passing on voluntariness of confession.

The trial court has wide discretion in passing on question of confession having been freely and voluntarily made, and its ruling cannot be interfered with in the absence of a showing of abuse.

5. Criminal law § 531(3)—Evidence of confession properly admitted.

Evidence of defendant's confession held properly admitted, in absence of showing of coercive measures or inducements, despite defendant's claim that he was imposed on by officers especially in view of evidence to contrary and instruction to disregard confession if not freely and voluntarily made.

6. Homicide § 29—For killing, though accidentally, by one of several while attempting to rob, all guilty of first degree murder.

Under Pen. Code, § 189, if a homicide is committed, though accidentally, by one of several while jointly engaged in an attempt to rob, all are guilty of first degree murder.

7. Criminal law § 773(4)—Instruction as to legal standard of mentality for accountability proper, where evidence of mental infirmity offered.

It is proper to give an instruction as to legal standard of mentality for accountability, where evidence of mental infirmity is offered by defendant with the object of mitigating his punishment and as a defense, though insanity is not claimed; the jury's right to consider mental weakness in mitigation of punishment being preserved.

8. Homicide § 311—Instruction as to jury's discretion in finding punishment for first degree murder held not erroneous.

Instruction that jury's discretion as to fixing punishment for first degree murder is not arbitrary, and is to be employed only when they are satisfied that the lighter punishment should be imposed, held not erroneous.

9. Criminal law § 823(1)—Any vice in instruction as to jury's discretion in fixing punishment held rendered harmless by other instruction.

Were there any vice in an instruction that jury's discretion in fixing punishment for first degree murder was not arbitrary, etc., held, that it was rendered harmless by the closing paragraph of another instruction, that in the exercise of their discretion as to which punishment should be inflicted they were entirely free to act according to their own judgment.

10. Criminal law § 773(4)—Inclusion in instruction on accountability of part of Code definition of persons of sound mind not error.

Inclusion, in instruction on accountability to the law, of that part of Pen. Code, § 21, providing that "all persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots nor lunatics nor affected with insanity," held not error.

11. Homicide ⚡314—Simple verdict of guilty of first degree held proper to carry death penalty.

A simple verdict of guilty of first degree murder is proper to carry death penalty, the jury having been told that such a verdict would have such effect, and that, if in their judgment any defendant should be relieved of such penalty, verdict should impose life imprisonment.

12. Infants ⚡68—Under evidence, held implied finding that defendant was 18 years of age could not be disturbed.

Under the evidence, held, that the implied finding that defendant in homicide was 18 years old when the murder was committed, and so not exempt from death penalty, under Pen. Code, § 190, could not be disturbed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Lewis Perry, Ed. Montijo, and Tom Bailey were convicted of murder, and denied new trials, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Kirby, Holland & Kirby, Guy Eddie, William T. Aggeler, and F. H. Vercoe, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The defendants were jointly accused by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles with the offense of having, on February 20, 1924, in said county of Los Angeles, murdered Glen E. Bond, a police officer of the city of Los Angeles. They were thereafter jointly tried and convicted of said crime of murder as by the indictment charged the jury having returned a simple verdict against each defendant of murder of the first degree. The court thereupon pronounced the judgment which the law in such cases prescribes, which is the death penalty. The appeal is from the orders denying the motions for new trials made jointly by Perry and Bailey and separately by defendant Montijo, and from the judgments of conviction.

The defendants, all of whom are young men with blemished records, and who were known by various false names, preconceived on the day prior to the day on which the murder occurred, and agreed upon, a plan by which they were to undertake to rob a branch of the Merchants' National Bank, situate on the corner of Seventh and Hoover streets, in said city of Los Angeles. The hour set by the defendants for the commission of the crime was 12 o'clock, meridian, February 20, 1924. Pursuant to their said agreement and understanding, the defendants entered said bank a few minutes before the appointed hour, armed with loaded revolvers or pistols, with the clear intent and purpose of executing their plan to rob said bank of its moneys and valuable personal property by means of force and fear to be exercised upon the officers and employees of said bank and upon such other persons as should be present in said bank. In accordance with the prearranged plan, the defendant Montijo, upon entering the bank, took a position near the front entrance the better to guard the entrance to the bank against such persons as might attempt to enter during the robbery and to exercise surveillance over persons occupying the front portion of the room. Defendants Perry and Bailey, with drawn arms, made their way from the front entrance to the central and to the rear portions of said bank, commanding as they went the officers and employees of said bank, and the two or three customers who were transacting business therein, to hold up their hands, and directing certain of the employees to occupy designated positions and to maintain silence. The bank contained the usual lobby for the use of the public. Certain floor space therein was divided into teller's and clerk's cages and into compartments for the private use of the patrons of the bank and its officers. Two police officers, Glen E. Bond, the deceased, and F. W. Forbes, members of the Los Angeles city police department, who had previously been detailed as guards at the bank, were seated in one of these compartments. The door leading therein was partly open. The police officers were taken by surprise as defendant Perry came to the door of the compartment which they were occupying and commanded them to remain quiet. He then ordered Paul A. Terry, a bank clerk, and Assistant Manager George W. Thompson to enter the same compartment occupied by the police officers. In the meantime W. E. Zimmerman, the manager of the bank, had been held at bay at his desk by defendant Bailey, who held a pistol leveled at his body. During the time that Perry was occupied in conducting Terry and Thompson to their respective stations, Officers Bond and Forbes had changed their positions, and Bond, at least, had drawn his pistol and was standing in a crouching position near the door as Perry returned conducting Terry and Thompson to the compartment occupied by the police officers. Immediately upon Perry appearing at the door, three pistol shots rang out in rapid succession. Whether Officer Bond or the defendant Perry fired the first shot the witnesses were unable to state. At any rate, Bond fell mortally wounded from the fire of Perry's pistol. Two bullets entered his body and he expired soon thereafter. Shortly after Bond had fallen mortally wounded, Forbes, who had dropped to the floor and was crawling out of the compartment through another door, was struck on the head by a bullet which inflicted a scalp wound. He was probably shot by Bailey. Several other shots were fired by Perry and Bailey. They assumed crouching or stooping positions and while making their way toward the front exit, brandishing their revolvers in a menacing manner, Officer Forbes, as he lay wounded upon the floor, fired a shot at Perry and exclaimed as he shot, "I got him." Montijo retreated from the bank a little ahead of the other two defendants, and all of the defendants made their escape from the building. They obtained nothing of value. A red Buick automobile, sport model, which will be hereafter referred to, played a part in the crime. Without doubt the defendants used this car, which had been stolen by them or by a fourth person who also appears to have been a confederate for the purpose of making a reconnoitering survey of the bank and its surrounding locality preliminarily to the attempted robbery. This automobile was parked at a convenient place near the scene of the crime immediately prior to the attempted robbery. It was hurriedly driven away immediately after the attempted robbery, but by a miscarriage of plans none of the defendants, possibly with the exception of Perry, was able to obtain passage in it. According to the confessions received in evidence, Oscar Perry, a brother of defendant Lewis Perry, was the driver of the car.

Dr. H. Gordon Bayless, a physician and surgeon, was called by Oscar Perry to attend his brother, defendant Lewis Perry, for a gunshot wound, at 1 o'clock on the afternoon of the attempted robbery. This was but one hour following the shooting at the bank. The defendant was then at the Olive Inn, 337 Olive street, suffering from a gunshot wound. He made no explanation to the physician as to how he came by his wounds. Oscar informed the physician that Lewis had accidentally shot himself. The bullet had passed through the defendant's body, piercing the right lung in its course. The surface wound upon the chest was larger than the wound in the back, which would indicate that the bullet entered the back and passed out through the chest-wall. The shot was probably fired by Forbes as Perry was retreating from the bank. Defendant Perry, his brother Oscar, and perhaps one other of the defendants, became suspicious that the physician would report the case to the police, and the defendant Perry was removed from the Olive Inn to Oscar's home at 2025 E. Fourth street. At 9 o'clock that evening, defendant Lewis Perry was arrested and subsequently taken to the receiving hospital. He informed the officers that he had shot himself accidentally, in some sort of a scuffle. There were no indications of powder burns or other evidence that the shot had been fired at short range. Two loaded revolvers and cartridges were taken from the premises occupied by defendant Perry. Articles of clothing which he had worn were also taken and afterwards exhibited to the identifying witnesses at the trial.

Defendant Bailey was arrested at about 6 o'clock on the afternoon of the robbery. According to his confession, immediately after his flight from the bank he changed his wearing apparel to elude identification. He threw his revolver into Westlake Park in the progress of his flight. Defendant Montijo was arrested at San Diego three days thereafter. Both Montijo and Bailey made complete confessions of their participation in the crime, which, of course, incriminated Lewis Perry. While Oscar Perry did not directly participate in the offense of robbery which resulted fatally to Officer Bond, the confessions of Montijo and Bailey implicated him as the driver of the automobile which conveyed the defendants to the scene of the crime and which disappeared shortly after the defendants fled from the bank.

The positive identification made of the defendants by certain employees of the bank and by the two or three persons who by chance were transacting business with the bank at the time of the attempted robbery, considered in connection with other corroboratory evidence, established the guilty participation of the three defendants in the commission of the crime charged against them beyond a reasonable doubt. Defendants Montijo and Bailey made confessions and each gave in detail accounts of the preparation made by the three defendants and Oscar Perry for the commission of the crime as well as the part each defendant actually took in its commission. Bailey took the officers over the route the defendants traveled in going to the bank and the course he took in his flight. Taken to the bank by the officers, he pointed out the positions occupied by the several defendants, the bank employees, and the customers. In fact, he identified certain of the employees and passed a few words with them as to how certain ones acted under the stress of the situation. His description as to what took place and the sequence of events narrated by him made it morally certain that he had been an actor in the tragedy. Both Montijo and Bailey made mention of physical facts which made it certain that their statements connecting themselves with the offense were true.

[1, 2] The insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment is not, and in the light of the facts of this case could not well be, urged as a sufficient ground to justify a reversal of the case. It is urged that the court committed reversible error by refusing to grant the motions of defendants Perry and Bailey, in which Montijo did not join, for separate trials. These motions were placed upon the ground that it was believed by the other defendants that Montijo had made a confession which was to be introduced in evidence by the prosecution, incriminating both Perry and Bailey and that any extrajudicial confession made by any one of the defendants not in the presence of either of the others was not admissible against either of the parties not present and who were in no way a party thereto. Further, that if the three defendants were tried jointly, the confession of Montijo would inevitably be considered by the jury that was also to pass upon the guilt or innocence of the other two defendants. Clearly Bailey was not prejudiced by any confession that Montijo may have made, as he, too, had made a confession that was practically demonstrative of his guilt and which was more damaging to him than anything that Montijo had said or done. As to Perry, he had been unmistakably identified by several persons as a participant in the crime and within one hour after the shooting was found bearing bullet wounds freshly made upon his body. Identified clothing worn by him, revolvers, cartridges, and other physical facts, had lain the weight of guilt heavily upon him. Montijo, of course, like Bailey, could not get away from his own confession, if it was legally receivable in evidence. We have said this much preliminarily to a consideration of the objection made, to show that if it should be conceded that the court erred as to a matter of procedure the error did not result in a miscarriage of justice. With the confession complained of wholly eliminated from the jury's consideration, the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the conviction of all or any one of the defendants. We are of the opinion, however, that we cannot hold, as a matter of law, that the court abused its discretion by refusing to order a separate trial as to either Perry or Bailey.

Section 1098, Penal Code, as amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 90), provides as follows:

"Defendants jointly charged must be jointly tried. When two or more defendants are jointly charged with any public offense, whether felony or misdemeanor, they must be tried jointly, unless the court order separate trials. In ordering separate trials, the court in its discretion may order a separate trial as to one or more defendants, and a joint trial as to the others, or may order any number of the defendants to be tried at one trial, and any number of the others at different trials or may order a separate trial for each defendant. * * *

The remainder of the section regulates the number of challenges that each defendant shall be entitled to if the trial be joint, and is not germane to the point under consideration.

The motion for a separate trial for each defendant was presented at a seasonable time before the trial began and was based upon an affidavit made by the attorney for the moving defendants upon information and belief. It was averred that a confession had been made by Montijo which was to be offered in evidence by the prosecution, and that the confession incriminated and implicated both Perry and Bailey in the commission of the crime charged. There was no averment or reference made to the fact that Bailey had also made a confession incriminating Perry and Montijo. The confession of Montijo, it was averred, would be highly prejudicial to defendants Perry and Bailey, and even though limited by the court to the confessor alone, it would make an ineffaceable impression upon the jury which could not be disregarded by it, and that it would influence the jury to the extent that said defendants would be substantially denied a fair and impartial trial. Prior to the amendment of 1921, each defendant jointly charged with the commission of a felony was entitled to be separately tried upon request made by him for a separate trial. At common law a defendant jointly charged with others was not, as a matter of right, entitled to a separate trial. Our Code section as it now stands is declaratory of the common-law rule. There is no decision of this court which disposes of the precise question here presented. The question, however, is not a new one. It has received the attention of the Massachusetts Supreme Court and the United States Supreme Court upon several occasions. People v. Borasky, 214 Mass. 313, 101 N. E. 377, presents the precise situation we have before us. The facts of that case are stated in the opinion from which we quote:

"The indictment charged the defendant and one Antone Kolek with having committed the crime of murder by killing Rose Amansky. Both were convicted, but Kolek has deceased. It does not appear to have been disputed at the trial that the woman was murdered.

"Borasky seasonably filed a motion that he should have a separate trial on the grounds that there would probably be introduced in evidence a written confession made by Kolek, which implicated both defendants, and that, as he had been unable to obtain a copy, the court should order the commonwealth to furnish a copy, in order that it might be annexed to his motion. At the argument in support of the motion the judge was requested to examine the confession in the presence of the district attorney, and in the absence of the defendant Borasky or his counsel. There was no error in the denial of the motion. Whether two defendants indicted jointly shall be tried together is discretionary with the trial court. This has been decided many times respecting the trial of crimes involving a punishment less than capital. [Citing Massachusetts cases.] In Com. v. James, 99 Mass. 438, it was stated, in the course of a trial for murder heard by the full court sitting in banc for the trial of two defendants jointly indicted for murder, that 'the general rule is that persons jointly indicted should be tried together.' The confession was there regarded as presenting 'an exceptional case' and it was intimated that a separate trial would be granted if the commonwealth intended to offer the confession. It was not offered and was withdrawn by the commonwealth, and a joint trial was had. It does not appear that the intimation there was thrown out in any other way than as the exercise of discretion. That such a motion is not to be granted as of right but rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court, even in capital cases, is the rule in the federal courts. United States v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. 480, 6 L. Ed. 700; U. S. v. Ball, 163 U. S. 662, 672, 16 Sup. Ct. 1192, 41 L. Ed. 300. There is nothing in the case at bar to indicate any abuse of discretion. Plainly, the court was not required to examine the alleged confession in the presence of the district attorney and in the absence of counsel for the defendant. During the trial the court was scrupulously to advise the jury, whenever any statements made by Kolek in the absence of Borasky implicating the latter were offered in evidence, that they were not to be considered against Borasky."

So, too, in the instant case, the jury was scrupulously admonished by the court, whenever the confessions made by either Montijo or Bailey were referred to, that such confession could not be taken as evidence against the party who had not made it, and it must be disregarded as to all the other persons. Not only was the admonition repeated time after time during the progress of the trial, but again in the final charge to the jury.

In almost every criminal trial in which two or more persons are jointly charged with the commission of an offense, some fact, or facts, are developed against one of the defendants which cannot be regarded as evidence against the other. In the prosecution of criminal conspiracies, or that class of cases which require more than one to execute the crime, it quite frequently happens that damaging testimony admissible against one defendant, but not admissible against the others, is received in the case, but limited in its application to the one to which it is referable. Such evidence may carry with it an unfavorable effect equal in its harm to a confession. Yet it is not the rule in those jurisdictions in which the common law prevails, or in states which have statutes similar to our own, that the defendants are entitled to a separate trial for that reason alone. The motion for severance in the case at bar was submitted to the sound discretion of the trial court, and, considered with respect to the evident reason for the amendment and the circumstances of the instant case, we cannot say that it was error to deny the motion. What we have said applies also to the separate request of Montijo, whose request was not supported by the same showing as was made in behalf of the other defendants.

mitted in overruling objections made by the defendant to testimony offered tending to identify a certain red, five-passenger Buick automobile, sport model, 1923, disc wheels, tan top, red upholstery, which, it is claimed, had been stolen, and was used by the defendants in the perpetration of the crime. A young lady owned such a car which was stolen from her home, at about 8:30 o'clock, the evening before the crime was committed. Montijo, in his confession, described the machine used by Oscar Perry in conveying the defendants on the next forenoon to the vicinity of the bank building on a reconnoitering tour. His description corresponded generally with the machine stolen, to wit, a red Buick, five-passenger, sport model car. The witness William J. Brennan, a chauffeur, stopped his car a few minutes before 12 o'clock on February 20, 1924, on Hoover street at the corner of Seventh street, to permit the traffic to pass. While thus abiding his time to cross Seventh street, he heard the shots in the bank, and saw three persons come out of the bank. The first backed out with a pistol in his hand. The second also backed out. Both ran north on Benton boulevard. The third came out a short time later and ran across a parkway or square between Benton and Hoover streets. At that time a red Buick touring car left the corner of Seventh and Hoover streets and turned into Sunset place. The third person ran in the direction of this car, passing through Sunset place. The witness could not see whether the party he observed running after the car got into it. The last he saw he was running after the car with a "gun" in his hand. Five minutes afterwards he saw a car which he took to be the same car above referred to on the corner of Fourth and Westmoreland avenue. Two persons occupied the front seat. The witness described one of the occupants as a "light haired fellow, and he seemed to be either lying down or stooped over. * * * He seemed to be stretched out, with his head on the back of the cushion—the top of the seat." Keeping in view the fact that Perry was the farthest from the front door of the bank and probably the last to leave the bank, and had been severely wounded, leaves little room for doubt that the person described was Perry. The witness described the car as being red, five-passenger Buick, red disc wheels, yellow top. The witness testified that the car first described by him resembled in all respects the car seen five minutes thereafter and the inference is that it was the same car. The last time it was observed by him it was traveling at a rapid rate of speed and was about three-quarters of a mile from the bank building. The description of the car as given by witness Brennan agreed quite well with the car that had been stolen the evening before. Between the hours of 1 and 2 o'clock p. m. on the afternoon of the day of the crime, Officer Theodore E. Robinson discovered the automobile in which Perry had undoubtedly been taken from the scene of the crime, as described by witness Brennan, abandoned at 338 South Grand avenue. It corresponded in detail to the machine that had been stolen. The motor was still warm, and on the seat which a companion of the driver would have occupied, there were clots of fluid which had the appearance of being blood. The car was about a block from Olive Inn, at which place Perry had been rooming under the fictitious name of W. L. Grant. He was identified by the landlady as a guest at her rooming house. The officer watched the car until darkness came on, but no one came to claim it. The room assigned to Perry in Olive Inn was No. 8, but after receiving the wound he returned to the inn surreptitiously and occupied another room, to wit, room No. 12, as the blood stains on the bedclothing gave evidence. Dr. Bayless testified that he visited him in room 12. In his own room, however, a cartridge clip containing a few cartridges of .44 caliber was found. They sustained an evidentiary value in the case by comparison with the pistols and other cartridges introduced in evidence. Upon motion of counsel for the defendants, the court struck from the record all of the testimony elicited from the owner of the car as to it having disappeared from her possession the night before the crime was committed, in a manner that indicated a theft of the car. Counsel assigned the reception of this testimony although afterwards stricken from the record, as reversible error. Although this testimony had a tendency to connect the defendants with the theft of the automobile, it was clearly admissible. It was rendered admissible as against Montijo and Bailey by their confessions in which they described the red machine driven by Oscar Perry which conveyed them to the scene of the crime. It was in this machine, when en route to the bank, that Bailey was handed by either defendant Perry or Montijo a .45-caliber automatic pistol. The evidence was admissible as against Perry for the reason that it was shown independent and extrinsic to the confession of any one of the defendants that the stolen machine carried him away after he was wounded. His brother was the driver. The fact that the machine had been stolen did not render it inadmissible. Its movements were in obedience to a plan outlined for the commission of the crime, and it was proper that all the evidence or pertinent facts tending to connect the defendants or any of them with its use should have been submitted to the jury. Whether the machine was stolen or not by the defendants was of no great moment; the important question being, did these defendants commit the crime and did the automobile incident tend to connect them with its commission? The rule is too firmly established that evidence tending to connect a defendant with the commission of a crime charged against him is not to be excluded on the ground that it tends to connect him with an offense not included in the charge, to require the citation of a long list of authorities. People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 230, 46 P. 153; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 106 P. 65; People v. Clark (Cal. App.) 233 P. 980. No error would have been committed had the testimony been allowed to stand, and certainly none was committed by the court in expunging it from the case.

[4, 5] The confessions of Montijo and Bailey appear to have been freely and voluntarily made. The trial court so determined, and there is absolutely nothing in the record to raise a doubt as to the correctness of its ruling. The witnesses who gave testimony as to the confessions were examined at great length on their voir dire, and counsel for the defendants were not able to show that any threats, force, or coercive measures were employed or that any inducements or hope of reward were held out by those in authority, or by any other person, to procure said statements or confessions to be made. The court is vested with a wide discretion in passing upon this issue, and its ruling cannot be interfered with in the absence of a showing of abuse. People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 P. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 95 P. 863; People v. Tugwell, 28 Cal. App. 348, 152 P. 740; People v. Castello et al. (Cal. Sup.) 229 P. 855. In resisting the introduction of the confession, Bailey made the claim that he had been imposed upon by the officers, who represented to him that his pal (Perry) had died and in his dying confession had implicated him in the crime. He further said that the officers, in an attempt to prove to him that Perry was dead, took him at 2 o'clock on the morning following the shooting to the Emergency Hospital, where Perry was lying on a bed with his eyes closed and that he presented the appearance of death. He observed him and believed him to be dead. This exhibition, together with the statement that Perry had implicated him, influenced him, according to his testimony, to make the confession offered against him. Bailey was, in fact, taken to Perry's bedside at the hour stated, but the several persons, who were present at all of the times mentioned by Bailey, stated that absolutely no such statements or representations as stated by Bailey were made. Perry was aroused when Bailey was brought into his presence, and a conversation occurred between the officers and Bailey, and the officers and Perry, in turn, in the presence and hearing of Perry. The court properly admitted the confession and in its final charge went to the extent of instructing the jury that it was its right and duty to determine whether the confession of either Montijo or Bailey was obtained under promise of reward, immunity from punishment, or influenced by promises, duress, violence, force, or fraud, and whether said confessions were freely and voluntarily made, and, if they should find that they were obtained by the employment of any of the methods enumerated, it was the duty of the jury to disregard said confession in its consideration of the case.

[6] Specifications of error Nos. 7, 8, and 9 may be treated together, as they raise the same point and are attacks upon the instructions of the court based upon the construction of section 189 of the Penal Code. That portion of the section which is germane to the point made is as follows:

"All murder which is perpetrated by means of poison * * * or which is committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem, is murder of the first degree; and all other kinds of murders are of the second degree."

The purport of these instructions is that if a human being is killed by any one of several persons jointly engaged at the time of such killing in the perpetration of or an attempt to perpetrate the crime of robbery, whether such killing is intentional or unintentional, or accidental, each and all of such persons so jointly engaged in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, such crime of robbery, are guilty of murder of the first degree. This is not only the clear meaning and effect of the statute, but it is fortified by a number of the decisions of this court. If a homicide is committed by one of the confederates while engaged in an attempt to perpetrate the crime of robbery in furtherance of a common purpose, the person or persons so engaged, but who did not actually do the killing, are as accountable to the law as though their own hands had intentionally fired the fatal shot or given the fatal blow, and such killing is murder of the first degree. The jury has no option but to return a verdict of murder of the first degree whether the killing was intentionally or accidentally done, and it is proper to so instruct the jury. People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 122, 22 P. 125; People v. Milton, 145 Cal. 169, 78 P. 549; People v. Bostic, 167 Cal. 754, 141 P. 380; People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 143 P. 317; People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 148 P. 928; People v. Hadley, 175 Cal. 118, 165 P. 442; People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 206 P. 63, 20 A. L. R. 1441; 13 Cal. Jur. 600.

[7-11] It is urged by the appellants that the court erred in giving the jury any enlightenment whatever on the subject of insanity. None of the instructions is challenged as being incorrect statements of the law, but it is insisted that no instructions whatever should have been given defining mental unsoundness for the reason that no claim was made that any one of the defendants was insane. It is, perhaps, true that no specific use was made of the word "insanity" by counsel, but five alienists, or psychologists, were called by the defense and gave testimony bearing directly on the mental deficiency of the defendant Montijo. His father was called to the stand to relate the story of his life. He recalled an injury which the defendant had received in his youth upon his head; also his incorrigibility as a youth, which resulted in his commitment to a reformatory; his roving inclinations and occasional nervous seizures to which he was subject, and mental peculiarities and obtuseness were brought into the case by the father's testimony. It was also shown that he had been a user of narcotics, and some reference was made to a blood taint. The experts testified that his intellectual quotient, as gauged by the Binet-Simon test, Leland Stanford, Jr., University Revision, was no higher than that which a normal boy should register at the age of 11 years. But the law does not substitute mental standardization in place of actual age as the sole test of responsibility for the commission of crime. None of the experts claimed that the defendant did not measure up to the law's standard of accountability, which succinctly stated, is: Did he know the nature and quality of the act that he was committing, and, if so, did he know that it was an act forbidden and punishable by law and that it was wrong to commit it? The testimony offered as to the mental status unquestionably furnished a basis for the contention that the defendant by reason of mental unsoundness, superinduced by injury, or caused by disease—acquired or transmitted—or brought about by the use of drugs, rendered him irresponsible, and that he ought not be required to suffer the penalties prescribed as punishments for the violation of the law. Appellant's contention plainly stated, is that the evidence offered on the issue of mental capacity should be considered as a mitigating circumstance and, perhaps, as a complete defense, and it was error for the court to have instructed the jury as to what mental infirmities will relieve an accused of punishment. We know of no decision, and none has been cited, which holds that if a person offers evidence in his own behalf as to his mental infirmity with the object of mitigating his punishment, the court thereby becomes powerless to instruct the jury as to the legal standard by which accountability is to be determined. Insanity is a broad subject and includes many forms of mental disorders and degrees of mental weaknesses, and the kind and degree that will excuse crime is definitely settled by many decisions of this court. So far as accountability to the law is concerned, there is no middle ground. The verdict of the jury must be guilty of the offense charged, or not guilty by reason of the insanity of the accused, or a plain verdict of not guilty. It is the jury's right and duty to consider and weigh all the facts and circumstances attending the commission of the offense, and from these and such reasons as may appear to it upon a consideration of the whole situation, determine whether or not, in the exercise of its discretion, life imprisonment should be imposed rather than the infliction of the death penalty. As a matter of fact, the right of the jury in the instant case to consider mental weakness as a mitigating circumstance was not infringed in the slightest degree by anything said in the instructions. The instructions throughout dealt with the broad question of responsibility to the law, and not at all with the jury's right to exercise its discretion with reference to any issue in the case. The jury was repeatedly told that if it should entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether the death penalty or life imprisonment should be imposed, it could not, so long as it held such doubt, impose the extreme penalty. The following admonition is a fair example of the many instructions given on this subject:

"If the jury should be in doubt as to the proper penalty to inflict the jury should resolve that doubt in favor of the defendant and fix the lesser penalty, that is, confinement in the state prison for life."

This instruction appears so frequently in the charge as to make it certain that the jury was under no misapprehension as to its duty. It is true that an instruction was given which has its inception in our earlier decisions and which has been carried through the reports, drawing an occasional criticism as to its soundness, by which the jury are told that while the law vests it with a discretion as to whether a defendant shall suffer death or confinement in the state prison for life, this discretion is not an arbitrary one, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed. The precise instruction given in the instant case was considered in the very recent cases of People v. Casade (Cal. Sup.) 230 P. 9; People v. Wolfgang, 192 Cal. 754, 221 P. 907; and other cases. The objection may be disposed of by a quotation from People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 P. 143, carried forward in the Casade Case, which is as follows:

"The law of the state thus appears to be thoroughly settled to the effect that the instruction in question is not erroneous."

But if it could be said that there was any vice in the instruction, it was rendered harmless in the instant case by the closing paragraph of another instruction, which reads:

"In the exercise of your discretion as to which punishment shall be inflicted, you are entirely free to act according to your own judgment."

Objection, without argument to support it, is made to the inclusion of that portion of section 21 of the Penal Code, which is probably given in a great majority of the criminal cases tried in this state, and which reads as follows:

"* * * All persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots nor lunatics, nor affected with insanity."

The foregoing is a portion of the Code section defining intent, and we are unable to find any valid ground of objection thereto. Objection is also made to the form of the verdict. It is contended that if the jury intended to impose the death penalty, it should have been required to return a verdict expressly declaring such intent. This would be a departure from the settled form of procedure. The jury was repeatedly told that if it should return a simple verdict of guilty of murder of the first degree, such a verdict would carry with it the death penalty, and, if in their judgment any one or all of the defendants should be relieved of the death penalty, a verdict imposing life imprisonment should be returned. We see no merit whatever in appellant's objection to the forms of the verdicts.

[12] Lastly, it is urged that the evidence does not justify the implied finding of the jury that the defendant Perry had arrived at the age of 18 years on the day the murder was committed. Section 190, Penal Code, in part, provides as follows:

"* * * Provided, however, that the death penalty shall not be imposed or inflicted upon any person for murder committed before such person shall have reached the age of eighteen years; provided, further, that the burden of proof as to the age of said person shall be upon the defendant."

Defendant's brother, Oscar Perry, who was shown by convincing evidence to have been particeps criminis with the others in the commission of the crime, testified that Lewis Perry was a few days under the age of 18 at the time the murder was committed. At one stage of the proceedings the matter was referred to a juvenile court to determine the defendant's age and pass upon his fitness for consideration by that court. The court made no finding as to his age, but expressed the opinion that he was over the age of 18 years, and remitted him to the superior court for trial on the ground that his case was not a proper one for that court to proceed with. At that proceeding the defendant testified that he was born at Dallas, Tex., and was 17 years of age. He claimed that his birthday was February 12. This would have made him eight days under the statutory age. He also admitted that he was committed to the Preston School of Industry from Los Angeles county in the forepart of January, 1923. He admitted that he testified at the proceeding before the juvenile court during the forepart of January, 1923, and made representations to others that his birthday was January 5, 1922, and that he was 17 on the day last above mentioned. According to this statement, made in the superior court sitting as a juvenile court, the defendant was more than a month past 19 years of age at the time the murder was committed. The defendant attempted an explanation as to serious discrepancies concerning his age and said that he had set it forward in order to have the benefit of a jury trial on the charge pending against him, thereby ousting the juvenile court of jurisdiction of his person. His attention being called to the fact that he had not placed his age sufficiently high to bring him within the right to be dealt with in the superior court as an adult, he replied by stating that he understood the law to be the same here as it was in Texas, which provided that a person of 17 years of age was entitled to have his case heard and determined in the superior court. There was then pending in Texas a charge of burglary against the defendant. One witness testified that the defendant had the appearance of being more than 18 years of age. The jury evidently was not impressed with the testimony of either Lewis Perry or his brother, Oscar, as to the question of age. As between the defendant and his brother, it was not made definite as to whether Lewis Perry was born in January, February, or March. Neither do the days of the month agree. All three of the months above mentioned are stated to be his birth months. The defendant was in the presence of the jury during a long trial, and it had ample opportunity to make physical and mental observations of him. His connection with and the part he took in the crime and his demeanor thereafter furnished evidence of his maturity or immaturity, all of which was, no doubt, considered by the jury. On the issue of age, the burden being upon the defendant, the implied finding that he had not sustained the burden which the law casts upon a defendant cannot be disturbed under the evidence.

The order and judgment appealed from in each is hereby affirmed.

In re MALTMAN'S ESTATE.

1. Perpetuities $\S$ 6(7)—Devise in trust for son and all children during their lives held void as a perpetuity.

Testamentary trust for son and his children, held intended to continue until death of last child born or to be born, and hence void under Civ. Code, $\S$ 715, 716, as to suspension of power of alienation, in view of section 749.

2. Perpetuities $\S$ 6(11)—Power of sale held not to take trust out of statute against perpetuities; "suspension."

Power of trustee to sell and reinvest proceeds of trust res, held not to take it out of statute against perpetuities, in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 771, providing that "suspension" of all power to alienate, other than to sell and reinvest proceeds to be held upon same trust, is "suspension" within meaning of section 715.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Suspend—Suspension.]

3. Wills $\S$ 81—Trust of entire estate, for benefit of son and daughter equally, which was invalid as to son, held invalid as to daughter.

Devise of entire estate in trust to pay one-half of income to son and all his children for their lives, and one-half to daughter and her child for life, which was invalid as to son as violating statute against perpetuities, held invalid as to daughter also, since to declare trust invalid as to son only would require distribution of one-half to both, and thereby violate testator's intention of equal division.

4. Wills $\S$ 81—Trust violating rule against perpetuities not upheld as to beneficiaries actually in being at time of creation.

Trust violative of rule against perpetuities, in that class of beneficiaries might be increased by members still unborn, will not be upheld as to beneficiaries actually in being at time of creation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

Proceeding for the distribution of the estate of John S. Maltman, deceased, in which Ray C. Riley, State Controller, filed objections. From an order decreeing distribution to John W. Maltman and another, the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, executor and trustee, appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Keogh, of Los Angeles, and Frank H. Snyder, of Glendale, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin P. Werner, of Los Angeles, Adrian C. Stanton, of Sacramento, George S. Dennison and D. H. Lau-bersheimer, both of Los Angeles, and John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order and decree of distribution. The decedent, a widower, died testate, leaving surviving him as his only heirs at law two children, his son, John W. Maltman, and his daughter, Teresa Maltman Kennard. His said son at the time of the making of the decedent's will was married and had two children. Subsequent to the execution of his father's will, another child was born to his said son, and he, his wife, and children, were living at the time of the father's death. The daughter of the deceased was also married at the date of the father's will and had one child, a daughter, and the husband, mother, and daughter were alive when the testator died. By the terms of his will he devised his entire estate of which he should die seized to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company of Los Angeles, a corporation—

"to be held by it upon the following trusts and not otherwise, to wit. Said Trustee shall manage and care for all such estate, and collect the income thereof, and is hereby given full power to sell and convey all said estate, or any part thereof, at any time, without any order of court whatsoever, and to reinvest the proceeds. I request that such estate be sold and turned into good interest bearing securities, as soon as the market favors such sales. I make the following bequests as a token of high appreciation of their most kind, devoted and valuable service to me in time of my distress and need. To Dick Sutton of said county and state, one thousand (1000) dollars. To Mrs. Agnes H. Pleasance of said county and state, one thousand (1000) dollars. After paying the expenses of said trust, the up-keep of said estate and said bequests, the trustee shall pay the net balance of the income derived, from time to time, to my said two children share and share alike, so long they shall live; all such payments to be made quarterly, namely, every three months. Upon the death of said Teresa, leaving her husband E. H. Kennard and her daughter, or either of them surviving, then her said share is to be paid quarterly, share and share alike to such husband and daughter, and to the survivor of them, so long as they or either of them shall live. Upon the death of said John leaving a wife and children or any of them surviving, then his said share is to be paid quarterly, share and share alike, to such wife and children and to the survivors and survivor of them, so long as they, or either of them shall live. It is my will that said trust shall cease and terminate as follows, to wit, first on one half of the remainder of said estate; then on the other half of said estate, that is to say, when said Teresa and husband and child shall have died, said trust shall cease and terminate on one half of such estate, and thereupon be distributed according to the laws of the state of California; and so when said John and his wife and all his children shall have died, said trust shall cease and terminate on one half of said estate, meaning the other half if said Teresa, her husband and child shall have died and said trust had terminated on one half. Meaning and intending that said trust shall wholly terminate on the entire estate when said Teresa and John and their said families shall have died, and that all the remainder of said estate shall be distributed in accordance with the law of inheritance of the state of California. Said trustee shall be the sole judge of what constitutes one half of said estate, and what half shall first be sold or prepared and distributed as above provided. I particularly request and direct that such legatees shall not anticipate their income by any bargain and sale, or pledge to secure advances or loans on same, and that said trustee shall make payment to each one in person, whenever practical, and not to their order. Any attempt to break this my last will and testament or contest any of its provisions shall operate to extinguish all rights and share of my estate, in and to such contestant or contestants, and any and all such contestants shall have no part thereof. I request and direct that my body be cremated and the ashes thereof be deposited in an urn and placed in the Maltman family plot in Rosedale Cemetery, in the City of Los Angeles. I hereby nominate and appoint the said Title Guarantee and Trust Company as executor of this my last will and testament."

[1] The said will of the testator was duly admitted to probate and was duly administered upon up to the time when the estate was practically ready for final settlement and distribution, whereupon the inheritance tax appraiser filed his report and appraisal in said estate, wherein he based his estimate of the amount of inheritance tax upon his contention, as expressed therein, that the trust provided for in the said will was invalid as in violation of the provisions of section 715 of the Civil Code. The final account and petition for distribution of said estate were filed shortly thereafter, and to said account and petition the state controller filed his written objections based upon the same ground as that embraced in the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, and it was stipulated between the parties, through their respective counsel, that the hearing upon the said report of the inheritance tax appraiser be had at the time of the hearing upon the petition for final distribution and of the objections of the state controller thereto. These matters were accordingly heard together, and the decision upon both was embraced in the body of the order and decree of distribution wherein the court adopted the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, sustained the objections of the state controller to the form of the final account and petition for distribution as filed, holding the trust void in toto, and directing that the entire estate, after the payment of the special bequests, be distributed under the laws of succession, one-half to the son, John W. Maltman, and one-half to the daughter, Teresa Maltman Kennard, and that the inheritance taxes be computed upon the basis of such succession. The trust company, both in its capacity as executor and as trustee under the said will, has appealed from said order and decree of distribution, thus presenting for our determination the question as to whether said will, except as to said special bequests, is void as creating a perpetuity in violation of the provisions of said section of the Civil Code. An examination of the trust provisions of said will as above set forth discloses that a trust is thereby created, by the terms of which one-half of the residue of the testator's estate was to be distributed to the trustee named for the benefit of his daughter, Teresa Maltman Kennard, and her daughter, and the other one-half of said estate was to be distributed to the same trustee for the benefit of his son, John W. Maltman, and his children. We shall consider the latter first in the light of the respondent's contention that a perpetuity was thereby created in contravention of the provisions of section 715 of the Civil Code. The language of this latter provision of said will is not ambiguous or uncertain so as to require resort to other sources than the language of said will itself for its interpretation. In this portion of said will the testator devises one-half of his estate to said trustee upon the trust to manage, conserve, sell, and invest the proceeds of the same in good interest-bearing securities, and to pay the net balance of the income derived therefrom to his said son so long as he should live. The will proceeds:

"Upon the death of said John leaving a wife and children or any of them surviving, then his said share is to be paid quarterly, share and share alike, to such wife and children and to the survivors and survivor of them, so long as they, or either of them shall live * * * and so when said John and his wife and all his children shall have died, said trust shall cease and terminate on one half of said estate, meaning the other half if said Teresa, her husband and child shall have died and said trust had terminated on one half. Meaning and intending that said trust shall wholly terminate on the entire estate when said Teresa and John and their said families shall have died."

Section 715 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"Except in the single case mentioned in section seven hundred seventy-two, the absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended, by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than as follows:

"1. During the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition; or

"2. For a period not to exceed twenty-five years from the time of the creation of the suspension."

Section 716 of the same Code reads:

"Every future interest is void in its creation which, by any possibility, may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed in this chapter. Such power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed."

It is not necessary to again indulge in an elaborate review of the history or proper interpretation of these two sections of the Civil Code. That was done at much length and with great learning in the leading case of Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 41 P. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, from the reasoning of which there has been no material departure since its decision 30 years ago. Two particular clauses found in these sections of the Civil Code have been given more exact definition in later cases. One of these is the clause found in both of these sections referring to the "creation" of the limitation, condition, estate, or interest affected by the inhibition of these Code provisions. In Estate of Whitney, 176 Cal. 12, 167 P. 399, it was held that the time of the death of the testator whose will contained provisions for the creation of such condition, limitation, estate, or interest was the date fixed by these Code sections for the purpose of determining their validity. Civ. Code, § 749. The court in that case quoted approvingly from Estate of Steele, 124 Cal. 533, 537, 57 P. 564. The language of the court in that case to the effect that:

"The statute does not permit us to wait and see whether events may not so transpire that in fact no perpetuity results, but if under the terms of the deed or will creating the trust, when properly construed, the instrument 'by any possibility may suspend' the absolute power of alienation beyond the continuance of lives in being, the instrument, whether a deed or will, is void, and no trust is created nor any estate vested in the trustees."

We thus have also a judicial interpretation of the other clause in said section of the Code, viz. "by any possibility." It is important that each of those particular clauses of these sections of the Civil Code should be borne in mind as we approach the interpretation of the provision of the will of the decedent in so far as it relates to the trust attempted to be created in favor of his son John and his descendants. It is also to be borne in mind that it is a conceded fact in this case that at the date of the execution of his father's said will, and also at the date of his death, John W. Maltman was married; that his wife was living; that he was the father by her of two children at the time said will was executed, and that a third child was born to these parents between that date and the date of the death of the testator, and that at all of these times these parents were capable of begetting and bearing other children. Turning to the provisions of the will having particular reference to the trust proposed to be created for the benefit of John W. Maltman, his wife, and his children, we find therein no limitation nor any apparent attempt to limit the trust estate to the lives of those in being either at the date of said will or at the date of the death of the testator. The will provides that during the life of the testator's son, John, one half the net income arising from the investment of the substance of his estate by his said trustee shall be paid to his son John, and that:

"Upon the death of said John leaving a wife and children or any of them surviving, then his said share is to be paid quarterly, share and share alike, to such wife and children and to the survivors and survivor of them, so long as they, or either of them shall live."

The will continues:

"And so when said John and his wife and all his children shall have died, said trust shall cease and terminate."

[2] This language in the testator's will is so clear and explicit as to seem to leave no doubt in our minds that, considering the foregoing provisions of said will by themselves, they can be given no other interpretation than that of evincing his intention that the trust created by his said will as to this half of his estate should continue until the death of the last child born or to be born to his son, John, and his said or any wife. If the aid of authority is needed to enforce this conclusion, it is to be found in the decision of this court in Estate of Van Wyck, 185 Cal. 49, 196 P. 50, between which and the instant case, in every material respect, no distinction can be drawn. It is, however, the appellant's contention that in determining the meaning to be given to this particular portion of the testator's will, the entire will is to be taken into consideration, with a view to determining the testator's intent in the use of the particular language used in the portion of it under immediate review, and that, if we should hold that as to the portion of said will which purported to create a trust in favor of his daughter, Teresa, and of "her daughter," the testator did not create an estate beyond the lives of those in being, he is not to be held to have intended to do so in the creation of the trust in favor of John and "his children." While it is true that the principle of interpretation of instruments invoked by the appellant is correct in its application to those portions of such instruments in which the language used by the testator is of doubtful meaning, it does not go to the extent of controlling the meaning to be given to those particular provisions of the instrument wherever the language used by the testator in dealing with the immediate subject conveys no doubtful meaning, and hence requires no recourse to other portions of the instrument to determine the interpretation to be given to its plain and unmistakable terms. Aside from this, however, if the interpretation for which the appellant contends should be given to the portion of the testator's said will creating a trust in favor of his son, John, and "his children," and continuing said trust in force and effect, until the death of his said son, John, and his wife and "all his children," it would have the effect of imputing to the testator the intent of limiting his benefaction to the children of his son, John, in being at the time of the execution of his said will to the exclusion, not only of the child born to his said son after the date of said instrument, but prior to the testator's death, and also to the exclusion of any later children born to him after the decease of his father. The imputation of such an intent does violence to the manifest intent of the testator that his son, John, his wife, and all his children should have an equal share in the benefits to be derived from the execution of said trust so long as any of them should live. Such an interpretation, to use the language of this court in the case of Estate of Van Wyck, supra, applied to a precisely similar situation, would be "an unnatural and unreasonable provision, and one contrary to the natural meaning of the language used." Our conclusion therefore is that, as to the provisions in said will which purport to create a trust in favor of John W. Maltman, his wife, and his children, they are obnoxious to the terms of section 715 of the Civil Code, relating to perpetuities and are void. In so holding we have in mind the contention of the appellant herein that the provision in said will empowering the said trustee to sell and convey all of the real estate bequeathed to it in such trust and to reinvest the proceeds in interest-bearing securities would have the effect of relieving such trust from the inhibitions of said section of the Civil Code, but we consider that this contention is fully met by the provisions of section 771 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"The suspension of all power to alienate the subject of a trust, other than a power to exchange it for other property to be held upon the same trust, or to sell it and reinvest the proceeds to be held upon the same trust, is a suspension of the power of alienation, within the meaning of section seven hundred and fifteen."

[3] The next question presented for our consideration is that relating to those portions of the testator's will which purport to create a trust affecting the other one-half of his estate in favor of his daughter, Teresa Maltman Kennard, and "her daughter." It will be at once perceived that an entirely different intent is here manifested on the part of said testator. The specific persons for whose benefit this portion of said trust is created are defined. There is no room for a conclusion that the testator in attempting to create this particular portion of said trust intended it to apply to any other person or persons then in being or thereafter to come into being than the two designated beneficiaries thereof, viz. his daughter Teresa, and

"her daughter." The fact that he does not mention the latter by name conveys no reasonable implication that he intended to embrace within the designation "her daughter" other offspring than the one already borne by his said daughter, Teresa, and in being at the date of his will. We would have no hesitancy, therefore, in holding this portion of said trust to be valid, were it not for the difficulty in so doing which springs from our conclusion that the provisions of said will relating to the trust sought to be created in favor of the son of the testator and "his children" are void. This conclusion compels us to a determination of the question as to whether the entire trust must not therefore be held void for the reason that the two portions or provisions thereof are inseparable. Reading the will of the testator as a whole, there can be no doubt that it was his intention thereby to divide his estate and the income thereof equally between his two children, and that an equal one-half thereof should pass through the medium of the trust sought to be created to the offspring of each. But if, as we have held, the trust attempted to be imposed upon the one-half of his said estate for the benefit of his son John and "his children" is for the reasons stated void, and if, for the further reasons stated, the trust sought to be created for the benefit of his daughter, Teresa, and "her daughter" were to be held valid, it is unavoidably apparent that this intent on the part of the testator would be subverted, and this for the reason that, the bequest to the trustee of the one-half of said estate intended for the benefit of John and his children having failed, that portion of the estate would remain undivided, and hence would pass to the heirs of the ancestor under the laws of succession, in which event his natural heirs, John and Teresa, would be entitled to share equally in said undivided portion of their ancestor's estate, by which division thereof upon the distribution of said estate Teresa would receive, not only the benefit, as a cestui que trust, of the one-half thereof devised to the trustee, but would also be entitled to receive one-half of the remaining undivided portion of said estate under the laws of succession. This would have the result of distributing three-fourths of the ancestor's estate directly and indirectly to Teresa, and one-fourth thereof to John, a consequence clearly in violation of the intent of the testator in making said will. We are thus driven to the conclusion that the provisions of said will, in so far as they purport to create a single trust for the management and conduct of the testator's entire estate, sale of its properties, and investment of its funds for the expressed purpose of having his son and daughter have each an equal share in the income thereof during each of their lives, and of having their respective offspring also share equally in the respective portion thereof held in trust for their parents' benefit respectively, and of having each one-half of his said estate distributed under the law of inheritance upon the eventual termination of said trust, are so far inseparable that the holding of the one portion thereof void, as in violation of the statute against perpetuities, invalidates the entire trust. We are not without authority in arriving at this conclusion. In Estate of Van Wyck, supra, in which a much similar situation was presented, this court said:

"The real question presented where a will contains both valid and invalid provisions is whether the two are so parts of a single plan or scheme, or otherwise so dependent one upon the other, that, by avoiding the invalid provisions and allowing the valid to stand, there will result a disposition of the estate so different from what the testator contemplated or so unreasonable that it must be presumed that the testator would not have made the valid provisions if he had been aware of the invalidity of the others. The rule in fact is frequently stated more strongly against allowing the valid provisions to stand than we have just stated it. Thus, in Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 540 [84 Am. St. Rep. 70, 60 Pac. 549], it is said: 'The question whether the valid clauses can stand depends upon whether or not the invalid ones are so interwoven with them that they cannot be eliminated without interfering with and changing the main scheme of the testator. In Darling v. Rogers, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 495, Senator Verplanck correctly stated the rule as follows: "When a will is good in part and bad in part, the part otherwise valid is void if it works such a distribution of the estate as, from the whole testament taken together, was evidently never the design of the testator."

It is clear to our minds in the light of the foregoing authorities that our holding that the portion of the testator's said will purporting to create a trust in an undivided one-half of his estate for the benefit of his son, John, and his children is void as in contravention of the statute against perpetuities, so far destroys the scheme and purpose of the testator in the creation of said trust affecting his entire estate that said trust must be declared invalid in toto, notwithstanding the fact that it might otherwise have been declared valid in so far as its provisions affected the rights of his daughter, Teresa, in the portion of said estate upon which said trust was imposed for her benefit.

[4] The appellant makes the further point that, even though it should be held that said trust is void in whole or part as violative of the statute against perpetuities, it may still be upheld as to the beneficiaries thereof actually in being at the time of the creation of said trust; but this contention will be found to be sufficiently disposed of by what this court has said in Estate of Van Wyck, supra, wherein the same contention was urged.

The order and decree appealed from are and each of them is affirmed.

UNIT CONST. CO. v. FOSS et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 7, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 6, 1925.)

1. Attachment §333—When cause of action on bond to release accrues stated.

Cause of action against sureties on bond to release attachment accrues when, after judgment against defendant in the attachment action, he refuses to redeliver the property on demand, and execution is returned unsatisfied.

2. Attachment §333—Obligation of sureties on bond for release not discharged by offer to redeliver property with mechanics' liens thereon reduced to judgment.

In view of Const. art. 1, § 13, relative to due process, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1186, relative to mechanics' liens, it is no defense to action against sureties on bond for release of real estate from attachment that they offered to return the property, where mechanics' liens thereon, filed after giving of the bond, for work commenced before the attachment, were already reduced to judgment, depriving plaintiff of opportunity to attack their validity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by the Unit Construction Company against Howard N. Foss and others. From judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant and two others appeal. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and Charles A. Tuttle, all of Fresno, for appellants.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants Foss, Craycroft, and Millark prosecute this appeal from the judgment entered herein against all the defendants.

The action was instituted to enforce the obligation of defendants on an undertaking executed by them for the release of an attachment of money and real property in an action prosecuted by plaintiff herein against the Fresno Dehydrated Products Company, the owner of such property. The undertaking recited the seizure of the property by the sheriff under the writ of attachment and provided that, "in consideration of the release from the attachment of the property attached," the sureties "do hereby, jointly and severally, undertake in the sum of $10,- 000, and promise in case the said plaintiff recover judgment in this said action, the said defendant will on demand redeliver such attached property so released to the proper officer to be applied to the payment of the judgment; and that in default thereof said defendant and sureties will on demand pay to said plaintiff the full value of the property released, not exceeding the amount of said judgment." It is admitted that the value of such property was in excess of $10,000. January 7, 1922, judgment was entered in the attachment suit against the defendant therein for the sum of $7,259.32, together with certain additional sums as interest. In the meantime the defendant in the attachment suit had been adjudged a bankrupt, and the aforesaid judgment directed that it "be enforced solely out of the property attached or out of any and all bonds or undertakings given for the possession thereof or for the release thereof."

At the time of the execution of the undertaking there was a building in course of construction upon said real property, and several persons had theretofore performed services and furnished materials in the construction thereof. These persons subsequently duly filed claims of lien, and late prosecuted the same to judgment.

More than six months after the execution of the undertaking, the Fresno Dehydrated Products Company filed its petition in bankruptcy and was thereupon adjudged a bankrupt. January 13, 1922, in the bankruptcy proceedings, the interest of the bankrupt in said real property was duly sold and conveyed to C. A. Tuttle.

January 14, 1922, plaintiff demanded of defendant in the attachment suit that it redeliver to the sheriff the property which had been attached, but the defendant refused. On the same day the plaintiff demanded of the defendants herein that they perform the obligation of their undertaking, but they refused. January 16, 1922, execution was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, but the same was returned by him "wholly unsatisfied" on the 27th of January, 1922. February 23, 1922, this action was commenced. March 6, 1922, the defendants filed their demurrer to the complaint. March 27, 1922, they tendered to the plaintiff the amount of money which had been attached and interest thereon, and a deed executed by C. A. Tuttle conveying said real property to plaintiff. The plaintiff refused to accept the property so tendered. At the time of the tender the real property was incumbered by the aforesaid liens, or the judgments recovered thereon, and a lien for taxes. The defendants did not offer to pay any of these liens or to pay plaintiff's costs incurred up to that time in the prosecution of this action. The liens aggregated more than $6,000.

[1] Respondent contends that the offer to redeliver the property was not a performance of the obligation of the sureties for several reasons: First, that it was too late, being made after suit upon the undertaking had been properly commenced; second, that the tender of the property was not made "to the proper officer to be applied to the payment of the judgment," but to the plaintiff; third, that at the time of the tender the real property was incumbered with the aforesaid liens for labor and materials and the judgments based thereon; fourth, that the defendants did not offer to discharge such liens or to pay the costs incurred by the plaintiff in the prosecution of this action up to the time of the tender. It is not necessary to consider all of these contentions. The plaintiff's cause of action against the sureties accrued immediately upon the refusal of the defendant in the attachment suit to redeliver the property on demand and the return of the execution unsatisfied. Metrovich v. Jovovich, 58 Cal. 341, 344; Gardner v. Donnelly, 86 Cal. 367, 372, 24 P. 1072; Brownlee v. Riffenburg, 95 Cal. 447, 449, 30 P. 587. In view of the conclusion reached upon respondent's third contention, it need not be determined whether the sureties might have discharged their obligation by a proper redelivery of the property after the commencement of this action.

[2] Appellants contend that the judgments upon the liens "related back to the time of the commencement of the building, and * * * were prior liens to the attachment of this plaintiff"; and that therefore "the property was sought to be returned to the plaintiff in exactly the same condition that it was at the date of the attachment." Section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to liens of mechanics and materialmen, provides:

"The liens provided for in this chapter are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement, or structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished."

Had the property remained under attachment, it is undoubtedly true that such liens would have taken precedence over the lien of plaintiff's attachment. In that case, however, the plaintiff would have had the right to intervene in any action to enforce such preferred liens and to contest the validity or the amount thereof. Plaintiff's attachment lien ceased upon the release of the property. Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 240, 243, 55 P. 804. He thereafter had no standing to appear in the actions wherein the preferred liens were prosecuted to judgment. If he is bound to accept redelivery of the property incumbered with the liens of the judgments entered in such actions, then the security which he obtained by levy of the writ of attachment, and the undertaking for release thereof, has been impaired by suits to which he was not and could not have become a party. Such security is a property right.

"No person shall * * * be deprived of * * * property without due process of law." Const. art. 1, § 13.

"The meaning of this is that no one can be deprived thereof without notice and an opportunity for a hearing before some tribunal authorized to determine the question." Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 249, 187 P. 965.

The judgments entered upon the preferred liens are binding upon the property, and would have remained so if the plaintiff had accepted it when the tender was made. He could have attacked their validity, after acceptance, only upon the limited grounds upon which final judgments may be attacked. Their validity cannot be determined collaterally in a suit upon the undertaking of the sureties. His inability to protect his rights under the attachment against the suits on the preferred liens was brought about by the act of the sureties in procuring the release of the property. The offer to redeliver the property under the circumstances stated is no defense. What the rule would be if the preferred liens had not been reduced to judgment and the plaintiff still had the right to contest them is a question not involved on this appeal.

No case has been discovered in which the precise question presented here is considered. There are, however, cases analogous in principle wherein it is held that conflicting claims to property released from attachment cannot be determined collaterally in a suit upon the undertaking given to secure such release. In Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 240, 55 P. 804, the undertaking was to the same effect as that in the instant case. After the release of the attachment, and in less than a month after the levy, the defendant filed his voluntary petition in insolvency, and his property was conveyed to the assignee appointed in that proceeding. The effect thereof under Insolvency Act of 1880, § 17 (Stats. 1880, p. 86), was to "dissolve any attachment made within one month next preceding the commencement of the insolvency proceedings." The court said:

"Defendants contend that the effect of this provision was to dissolve the attachment * * * and render impossible the return of the released property to the attaching officer, and hence to destroy the obligation of their undertaking. * * * It is clear, for reasons which need not be enlarged upon, that if at the time the proceeding in bankruptcy is instituted there is no attachment in force on which the proceeding can operate, if the attachment lien has already been discharged by a bond for that purpose, then the liability of sureties on the bond is not affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of their principal."

In McCormick v. National Surety Co., 134 Cal. 510, 66 P. 741, the plaintiff in the attachment suit involved had procured an attachment to be levied on certain property as the property of the two defendants in that action. The surety company executed an undertaking for the release of the property. The undertaking contained the same provisions as that in the instant case. Judgment in the attachment suit was entered against only one of the defendants therein. In the action against the surety the trial court found that the property attached belonged to the defendant against whom no judgment was recovered. The Supreme Court said:

"The actual ownership of the property attached is no concern of the surety. He can meddle with such property and remove it beyond the reach of the attaching creditor only by undertaking that if the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, it—the identical property attached and released—shall be restored to the attaching officer. Whether it belongs to a third party, or for any reason is not legally subject to the attachment, is a question to be litigated between plaintiff and the adverse claimant, and in no way affects the surety's express covenant to restore."

See, also, Passow & Sons v. United States F. & G. Co., 177 Cal. 31, 38, 170 P. 1124; Tormey v. Miller, 31 Cal. App. 469, 472, 160 P. 858, and S. F. Sulphur Co. v. Aetna Indem. Co., 11 Cal. App. 695, 699, 106 P. 111. The question discussed is decisive of the case against the appellants, and there is therefore no need to consider any other contentions made.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Cr. 1174.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 5, 1925.)

1. Burglary $\S$ 10—That person was sleeping in room entered held to establish burglary in first degree.

That person was asleep in room, which accused entered and took therefrom clothes containing property, established burglary in first degree, regardless of lack of proof that accused was armed, or that he committed assault while perpetrating offense.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 829(3, 18)—Refusal to give instruction fully covered by other instructions not error.

In prosecution for burglary, refusal to give instructions as to reasonable doubt, intent, and that accused was not on trial for larceny, fully covered by other instructions, was not error.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 829(3) — Refusal to give statement in instruction already in effect given therein held not error.

In prosecution for burglary, where instruction stated that accused was only being tried for burglary and not for larceny, refusal to give concluding statement that, even if he was guilty of larceny, he could not be convicted of burglary, unless it was proven beyond reasonable doubt, was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

John Miller was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John Miller, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, John Miller, was convicted by a jury of the crime of first degree burglary, and has appealed from the judgment of conviction therein, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The record discloses the following facts: On the night of August 24, 1923, Bert Richter, a locomotive fireman, while sleeping in one of the bedrooms of a lodging house situated on Seventh street, Oakland, was awakened about midnight by the electric light in the hall shining through the doorway leading from said hall into his room. Looking up, he observed the form of a man passing out of his room through said doorway into the hall. He then heard the man proceed up the hall toward the rear of the house to the bathroom. Richter immediately reached out to a chair, which was standing at the head of his bed, to ascertain if his clothes, which he had placed there upon retiring, had been disturbed; finding that his overalls, which contained his watch and other personal belongings had been stolen, he arose from the bed, put on his trousers and stood at the doorway just inside of his room awaiting the return of this person from the bathroom. The defendant, who was a stranger and not a roomer in the house, soon came down the hall from the bathroom, and opening the door to Richter's room quietly was just about to enter, when Richter grabbed him, charged him with the theft, and demanded the return of his (Richter's) watch. The defendant denied having been in the room or having possession of the watch. Richter thereupon took the defendant across the hall, into a room occupied by another locomotive fireman, and in the presence of defendant and the other fireman, again charged defendant with the theft and demanded the return of said watch. Again the defendant denied his guilt or that he had the watch. Richter then told defendant that if the watch was not surrendered he (Richter) would take it away from him; whereupon defendant produced the watch and handed it to Richter. The latter then asked defendant where the overalls were and defendant replied that they were in the bathroom. Richter then accompanied defendant to the bathroom, where Richter's switch key and the other articles belonging to him were found. Soon afterwards the defendant was turned over to the police, to whom he admitted his guilt, and attempted to explain his conduct upon the ground that he was intoxicated. This latter assertion, however, was disputed by other witnesses. When the defendant was searched at the prison, a railroad watch inspector's card, belonging to Richter, and which had been taken from the overalls, was found in defendant's pocket. No defense was offered at the trial by the defendant.

[1] The first contention made upon the appeal is that there is no evidence to prove that the room burglarized was at the time inhabited or that defendant, while engaged in the perpetration of the crime, committed any assault upon any person or was armed; that therefore there was insufficient evidence upon which to base a verdict of burglary of the first degree. The point is wholly without merit. While there was no evidence to prove that the defendant was armed, or that he committed any assault while perpetrating the crime, it was established, without question, that Richter was asleep in this particular room, when the defendant entered and took therefrom Richter's overalls containing his watch and other belongings.

[2,3] Defendant's second contention is that the court erred in refusing to give three instructions and in modifying a fourth one, proposed by defendant. The refusal to give the instructions in question was justified, however, because the subject-matter thereof was fully covered by other instructions which the court gave. For instance, defendant's proposed instruction No. 28, which was refused (erroneously designated in appellant's brief as No. 26) related to the doctrine of reasonable doubt, in connection with circumstantial evidence. That doctrine was several times alluded to and elaborated upon in the court's charge, particularly as set forth on pages 28, 30, and 31 of the clerk's transcript. Defendant's proposed instruction numbered 38, also refused, set forth that the defendant was charged with burglary, and it concluded with this sentence:

"The crime of larceny is not included in the charge."

The very next instruction, however, No. 39, proposed by defendant, and which the court gave, covered the entire matter. It is as follows:

"The defendant is not on trial for larceny or for any offense other than burglary. Burglary is the only charge he is required to meet upon this trial, and, unless you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt from the evidence in this case that he committed the crime of burglary as charged in this information, you must find him not guilty."

When originally proposed this last instruction contained the additional sentence: "This will be so even though you believe that he has been guilty of larceny," which the court refused to give, and rightly so, because the effect of the sentence stricken out was incorporated in defendant's instruction No. 39 above quoted.

Defendant has not specified in his brief which of the two instructions appearing on page 24 of the clerk's transcript he claims it was error for the court to refuse. The first one relates to the element of intent essential to constitute burglary; the other, to the fact that defendant was not on trial for larceny. We have examined both instructions, however, and find that each was properly refused. The matter of intent was abundantly covered by the court in its charge, and, as already pointed out, the proposition that the defendant was not on trial for, nor answerable to, the charge of larceny, was made perfectly clear.

The record is free from error, and therefore the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Lawrence L. Larrabee and G. R. Crump, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles County Bar Association.

John E. Biby, of Los Angeles, for respondent State Board of Bar Examiners.

WORKS, J. Applicant petitions for admission to the bar. He has never been admitted to the bar in any jurisdiction. His application shows that he has engaged in the study of the law for 15 years in Michigan, in Illinois, and in this state, and that he has read certain specified text-books upon various branches of the law. He applies for an admission without examination as to his qualifications and presents certificates from trial judges and lawyers of this state to the effect that he is possessed of the learning in the law necessary to qualify him for admission. The certificates presented by the lawyers further show that they find him qualified after having carefully and diligently examined him as to his attainments.

Petitioner contends that this court enjoys the inherent power to admit him without examination. He also asserts that this inherent power is so firmly, completely, and irrevocably fixed that it is not subject to regulation by the Legislature. He says that the matter of the admission of persons to the bar is so much a matter of judicial cognizance and is so far a matter for judicial determination that for the Legislature to attempt to regulate it would be for the legislative branch of government to throw down that barrier which the Constitutions of this country, including our own state Constitution, have erected between that branch and the judicial branch. As a corollary to this assertion, he makes the specific contention that the enactment of the Legislature providing for a state board of bar examiners and prescribing its functions is unconstitutional and void. This enactment is incorporated in various sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, so far as they are pertinent to the inquiry made necessary by petitioner's position, read as follows:

"Sec. 276. Every applicant for admission * * * must present to the district court of appeal * * * satisfactory proof that for at least three years he has diligently and in good faith studied law in such manner, upon such subjects and under such conditions as the Supreme Court or the board of bar examiners shall have prescribed. Before being admitted he must produce a certificate showing that he has satisfactorily passed an examination conducted by the board of bar examiners. * * *

"Sec. 276a. The Supreme Court is empowered to appoint three competent attorneys to examine applicants for admission as attorneys and counselors at law. Such persons shall constitute the board of bar examiners. The said board shall hold examinations for admission to the bar of applicants who have regularly filed their applications. * * * Said board shall issue a certificate to each of said applicants who shall satisfactorily pass such examination. * * * Nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the district courts of appeal from further examining any applicant where deemed proper. * * *

"Sec. 277. Upon presentation to it of the evidence required by section two hundred seventy-six, any District Court of Appeal shall admit the applicant as an attorney and counselor at law in all the courts of this state, and shall direct an order to be entered to that effect upon its records, and that a certificate of such admission be given to him by the clerk of the court, which certificate shall be his license. * * *

[1,2] The courts undoubtedly enjoy the inherent power to determine what persons shall be admitted to the bar (6 C. J. 571), but if we concede that such questions may be determined without the taking of evidence by the courts upon which to base conclusions reached, a point which we do not decide, we are yet left with the query whether the statute concerning the board of bar examiners is constitutional. Notwithstanding the inherent power of the courts to admit applicants for licenses to practice law, "it has been generally conceded that the Legislature may, in the exercise of the police power, prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for admissions to the bar which will be followed by the courts." 6 C. J. 572. See, also, Vernon County Bar Ass'n v. McKibbin, 153 Wis. 350, 141 N. W. 283; In re Bruen, 102 Wash. 472, 172 P. 1152; Keeley v. Evans (D. C.) 271 F. 520; In re Ellis, 118 Wash. 484, 203 P. 957; In re Crum, 103 Or. 296, 204 P. 948. "The manner, terms, and conditions of their [attorneys'] admission to practice, * * * as well as their powers, duties and privileges, are proper subjects of legislative control to the same extent and subject to the same limitations as in the case of any other profession or business that is created or regulated by statute." Ex parte Yale, 24 Cal. 241, 85 Am. Dec. 62. The only restraints upon the exercise of this power by the Legislature are that the regulations prescribed by that branch of the government shall be reasonable and shall not deprive the judicial branch of its power to prescribe additional conditions under which applicants shall be admitted, nor take from the courts the right and duty of actually making orders admitting them. 6 C. J. 572; In re Platz, 42 Utah, 439, 132 P. 390; In re Bruen, supra. In some jurisdictions it has been determined, it is true, that the power to regulate the machinery governing admissions to the bar is strictly judicial and that the legislative branch cannot be concerned with it (see 6 C. J. 572), but in our opinion such a view is consonant neither with reason nor with the weight of authority.

[3] Do the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the board of bar examiners exhibit a proper exercise of the control which the Legislature may justly impose upon the matter of admissions to the bar? We think they do. Bar examiners, or law examiners, as they are termed in some states, have been provided for in many jurisdictions as aids to the courts in the discharge of the duty of ordering admissions to the bar. These bodies are so helpful to the courts, and the laws concerning them trench so little upon the rightful exercise of the judicial power to admit, that the new instrumentality practically everywhere has been put into operation without apparent thought as to an unconstitutionality upon the grounds suggested by the present applicant. The examining bodies have found recognition as effective aids in the better discharge of an onerous duty in Musgrave's Case, 216 Pa. 598, 66 A. 84; In re New York Law School, 190 N. Y. 215, 83 N. E. 17; Mitchell v. State Board of Law Examiners, 155 Mich. 452, 119 N. W. 587; In re Alexander, 167 Mich. 495, 133 N. W. 491; Ex parte Grier (S. C.), 80 S. E. 705; In re Bergeron, 220 Mass. 472, 107 N. E. 1007, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 549; In re Bowers, 137 Tenn. 189, 194 S. W. 1093; In re Bowers, 137 Tenn. 193, 192 S. W. 919; In re Bowers, 138 Tenn. 662, 200 S. W. 821; In re Adkins, 83 W. Va. 673, 98 S. E. 888; In re Frank, 293 Ill. 263, 127 N. E. 640; In re Ellis, supra. So many cases—and there are others of a similar character—yielding tacit assent to the constitutionality of the laws creating such bodies, give some weight to the view that the present assault upon the California law on the subject is without merit. This condition is of course far from controlling, but we are not without some authority directly bearing upon the point. In an interesting case which involved the constitutionality of a statute providing for "law examiners," the Supreme Court of Washington determined that parts of the law should stand, but that other parts of it must fall. The court said, in part:

"The courts are jealous of their own prerogatives and, at the same time, studiously careful and sedulously determined that neither the executive nor legislative department shall usurp the powers of the other, or of the courts. Now, it is evident that, under our Constitution, this board may exercise such delegated legislative powers as have been granted to it, which are the examination of applicants for admission to the bar and the prescribing of certain rules; and they are competent to exercise the administrative powers conferred upon them of investigating the conduct of attorneys who have been admitted, to ascertain whether or not they should be permitted to continue to practice their profession, in order that the mischiefs sought to be remedied by the legislature may be remedied and prevented, and may initiate complaints in such cases and hear the evidence, and make reports and findings thereon. But the board is not a court and cannot exercise the functions of a court, except the limited function of passing upon evidence received by them and reporting it. They can make no order striking the name of an attorney from the rolls or disbarring him from practice." In re Bruen, supra.

If there were not authority upon the subject, we should not hesitate to declare constitutional our statute creating and providing for the functions of the state board of bar examiners. The law appears to us to exhibit a proper legislative regulation of the machinery for admissions to the bar. In our opinion it does not invade the judicial realm. The applicant cannot therefore be admitted to the bar without first submitting himself to the board for examination.

EHRHART v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5141.)

1. Master and servant §403 — Burden on claimant to show compensable injury.

Burden is on claimant, under Workmen's Compensation Law, to show injury occurred in course and arose out of employment.

2. Master and servant §405(4)—Finding of injury by frolicking sustained.

Evidence held to sustain finding of Industrial Accident Commission that injuries to petitioner received from passing automobile, when he was near his employer's truck which he drove, did not arise out of his employment, but resulted from frolicking with a companion.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), by Vernon P. Ehrhart, claimant, by his guardian ad litem, T. J. Ehrhart, opposed by the Stockton Delivery Company, employer, and the Columbia Casualty Company, as insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission entered an order denying compensation, and claimant applies for certiorari to review such order. Affirmed.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for Respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for other respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in denying benefits to V. P. Ehrhart, an employee of the respondent Stockton Delivery Company. The other respondent, Columbia Casualty Company, is interested by reason of being the insurance carrier for its correspondent.

Petitioner is a minor, and has instituted the proceedings by his guardian ad litem for the purpose of having determined the lawfulness of the original award made in favor of respondent denying compensation to the petitioner on account of an accident resulting in a compound fracture of both bones of the left leg, sustained on April 11, 1924, at Stockton, Cal., while petitioner was in the employ of respondent Stockton Delivery Company.

The petition shows that the respondent employer maintains a delivery service in the city of Stockton, and that petitioner at the time of the accident was employed by it as a truck driver, and was about to depart from the place of business of a certain grocery firm, one of the patrons of the company, with a truckload of groceries for delivery to the customers of that firm. While going to the front of his truck for the purpose of cranking the same, so it is alleged, petitioner was struck and injured by a passing automobile belonging to a third party. Thereafter he duly filed his application with the Industrial Accident Commission. Answer was made by defendants, respondents herein, denying that the injury arose out of the course of the employment or was proximately caused thereby, and they set up as a further defense that it was proximately caused by "skylarking" of said applicant. The application came on for hearing and was submitted. On the 19th day of September, 1924, the Commission made its award, finding that the applicant received the injuries while in the employ of defendant employer, but that the evidence was insufficient to establish as a fact that the injuries arose out of or were proximately caused by the employment.

In accordance with the findings the award was that applicant take nothing by reason of his claim.

A petition for rehearing was filed upon the ground that the evidence did not justify the findings; that the findings of fact did not support the order or award, in that there were no findings of fact upon the subject of the course of employment or proximate causation, the findings being merely conclusions of law; that the Commission acted without or in excess of its powers in making the award, there being no evidence whatever upon which to base the same. The petition was denied.

It is here claimed that the Commission acted without and in excess of its powers; that its order is unreasonable; and that the findings of fact are not supported by the evidence.

[1,2] There was a sharp conflict therein before the Commission as to the manner in which the accident occurred. Petitioner testified that just before the happening of the same he had been fooling and scuffling with a friend, and that as he left the sidewalk to crank his car he had thrown a piece of paper at him, but that at the time of the accident he was not skylarking. He claimed that he approached his auto truck at his customary speed, and while doing so he was struck by a passing automobile. It is conceded that if such were the fact applicant would be entitled to compensation. The insurance company contended that the applicant had been frolicking with a companion and had thrown a piece of paper at him, whereupon the latter undertook to chase him, that applicant then ran from the sidewalk out into the street and was struck by the passing car, causing the injuries complained of. It is admitted by applicant that just before the accident he had been fooling and scuffling with his companion, and that he had thrown a piece of paper at him, but denied that he was running to escape from him, and asserted that he was hurrying to crank his car in order to proceed with his deliveries.

Upon this question there is a decided conflict in the testimony. The driver of the passing car which struck applicant testified that both boys ran out together very suddenly against his car as he was passing, and that at the time he was under the impression that he had struck them both. He further testified that when he took petitioner to the hospital he admitted to him that boys were chasing him. The employer of petitioner also testified that in making inquiry of the boys immediately after the accident for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of the injury, and making a report to the Industrial Accident Commission and the insurance company, petitioner admitted to him that his companion started to chase him and he ran out into the street to escape. The testimony of police officers was to the same effect. The Commission therefore had ample evidence before it to sustain its finding that the injury did not arise out of the employment, but was due to skylarking. Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, 158 P. 212, L. R. A. 1916F, 1164. The burden of proof was upon the applicant to prove to the satisfaction of the Commission that the injury occurred in the course of and arose out of the employment. Eastman v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 593, 200 P. 17. This burden he did not sustain. On the contrary, respondents alleged and proved that the injuries were due to skylarking, and that they did not therefore arise out of the employment.

KEOWN v. TRUDO. (Civ. 4602.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 5, 1925.)

1. Motions $\hookrightarrow$ 21—Notice of motion, not specifying grounds, held insufficient.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1010, notice of motion which did not specify grounds upon which it was to be made held insufficient.

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 153(2)—Motion to set aside default, not made within six months after entry thereof, too late.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, failure to file notice of motion or make motion to set aside default within six months after entry thereof, as positively required by statute, held to render motion too late.

3. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 339(2)—Attempt to present question of ruling on demurrer over three years after judgment held abortive.

Where demurrer to complaint was sustained in November, 1919, notice of appeal filed in June, 1923, attempting to question ruling on demurrer and jurisdiction to enter judgment pending appeal from order on demurrer held abortive, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 939, terminating right of appeal 60 days after entry of judgment.

4. Costs $\hookrightarrow$ 263—Fine for prosecuting frivolous appeal imposed.

Where appellant, attorney at law, interposed frivolous appeal, it appearing that he had told judge that case would take 10 years to try and action had survived 7 years, fine of $250 was authorized.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Summerfield, Judge.

Action by James A. Keown against Mary E. Trudo, alias Mary E. Keown. From an order refusing to set aside default judgment entered against him, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James E. Keown, in pro. per.

W. H. Dehm, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default and also from the judgment entered pursuant to such default.

[1] The default arose by reason of the failure of appellant to file a third amended complaint within the time allowed by the trial court for such filing, after demurrer was sustained to the second amended complaint. The order sustaining the demurrer was entered April 14, 1919, and appellant was thereupon and on the same day allowed 15 days within which to amend. No amended pleading having been filed by him, an order to enter his default for failure to amend within time was filed November 12, 1919, 6½ months after the expiration of the time within which he was permitted to amend under the order of the court made in that behalf. On April 9, 1923, 3 years and 5 months after the entry of the default, appellant filed his notice of motion to set it aside. The notice specified no grounds upon which the motion was to be made and was therefore insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 1010); but, as this point is not pressed by respondent, we shall dispose of the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the default upon other considerations. The grounds upon which appellant sought to set aside the default are indicated in an affidavit filed with his notice of motion to set it aside and are elaborated in his brief on appeal. It is averred in the affidavit that appellant was not present in court, either in person or by counsel, at the hearing on the demurrer to the second amended complaint; that he was "absent in the East" at the time, and that, "when notice of the action on the demurrer reached the plaintiff in Massachusetts, it was too late to amend and have his amended complaint filed even if he wished to do so"; that he prosecuted an appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer, but that in his absence, and in the absence of counsel for him, the appeal was dismissed on the ground, as he is informed and believes, that the appeal was premature, no judgment having been entered on the ruling on demurrer; that he "thereafter had no knowledge, actual or constructive, of any action being taken in the case until on or about November 9, 1922, which was the first day he had been in California since the first hearing in the case more than three years previously"; that on that day "he discovered for the first time that the case had been dismissed without notice or opportunity to be heard"; that "no notice of the dismissal or notice of the motion to dismiss has ever reached the plaintiff directly or indirectly until November 9, 1922, and he believes that none was given or sent by the defendant or her attorney, and he is informed and believes that the record discloses none being given, sent or received"; that "the matter contained in the complaint is of the utmost importance and the property therein mentioned represents the plaintiff's entire life savings"; that he "is practically destitute of money or property"; that he has at all times intended to prosecute the action in good faith, and that he believes he has a "good" cause of action; that "the defendant is neglecting and wasting the property" and has failed to pay certain taxes upon it which are delinquent; that while appellant "concedes that more than six months has elapsed between the judgment of dismissal, taken without notice or opportunity to be heard, he maintains that section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to this matter, or if it does it should be construed as commencing to run from the time he had actual knowledge of the said dismissal"; and that "six months has not elapsed since he discovered November 9, 1923[2], the action of the court taken in the case as aforesaid, and the reason for not moving sooner after the discovery was because of poverty caused by the misconduct of the defendant and her agent and servants as set up in the complaint and continued to greatly accentuate to the present time and his inability to maintain himself or remain in California because of the aforesaid poverty." The affidavit was made on April 9, 1923.

[2] The substance of appellant's affidavit, stating, as it does, both matter of fact and matter of argument, is set forth so fully for the reason that the document carries within itself ample and apparent refutation of appellant's contentions. Passing by, however, the manifest inaccuracies and contradictions of the paper without further comment, we must also say that the motion presented by appellant to the trial court was not within the terms of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as the notice of motion was not filed, nor was the motion made, within six months after the entry of the default, as positively required by that enactment. It is also to be observed that if the motion can be viewed as having been made upon some other ground than those allowed by section 473, a point which we are far from deciding, it came too late. Smith v. Jones, 174 Cal. 513, 163 P. 890; Wheelock v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 227 P. 931. We find nothing to aid appellant in Consolidated Const. Co. v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 184 Cal. 244, 193 P. 238.

[3] Upon the appeal from the judgment appellant attempts to present the question whether the demurrer to the second amended complaint was properly sustained, but that branch of the appeal is abortive. The judgment was entered November 17, 1919. The notice of appeal was filed June 7, 1923.

No right of appeal from the judgment existed after the expiration of the 60 days following its entry. Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

As stated in the affidavit of appellant, the substance of which is above set forth, he appealed long ago from the order sustaining the demurrer to his second amended complaint. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that no appeal lies from such an order. The judgment from which the present appeal is prosecuted was entered after the filing of the notice of appeal from the order on demurrer and before that appeal was dismissed. It is now contended that the trial court had no jurisdiction to enter judgment pending the appeal from the order on demurrer. For the reasons stated in the last preceding paragraph, the point cannot be considered.

[4] The fact that the present appeal is futile cannot be laid, altogether, to the ignorance of appellant. He is an attorney at law. Also, as shown by an affidavit in the record, he once wrote a letter to respondent's counsel in which he said concerning the present litigation:

"Nearly two years ago I told a Mass. judge that this case would take ten years. I have not been at it quite two as yet."

Appellant does not deny the writing of this letter. Under all the circumstances shown by the record, a fine should be imposed upon appellant for prosecuting a frivolous appeal. Under that infliction he may not be unduly exuberant in his joy over the fact that the action, his own child, has survived nearly seven years—for the complaint was filed on July 22, 1918—even if it has not lived out its allotted span of ten years.

Judgment and order affirmed. Appellant is fined $250 for the prosecution of a frivolous appeal.

ARNOLD et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.
(Civ. 5054.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 16, 1925.)

New trial  165—Order sustaining motion to amend order granting new trial held void as being beyond trial court's jurisdiction.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, order sustaining motion to amend order granting new trial held void as being beyond trial court's jurisdiction, where the order granting new trial was regular, and notice of motion to set it aside was not served on adverse party, and movant did not produce any evidence establishing any infirmity in order granting new trial.

Writ of Review to Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Application for certiorari by Max Arnold and another, directed against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and others, to review an order of respondent court. Order annulled.

Samuel Hamburg and G. C. Ringole, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Rudolph J. Scholz, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for a writ of review. An understanding of the application requires a consideration of the following facts: M. E. Geary, as plaintiff, commenced an action against Chris Stafford to obtain the possession of a certain automobile. When he commenced his action the plaintiff executed an affidavit and undertaking, and, together with P. G. Jacobus, Jr., and Gus C. Ringole, as sureties, executed an undertaking and caused the sheriff to take into his possession the said automobile. The defendant Chris Stafford appeared and answered and at the same time filed a cross-complaint. In the cross-complaint Stafford set forth that on the 7th day of April, 1923, G. B. Skinner was in the lawful possession of the automobile and requested Stafford to make alterations and repairs, that he did so, and that the cost of the alterations and repairs was $849.51, and that at the time of the commencement of the action he held possession of the automobile to secure his lien for the sum mentioned. He also pleaded that he did said work for M. E. Geary, G. B. Skinner, Max Arnold, and Richard Roe. He also pleaded a stated account. The cross-complaint was answered by M. E. Geary, G. B. Skinner, Max Arnold, and Richard Roe. The answer purported to deny each of the allegations of the cross-complaint.

A trial was had by the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of Stafford sustaining his lien. It also found that Max Arnold and G. C. Ringole were the owners of the automobile, that the alterations and repairs were made for them, and that Skinner acted as the agent of the owners. Thereupon the trial court directed judgment in favor of Stafford and against Arnold and Ringole. The attorney for Stafford prepared a judgment accordingly, but proceeded to add to what the court had ordered. Among other things, he added that the record showed the giving of the undertaking above mentioned, that Jacobus and Ringole signed the same as sureties, and that unless the mechanic's lien were fully satisfied that Stafford should have judgment against Jacobus and Ringole for the amount of the lien found by the court to be $638.90. Thereafter M. E. Geary, G. B. Skinner, Max Arnold, and Richard Roe served a notice of intention to move for a new trial. Thereafter they served a notice that their motion for a new trial would be made on the 18th day of April, 1924. Thereafter said motion was presented to the court, and some days later, May 13, 1924, the judge of the trial court signed an order which was worded as follows:

"The motion for a new trial in the above-entitled cause having been duly made, argued, and submitted, and the court being fully advised, it is hereby ordered that the said motion be, and the same is hereby, granted upon the statutory grounds and a new trial of the above-entitled cause and the whole thereof is hereby ordered."

Thereafter Stafford's attorney did, on June 17, 1924, sign and file a notice that on the 27th day of June, 1924, he "would move the court to set aside the order granting a new trial." The notice recited that the motion would be made upon the ground that no proper notice of intention to move for a new trial was served upon him and that no notice of intention to move for a new trial or motion for a new trial had been served by Jacobus. The record does not show whether that notice was served. The record does not show that the notice was supported by any affidavit or any other showing whatsoever. Neither does the record show whether said motion was ever made. However, the record contains another notice of motion dated September 26, 1924, which gives notice of the making of a similar motion in these words:

"Said motion will be made upon these further grounds, which grounds were not noted in the notice of motion dated June 17, 1924, in the above-entitled matter, that the order granting a new trial heretofore made and dated the — day of —, 1924, was signed by the court through an inadvertence and that the said court was not at the time fully advised of the contents of said order."

The record does not show that said notice of motion was ever served except a memorandum "Served September 26, 1924, R. J. Scholz," who at that time was attorney for the moving party. The record does not show that said motion was supported by any affidavit or other paper or record of any kind or nature. Thereafter an order was presented to the trial court by Stafford's attorney and appears to have been signed on the 6th day of October, 1924. It recites,

"The motion of defendant and cross-complainant Chris Stafford coming on regularly for hearing, and the matter being duly argued in open court, and it appearing to the court that the order heretofore made, granting a new trial, and dated the 13th day of May, 1924, was inadvertently, improvidently made, and that the court was not fully advised of the contents of said order, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that the order granting a new trial heretofore made and dated the 13th day of May, 1924, is hereby vacated, set aside, and made of no avail whatsoever, and that the judgment heretofore rendered is in full force and effect, excepting as to P. G. Jacobus, Jr., and G. C. Ringole, sureties in the above-entitled cause and as to them said judgment is vacated and set aside."

Soon after the order last mentioned was signed, the petitioners applied to this court for the writ of review, hereinabove referred to, alleging that the respondent court had exceeded its jurisdiction in entering the purported order dated October 6, 1924.

In the case of United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 151 P. 129, 132, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199, at page 760, the court said:

"Nothing is more firmly settled in this state than the doctrine that the superior court may not revoke, modify, or otherwise disturb its judgments and orders regularly made in pursuance of plain statutory provision, where the statute prescribes the method by which such judgments and orders may be reviewed, except as authorized by statute. [Citing cases.]"

One method provided by statute for reviewing its own orders and the only one which is possibly applicable in the present case is contained in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the case of Scamman v. Bonsett, 118 Cal. 93, 97, 50 P. 272, 274, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226, the court said:

"Any error or defect in a record occurring through acts of omission or commission of the clerk in entering or failing to properly enter of record the judgment or proceedings of the court—in short, what may be termed clerical misprisions—may, the record affording the evidence thereof, be corrected at any time by the court upon its own motion, or on motion of an interested party either with or without notice. Where, however, an inspection of the record does not show the error, and resort must be had to evidence aliunde, courts will require notice to be given of a motion to amend a judgment to the parties to be affected thereby, and a motion for the amendment of a judgment in such last-mentioned case must, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be made within six months, except in cases where personal service of summons has not been had, in which cases the court may grant relief within one year after the entry of judgment. People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 5 Am. St. Rep. 448; Hegeler v. Henckell, 27 Cal. 495; Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 502; Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 422."

Glancing back over the record before us, it is patent that the order granting the motion for a new trial was entirely regular and proper on its face. Without notice to the adverse parties, Stafford moved to set aside the order granting a new trial, and did not produce any evidence showing any infirmity in the order granting a new trial. Under these circumstances the trial court had no jurisdiction to grant Stafford's motion in whole or in part.

It follows that the order of the trial court dated October 6, 1924, and which purported to amend the order granting a new trial, was void, and the said order dated October 6, 1924, is therefore annulled.

KINNEY v. KINNEY (GROSS et al., Interveners). (Civ. 5095.)

Evidence 429—Testimony of grantor that he never acquired title held admissible in suit by third parties claiming title.

Where husband deeded his property to his wife, and thereafter husband's brothers and sisters claimed an undivided portion of such property as heirs of their mother, held that husband, notwithstanding he was grantor of property, could testify that deed of property from the mother to himself was never delivered during his mother's lifetime, thus showing that he was never vested with absolute title.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by George F. Kinney against Susan Jane Kinney, in which Jane A. Gross and others intervened. From a judgment against them, interveners appeal. Reversed.

Harry I. Stafford and W. F. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Henry B. Lister, of San Francisco, for plaintiff respondent.

Wm. T. Eckhoff, of San Francisco, for defendant respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the interveners from a judgment against them. The plaintiff and defendant are husband and wife, between whom divorce proceedings were pending at the time of the trial of this action. The plaintiff, George F. Kinney, commenced an action against the defendant, Susan Jane Kinney, alleging that on December 7, 1920, he had deeded to her certain real property in the city and county of San Francisco, with the understanding that the said deed should not be recorded nor become operative unless plaintiff died or became seriously ill, and with the further understanding that said deed should be kept in a tin box in the home of plaintiff and defendant and accessible to both parties, and that plaintiff might destroy said deed at any time if he so desired; that said deed remained in said box as agreed between the parties until July 28, 1922, when the defendant abandoned and deserted the plaintiff, and in violation of said agreement between them caused said deed to be duly recorded. It was prayed that said deed be declared void, and that the title to said property be declared vested in plaintiff.

Defendant answered and denied that any agreement, as alleged, was entered into between the parties, and asserted that the property had been deeded to her by her husband as a gift, without any conditions or limitations whatsoever.

The interveners and appellants, sisters and brothers of plaintiff, then entered upon the scene with a complaint in intervention, setting forth that the real property was owned by their mother, Caroline Kinney, at the date of her death, March 18, 1919; that she died intestate, leaving interveners and plaintiff, George F. Kinney, as her only heirs at law, each of whom became the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest in said property; that shortly after the death of their said mother, Caroline Kinney, George F. Kinney caused to be recorded a deed of gift from Caroline Kinney to himself, conveying this property; that said deed so recorded had never been delivered to George F. Kinney by his said mother and was void therefore, and of no effect. That thereafter George F. Kinney executed a deed to defendant Susan Jane Kinney, purporting to convey said real property to her. Interveners pray that they each be adjudged the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest in said real property.

George F. Kinney failed to answer the complaint in intervention, and his default was entered. The trial court found against him upon the issue raised between himself and the defendant with reference to the limitation upon the deed given to her, and, as the evidence upon this question was conflicting, we are not concerned with that issue. The interveners, in attempting to prove their case, called George F. Kinney as a witness. He did not attempt to contradict the terms of his conveyance to defendant, but upon being questioned as to the source of his own title, stated that his mother, Caroline Kinney, had executed a deed to him, but had never delivered it to him; that he never saw it until about a week after her death, when he opened a tin box which had belonged to his mother and there found the deed which he recorded; that no one told him to open this box, and that he had never had access to it during the lifetime of his mother; that he had thought at the time of recording said deed and at the time of making the deed to Susan J. Kinney that the undelivered deed of Caroline Kinney vested title in him to said property. There is nothing in the record to contradict, in any manner, this testimony regarding the nondelivery of said deed from Caroline to George Kinney and, had it remained in the record, the trial court must have found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint in intervention. However, the foregoing testimony was objected to upon the ground that it was an attempt to disparage the title of George Kinney, which he had conveyed to defendant. The objection was overruled and the testimony admitted, but later, upon the renewal of the objection, the testimony was stricken out, and the court found that the deed from Caroline Kinney to George Kinney had been delivered, doubtless upon the theory that, there being no testimony upon the subject in the record, the finding must be against the party having the burden of proof, or that the presumption of delivery would follow from the possession of the deed by the grantee.

Thus the record presents but one legal question: As to the admissibility of this testimony. In support of the action of the trial court respondent relies upon several cases. We think they are not in point. In Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 11 P. 820, the rule is laid down that parol testimony cannot be introduced to vary the terms of a written instrument conveying an interest in real property. The question was stated as follows:

"In such an action (action of ejectment) can it be shown that A., who presents a patent from the government to land, has declared such patent to mean something different from what is expressed in it, and thus defeat the title conveyed thereby? Or that a power of attorney to A., authorizing him to lease or repair, was intended to empower, and therefore did empower, him to sell and convey an indefeasible title?"

As stated in the case just cited, "the negative of these propositions is too apparent to need argument."

But the question involved in the instant case bears no resemblance in principle to the foregoing questions. Here George Kinney's testimony did not seek to change the terms of his conveyance to the defendant, nor to impeach its force and effect, if it had anything upon which to operate. He was examined, on behalf of interveners, who were not parties to any conveyance made by him, as to the source of his title, and testified to a physical fact not evidenced by any instrument in writing executed by him. Assuredly, if George Kinney had retained the record title to the property, he might have been examined as to the delivery of the deed from their mother in an action by interveners to establish their interest in the property. The defendant is in privity of estate with him, and took her title without valuable consideration. Could George Kinney have defeated the right of his brothers and sisters to examine him as to the delivery of the deed from their mother by transferring the title to his wife without consideration when he and his wife were living together with their interests harmonious? If not, the circumstance of the quarrel and separation of the husband and wife has no legal significance in the problem we are considering. The rights of the interveners cannot be affected by reason of the fact that George Kinney has transferred the record title to another without consideration. We find no authority for such a contention, and it is contrary to reason and to the theory and purpose of the general rule respondent seeks to invoke; i. e., that a grantor may not, by parol evidence, contradict the averments of his deed—a solemn contract. This cannot mean that, when one purports to grant real property, third persons are precluded from proving by him any facts necessary to establish their chain of title to the same. If it were otherwise, one might effectively divest an innocent person of title to his property by securing a purported conveyance from a person who was the only one familiar with the facts upon which the title of such innocent person could be established.

In the case of Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, relied upon by respondent, the question was as to the delivery of a deed by a grantor prior to his death. Evidence of various facts and circumstances was offered upon this question; some of these matters, having to do with acts and statements of the grantor after the alleged date of delivery, were objected to upon the theory that they were in disparagement of the title to the property with which the grantor had parted. Upon appeal it was pointed out that the rule invoked had no application to the facts of the case; the court saying:

"But here the very question was whether Williams had ever parted with title to the property. This was the main issue in the case; the claim of respondents being that there had been no delivery of the deed with intent on the part of Williams to do so. The conduct and declarations of Williams covered a period subsequent to the making of the deed and, while Kidd held it as a depositary, and we are satisfied that such acts, conduct, and declarations of Williams with reference to the property during that period were properly admissible as bearing on the issue as to whether there had been a delivery of the deed."

The case from which we have just quoted is certainly not authority for the exclusion of the testimony we are considering in the instant case. Neither are the cases of Emons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 P. 303; Ord v. Ord, 99 Cal. 523, 34 P. 83; Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, and Ferguson v. Basin Consolidated Mines, 152 Cal. 712, 93 P. 867, all relied upon by respondent.

None of these cases holds that third parties are prevented from showing, by any evidence which is relevant and material, that the grantor of the holder of a record title did not himself have title to the property sought to be conveyed.

In so far as the one-fifth undivided interest of George Kinney in the property is concerned, his deed, of course, would carry what interest he had, even though that interest be less than the interest purported to be conveyed; but it cannot carry an interest which he did not have, and the rules of evidence do not accomplish so inequitable a result by excluding the proof stricken out by the trial court.

The judgment is reversed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION
et al. (Civ. 5138.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 17, 1925. Rehearing Denied March 9, 1925.)

Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 405(5)—Evidence held to show widow and child were total dependents.

Evidence based on wife's answers to interrogatories held to support finding and award of Industrial Commission that wife and infant daughter of deceased employee, residing in Italy, were totally dependent on deceased employee for support.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Maria Marsili, claimant, for death of Silvio Marsili, her husband, opposed by the Hammond Lumber Company, employer, and others. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the employer and others apply for certiorari to review the award. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This record is before us upon the return to a writ of review. Petitioners are objecting to an award of the Industrial Accident Commission by which the surviving wife and child of Silvio Marsili, deceased, were allowed full death benefit, amounting to $3,300, because of the death of said Silvio Marsili, which was brought about by an industrial accident. It is not contended that the facts do not present a case for compensation, nor that the petitioners are not liable for the payment of the same. The controversy between the parties is as to whether the allowance should be made upon the basis of total or partial dependency of said wife and child.

Maria Marsili, the wife, and her infant daughter live in Italy, and the deceased had been sending them money each month for their support. The evidence upon which the findings and award of the Commission are based consists of answers to interrogatories sent to Maria Marsili by the Commission and by the petitioners. The portions of this testimony which give rise to petitioners' contention are as follows: Maria Marsili was asked if she did any work since her marriage. She replied that she did none, except housework and caring for her child. She was asked:

"Do you own the home in which you live? A. No.

"Q. If not, who does own it; and, if you are required to pay rent, what is the amount of rent which you are paying per month? A. The owner is my father, and I don't pay rent. * * *

"Q. Since Silvio Marsili left Italy, have you been living in your own home? A. Yes.

"Q. If not, with whom have you been living, and what relations do these persons bear to you or to your husband? A. Living with father, four brothers, and three sisters."

She then states that her husband sent her money from the time he came to America until his death, and it appears from the record that he sent the equivalent of $435 in nine months. She stated that this money was to support her child and herself. The questions and answers then continue:

"What person or persons other than Silvio Marsili supported or assisted you in your support of yourself and your child since Silvio Marsili left Italy? A. No.

"Q. To what extent did these other persons assist in your support? A. None.

"Q. What income did you have since your husband left Italy? A. None. * * *

"Q. At what amount do you estimate the average monthly cost of maintaining yourself and your child, including cost of food, clothing, and shelter? A. The average is 70 lire a day ($3.00)."

In answer to further interrogatories, the witness stated that she lived in her father's house. She was asked:

"Q. State whether or not any members of your family, brothers, sisters, or other relatives, contributed to your support at any time during the three years preceding the injury of the employee, and, if so, state each amount and dates. A. I did not have any help.

"Q. Give the amount and date of each contribution by each member of the family (other than that made by the employee) towards the family expenses during the year ending June 1, 1923. A. I paid my expenses with the money that my husband sent me, and now I am obliged to go into debt."

She also stated:

"I have never received any contribution, neither from any person, nor from any institution, nor from any private source."

"What is the monthly amount of your living expenses at the present time? A. About three hundred lire a month.

"Q. How much of this goes for rent; how much for food; how much for clothing? A. That is for my support alone."

In answer to another interrogatory, the witness again stated:

"I did not receive any help from anybody except from my husband."

The Industrial Accident Commission upon this evidence has found that Maria Marsili and her child were totally dependent upon deceased for their support. While there are some conflicts in the testimony, if taken absolutely literally, especially that portion of it which has reference of the amount required for the support of the dependents, we fail to see how the Commission could have found otherwise than it did. The argument against the finding is based upon the fact that Maria Marsili stated that she lived in her father's house and did not pay rent. From this petitioner asks us to conclude that she received her rental free. And, as she stated that it cost $90 a month for the support of herself and her child and that the money sent by her husband was barely enough for her support, petitioners ask us to conclude that the rental which she received without charge was of the value of $40 a month. The entire testimony of the witness must be taken as a whole and reconciled, if possible. It is also to be remembered that the questions were translated into Italian, and answers translated from Italian into English, and this fact may account for the lack of precision in some parts. We think the entire testimony, fairly considered together, shows that the witness was entirely supported by her husband, that she used his remittances to pay all expenses of herself and her child. She lived in a home with her father and brothers and sisters, and as she did not pay out a specific item for rent, she stated that she did not pay rent, as such. It is not to be expected that she would answer the questions as a student of economics would answer them, and that she would reply that in paying for her entire support, in paying into the household her proportion of the entire expense of maintaining the same out of the money sent to her by her husband, she was, in effect, paying rent. Her answers are such as a woman of her class would naturally make. She repeatedly said that she received nothing of value from any one but her husband; that she used the money he sent to her to pay the expenses of herself and child; that she lived in the family with her father and brothers and sisters. It is unlikely that a peasant family living in a small province in Italy would set apart a separate apartment for this mother and her child, and it is fair to assume from the entire record that this woman and her child shared with the family their home and food and other necessities and in return paid into the family funds the money her husband sent to her, which was sufficient and only sufficient to pay her proportionate amount of the entire expense of maintaining the family.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

1. Infants ⇐20—Corpus delicti may be established by circumstantial evidence.

In prosecution for committing lewd acts on female child in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, in view of secrecy surrounding commission of such crime, all that is required in proof of charge is that corpus delicti be proved beyond reasonable doubt, which may be by circumstantial evidence.

2. Criminal law ⇐535(1)—Corpus delicti must be proved independent of extrajudicial admissions.

No person can be convicted of a crime on extrajudicial admissions alone, but corpus delicti must be proved independent of such admissions.

3. Infants ⇐20—Evidence held sufficient to prove corpus delicti.

In prosecution for committing lewd acts on female child in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, evidence held sufficient to prove corpus delicti.

4. Infants ⇐20—Proof of recent complaint by prosecutrix admissible.

In prosecution for committing lewd acts on female child in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, proof of complaint made by prosecutrix to another, if recent, may be shown, and rule applies whether there was actual resistance or where nonconsent is inferred.

5. Infants ⇐20—Admission of details of complaint made by prosecutrix held error.

In prosecution for committing lewd acts on female infant in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, where child was incompetent as a witness, admission of details of complaint made by prosecutrix to her mother was error, and fact that mother was cross-examined upon such subject did not justify its admission.

6. Criminal law ⇐419, 420(5)—Witnesses ⇐227—Hearsay evidence of declarations of child without capacity to be sworn inadmissible, and such child not to be examined without oath.

7. Criminal law ⇐1169(2)—Erroneous admission of details of complaint made by prosecutrix held not to require reversal, where other evidence sufficient to establish corpus delicti.

In prosecution for committing lewd acts on body of infant child, offense in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, erroneous admission of details of complaint made by prosecutrix to her mother held not to require reversal, where there was sufficient other evidence to prove corpus delicti.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Harry Ewing was convicted of committing lewd and lascivious acts on body of female child, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Spencer G. Prime and William F. Herrin, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. The defendant was charged with the offense denounced by section 288 of the Penal Code, it being alleged that he committed certain lewd and lascivious acts upon the body of one Florence Wells, a female child of the age of six years. He was tried and convicted. Motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this is an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying the motion.

It is contended that there is no evidence in the record tending to show the commission of the crime charged or of any other crime, except the unsworn and hearsay declaration of the prosecutrix, who was not permitted to testify at the trial; she having been held incompetent after an exhaustive examination by the trial judge by reason of her inability to receive just impressions of facts or to relate them truly.

[1] At the outset it may be said that there is no direct evidence of the commission of the offense. Rigorous proof, however, of the corpus delicti in cases of this character is sometimes unattainable, and it is not necessary that the offense should be proved by direct and positive testimony. Such crimes are committed in secrecy, and tribunals must often act upon such indications of an offense as the surrounding circumstances present. All that is required in the proof of these charges is that the corpus delicti be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; that the evidence may be merely circumstantial is immaterial.

The evidence in the case may be summarized as follows: Agnes Wells, the mother of the prosecutrix, testified in substance that on the afternoon of the day when the offense is alleged to have been committed her little girl had gone out to play. Directly across the street from the Wells home was situated a private garage occupied by defendant. Mrs. Wells had occasion to call her daughter, and after some delay the child emerged from the garage, where the defendant at that time was working, and crossed the street to her home in response to her mother's call. About the same time the defendant came out through a side door of the garage into a passageway leading thereto. As soon as the child reached her mother, she was taken into the house and given a spanking, after which she was asked by her mother what defendant had done to her, and she replied that he had kissed her. Thereupon Mrs. Wells went to the front door and called defendant and upbraided him for his conduct, and informed him that when her husband came home she was going to have him thrash defendant. The mother then re-entered her home. At the same time defendant crossed the street and, opening the door of the Wells home, followed Mrs. Wells down the hall, who thereupon accused him of having "a bad name for handling little children," to which the defendant answered: "Don't tell my mother what I have done. I was only kissing your little girl and fooling around her." Mrs. Wells then ordered defendant out of her house and took her daughter into a back room and further questioned her concerning the acts of defendant; the child replied that he had unbuttoned her underwear and inserted his finger in her private parts. The mother then made an examination of the clothing and person of her child, and found several spots upon her dress and undergarments. The spots were wet and white in color. She also examined the vaginal regions of the child and found them to be red and inflamed, and a woman neighbor, who was present at the examination, also testified to this abnormal condition. About this time the defendant again entered Mrs. Wells' home and asked her forgiveness, and stated to her, "It is bad, but not as bad as you think it is." This statement was also made in the presence of the witness last referred to. The record further shows that the child was examined by a physician, who found the same inflamed condition testified to by the mother.

Defendant took the stand in his own behalf and denied that he had ever touched the child, except that when she came into his garage he took her in his arms and put her out, fearing that she might get hurt, but that she returned and left a few minutes later when her mother called her.

This, in substance, is the entire evidence had at the trial, and counsel for the appellant claims that aside from the hearsay declarations of the child it is destitute of any showing either that defendant committed the crime charged or that any crime in fact had been committed.

[3] The character of the case does not invite a recapitulation of the facts, but we are of the opinion that the evidence, leaving entirely out of consideration the hearsay testimony hereafter discussed, sufficiently proves the corpus delicti. During the course of the trial, as above indicated, over the objection of defendant, the mother was permitted to testify to what her daughter had told her. The admission of this evidence is assigned as error. The prosecution seeks to justify its admission upon the ground that defendant himself had invited it. Under her direct examination Mrs. Wells, the mother, was asked whether or not her daughter had made any complaint. On cross-examination the defendant went into the matter of the first statement of the child, and then asked Mrs. Wells if she was not in the habit of accusing her neighbors of improper acts with her children, to which question an objection was sustained. The evidence was then admitted of the subsequent statement of the child to rebut the inference that might arise from the question that no complaint had in fact been made by the child.

[4] The rule is that in prosecutions of this character proof of complaint of the act while it is recent may be shown by the prosecutrix and also by the person to whom the complaint was made. While such evidence is in the nature of hearsay, its admission is justified upon the ground that in such cases, when restricted to the fact of complaint alone, it is in the strictest sense original evidence. The rule also applies to complaint on the part of one under legal age, there being no distinction between cases where there was actual resistance and those in which nonconsent is inferred. People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 251, 49 P. 186; People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 P. 838. Here, however, the original statement made to the mother was one not in the nature of a complaint, but was elicited from the child only after a spanking had been administered to her, and later, and after the mother had interviewed defendant, the further declaration was made by the child inculcating him.

[5-7] This is not the character of complaint contemplated by the rule. It is purely hearsay, and the rule does not extend to the details of the acts complained of. The cross-examination of Mrs. Wells upon this subject did not justify the admission of this incompetent evidence, and it was no more admissible on redirect examination than it would have been in chief. Wagner v. People, 30 Mich. 384; State v. McDonough, 232 Mo. 219, 134 S. W. 545; People v. Flaherty, 162 N. Y. 532, 57 N. E. 73; 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2119. The error is even more apparent when it is considered that the child was not sworn, she being incompetent as a witness. Hearsay evidence cannot be given of the declarations of a child who has not the capacity to be sworn, nor can such child be examined in court without oath. 4 Blackstone's Com. chap. 15, § 3. There can be no doubt but what the admission of this evidence constituted error; but the question then arises whether the error was of so prejudicial a character as to require the reversal of the judgment. A careful consideration of this question leads us to the conclusion that it is not. The case does not present a situation where a defendant is at the mercy of the charges of a prosecutrix. The jury could have inferred from the evidence of the defendant's own admissions that he was guilty of the very character of acts denounced by the section of the Penal Code referred to; and having found a verdict of guilty, and there being, as we have seen, sufficient evidence apart from the hearsay declarations of the child erroneously admitted, to prove the corpus delicti, the case is not one in which we can say that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

For reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

STUKEY v. MIHARA et al. (Civ. 4250.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 19, 1925.)

Estoppel — Assignee of auto sales contract held estopped to deny title of subsequent innocent purchaser from assignor.

Where assignee of contract for conditional sale of auto truck permitted assignor and buyer to keep certificate of registration in their names as "legal owner" and "owner," he is estopped to deny title of subsequent innocent purchaser of truck from assignor after buyer's default, and cannot recover possession thereof from such purchaser in claim and delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by M. C. Stukev against S. Mihara and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Van Lee Hood, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff brought an action in claim and delivery against defendants for the possession of an auto truck. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

The facts appear to be that Los Angeles Auto Sales Company sold the truck to one Inui on a conditional sales contract, and immediately thereupon assigned its interest in the contract to plaintiff. Inui defaulted in his payments on the truck, and after a short time it was returned to Los Angeles Auto Sales Company, which for a period covering several following months kept up the payments as they fell due on the contract. Thereafter Los Angeles Sales Company sold the truck to defendant Mihara, likewise on a conditional sales contract, and thereupon assigned its interest in the Mihara contract to Angelus Investment Company, which, in turn, assigned to defendant Braley.

When the sale was made to Inui he caused the transaction to be registered in accordance with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 191), and a certificate was thereupon issued showing Los Angeles Auto Sales Company as "legal owner" and Inui as "owner" of the truck; but on the assignment of the conditional sales contract in that transaction no registration was made or certificate issued showing plaintiff's connection therewith. During all the time that the Los Angeles Auto Sales Company had the truck plaintiff knew that it was registered in the name of the Los Angeles Auto Sales Company as legal owner.

On the second sale of the truck being made—that is, the sale to defendant Mihara—he caused a registration to be made and a certificate to issue showing Los Angeles Auto Sales Company as "legal owner" and Mihara as "owner" of the truck. The application for change in the registration of the truck and the issuance of the last-mentioned certificate was signed by Mihara and Los Angeles Auto Sales Company.

Some time after the action was commenced, Angelus Investment Company, in order to have the truck registered in its name, gave a bond to the state of California to accomplish that purpose, whereupon a certificate issued showing Angelus Investment Company as "legal owner" and Mihara as "owner." Thereafter the contract was assigned to defendant Braley.

The effect of the argument of counsel for appellant is that by the assignment of the first contract, Los Angeles Auto Sales Company passed all its interest in the truck under the contract to plaintiff; that no delivery of the truck to plaintiff was necessary; and that under the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act neither the registration of the transfer nor the issuance of a certificate was required.

Whatever might be said in support of such contentions becomes of no moment in view of the recent decision by the Supreme Court in the case of Parke v. Franciscus, 228 P. 435, where the facts were strikingly similar to those in the instant case. It is there held (syllabus, 68 Cal. Dec. 133):

"In an action of claim and delivery for the possession of an automobile, where the plaintiffs permitted the conditional vendor and vendee of said automobile to keep the certificate of registration indorsed alone by the original owner, thus enabling them to dispose of the property to an innocent purchaser in the belief that he was obtaining valid title thereto, said plaintiffs are estopped to deny that such innocent purchaser had obtained such title, and, as the registration certificate was a prerequisite to the passing of title, and the plaintiffs failed to obtain such certificate and negligently allowed it to remain outstanding, they cannot recover possession of the automobile in an action for claim and delivery, since defendant, as an innocent purchaser, acquired lawful possession thereof."

And see, also, Chucovich v. San Francisco Securities Corp., 60 Cal. App. 700, 214 P. 263; Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 P. 848.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Perjury §21—Indictment designating name of action in which perjury was alleged to have been committed held sufficient.

Indictment for perjury under Pen. Code, § 966, alleged to have been committed in prosecution for crime defined as "obtaining money under false pretenses" rather than "obtaining money by false and fraudulent pretenses knowingly and designedly made with intent to defraud," held sufficient; designation by name of action involving controversy in which perjury was alleged to have been committed being enough.

2. Perjury §22—Indictment need only set forth general statement of jurisdiction in action in which perjury committed.

Indictment for perjury need only set forth general statement of jurisdiction in action in which perjury is alleged to have been committed, and need not set forth facts by virtue of which jurisdiction existed.

3. Perjury §12—Statement of witness as to whether he had been convicted of felony is statement of fact.

Statement as to whether witness had been convicted of felony held statement of fact, as recognized by Code Civ. Proc. § 2065, and not mere conclusion of law on which perjury charge could not be predicated.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Charles E. Paden was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter F. Lynch and G. Edward Lyon, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of a felony, to wit, perjury.

[1] The first attack is upon the sufficiency of the indictment. It charges that the offense was committed by false swearing in an action in which the plaintiff was the people of California and the defendant was Charles Paden, which action was numbered 13171 of the records of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and in which action the defendant therein was charged with a felony, to wit, obtaining money under false pretenses. Appellant's position is that the indictment in the perjury case should have stated that defendant was sworn in a criminal proceeding in which the defendant was charged with "obtaining money by false and fraudulent pretenses, knowingly and designedly made with intent to defraud," instead of defining the offense as "obtaining money under false pretenses." The objection is without merit. The case of People v. Ah Bean, 77 Cal. 12, 18 P. 815, considers an indictment for perjury under the provisions of section 966, Penal Code, and holds that the designation by name of the action involving the controversy with respect to which the perjury was committed is sufficient; the court saying: "The controversy in respect to which the offense was committed in this case was the case of People v. Martine." To the same effect are the cases of People v. De Carlo, 124 Cal. 462, 57 P. 383, and People v. Carpenter, 136 Cal. 391, 68 P. 1027.

[2] It is also urged that the indictment is faulty because it fails to aver that the court where the perjury is said to have been committed had jurisdiction, inasmuch as it is not shown whether the property claimed to have been obtained by false pretenses was obtained in the city and county of San Francisco. This objection is answered by the case of People v. De Carlo, supra, which holds that "the general statement of the jurisdiction is sufficient without setting forth the facts by virtue of which it exists." The case of People v. Carpenter is to the same effect.

The other objections to the indictment do not require consideration, as the indictment before us meets the requirements of section 966, Penal Code, and the aforementioned decisions construing said section.

[3] The perjury charge is predicated upon the statement of defendant in the former trial that he had never been convicted of a felony, and it is contended upon appeal that this statement is a conclusion of law and not a statement of fact, and that perjury cannot be predicated upon a statement of an opinion or a conclusion. Whether or not a man has been convicted of a felony is a statement of fact, and is recognized as such by section 2065, Code of Civil Procedure. We see no merit in this objection.

[4, 5] It is contended that error was committed in sustaining an objection to a question asked of defendant by his counsel, as follows: "Why did you not bring these witnesses here who could testify to that?" The word "that" in this question referred to the defendant's claim that his prior conviction in the federal court of the crime of embezzlement was a "sham" conviction which was resorted to so as to place defendant within the walls of the federal prison at Leavenworth as an investigator for the department of justice. We think the objection to the question that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial was properly sustained under the facts of this case. Before the trial of this action the defendant made a motion to take depositions of persons in Washington, D. C., Wichita, Leavenworth, and Arkansas City, Kan., to sustain his defense, and such motion was denied. The record is silent as to the proceedings upon the hearing of that motion, and we must assume, in support of the action of the trial court, that no proper showing was made for the granting of the same. No point is made by the appellant that this ruling was not correct, and we must assume that, if the defendant had made a proper showing, he would have been permitted to take the depositions. Since he did not do so, it is quite immaterial why he did not bring the witnesses to California.

[6] It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to warrant a conviction in this case. We cannot agree with the appellant in this contention. The conviction in this case is supported by the testimony of several witnesses, by the admissions of appellant, and by the judgment roll in the action in which he was convicted of embezzlement in the United States district court.

[7] It is also urged that there is no sufficient showing of the materiality of the testimony alleged to have been false. Such testimony is recognized as material by sections 2051 and 2065 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

There are no other matters which require consideration, and the judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 16, 1925. Rehearing Denied March 17, 1925.)

1. Master and servant §417(7)—Findings of Industrial Commission conclusive if based on evidence.

Findings of Industrial Accident Commission will not be disturbed on appeal, if based on some evidence or on conflicting evidence, but where there is no evidence to support a finding review may be had on theory that Commission had no jurisdiction to make it.

2. Master and servant §388—Mother held not partial dependent of son.

Evidence that deceased employee for 2 years previous to his death had sent his mother but $60, that at time of his death he was not devoting any amount to her support, and that mother was residing with married son or daughter and was earning but $6 per week less than deceased son, held not to authorize award to mother as partial dependent.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Lucinda Black, claimant, for the death of Johnson Black, her son, opposed by the Owl Drug Company, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the employer applies for certiorari to review award. Award annulled and cause remanded, for further proceeding.

Donald Barker, of Los Angeles (Harry A. Keithly, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner is a Nevada corporation conducting a mercantile drug business in this state under the authority of our statutes. On the 25th day of October, 1923, one Johnson Black, an employee of petitioner, was killed by one of its trucks at Sixth and Main streets, in the city of Los Angeles. The respondent Lucinda Black thereafter instituted proceedings before said Commission as an alleged dependent of Johnson Black for compensation, and after hearing the evidence she was allowed the sum of $640, $100 of which was awarded on account of funeral expenses. Petitioner applied for a rehearing before said Commission upon the ground that the latter acted in excess of its authority in granting to said dependent more than the sum of $100, which rehearing was denied, and, a petition for writ of certiorari for review of the proceedings before the respondent Commission having been filed in this court, an alternative writ issued.

The basis of petitioner's complaint is that the evidence does not justify any finding that Lucinda Black was entitled to more than the sum of $100. It was alleged in the petition for adjustment of claim filed with the respondent Commission that Johnson Black, in the course of his employment, ran to and attempted to mount one of petitioner's trucks while in motion, that he fell to the ground and was crushed by the truck. The respondent corporation denied that Lucinda Black was at the time of the death of said Johnson Black, or during the period of his employment, wholly or to any extent dependent upon him for her support. It was stipulated that said employee was at the time of the accident receiving $22.50 per week for six days' employment, and that there was no claim of misconduct on his part as a cause of his death; that said employee was accustomed to ride on the company's trucks, though not under instructions to do so.

she was the mother of the deceased employee; that she came to Hartford, Conn., from Americus, Ga., in January, 1923; that during the thirty weeks from the latter part of March until the 25th of October, 1923, she had had employment for about twenty weeks at $2.80 per day, six days per week, but that from January until March she worked at that rate but a few days a week; that previously to leaving Georgia she had steady employment at $3 per week and her board; she roomed with a daughter in Georgia, and entered the home of a married son at Hartford, where she had resided since her arrival there. She testified:

"Q. Do you pay any board and room to your son where you live now? A. I don't pay any special amount, but I take care of my expenses. When he gets behind with his bills I drop in a little to help out.

"Q. Does any one aid you in buying your clothes? A. No; I buy everything myself.

"Q. Have you any other expenses besides buying your clothes and board and room? A. No more than keeping up my societies."

She said that between October 25, 1922, and October 25, 1923, she had received from the decedent $80 in January, $40 in April, and $15 in August, or a total of $135, that the last time he had written her was some time in September, but that he then made no mention of money. She did washing to compensate for her room rent, and when she received money she would put it in her trunk; if asked for a dollar or two she would give it to her children when needed, but she testified that with money sent her by the decedent she also bought two postal savings certificates, and that, although the amounts of her earnings and funds sent her by him constituted her only means of support, yet it appears that she paid, and was expected to pay, but little for her domestic accommodations at Hartford.

The Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act provides as follows:

"In case the deceased employee leaves no person wholly dependent upon him for support, but one or more persons partially dependent therefor, the said dependents shall be allowed the reasonable expense of his burial, not to exceed one hundred dollars, and, in addition thereto, a death benefit which shall amount to three times the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of the person or persons so partially dependent;" and that "If the deceased employee leaves no person dependent upon him for support, the death benefit shall consist of the reasonable expense of his burial, not exceeding one hundred dollars and such other benefit as may be provided by law." St. 1917, p. 840, § 9, subd. c, pars. 2, 3, as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, § 4.

The respondent Commission based its award upon a finding that Johnson Black had contributed an annual rate of $180 toward his mother's support; as we have seen, her own testimony shows but $135 to have been sent her during the year next preceding his demise, with which she said that she purchased postal savings certificates to the value of $100.

[1] Findings of the Commission will not be disturbed by an appellate court if based upon some evidence, or upon conflicting evidence, but as said in Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission, 189 Cal. 459, 466, 209 P. 31, where there is no evidence to support a finding, a review may be had on the theory that the Commission had no jurisdiction to make it. Section 14 (b) of said act provides that the question of dependency "shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee." At the time of this accident Lucinda Black was receiving as wages $16.80 per week, or but $6 per week less than the decedent; she had been earning this amount for twenty weeks, and prior thereto she earned about $84 in ten weeks. It appears from her testimony, without contradiction, that she had at all times resided with a married son or daughter, and that her total expenses for the year, including dues in three societies, amounted to $104.80 less than her earnings. It appears that for a period of two years previously to his death Johnson Black had sent her but $60, and that at the time he died he was not devoting any amount to her support, if he ever did so.

In Spreckels Sugar Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 186 Cal. 256, 199 P. 8, it was said:

"The whole theory of the Compensation Act as to death cases is that the dependents of the employee killed through some hazard of his employment shall be compensated for the loss of the support they were receiving from him at the time of his injury. This necessarily means that the death benefit must be computed on the rate of contribution at that time. It is the rate which is the measure of the loss, not the gross amount which the decedent has happened to pay through any past year, or through any other period of time." (Italics supplied.)

The Supreme Court there illustrates the application of the rule by a hypothetical situation, where a son commences to contribute to his partially dependent mother the sum of $50 per month, which he continues to do for three months, or perhaps for but one month, when he is killed:

"Manifestly, the mother's loss of support is $50 a month, or $600 a year, regardless of how long that support has been continuing, and compensation for the loss must be upon that basis, and not upon the basis of what the son has actually contributed in the short time the condition of dependency has existed. In the present case, the facts as to dependency are merely reversed. A period of total dependency is succeeded by a short period of but partial dependency. During the first period the employee has contributed at the rate of $145 a month, and during the second at the rate of only $45 a month. It is plain that the loss of support to the dependents incurred by the employee's death is the latter rate."

In Great Western Power Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 724, 438, 218 P. 1009, it was also said:

"The statute in this state, differing in this respect from compensation acts in other jurisdictions, expressly provides that it is not the amount of contributions which shall be the basis of the computation, but it must be three times the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of the person or persons so partially dependent. It is the amount actually devoted by the employee to such support that fixes the compensation. The amount, it would seem, must not only be contributed for support, but it must be actually applied wholly to that purpose. It is very easy to conceive of a case, by way of illustration, in which only a small part or portion of what may be contributed will be devoted or applied to support; the rest being placed in bank or invested."

And quoting with approval from the dissenting opinion in Milwaukee Basket Co. v. Wiecki, 173 Wis. 391, 181 N. W. 308, the following apt language is incorporated:

We "cannot believe that it was the legislative intent that a father should be permitted to swell his investment account at the expense of an employer of his son, or at the public expense, if it instead of the employer ultimately bears the burden. Neither in popular nor in technical language does the word 'support' connote a meaning common to either 'investment' or 'savings,' and judicial construction should not change its meaning."

[2] The most that can be said in behalf of the respondents' position here is that Johnson Black on three occasions during 1923 took it upon himself to send a few dollars to his mother with which she might do as she saw fit. That she asked it, or was in any way dependent upon his contributions, or that he indicated any intention of establishing a precedent, does not appear; in fact, during much of that time she was earning more than five times as much as she had earned before. Aside from the fact that little could be left of the $135 for her support after investing $100 in government certificates and defraying the expenses of transportation from Georgia to Connecticut, she received from her son but $15 in about six months, and there is no evidence whatever upon which to base a rate at the time of the injury.

It follows that Lucinda Black was not partially dependent, and the award is therefore annulled, and the cause remanded to the respondent Commission, for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Upon petition for rehearing it is contended that in the opinion of the court there are certain inaccuracies in the statement of fact. If, for the sake of argument, it be conceded that this contention is correct, the conclusion reached by us would not thereby be affected.

The petition is denied.

PEOPLE v. HULING. (Cr. 1134.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 4, 1925.)

1. Conspiracy — Express or implied agreement necessary foundation for existence of criminal conspiracy.

An agreement, either express or implied, must be the foundation for existence of a criminal conspiracy.

2. Criminal law — False pretenses — Defendant exonerated from charge of conspiracy to obtain money by false pretenses could be found individually guilty, and such verdict held not contradictory.

In prosecution for obtaining property by false pretenses in which one count of indictment charged conspiracy between defendant and another, even if evidence did not show such conspiracy, under Pen. Code, §§ 31, 971, and in view of distinction between a "conspirator" and an "aider and abettor," defendant could be convicted of aiding and abetting, and verdict exonerating defendant from charge of conspiracy, but convicting him of obtaining property by false pretenses, was not contradictory.

3. Criminal law — Jurisdiction of prosecution of one aiding and abetting is in county of aiding or abetting, and not in county where principal offense committed.

Under Pen. Code, § 791, jurisdiction of offense of aiding and abetting another to obtain money by false pretenses was in county where offense as an accessory was committed, notwithstanding principal offense was committed in another county, and court of county in which principal offense was committed was without jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Jesse Olney, Judge.

John E. Huling was convicted of obtaining property and money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Reversed.

Wm. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. In an indictment consisting of five counts, defendant and one F. E. Alford were jointly charged with the crime of obtaining money and property by false representations and pretenses. An information containing three counts also charged defendants with the commission of certain related offenses. A demurrer to the information was sustained as to the first count thereof. The third count of the information accused defendant Huling of the crime of conspiring with defendant Alford to defraud the city of Ontario of the sum of $2,800; and in the second count of the information, defendants Huling and Alford were charged with the offense of obtaining by false representations and pretenses the same money and property described in the charge of conspiracy mentioned in the third count, thereby defrauding the city of Ontario of the said sum of $2,800.

For the purposes of the trial the several charges contained in the indictment and the remaining charges in the information were consolidated. The jury returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant, John E. Huling, guilty of the crime of obtaining property and money by false representations and pretenses, a felony, as charged in count 2 of the information, and not guilty of the crime of conspiracy to commit a felony, as charged in count 3 of the information, and not guilty of each and all of the offenses charged in the indictment."

Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Count 2 of the information charged in substance that said defendants presented a false claim in the name of E. S. O'Neal to the city of Ontario and thereby procured a warrant for the payment to said O'Neal of said claim, and that said warrant was subsequently paid. The evidence showed, among other things, that defendant Alford was the city manager of the city of Ontario, and that it was he who actually made the false representations in order to procure the issuance of the warrant. After obtaining the warrant, Alford sent it to Huling, who resided in the city of Los Angeles. Huling then induced E. S. O'Neal, who was his mother-in-law, to indorse the warrant, and thereafter Huling exchanged the warrant so indorsed for the private check of Fred Weddington, who was his brother-in-law, and which check defendant cashed at a bank, and, according to defendant's testimony, sent the greater part of the money so received to defendant Alford, retaining a small part thereof as a "loan" from defendant Alford. The warrant was thereafter paid.

Appellant's brief contains many specifications of alleged prejudicial error which he urges as reasons for a reversal of the judgment. We are convinced that but two of them require consideration by this court. They are: (1) That the verdict is contradictory; and (2) that the court was without jurisdiction as to defendant Huling.

Directing attention to the verdict as to the counts in the information, it will be noted that the verdict finds defendant Huling guilty of obtaining property and money by false representations and pretenses, as charged in count 2, and not guilty of the crime of conspiring to commit the same offense as charged in count three of the information.

[1, 2] An agreement, either express or implied, must be the foundation for the existence of a criminal conspiracy. The evidence shows that the only connection that defendant Huling had with the matter was in substance as hereinbefore set forth. If there was no agreement or understanding of any kind between defendants that in effect they would commit the offense, it might follow that defendant Huling's acts were innocent of any criminal intent. However, as distinguished from a "conspirator," if defendant Huling "aided and abetted" in the commission of the offense, he might still be criminally liable and the verdict be permitted to stand. In volume 5 of California Jurisprudence, at page 496, it is said:

"A 'conspirator' is one who is a participant in a conspiracy. * * * And a conspirator is not necessarily an aider and abettor. * * *

And in People v. Bond, 13 Cal. App. 175, 187, 109 P. 150, 156, the court said:

"Conspiracy" implies an agreement to commit the crime, while to 'aid and abet' requires actual participation in the act constituting the offense. It is therefore manifest that one may 'aid and abet' without having previously entered into a conspiracy to commit the crime."

See, also, Jones v. State, 174 Ala. 53, 57 So. 31.

By the provisions of both section 31 and section 971 of the Penal Code, any person concerned in the commission of a felony who "aids and abets" therein is a principal. It would therefore follow that, although the verdict by the jury exonerates defendant Huling from having "conspired" with defendant Alford to commit the offense with which they were jointly charged, the jury may have concluded that, without any agreement or understanding with defendant Alford that a crime should be committed, in view of the fact that a distinction apparently exists between "conspiring" and "aiding and abetting," defendant Huling, while innocent of the crime of criminal conspiracy as charged in the third count of the information, because of his having "aided and abetted" defendant Alford in the perpetration of the offense, was guilty of the crime charged in the third count, and consequently that, instead of Huling being a coconspirator with Alford, he was an "accessory" with him. In the cases of People v. Outeveras, 48 Cal. 19, and People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, 20 P. 36, an "accessory" is substantially defined as one who stands by and aids and abets and assists, or who counsels, advises, or encourages in the perpetration of a crime.

By section 971 of the Penal Code the distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal is abrogated, and it is therein provided in effect that accessories shall be "prosecuted, tried and punished as principals." However, with reference to the place of trial of an accessory, section 791 of the Penal Code provides that—

"In the case of an accessory in the commission of a public offense, the jurisdiction is in the county where the offense of the accessory was committed, notwithstanding the principal offense was committed in another county."

And in the case of People v. Trim, 39 Cal. 75, 79, it is said:

"The venue of the offense, in case of a principal, may be in one county, and that of an accessory before the fact, may, necessarily, be in another and different county."

In the case of People v. Hodges, 27 Cal. 340, it appears that one Pool was indicted jointly with three others for murder alleged to have been committed in the county of El Dorado, and it was further charged in the indictment that the defendant within said county incited, counseled, hired, and commanded the said Pool and others to commit the said murder. The evidence introduced at the trial showed that the acts wherewith Hodges stood charged were performed by him in the county of Santa Clara. In considering the point that the trial court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged against the defendant, the Supreme Court said:

"We consider the objection to be well taken. Section 93 of the Criminal Practice Act is as follows: 'In the case of an accessory before or after the fact in the commission of a public offense, the jurisdiction shall be in that county where the offense of the accessory was committed, notwithstanding the principal offense was committed in another county.' By section 255, all persons connected in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and assist in its commission, though not present, are to be indicted, tried, and punished, as principals. To that extent 'all distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal, and between principals in the first and second degree,' is expressly abolished by the action."

"There is no conflict between these sections. The latter (section 255) requires that an accessory should be indicted, tried and punished in the same manner as principals; and section 93 fixes the place at or in which those events are to transpire."

"Though the common-law distinction between principal and accessory is in the main obliterated, yet it is retained for the purposes of venue. * * * Section 255 of the Criminal Practice Act relates to the frame of the indictment against an accessory, the method of trial, and the measure of punishment; and section 93 determines the forum having jurisdiction of the offense."

[3] The evidence in the instant case shows that defendant's acts in "aiding and abetting" in the crime committed by defendant Alford, or in being an "accessory" to such crime, were committed by him wholly in the county of Los Angeles. If, according to the verdict, defendant was not guilty of "conspiracy," his acts as an "accessory" in Los Angeles county could not be so connected with the initial or the final act or acts of Alford in the county of San Bernardino in the perpetration of the offense, as to give the court of that county jurisdiction. Such being the facts, according to the statute (section 791, Pen. Code) and the cases cited, the jurisdiction as to defendant Huling was in the county where his offense as an accessory was committed, "notwithstanding the principal offense was committed in another county."

In the case of People v. Stakem, 40 Cal. 599, where three defendants were jointly indicted for the crime of grand larceny committed in one county and where the evidence showed that the defendant on trial was not present in the county at the time of the theft and did not participate in the larceny, but subsequently, with a guilty knowledge that it was stolen, received the stolen property in another county and aided in disposing of the same for the joint benefit of himself and the perpetrator of the larceny, it was held that the defendant could not be convicted of larceny in the county where the crime was committed. In speaking of the matter the Supreme Court said:

"His offense, whatever it was, would, upon this hypothesis, appear to have been committed in the county of Yuba, and not in the county of Placer, and the courts of the latter county would consequently have no jurisdiction to inquire into the case."

The action herein having been tried in San Bernardino county, it follows that the court was without jurisdiction in the matter, and for that reason the judgment must be reversed.

Appellant directs attention to several other alleged prejudicial errors in the record; but in view of the fact that none of them is of such a character that a recurrence thereof is likely, it becomes unnecessary to devote attention thereto.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

71 Cal. App. 197

DOLAN v. CARMEL CANNING CO.
(Civ. 4861.)

1. Appeal and error — 1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence controlling.

Finding on conflicting evidence, as to whether labels printed and delivered conformed to the design approved, is controlling on appeal.

2. Evidence — 441(1)—Contemporaneous oral agreements inadmissible, except for fraud or mistake, to vary written contract.

In absence of fraud or mistake, contemporaneous oral agreements varying, modifying, or contradicting written contracts are inadmissible, and no additional force is added to the rule by inserting in the contract statement of the principle.

3. Appeal and error — 1050(2)—Admission of evidence of matter immaterial to issue held harmless.

The defense in action for price being that labels as manufactured were not in the form prescribed by defendant, admission of evidence, immaterial to such issue, that plaintiff agreed to assist in procuring registration of the label, was harmless.

4. Evidence — 412—Parol rule not violated by evidence of unauthorized alteration of writing.

Parol rule is not violated by showing unauthorized alteration of writing by plaintiff adding certain letters to label to be printed after defendant had in writing approved that submitted.

5. Trial — 66—Reopening case to permit proof in court's discretion.

Reopening case to permit evidence of a fact bearing on a separate defense of rescission is within sound discretion of trial court.

6. Sales — 359(1)—Defense of rescission held supported, notwithstanding defendant used an insignificant part of labels and delayed offer to return.

Defense of rescission of contract for purchase of labels to be printed according to approved design held supported by the evidence, though defendant used an insignificant part of the labels, and to accommodate plaintiff delayed offer to return them.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by G. E. Dolan against the Carmel Canning Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. W. Lovey and Walter E. Dorn, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action by plaintiff to recover the sum of $3,724.52 for goods alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant.

The complaint, in substance, charges that plaintiff's assignor, the United States Printing & Lithograph Company, entered into a written contract with defendant for the manufacture of certain labels for which the defendant agreed to pay the amount sued for. Defendant denied the indebtedness, and as a separate and distinct defense alleged, in substance, that plaintiff's assignor promised and agreed to manufacture and deliver to defendant canning company some 2,500,000 sardine labels at the agreed price of $1.30 per 1,000 and promised and agreed that the labels were to contain a design of the trade-name to be thereafter selected by defendant; that subsequently the lithograph company notified defendant that a certain trade-mark was available for registration in the patent office and prepared and delivered to defendant a sketch of the same; that defendant, upon being so informed, advised the lithograph company not to proceed with the printing of the labels until the trade-mark had been registered, as it would be necessary for the defendant, in using them, to have the words "Registered U. S. Patent Office" printed thereon; that thereupon the lithograph company represented to defendant that it was only a matter of a short time when the registration would be granted and that it would proceed upon its own responsibility to do the printing so that the material would be available for use as soon as the trade-mark was registered. Further allegations are to the effect that this was done and the product tendered to defendant company bearing the legend "Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.," but that registration was not granted, in consequence of which the labels were of no value to defendant.

At the trial, to prove his case, plaintiff offered in evidence a document in the form of a written order, signed by the secretary of the defendant company and addressed to plaintiff's assignor, requesting the entry of an order and submission of proofs for approval for 2,500,000 sardine labels of a specified size and character. He also offered in evidence the design of a proposed label, upon which were written the letters "O. K.—R. J. W." Upon this design appeared the above-mentioned legend indicating its registration in the United States Patent Office, and it also appeared upon the labels tendered to defendant in purported execution of its order. Proof was also made that the design had been submitted to R. J. Walsh, the secretary of the company, and that he had initialed the same as evidence of his acceptance. Plaintiff then offered in evidence a printed form of label which Mr. Woods, a salesman of plaintiff's assignor, testified was in the identical form as approved by Mr. Walsh on behalf of defendant company. It further appeared in evidence that the finished product was shipped by the printer to the defendant company at Monterey, Cal., and at the same time samples thereof were forwarded to Mr. Walsh at his office. This officer was also a witness, and he testified, in substance, that upon receipt of the samples he discovered that a change had been made in the form of the label, and he immediately notified Mr. Woods of the lithograph company by telephone of his discovery, stating to him at the same time that the labels were useless to the company with the words above referred to printed thereon. Mr. Woods thereupon visited the office of defendant and stated to Mr. Walsh, in the presence of witnesses, that he had added the words indicating trade-mark registration as the matter was pending in the patent office and the design would be allowed and approved within a few weeks; that if the matter was permitted to stand for a short time it would be all right. Mr. Walsh, as an accommodation and for the purpose of preventing a loss, agreed to hold the labels for a reasonable time pending the outcome of the application. Mr. Walsh also testified that the design which he approved did not contain the words "Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.," but that the same had been added thereto without his knowledge or consent. Other witnesses testified to the same effect. There was also testimony to show that, at the time the design was submitted to Mr. Walsh for his approval, he had requested that the lithograph company defer the printing of the label until it had been registered, but that Mr. Woods had replied that no prejudice could result, as the label did not contain any words indicating registration.

[1] The question whether or not plaintiff's assignor delivered the labels contracted for, i. e., whether they conformed to the approved design, was purely one of fact. It is manifest from what we have said with reference to the evidence upon the subject that it is controlled by the conflict of evidence rule. The finding of the trial court upon the subject is therefore controlling here.

Appellant complains of the admission of oral testimony concerning the execution of the contract contrary to its terms.

The instrument contained a provision, in substance, that, its approval and acceptance being based upon certain legal requirements, no verbal alteration or agreement between the buyer and salesman should be binding upon the lithograph company, and that that company was not to be held responsible for the text, size, or arrangement of any trade-mark, copyright, or other subject-matter required by law that was printed upon the materials ordered, notwithstanding that it or its representative may have been consulted thereon. During the course of the trial oral evidence was admitted to the effect that the lithograph company was to assist in the procurement of the trade-mark for a design, as was also oral evidence to the effect that the labels delivered did not conform to the approved design.

[2] The rule is universal that when parties have entered into a written contract their rights must be controlled thereby, and, in the absence of fraud or mistake, all evidence of contemporaneous oral agreements on the subject-matter, varying, modifying, or contradicting the written agreement, is inadmissible. The mere insertion of a statement of this principle in the contract itself added no additional force to the rule.

[3, 4] Conceding that evidence of an agreement on the part of plaintiff's assignor to assist in procuring registration of the label was erroneously admitted, its admission in no manner constituted prejudicial error. Whether or not plaintiff's assignor had so agreed was immaterial to the question at issue, namely, were the labels as manufactured in the form prescribed by the defendant? That they were not was the main defense relied upon, the defendant contending that they did not correspond to the design approved by it by reason of the added legend "Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.," which rendered them useless and without value to it. Whether the plaintiff's assignor was to assist in the procurement of the labels could in no manner affect this question. Nor was it error to permit oral evidence of the defect in the design of the labels as printed. The effect of such evidence was not to vary or change the written instrument but to show its condition when executed. This evidence was pointed to the authenticity of the document itself. The rule invoked does not exclude parol evidence to show that an alteration of or addition to a writing has been made without authority. Where it is claimed that an instrument in evidence fails to express the true contract or agreement of the parties by reason of alterations therein, extrinsic evidence is always admissible to prove that contention. 22 Corp. Jur. 1147. The rule itself presupposes the existence and proof of a written contract. That being established, it cannot be varied by parol evidence. As already remarked, the evidence here complained of was directed to the point that the label as printed did not comply with the terms of the contract, inasmuch as it was not in the form approved by the defendant, differing therefrom through the addition of the phrase indicating that the body thereof had been registered in the United States Patent Office as a trade-mark.

[5] The further claim is made that the action of the trial court, in permitting defendant to reopen its case for the purpose of showing that it offered to return the goods, constituted error. Defendant had pleaded as a separate defense to the action a rescission of the contract on the ground of failure of consideration, in that the labels were rendered worthless by reason of the registration legend printed thereon, when in fact registration was denied and the use of the design prohibited. The matter of reopening the case to permit proof of this fact was within the sound discretion of the trial court. Badover v. Guaranty Trust Co., 186 Cal. 775, 200 P. 638.

fendant dealt with the labels as though they were its own, and its offer to return the same was not seasonably made. There is evidence in the record to show that the defendant did use an insignificant number of the labels in an interstate shipment before it offered to return them. It further appears, however, that the shipment and use of the labels was for the purpose of satisfying the requirements of the patent office that before application for registration could be made there must be shown some use of the label in interstate commerce. There is also evidence that the delay in offering to return the labels was due to the fact that the defendant was willing to hold them as a matter of accommodation to plaintiff's assignor until such time as the right of registration was definitely determined. Defendant did, however, offer to return them immediately upon discovering the alteration. There is therefore no merit in these contentions.

The finding of the trial court that the contract declared upon was not performed by plaintiff's assignor finds full and ample support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

MITSUDA v. ISBELL et al. (Civ. 2793.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 10, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡1011(1)—Determination of triers of fact on conflicting evidence conclusive, unless evidence shows decision to be erroneous as matter of law.

Where evidence is conflicting, determination of triers of fact is binding on appellate court, unless whole testimony shows that decision is erroneous as matter of law.

2. Highways ⚡179—Statute, permitting repairs of vehicle on highway, permits necessary repairs only if practicable to remedy difficulty within reasonable time.

State Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. W, permitting repairing, on traveled portion of highways, vehicle so disabled as to make it impracticable to remove it until repairs have been made, must be reasonably construed to permit vehicle to remain on highway only if practicable to remedy difficulty within reasonable time, and with as little inconvenience and hazard to others using highway as is practicably possible.

3. Highways ⚡184(3)—Whether repairing vehicle on traveled portion of highway is necessary is for triers of fact, unless evidence shows on its face that it is reasonably necessary.

Under state Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. W, unless testimony shows on its face that time required to repair vehicle disabled on traveled portion of highway is reasonable, determination of such issue is for triers of fact.

4. Highways ⚡184(2)—Evidence held to warrant finding that defendants failed to exercise proper diligence to remove or repair disabled wagon left in highway over night.

Evidence held to warrant finding that defendants failed to exercise proper diligence to remove or repair heavily loaded and disabled wagon left on highway over night, with which plaintiff's automobile collided, causing death of his wife, injuries to plaintiff, and damages to automobile.

5. Highways ⚡179—Defendant's negligence in leaving wagon in highway held proximate cause of collision.

Where plaintiff's vision was so obscured by cloud of dust caused, when another automobile which he was following swerved and left paved portion of highway to avoid heavily loaded and disabled wagon left on highway over night by defendants, that plaintiff could not see wagon, held that proximate cause of collision with wagon was defendant's negligence in leaving it on highway, in violation of state Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. W, and not cloud of dust, which was merely condition resulting from defendant's negligence.

6. Highways ⚡184(3)—Evidence as to whether automobile driver, who collided with wagon left in highway at night, was contributorily negligent, held to present issue for triers of fact.

Evidence as to contributory negligence of automobile driver, who collided with wagon left in highway at night, in violation of state Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. W, held to present issue for triers of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by G. Mitsuda against J. W. Isbell and another, copartners doing business under the firm name of the Isbell Construction Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for appellants.

Leroy G. Smith, of Dinuba, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages growing out of a collision by a Ford automobile while being operated by the plaintiff with a large and heavily loaded wagon of the defendants which the latter had left standing on a certain highway in Tulare county. The result of the collision was that the plaintiff's wife, who was riding with him at the time of the collision, was instantly killed, the plaintiff himself sustained physical injuries, and the car driven by him at the time and of which he was the owner was greatly damaged.

The complaint, charging that the collision and the results thereof were proximately caused by the negligence of defendants, is in five counts, or, in other words, sets up five different causes of action, to wit: (1)

For injuries to his person; (2) for damage to his automobile; (3) for loss of services of his wife; (4) on account of expenses "for sanitarium service and medical aid"; (5) "for undertaker's charges and funeral expenses for his wife." The aggregate amount of damages claimed by plaintiff in his complaint for the several injuries which thus he alleged he received by reason of the collision is the sum of $13,463.15.

The defendants, by their answer, specifically deny each and all the material allegations of the complaint and plead contributory negligence, alleging that, but for the negligence of the plaintiff, the collision and the results thereof would not have occurred.

The court's findings were in general accord with the claims of the complaint, and, agreeably to said findings, judgment passed for the plaintiff for the total sum of $4,728.50. A motion for a new trial, on all the statutory grounds, was made by defendants and denied by the court.

The defendants, prior to and at the time of the happening of the accident, were, as copartners, engaged in the business of contracting for and doing highway construction work. For the purpose of carrying on this work of construction they had equipped themselves with and used a large variety of implements, tools, and other machinery suitable to and necessary for the building of highways. This outfit they moved from point to point, "as they completed one contract and began another." In the month of October, 1921, they had completed one of these highway contracts near the town of Seville, in Tulare county, and, on the 31st day of said month, proceeded to move their equipment from Seville to a certain point in Fresno county. A large part of the equipment, including a "portable blacksmith shop," was loaded on a wagon, drawn by six mules. Some time in the afternoon of said 31st day of October, this wagon, so loaded and propelled, was traveling in a northerly direction over and upon a recently constructed and completed paved highway in Tulare county, and, on reaching a point approximately one-half mile south of the village of Sultana, in Tulare county, the rear axle of the wagon broke, thereby causing the right hind wheel to lean inward and to scrape against the side of the wagon so that a groove was cut into the wagon bed. The wheel, so some of the witnesses said, was thrown in contact with the brake rod, with the result that both hind wheels locked in such manner as to make it impossible to proceed further with the wagon in that condition. There were two men in the wagon at the time of this accidental breaking of the axle. After an examination of the wagon and thus learning the condition in which the breaking of the axle had left it, the two men in charge of the wagon detached the mules therefrom, placed a lantern reflecting a white light on each of the four corners of the wagon, and then left it, with its load, on the highway, where it remained in that condition until the following morning.

About 10 o'clock of the night of said 31st day of October, the plaintiff was driving a Ford automobile north on the highway on which the wagon of defendants was left standing. His wife was sitting on his right in the front seat. Preceding his machine a short distance, and going in the same direction, was an automobile driven by one Tabuchi, a Japanese friend of plaintiff. Sitting in the front seat with and on the right-hand side of Tabuchi was one T. Iwasa. Immediately before reaching the spot where the wagon was standing, Tabuchi, having observed the light from a lantern suspended from the rear end of the wagon, turned his car to the left so as to pass around the wagon, and in doing so left the paved portion of the highway a short distance. There was at this and some other points scattered over the concrete portion of the highway some fine dirt, and, so the plaintiff testified, the passing of Tabuchi's car over or along the edge of the concrete pavement to get around the wagon caused a cloud of dust to rise just before plaintiff reached the point where the wagon stood, thereby causing plaintiff's vision to become so obscured that he could not or at least did not see the wagon. Thus the collision occurred, with the result as above explained.

The above is a general statement of the circumstances under which the accident occurred. The court made these findings:

"That on or about the 31st day of October, 1921, at about 4 o'clock of said day and at a point on the public highway about three-fourth miles south from the town of Sultana, in said county and state, the defendants did carelessly and negligently leave and abandon a wagon with overhanging loaded rack, allowing the said wagon and rack then and there to completely obstruct the easterly half of said highway and extended for about 24 inches westerly across the center of said highway, thereby making it necessary for vehicles traveling on said highway to turn off the pavement in passing said wagon and travel in loose soil and dust on and beyond the margin of said pavement. * * *

"Plaintiff was driving upon said highway in a northerly direction, following, at reasonable distance, another automobile which preceded him, and was traveling at a reasonable rate in a new Ford touring car at about 10 o'clock of the evening following the abandonment of said wagon upon said highway. The said wagon was invisible to plaintiff at all times. There was loose dirt or dust on each margin of the pavement and loose dry soil on each side of the pavement, and the travel of vehicles on the highway raised dust into the atmosphere and such dust hid the wagon, and

"That defendants were guilty of gross negligence in leaving said wagon upon said highway as aforesaid without displaying red lights thereon during the nighttime.

"With reference to the allegations set out in defendants' answer, it is found and determined that defendants did cause to be lighted and hung upon the rear end of said wagon a lantern, and upon the front end of said wagon two lanterns, and that said lanterns on the front were on said wagon and burning at the time of the collision described in the complaint, and one on the rear was burning at said time, but all were white lights and dust prevented plaintiff from seeing the white lights or wagon, and there were no red lights on said wagon.

"That plaintiff was not driving in a careless nor negligent manner, nor at a high or unlawful rate of speed, nor without due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians nor other vehicles nor drivers on said highway and plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence and no negligence of plaintiff contributed to the collision, nor to any injury nor to any damage resulting therefrom;

"That plaintiff was driving his automobile in a careful and prudent manner, but he did not see any lantern displayed on the rear of said wagon, and is not guilty of negligence in his manner of driving nor in approaching the said wagon."

The general contention of the defendants is that the foregoing and, consequently, all other material findings, are not supported by the evidence; the specific points being: (1) That, according to the uncontradicted evidence, the defendants were not guilty of any negligence, "either as a matter of law or of fact"; (2) that, conceding for the purposes of the argument, that defendants were primarily negligent in leaving their wagon on the highway as indicated and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, "still a wholly independent and responsible human agency, to wit, the other automobile which raised a cloud of dust and obscured respondent's vision, intervened between the act of appellants in leaving the wagon on the road, and the accident, and such intervening independent human agency was the direct proximate cause of the collision"; (3) "assuming that appellants were guilty of some negligence in leaving the wagon on the road, still, on the uncontradicted evidence, plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as precludes his recovery."

The plaintiff testified:

"I had an accident in October, 1921, on the highway south of Sultana. I think it was November 1st. The afternoon of the day of the accident the wife of Mr. Harada was ill and we visited her. We first went to the home of Harada and then visited the hospital at Orosi. My wife stayed at Harada's when I went to the hospital. In going to Harada's place, we went over the Sultana highway at about 3 or half past 3 in the afternoon, and, when we returned along the Sultana highway, it was between 9:30 or 10 o'clock at night. On our return along the highway, in my machine was my wife. She was sitting at my right on the front seat. There was another machine, the owner of which is now in Japan, but the party that was riding with him, by the name of Iwasa, is here. They were driving ahead of me. The distance between our machines varied at different times, but at the time of this accident I think it was about 40 or 50 feet ahead of my machine. I saw the machine turn slightly, and then a cloud of dust, and my vision was obscured, and I do not remember anything after that. The machine ahead of me turned slightly to the left. I made a slight turn in the direction that the other machine turned, then the dirt arose and I couldn't see him, and I do not know what happened afterwards. I had been able to see his machine clearly up to that time. It was directly ahead of me. I did not see any light ahead of that machine in the road, nor did I see any object ahead of the other machine as I drove along. I have no recollection what happened to my machine after the cloud of dust arose. I was driving about 16 or 17 or 18 miles an hour. I do not know how fast I was driving at the time when I was struck because I do not remember anything about it. I was following the other machine. We were together. I was not looking at my speedometer, but I could judge the speed by the amount of the gasoline that I pressed. I think it was about 5:30 in the morning when I regained consciousness at the hospital in Dinuba. After I regained consciousness I felt a very severe pain in my right shoulder. I remained in the hospital two weeks. * * *

"I went through Sultana the first time I went down there in the afternoon and over the same road where the accident occurred. That road was a new paved highway. There was dirt on the edges of the highway, but not much in the middle. When we left Harada's place about 9:30 that night, we were going home. * * * We traveled on the highway more than one-half mile before the accident, and I had been following behind his car. It was a clear night, there wasn't any fog, but it was dark. We left Harada's house about 9:30. As Tabuchi was driving along that road, after we left Harada's house and before the accident, there was no dust to speak of. I had my lights burning and Tabuchi had his lights burning on his car. As we were going along that road north, before we got to where this accident occurred, I could not see the lights on the wagon. I never did see any lights on the wagon. I could not see them just immediately or just at the instant when my car hit the wagon. Just a little before the accident the dust arose."

A. E. Russell, a resident of Dinuba, Tulare county, was at the place where the accident occurred early in the morning following the day of its occurrence. He testified:

"I reside at Dinuba in this county. On or about the 31st day of October, 1921, I had occasion to pass along the paved highway south of Sultana driving toward Dinuba. I noticed an obstruction on the highway at the time I passed just south of Sultana. I noticed a wagon setting there in the road which had a rack on it. A fellow was standing there, and an automobile was in the ditch. The wagon was loaded with lumber, a feed rack, boards, and junk. It was a big rack and the lumber was sticking out about 4 feet behind the rack. The rack extended over about 2 feet on each side of the wheels. The right front wheel I think was right at the edge of the paved highway. The right-hand hind wheel was about 2 feet on the paved highway; it was setting in an angle. The wagon was facing north. We thought the wagon was standing 2 feet over the middle of the highway; that is, the lumber was sticking out of the back end of the wagon, towards the west. It might be 2 feet over the middle of the highway. There was dirt on the highway; it was a new highway and had not been perfectly cleaned off. The dirt stood about 4 feet on each side. Some places you could get a visible view of the edge of the highway. You could see the tracks of passing vehicles in the dirt in the edge of the highway as they went around the wagon. * * * The wagon was facing north and the rear end was out on the highway. There are olive trees and fig trees along the right-hand side of the road going north. These trees are set at 10 or 12 feet from the edge of the highway. I saw these things between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning, around about 6 o'clock, at little after 6 o'clock."

Cross-examination:

"The road going south from Sultana had just apparently been recently built and uncovered and the dirt covered over the edges of the highway 3 or 4 feet. It was quite dusty driving along there. * * * There were figs or olive trees along the highway and I would say their branches would come out to 8 feet. The trees were 7 or 8 years old. You could drive your car off the highway and not hit the limbs. * * * I would say that the trees were planted 20 feet apart. * * * I don't know the width of the rack on the wagon. I noticed something wrong with the wagon. The right rear wheel was lopped over, and was dragging against the frame of the wagon. It looked like it had been doing that for quite a while, it had cut quite a circle in there by rubbing. I didn't notice whether or not it was caught on the brake. The paved highway there is about 16 feet."

Redirect:

"I would have thought that the wagon could have been moved. I made a special note that there was plenty of room to move the wagon off the highway."

Recross:

"The boards on the wagon extended about 4 feet back of the bed. I would not consider there was anything extra heavy about it. Two horses would move it easy enough on the highway. I noticed there were fifth chains there."

C. V. Lamb was traveling over the highway on the night of the accident and shortly thereafter was at the scene thereof. He testified:

"I saw the automobile which was damaged in the collision. It was in the ditch; up quite a ways above the wagon. I could not say how far. It was standing right in the bottom of the ditch with the front wheels up on the west bank. * * * When I first saw the machine, a Japanese man was in it. He was in a kind of a stupor. It looked like he had run into that wagon. * * * I went back the next morning about 9 o'clock and saw the premises. I saw a wagon on the highway. * * * At the time I was there I did not observe the position of the wagon. I had passed it during the night. We noticed it was setting on the highway. The man that was driving the car had to get off the highway to get by on the west side. * * * Along the highway the edges were covered with dirt."

Cross-examination:

"I should think it was a pretty dark night. * * * I had gone north earlier in the evening and passed the wagon when it was dark. Along the edge of the paved highway for about a foot there was dirt on either side. I observed the night of the accident that other machines caused considerable dust."

T. Iwasa accompanied plaintiff in the latter's car to the home of Harada, but on the return rode with Tabuchi. He testified:

"I first noticed the noise (of the collision) at the time of the accident. We got off of our machine and went to see what happened and found that Mr. and Mrs. Mitsuda were injured, and we took them to Dinuba. At that time Mrs. Mitsuda was dead. Just before we heard that noise, as we approached, we saw a wagon ahead of us. The condition of the road was not very good at that point where we avoided the wagon in order to pass it and immediately after we heard this noise. We had to get off the highway in order to pass the wagon. There was very light sand laying on the side and I suppose that is what caused the accident, was going through the sand like that raised a dust, and, after we stopped the machine and went back to see what happened to Mitsuda, we could not see it very well on account of the dust thrown up. The road was clear as far as the center was concerned, but on the side was dust or sand."

Cross-examination:

"I went down that highway when Mitsuda and I went there (to Harada's) in the afternoon. I noticed at that time in the afternoon that the dirt was covering part of the highway. * * * As we were going north along the road that night, I could see the rear light, but we noticed it some distance away. I called Tabuchi's attention there was a white light down there. That was about the distance between the telephone poles. * * * He (Tabuchi) commenced turning out about a hundred feet away; it might be a hundred feet after we went off the highway up to the time we went back on it. I know that one side of the machine went off the highway. * * * After we passed the wagon, it was dusty back there and one could hardly see the other automobile."

Leroy G. Smith, attorney for plaintiff, testified as follows:

"I will state at the outset that I was called by a Japanese interpreter very early in the morning, I should judge about half past 3 o'clock following this accident and, as soon as it was light enough to see, went out to the scene of the accident, and went very carefully over the situation. I had in mind the possibility of adjustment of claims if a claim should be made, and looked more carefully in detail, perhaps, than another person would under the same circumstances. I found that the right rear wheel of the wagon had evidently weakened under the heavy load, and the top was impressed against the frame of the wagon, and had cut something of a groove where the tire comes in contact with the frame. There was nothing else on any one of the four wheels, unless it would be a hot box, which I could not discover, that would in any way impede the motion of a wheel. That wheel was not locked, or any other member of the wagon, except by the friction of the top of the wheel rubbing against the wagon. It struck me as an exceptionally heavy load to put on a wagon of that kind. I think it was a thimble skein wagon. It was difficult to determine just where the edges of the highway at that point were, but I took a stick and scraped off the dirt at both the right front wheel and the right rear wheel. The right front wheel was turned so that it was not parallel with the edge of the highway. A portion of the wheel was touching the edge; the tongue being pointed toward and to the right of the highway. The rear wheel leaned inward and the lower part was nearer the outer edge of the highway than the plumb from the upper part of the wheel would have been, so that the hub, the middle of the spokes, was further in on the highway than the tire where it came in contact with the highway. I went to both edges of the highway and scraped off the dirt so I could locate the extreme edge of the highway. I measured from the middle of the highway to a plumb line from the overhanging left rear corner of the wagon and I estimated the distance from the center of the highway to the left rear corner of the wagon to be between 22 and 23 inches west of the middle of the highway. There was a well-beaten trackway made by automobiles where machines had passed around that wagon. The dirt was very loose and it was of a peculiar filmy kind of dirt that makes a dust. I was satisfied at the time that there was a light on the left front of the wagon and it is only a conclusion in my mind there was a light on the left rear because of the pieces of a lantern that I saw there. * * *"

"The automobile was 57 steps from the point of impact on the wagon to a place directly opposite the Ford on the highway. The right-hand side of the car was practically demolished. The top was torn to shreds and the car bore the appearance of having something ran through the right side of the windshield across the front seat taking the back with it and jamming the right rear of the body. There was plenty of room to move that wagon off the highway without coming in contact with the trunks of the trees, and, by disturbing the limbs of those trees slightly, the whole load could have been put well over the edge of the highway. Outside of that dragging tire there was nothing that would prevent its being moved. The dirt was soft on that side. It is true it would have pulled a great deal harder than on the highway. The wagon could have been unloaded and moved very easily. There was nothing bulky on that wagon; that is, I mean to say, while the total load was of tremendous bulk, the pieces upon it could have easily been handled and thrown off to the side of the road or put onto something else. There was no lanterns near or around the right side of the wagon, and no evidence of any having been hung there, and there was no evidence of a flag about the wagon of any kind, and I could see no sign of any kind of any warning except the two lanterns that I referred to in the beginning."

Cross-examination:

"The wagon was loaded with cement frames and some other loose stuff, and also lumber. My conception of the load is that it was too large; much heavier and higher than that given by Mr. Russell this morning. There was lots of lumber, these heavy frames they use for pouring cement. I think there must have been at least 2 feet of that packed in solid, perhaps 2½ or 3. I think that about four men could unload it in a couple of hours."

The witness Iwasa, called for further cross-examination, stated:

"When I went down that Sultana highway in the afternoon at 3 o'clock, this wagon was standing there."

Henry Cano, driver of the wagon on the day of the accident, testifying for plaintiff, stated that it was about 5:30 p. m. when he first started to drive on the highway on which the accident occurred.

[1] The above is a comprehensive statement of the testimony presented by the plaintiff. There is a conflict between that testimony and the testimony introduced by the defendants upon many of the essentially vital facts. It was, of course, for the trier of the facts (the court in this instance) to settle that conflict and from the whole mass of testimony determine the ultimate facts, and, unless it appears that upon the whole testimony the decision arrived at is, as a matter of law, erroneous, then that determination is binding upon this court.

[2] The proposition first advanced by the defendants is that the mere act itself of leaving the wagon on the highway under the circumstances as indicated, did not constitute negligence on their part. To the contrary, they contend, the provisions of subdivision W of section 20 of the state Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 219, in force at the time the damage complained of here was sustained) furnishes legal justification for the act of leaving the wagon on the highway. That paragraph of said section provides:

"No person shall leave standing or cause or permit to be left standing upon the main traveled portion of any public highway a vehicle undergoing repair or which has been stopped for the purpose of having repairs made thereon, or for the purpose of camping: Provided, however, that this provision shall not apply to a vehicle which shall be disabled, while on such main traveled portion of the highway, in such manner and to such extent that it shall be impossible to avoid stopping such vehicle on said main traveled portion of the highway, and impracticable to remove the same therefrom until repairs shall have been made."

[3] The language of the above provision is very general, but, in its application, it must be given a construction conformable to reason and common sense. If the language of the section were to be accepted without qualification, there would be no limit of time during which the highways of the state might be used for the purpose of repairing a vehicle getting out of order while being driven over such highways. What the section evidently means, or was intended to mean, is that where some essential part of the mechanical contrivances of a vehicle, while being driven over a highway, gets so out of repair as to render it incapable of performing its work, with the result that such vehicle cannot be moved by the usual method of moving it, then, if it be practicable to remedy the difficulty within a reasonable time, the vehicle may be allowed to stand on the highway until the defect or injury is corrected. Moreover, the provision clearly contemplates that the use of the highway for that purpose must be with as little inconvenience and hazard to others legitimately using it as is practically possible; and, unless upon the face of the testimony it can justly be declared that the time employed in making the repair was reasonable, considering all the conditions and circumstances, and that the manner of the use of the highway for that purpose entailed no unreasonable inconvenience or no such added peril to the traveling public as could not be overcome by the exercise of reasonable care, then the determination of all those matters would be with the jury or the court, where, as here, the decision of the questions of fact is committed to the latter.

[4] The evidence in this case is such as to make it peculiarly the province of the trier of the questions of fact to determine whether the defendants acted with due or reasonable diligence and with reasonable convenience and safety to others traveling over the highway in removing the wagon or in repairing the damage thereto so that it could be removed from the situation in which it was allowed to remain standing on the thoroughfare. The court was at liberty to find specifically, as impliedly it did find, these facts: That the wagon, large and heavily loaded with certain materials, which extended over or beyond its bed, was left standing at a slight angle on the highway, the front wheels being on the edge of the right side of the highway and the rear end nearer the center thereof; that the wagon was left standing in that condition and situation between the hours of 3 and 4 o'clock p. m. of the day of the accident and suffered to remain so standing until the following morning, without any real effort on the part of the defendants either to remove it or to make any earnest attempt to repair the injury to it so that it could be removed; that, notwithstanding the asseverations of the defendants to the contrary, there were facilities or means at hand (the tools constituting the portable blacksmith shop and the large boards or scantling which were a part of the equipment on the wagon) with which the brake could have been pried from the wheels and other repairs so made within a comparatively brief space of time as to have enabled them to remove the wagon from the concrete pavement to the dirt portion of the highway, thereby making the paved portion perfectly clear and safe for the usual travel; that, as a matter of fact, the wagon, in the first instance, could have conveniently been turned to and left standing on the dirt portion of the road; that, because of the position in which the wagon was left on the concrete pavement, passing autoists were, to be perfectly safe, compelled to leave the concrete and travel for the required distance over the unpaved portion of the highway to pass the point where the wagon stood; that, finally, and as the sum of all the foregoing considerations, the defendants did not exercise the proper diligence, under the circumstances as shown, to correct the damage to the wagon so that it could have been removed from the highway.

[5] The second point that, even if the act of the defendants in leaving the wagon on the highway as above explained constituted negligence, still the evidence shows that the proximate cause of the collision was due to an intervening independent act of negligence, is devoid of merit. As seen, it is the contention that the stirring up of the dust by the passing of Tabuchi's car to the left of the wagon and on the unpaved portion of the highway, with the result that the air was so impregnated with flying dust as to obscure plaintiff's vision, thereby preventing him from seeing the wagon or the lights suspended therefrom, constituted an intervening cause, wholly independent of the original or primary act of negligence, and which so arrested and displaced the primary or original act of negligence as to make it the sole proximate cause of the collision. But the circumstance of the stirring up of the dust was only a natural incident of the passing of automobiles or other vehicles over the highway. The highway in question was new, having been only recently completed, and over it, near its edges, was scattered fine dirt, not an uncommon way of leaving concrete highways immediately following their completion. Besides, as shown, the position of the wagon on the highway made it safer, if not absolutely necessary, to leave the concrete when passing the wagon and travel on the dirt portion. Naturally, under these circumstances, passing vehicles would be expected to cause dust to rise and becloud the air, and this condition would only be an essential incident of an act made necessary by the preceding wrongful act of the defendants. In other words, the defendants, by their own act of leaving the wagon on the highway as indicated, created a condition which itself was the direct cause of the flying dust and the consequent interruption of the plaintiff's vision so that he was prevented from seeing the wagon; and it was a condition or contingency so natural to arise under the circumstances that the defendants were bound and deemed to anticipate that it would happen.

The situation here with respect to the claim of a sufficient independent cause intervening to arrest or suspend the operation of the original act of negligence, etc., is, in the general aspect thereof, no different from that existing in the case of O'Connell v. United Railroads, 19 Cal. App. 36, 64, 124 P. 1022, and Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 503, et seq., 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134. In the O'Connell case the charge of negligence mainly relied upon was that the plaintiff, a youth of about the age of 16 years, was employed and put to work as a trolley tender on a work car owned and operated by the defendant. The boy had previously never had experience in such work and the defendant's agents, in charge of the car, failed to warn him, before he entered upon the discharge of the duties of trolley tender on an electric car, of the danger attending the performance of the duties to which thus he had been assigned. He was directed by the defendant's foreman to reverse the trolley, so that the car would take an opposite direction to that in which it had been moving, and, in doing so, the car being still in motion, the trolley was broken, causing him to lose his balance, so that he fell to the ground in front of the car, which partly passed over his body, whereby he sustained serious physical injuries. The claim was that the breaking of the trolley and not the failure of defendant's agents to warn the plaintiff of the perils of working in such a position was the proximate cause of the injury. To that contention this court made the following answer, which is of peculiar pertinency to this case as made by the evidence:

"The primary causation here could not, by its very nature, be otherwise than continuous, for it was the very germ from which the ultimate damage developed and without which there would perhaps have been no damage.

Its wrongfulness followed, permeated, and inhered in every subsequent act of the plaintiff in discharging his duties as a trolley tender, and the breaking of the pole was only a necessary ally in the production of the disastrous result which, in all reasonable probability, it was, from its very inception, destined to bring about."

In Merrill v. Los Angeles G. & Elec. Co., supra, in which the question in hand is learnedly considered and discussed, it is said:

"The original act of negligence, the primary causation, may be in its nature so continuous that the concurrent wrongful act precipitating the disaster will in law be regarded, not as independent, but as conjoining with the original act to create the disastrous result."

So here the original act of negligence by the defendants, as found by the court, was in its very nature necessarily continuous, and the stirring up of the dust just before plaintiff's car collided with the wagon merely conjoined "with the original (wrongful) act to create the disastrous result."

[6] The evidence is such that it was entirely with the trial court, as the arbiter of the issues of fact, to solve the question whether the plaintiff was or was not guilty of contributory negligence. There is nothing in the evidence which would justify the declaration, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff did not, under the circumstances, approach the point of collision with reasonable or the due amount of care. He was driving his car at a low rate of speed, not to exceed 17 miles an hour, and was about 50 feet in the rear of Tabuchi at the time the latter swerved to the left to pass around the wagon and, in doing so, stirred up the dust, thereby obstructing the vision of plaintiff so that he could not see any object on the highway before him; and this turning to the left by Tabuchi and consequent stirring up the dust was so instantaneous and so near the point where the wagon was standing that it is probably true—in fact, the court could well have specifically so found—that the plaintiff, notwithstanding the low rate of speed at which he was then driving, could not have stopped his car in time to avoid colliding with or running into the wagon. The plaintiff, as has been shown, testified that, because of the fact that Tabuchi's car was for a long distance in front of him and traveling north on the same side of the highway as he was and on the side on which the wagon was standing, his view ahead of him was so obstructed that he could not and did not at any time before Tabuchi turned to the left see a light or any lights hanging from the wagon or stationed at or near where the wagon stood. But it is further argued that, as Iwasa testified that he saw the wagon on the highway at the point where the collision occurred in the early part of the afternoon of the day of the accident, when he and plaintiff were passing over the highway on their way to the home of Harada, so it must be true that the plaintiff at the same time saw the wagon. There is no direct evidence that the plaintiff saw the wagon at the time referred to, nor is there any evidence that Iwasa, at the time, or at any time, made any remark to the plaintiff with respect to the circumstance of the standing of the wagon on the highway. The court could have concluded, as probably it did, that the plaintiff did not on that occasion see or notice the wagon, or that, if he did, it made no impression on his mind. But, if it were true that plaintiff did see the wagon at said time, and even noticed that it was disabled, still it does not necessarily follow therefrom that he was to assume or suppose that it would be allowed to remain standing on the highway for a period of six or seven hours, and in such a position as practically to obstruct the highway and so make it extraordinarily hazardous, particularly in the nighttime, to others traveling thereon. Thus briefly have we referred in a general way to the evidence bearing upon the charge that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately caused or contributed to the accident to confirm the statement substantially above made that the evidence addressed to that issue is such that, as to its effect, reasonable minds could reasonably differ; that, therefore, said evidence presented for the trial court's solution a question of fact; and that, consequently, the finding of the court on that issue is conclusive on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

195 Cal. 566

CITY PROPERTIES COMPANY, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA BOND & FINANCE CORPORATION (a Corporation), Defendant and Appellant. (L. A. 8523.) (Supreme Court of California. March 5, 1925.) In Bank. Motion to dismiss appeal by defendant from an order of the Superior Court of San Diego County; William P. Cary, Judge. Motion denied. Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant. Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This matter came before us at our last calendar in Los Angeles upon respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground of appellant's failure to file transcript within time. Counsel for appellant being actually engaged in the trial of a case in another county, was unable to be present at the hearing thereof, but forwarded by mail an affidavit in opposition to the motion. At the hearing respondent presented counter affidavits, and upon the showing thus made it appeared that appellant's bill of exceptions had been settled by the trial judge December 1, 1924, and that the transcript was not presented for filing until January 26, 1925, the return day of the motion, and long after the service of notice thereof. Upon this showing the motion was granted and the appeal dismissed. Within due time thereafter appellant petitioned for a rehearing of the order dismissing the appeal and also petitioned for relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, supporting the petition by affidavits, from which there appeared some material facts, the existence of which had not been ascertained by appellant at the time of the hearing on the original motion. The petition for rehearing was granted, and the matter is now before us upon respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal and appellant's application to be relieved from default. There is some conflict arising from the affidavits filed in these various proceedings, but the following facts are gathered therefrom without substantial contradiction: The order appealed from was made October 11, 1924, and defendant's notice of appeal therefrom was filed November 14. Appellant's proposed bill of exceptions upon appeal was served upon respondent November 19, and November 28 respondent delivered to appellant its proposed amendments thereto. Appellant refused to adopt the proposed amendments, and upon the same day he delivered to the clerk of the court for the judge who tried the case his proposed bill of exceptions and respondent's proposed amendments thereto. Both parties rested thereafter in the expectation that they would in due time receive notice from the clerk of the time set by the trial judge for the settlement of the bill of exceptions. No such notice was received by either party, and on January 8, 1925, respondent discovered from the record in the clerk's office that the bill of exceptions had been settled, without including therein any of respondent's proposed amendments thereto, on December 1, 1924. Respondent thereupon served and filed notice of motion to dismiss the appeal as aforesaid. It now transpires that through some mistake or inadvertence in the clerk's office appellant's proposed bill of exceptions was presented to the trial judge without the presentation to him of respondent's proposed amendments thereto and without advising him of the fact that amendments had been proposed thereto. Thereupon the trial judge, evidently believing that no amendments had been proposed to appellant's proposed bill of exceptions, settled the same as proposed by appellant without notice to either of the parties. Two things are apparent from this showing: First, that appellant's inactivity, while awaiting the receipt of notice from the clerk of the time fixed by the trial judge for the settlement of the bill of exceptions, may justly be regarded as excusable neglect; second, that the purported settlement of the bill of exceptions by the trial judge was not such a settlement thereof as the law contemplates in cases where amendments have been proposed thereto by respondent and have been rejected by appellant. The trial judge was misled by the circumstances into believing that no amendments had been proposed to appellant's proposed bill. It seems, therefore, that the relief sought herein by appellant should be granted, and that the trial judge will doubtless, upon proper application therefor, or upon his own motion, vacate the order heretofore made by him settling the bill of exceptions and will fix a time for the settlement thereof, at which time, and upon notice to the parties, he will either allow or disallow respondent's proposed amendments thereto as to him may seem proper. It is therefore ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal be and it is hereby denied.

fications of insufficiency of the evidence. The motion is supported by certified copies of a purported order of the superior court amending the engrossed bill of exceptions. It appears herein that on July 23, 1924, an engrossed bill of exceptions was stipulated to be correct by written stipulation of the parties appended thereto. On July 26, 1924, it was settled, allowed and certified to be correct by the judge who tried the case (Mr. Justice Knight, of the District Court of Appeal, formerly a judge of the superior court). Thereafter, on December 11, 1924, there was filed in the trial court an order purporting to amend said engrossed bill of exceptions nunc pro tunc as of July 26, 1924, by inserting therein specifications of insufficiency of the evidence. This order recited that it was made upon the ground that the specifications of insufficiency of the evidence had been omitted from the bill of exceptions through the mistake, inadvertence and excusable neglect of appellant, and the order was signed "Benj. K. Knight, Judge of Said Superior Court, Presiding at the Trial of the Case and Who Decided the Same." The specifications referred to in this order are the ones which are sought by this motion to be inserted in the printed transcript upon appeal, which was filed in this court October 24, 1924. The question of the validity and effect of the order purporting to amend the bill of exceptions may more conveniently and satisfactorily be considered and determined in connection with the consideration and determination of the appeal upon its merits. It is therefore ordered that the motion be granted, without prejudice to the later consideration upon this appeal of the question of the validity and effect of the order purporting to amend the bill of exceptions.

In re PERKINS' ESTATE. (L. A. 7946.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 2, 1925.)

1. Wills ⚡21, 53(2)—Actual mental condition of testatrix at time of execution of will is condition to be determined in will contest.

To contest a will on ground that deceased was of unsound mind, actual mental condition of testatrix at time of execution thereof is question to be determined, and her mental condition before or after execution is important only as tending to show mental condition at time of execution of will.

2. Wills ⚡52(1)—Contestants must show that testatrix was of unsound mind at time of execution of will to set it aside.

A person being presumed sane, burden is always on contestants of will to show affirmatively, and by preponderance of evidence, that testatrix was of unsound mind at time of execution thereof.

3. Wills ⚡52(3)—Proof of subsequent insanity of testatrix will not create nor carry presumption of its past existence.

In execution of wills, insanity of testatrix exists as matter of law only from time it is shown to exist, and proof of subsequent insanity will not create or carry a presumption of its past existence.

4. Wills ⚡31—Mental derangement sufficient to invalidate will, stated.

Mental derangement sufficient to invalidate a will must be insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally, or some specific and narrower form of insanity under which testator is victim of some hallucination or delusion, and such abnormality of mind must have had a direct influence on testamentary act.

5. Wills ⚡55(1)—Testatrix not shown to be of unsound mind at execution of will.

Contestants held not to have sustained burden of establishing that at execution of will testatrix was of unsound mind.

6. Wills ⚡55(10)—Dislike of relatives not necessarily proof of insanity sufficient to set aside will.

That a person dislikes his relatives with or without reason is not necessarily proof of insanity sufficient to set aside his will.

7. Wills ⚡31—Testamentary capacity not dependent on testatrix's ability to reason logically.

Testamentary capacity does not depend on testatrix's ability to reason logically or on her freedom from prejudice.

8. Wills ⚡38(3)—Testatrix not victim of insane delusion because mistakenly believing that relatives were unfriendly.

That testatrix mistakenly believed that relatives were unfriendly to her held not to warrant conclusion that she was victim of an insane delusion.

9. Wills ⚡50—Testatrix not insane because not dealing with relatives as generously as expected.

That testatrix did not deal as generously with her relatives as they hoped and expected was not proof of insanity.

10. Wills ⚡166(1)—Evidence held insufficient to show undue influence.

Evidence held insufficient to show undue influence in execution of will.

11. Witnesses ⚡200—Testimony of attorney relative to conversations with testatrix held admissible where not retained professionally.

In will contest, on ground of undue influence and lack of testatrix's mental capacity, court did not err in admitting testimony of attorney as to conversation between himself and testatrix relative to a proposed loan, and her appearance at the time, where there was no evidence that he was retained by testatrix professionally, and advice given was in nature of business rather than legal advice.

12. Evidence ⚡474(4)—Attorney held competent to testify as to sanity of testatrix.

Court did not err in permitting attorney with whom testatrix had business dealings as an intimate acquaintance to qualify as a witness concerning her sanity.

13. Evidence ⚡498½—Whether witness may testify as intimate acquaintance of testatrix is for court to determine.

In a will contest, whether witness may testify as an intimate acquaintance of testatrix, regarding her sanity, is a question of fact for trial court to determine.

14. Evidence ⚡498½—Court has wide discretion in determining whether witness may testify as intimate acquaintance to sanity of testatrix.

In will contest, court has wide discretion in determining whether witness may testify as an intimate acquaintance of testatrix concerning her sanity.

15. Appeal and error ⚡971(2)—Court's discretion in determining whether witness may testify as intimate acquaintance of testatrix not reviewable unless abused.

Court's discretion in determining whether witness may testify as intimate acquaintance of testatrix concerning her sanity is not reviewable unless such discretion is abused.

16. Evidence ⚡472(8)—Attorney held incompetent to give opinion as to testatrix's insanity.

In suit to contest will on ground of testatrix's lack of mental capacity, attorney with whom testatrix had business dealings held incompetent to give opinion as to her ability to clearly comprehend transaction of important business, such as execution of her last will and testament; he being a nonexpert witness.

17. Wills ⚡324(2)—Capacity of testatrix to make will is mixed question of law and fact.

Capacity of testatrix to make will is a mixed question of law and fact to be decided by jury under instructions of court.

18. Evidence —554—Admission of physician's testimony as to testatrix's capacity to execute will held not erroneous.

In suit to contest will on ground of testatrix's lack of mental capacity, court did not err in permitting physician, in response to long hypothetical question, to answer that he did not think that testatrix was of sound mind, but that he was not prepared to say whether she was insane at time of signing will.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Proceedings by Irving E. Bigelow, Jr., to probate the will of Clara Anna Perkins, sometimes known as Mrs. D. E. Perkins, deceased, opposed by Mattie Belle Fink and another. From judgment denying probate of will, proponent appeals. Reversed.

Ticknor, Carter & Webster and Wilton W. Webster, all of Pasadena, and Lincoln G. Backus, of Monrovia, for appellant.

Robert Brennan, of Los Angeles, and Miller, Kelly, Shuttleworth & McManus, by Jesse A. Miller, all of Des Moines, Iowa, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The decedent, Clara Anna Perkins, a widow, whose will is the subject of contest in this proceeding, died on the 26th day of October, 1922, at Monrovia, Cal., at the age of about 56 years. She left an estate, consisting of real and personal property, appraised, approximately, at $57,000. She left surviving her a sister, Mattie Belle Fink, and two brothers, Benjamin M. Bentley, who had been an invalid for some 20 years, and Frank G. Bentley. Mattie Belle Fink and Benjamin M. Bentley are the only contestants. They for many years lived in the city of Des Moines, Iowa. The decedent formerly resided there. She, with her husband, came to California some 10 years prior to her death. Frank G. Bentley, the non-contesting brother of the decedent, has lived in California for some 24 years. The death of the decedent was due to aneurism of the descending aorta and chronic neuritis. She was also a sufferer before her death, in a moderate degree, from nephritis or chronic Bright's disease.

The decedent by the provisions of her will devised and bequeathed to Mattie Belle Fink, her sister, $250; to Benjamin M. Bentley, her brother, $250; to two nieces and a grandnephew, $250 each; to Frank J. Bentley, her brother, $5,000; to the First Church of Christ Scientist of Monrovia, Cal., $1,000; to N. C. Carson and his wife of Monrovia, Cal., friends of the decedent, a house and lot in Monrovia; to Irving E. Bigelow, Jr., all of the rest and residue of the estate, which would approximate, after the payment of the debts of the decedent and funeral expenses, about $30,000. Irving E. Bigelow, Jr., the proponent of the will in the court below and appellant here, is a young man whom the decedent met some two years prior to her death while he was in military service stationed at the balloon school in Arcadia, Cal., and for whom the decedent had developed a strong attachment.

Upon the issues raised by the opposition to the probate of the will by Mattie Belle Fink and Benjamin M. Bentley, and answer thereto, the case was tried, with a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the contestants. The findings of the jury were to the effect that the decedent at the time of the making of her will was of unsound mind; that undue influence was exercised upon the decedent; and that her last will and testament was the product of such undue influence. From the judgment entered in accordance with this verdict, Irving J. Bigelow, Jr., named as residuary legatee in the will of the decedent, appeals.

In support of the appeal and as grounds for a reversal of the judgment it is urged that: (1) The evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury that the decedent was of unsound mind at the time of the making of the will; (2) the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury that the will in question was produced by undue influence; (3) the court erred in overruling objections to the testimony of a witness for the contestants, William B. Brown, an attorney at law; and (4) that the court erred in permitting the witness Charles L. Allen, over objection, to answer the hypothetical question propounded to him as to the sanity of the decedent.

[1-3] It is well settled that, upon the contest of a will on the ground that the deceased was of unsound mind, the actual mental condition of the testatrix at the time of the execution of the will is the question to be determined. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795; Estate of Little, 46 Cal. App. 776, 189 P. 818; Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085. Evidence as to mental condition before or after the execution of the will is important only in so far as it tends to show mental condition at the time of the execution of the will. The presumption is always that a person is sane, and the burden is always upon the contestants of the will to show affirmatively, and by a preponderance of the evidence, that the testatrix was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will. Estate of Dow, 181 Cal. 106, 183 P. 794; Estate of Little, supra; Estate of Allen, 177 Cal. 668, 171 P. 686; Estate of Casarotti, supra; Estate of Johnson, 152 Cal. 778, 93 P. 1015; Estate of Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 P. 172, 711. Insanity exists as a matter of law only from the time it is shown to exist and proof of subsequent insanity will not create nor carry a presumption of its past existence. Estate of Dolbeer, supra.

Every mental departure from the normal will not destroy a testamentary disposition, otherwise valid, of the testatrix's estate. It is not the rule of law that no person who is insane may make a valid will. The real rule is that the will of a person, who by reason of insanity is incapable of making valid testamentary disposition of his estate, shall not be upheld. Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130; Estate of Wasserman, 170 Cal. 101, 148 P. 931.

[4] Mental derangement sufficient to invalidate a will must be insanity in one of two forms: (1) Insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally; or (2) some specific and narrower form of insanity under which the testator is the victim of some hallucination or delusion. Even in the latter class of cases, it is not sufficient merely to establish that a testator was the victim of some hallucination or delusion. The evidence must establish that the will itself was the creature or product of such hallucination or delusion; that the hallucination or delusion bore directly upon and influenced the creation and terms of the testamentary instrument. The evidence must establish, in addition to the fact of the existence of the hallucinations or delusions, the fact that by reason of these hallucinations or delusions the testatrix devised or bequeathed her property in a way which, except for the existence of such delusions, she would not have done. In short, the abnormality of mind must have had a direct influence upon the testamentary act. Estate of Chevallier, supra; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 670, 164 P. 1110; Estate of Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 P. 794; Estate of Casarotti, supra.

[5] Applying these principles of law to the instant case, the conclusion is inescapable that the contestants have failed to sustain the burden of establishing the fact that at the time of the execution of the will the testatrix was of unsound mind. It was not shown that the particular form of mental unsoundness with which it is claimed the testatrix was at times afflicted bore directly upon and influenced her testamentary act. Disregarding any conflicting evidence and resolving whatever conflicts there may be in the evidence in favor of, and granting to the contestants every possible inference to be drawn from the evidence, there still remains a hiatus in the chain of proof that at the time of the execution of the will the testatrix was mentally incompetent or that she was at the time subject to delusions which in any manner affected her testamentary act.

Reduced to its real evidential purport, the evidence in support of the contestants' claim that, at the time of the execution of the will, the testatrix was of unsound mind may be summed up as follows: Upon the occasion of the visit of testatrix's sister to California four years prior to testatrix's death, the sister found that the testatrix's disposition was greatly changed; that she was highly irritable; the least thing upset her; financially she was extremely close, whereas she had previously been very generous. For at least a year prior to her death the testatrix at times suffered severe pain from intermittent attacks of neuritis; sometimes these attacks were so severe as to require a sedative, and sometimes they would pass off without the use of any sedative. The sedative consisted of from one-eighth to one-quarter of a grain of morphine and this was never administered more than twice a day. The night preceding the day of the execution of the will, one-fourth of a grain of morphine was administered to the testatrix, but none was administered to her on the morning she executed her will. Her arm was swollen and cramped. At times she would groan and call out in pain. She had on certain occasions a "starey" look in her eyes. At times she was delirious and subject to hallucinations. On one occasion she told her brother Frank Bentley that they were going to Europe and inquired if all of the trunks were packed; on another occasion that they were going to Iowa; and on yet another occasion she insisted that her nightdress was torn, whereas, in fact, it was not. Several days before her death she told the nurse who was in attendance that she was going to be married and asked her to see that no one used the telephone as she wished to call up her bridesmaids. At another time she told the nurse that the pictures had been taken down from the hooks on the wall in order that babies might be hung there. All of these hallucinations, so the testimony shows, occurred some five or six days prior to the signing of the will or some nine or ten days subsequent to the signing of the will. At times during her last illness she would call Frank Bentley "Benny," the name of the other brother. Although she was always suffering more or less, some days she would have a comparatively easy day and would converse and carry on ordinary and usual conversations and would conduct herself in all respects as a normal person. On two occasions, several months prior to her death, the testatrix called to see William Brown, an attorney, upon the feasibility of obtaining a loan of $18,000. Upon those occasions he explained to her that the interest actually amounted to 8 and 9 per cent.; that although in the circular of information on the subject the interest was set out as 6 per cent., it actually amounted to 8 or 9 per cent. because she was required to retire the principal in installments. He explained to her that it was a very inadvisable step for her to borrow the money to build bungalows on her property, but she seemed "unable to visualize it, or take a preview of the situation." He testified that upon the second visit she made no reference to her former visit, but commenced to explain the proposition to him as if he had not already advised her.

On the morning of the execution of the will, a short while after Dr. McKittrick, the attending physician and attesting witness departed from the house, the attending nurse upon entering the room found the testatrix "clear off." "She was either delirious or something else. She certainly was not all right. She was not quiet. She was talking incoherently." The will was signed by a mark instead of the signature of the testatrix. The testatrix several days after the execution of the will said to Mrs. Frank Bentley:

"I have not done right by Frank and Benny. Tell them not to be mad at me. It is just my little joke."

Within a day or so previous to October 10, 1922, the day on which the will was signed, the brother, Frank Bentley, had instituted proceedings to have a guardianship appointed for his sister and had had the papers served. Upon being informed by Mr. Backus, the testatrix attorney, that he and her Eastern relatives were provided for, he dropped the proceedings. The testatrix was at the time of her death suffering somewhat from chronic Bright's disease. In answer to a hypothetical question setting forth all of the above-mentioned facts, the testimony of Dr. Charles Allen was:

"I don't think she was of sound mind. As to the degree of her irrationality at that particular moment, I don't know; neither would I be prepared to say that she was insane at the moment of signing that will."

The evidence thus outlined does no more than show that the testatrix was mentally distressed and disturbed a short while after the making of the will. It does not show that she was of unsound mind in the legal acceptance of the term at the time of the making of the will. Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 P. 778; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932. And the question to be determined is not what might have been her mental condition, but what in fact was her mental condition at the time that she made the will. Estate of Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 275, 49 P. 172, 711.

The evidence absolutely fails to establish by sufficient evidence that the testatrix was afflicted with insanity of "such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally." On the contrary, the evidence is all to the effect that except on the occasions when she was suffering intensely from neuritis she was perfectly normal and rational. It likewise fails to establish the fact that the testatrix was suffering any specific or narrower form of insanity, hallucination, or delusion at the time of the making of the will which had a direct influence on the testamentary act. The evidence is that the hallucinations from which she suffered were in the nature of hallucinations arising from the paroxysms of pain caused by attacks of neuritis. The evidence shows that these attacks were not permanent but only temporary. Moreover, they were not of a character to influence the testamentary act. The hallucination that the testatrix was going on a trip to Iowa; that she was going on a trip to Europe; that there were holes in her night-dress and bedclothing; that she wished the use of the telephone reserved for calling up the bridesmaids for her wedding; that babies were hung on the wall in place of pictures—are obviously but the vagaries of a mind made delirious by the pressure of pain. No possible relationship between these delirious hallucinations and the testatrix's disposition of her property can be traced. The evidence falls short of establishing that such hallucination or delusion existed at the time of the execution of the will, or that the will was in the slightest degree the product or offspring of such abnormal condition.

At this point it may not be amiss to note that it is significant that the nurse who was in the room of the testatrix just prior to the execution of the will, and must have been in a position to know the condition of the testatrix at that vitally important time, failed to testify that the testatrix's condition was in any manner abnormal.

Moreover, the conclusion that the will was executed at a time when the testatrix was in possession of her normal faculties is strongly fortified by the fact that there is in the record proof of an olographic will made more than a year prior to the execution of the will in question, in which she made much the same disposition of her property. In a letter written by the testatrix at the time of the making of this olographic will she stated her reasons for making Mr. Bigelow her principal beneficiary to be that had he been her own son she could not have loved him more, and that by reason of his many kindnesses many happy hours had been added to her lonely life.

[6] Contestants, in support of their contention that the testatrix was of unsound mind generally, and at the time of the making of the will, rely chiefly upon the alleged "unwarranted" belief of the testatrix that her relatives were not interested in her and that they would be glad to hear of her death. This belief, it is argued, was an insane delusion, which resulted in an antipathy to her relatives and prompted and influenced her in the making of the will. The fact that a person dislikes his relatives, with or without reason, is not necessarily proof of insanity. As was said in Estate of Kendrick's Estate, 130 Cal. 360, 364, 62 P. 605, 607:

"Prejudices, dislikes, and antipathies, however ill founded, or however strongly entertained, cannot be classed as insane delusions, nor is every delusion an insane delusion."

[7] Care must be taken to differentiate between mere unreasonable opinions and mental derangements. Testamentary capacity does not depend upon the testatrix's ability to reason logically or upon her freedom from prejudice. A belief may be illogical or preposterous, but it is not therefore evidence of insanity. Estate of Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 67, 60 P. 527.

[8] The record in the instant case clearly and convincingly shows that this belief as to the lack of cordiality in the relations of herself and her eastern relatives was not a delusion in the usual and legal acceptation of the term. The existence of cordial relations depends upon the attitude of both parties. It may well have been that the sister, Mrs. Fink, entertained none but the most kindly feelings toward her sister. This is not incompatible with the fact that the testatrix may not have reciprocated those feelings. And if she did not, she was justified in her belief that cordial relations did not exist between herself and her sister. Mrs. Fink testified that there was no "serious" difficulty between herself and her sister. She did testify, however, that the testatrix had wanted the daughter of the witness, who had been raised in testatrix's home in Des Moines, to come and live with the testatrix in California, but that she (the witness) had refused to let her daughter do so because she did not want her daughter to be away from her and it was difficult for her to leave Des Moines. She also testified that she and the testatrix did have some disagreement about the care her mother was receiving. The record also shows that this belief of the testatrix that her sister did not care about her was entertained by the testatrix some six years prior to the making of her will. It was not, therefore, the sudden, inexplicable antipathy of an enfeebled intellect. Evidence introduced by contestants was to the effect that at the time of the existence of the belief the testatrix was a person of strong and vigorous mentality. The fact that Mrs. Fink was justified in not wanting her daughter to come to California has no bearing upon the question of whether or not from that fact the testatrix was justified in believing that her sister cared nothing about her. It often happens that a person thwarted in his desires imputes wrong motives to the one responsible. The fact that the relatives of the testatrix in their own minds held nothing but the most friendly feelings toward the testatrix will not suffice to warrant the conclusion that because the testatrix believed, mistakenly, perhaps, that the relatives were in fact unfriendly, she was the victim of an insane delusion. Estate of Calef, 139 Cal. 673, 675, 73 P. 539. If all mistaken beliefs were to be catalogued as delusions, few indeed would escape the stigma of insanity.

[9] Nor does the fact that testatrix left only $250 to her crippled brother in the east, toward whom she never manifested any but the most affectionate regard, tend to show that the will was an unnatural will and the testatrix of unsound mind. The evidence shows that she believed that she had adequately provided for her brother, aside from her will, by selling him the property on which he was living in Des Moines, which she valued at $12,000, for $3,100. In other words, having made other provisions for him, she did not deem it necessary to leave him a large amount in her will. The property of the testatrix was hers to dispose of as she willed, and the fact that she did not deal as generously with her relatives as they hoped and expected is not proof of insanity.

[10] It will not be necessary to discuss in detail the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of undue influence, for the reason that a careful and painstaking search of the record fails to reveal an iota of evidence as to any undue influence in the execution of the will. There is an utter lack of any proof of pressure brought to bear upon the testatrix which overpowered her mind and overcame her volition at the very time the will was made. In re Ricks' Estate, 160 Cal. 450, 117 P. 532.

[11-15] The court did not err in admitting the testimony of the witness for the contestants, William B. Brown, as to the conversation between himself and the testatrix relative to a proposed loan of $18,000 and her appearance at that time. Mr. Brown at the time he saw and talked with the decedent was a lawyer, but there is no testimony that he was retained by the testatrix then or at any other time in that capacity. It is true that he gave her advice, but it was in the nature of business rather than legal advice. Neither did the court err in permitting Brown, as an intimate acquaintance, to qualify as a witness concerning the sanity of the testatrix. Whether or not a witness may testify as an intimate acquaintance is a question of fact for the trial court to determine. That court is vested with a wide discretion, and its determination is not subject to review unless the court has abused its discretion. Such an abuse is not here shown.

[16, 17] The court did err, however, in permitting the witness to give his opinion as to the ability of the testatrix to clearly comprehend the transaction of important business such as the execution of her last will and testament. The effect of the question was to ask the opinion of the nonexpert witness as to the capacity of the testatrix to make a will. The capacity of testatrix to make a will is a mixed question of law and fact, to be decided by the jury under instructions of the court, and the opinion of the witness upon this question should have been excluded. Estate of Taylor, 92 Cal. 564, 28 P. 603; Estate of Russell, 189 Cal. 759, 772, 210 P. 249.

[18] We find no error in the ruling of the trial court permitting in evidence the testimony of Dr. Charles Allen, who replied, in response to a long hypothetical question framed to meet the views of the contestants:

"I don't think she was of sound mind. As to the degree of her irrationality at that particular moment, I don't know; neither would I be prepared to say that she was insane at the moment of signing that will."

The record failing to disclose any substantial evidence that at the time of the execution of the will the testatrix was of unsound mind, or that she was actuated by undue influence, the judgment must be reversed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. YAHNE. (Cr. 2769.)

1. Courts $\S$ 97(5)—Question whether requiring certificate of public convenience from one engaged in interstate commerce imposes burden on interstate commerce controlled by decisions of United States Supreme Court.

Contention that attempt to require operator of auto stage in interstate commerce, to obtain certificate of convenience, under St. 1917, p. 333, $\S$ 5, would constitute the imposition of a burden on interstate commerce, is a question arising under federal Constitution and laws as to which the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States is the ultimate authority.

2. Commerce $\S$ 62—Statute prohibiting operation of bus over state highways held unconstitutional as to those engaged solely in interstate transportation.

Auto stage and Truck Transportation Act (St. 1917, p. 330) requiring transportation companies to obtain from railroad commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity as condition precedent to use of highways is invalid as against one who is engaged solely in interstate commerce, as an unconstitutional invasion of field reserved by commerce clause.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Melville Yahne was convicted of operating an auto stage as a common carrier without having obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity, and he appeals. Reversed.

H. L. McAllister, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Carl I. Wheat and Woodward M. Taylor, both of San Francisco, for Railroad Commission.

PER CURIAM. Defendant herein was accused by information of a misdemeanor in violating the provisions of section 5 of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 330, c. 213). The violation charged consisted in the operation of an auto stage for the transportation of persons for compensation as a common carrier on the public highways of this state and over a regular route, without first having obtained from the railroad commission, as provided for by the act, a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity required such operation. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction. Defendant was engaged in the business of transporting passengers for hire from San Francisco, California, to Portland, Oregon, but he neither received nor discharged any passengers at intermediate points. He was engaged, therefore, solely in interstate transportation. As transportation is commerce, he contends that, inasmuch as he was engaged solely in interstate commerce, the state of California has no jurisdiction, through its railroad commission, over the transportation of persons or property for compensation upon the highways of this state, when such transportation is solely of an interstate character. He asserts, therefore, that he is not required and cannot be compelled to obtain from said commission the certificate of convenience and necessity provided for in the act in question, for the reason that such requirement and compulsion would constitute the imposition of a burden upon interstate commerce such as is beyond the power of the several states under the provisions of the federal Constitution and statutes.

[1, 2] The question thus presented is one arising under the federal Constitution and the laws of Congress enacted in pursuance thereof, as to which the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is the ultimate authority. Estate of Romaris, 191 Cal. 740, 745, 218 P. 421. At the time of the trial of this case in the court below and up to the time when the decision of the district court of appeal herein became final, the Supreme Court of the United States had rendered no decision upon the precise point involved herein, but since then that court has rendered two decisions which in our opinion are determinative of the present case. Buck v. Kuykendall (No. 345, Oct. term, 1924) 45 S. Ct. 324, 327, 69 L. Ed. —, and Bush & Sons Co. v. Maloy et al. (No. 185, Oct. term, 1924, decided March 2, 1925) 45 S. Ct. 326, 327, 69 L. Ed. —. Those decisions hold that while appropriate state regulations adopted primarily to promote safety upon the highways and conservation in their use may not be obnoxious to the commerce clause where the indirect burden imposed upon interstate commerce thereby is not unreasonable, nevertheless a statute whose primary purpose is not regulation with a view to safety or to conservation of the highways, and which determines not the manner of use but the persons by whom the highways may be used, is in effect a regulation of commerce and an unconstitutional invasion by the state of a field reserved by the commerce clause for federal regulation. Under these decisions we see no escape from the conclusion that the provisions of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, supra, which require transportation companies as therein defined to apply for and obtain from the railroad commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a condition precedent to the use of the highways of the state, are invalid as against one who is engaged solely in interstate transportation.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MURPHY. (Cr. 1215.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1925.)

1. Criminal law § 1192—Continuation of trial after noon on Saturday, and that indictment was signed by person other than foreman of grand jury, held not jurisdictional errors, authorizing annulment of judgment.

Alleged error, in that trial was continued after noon on Saturday, and that grand jury which presented indictment had been illegally selected, and that indictment had been signed by person other than foreman, held mere errors of law, requiring presentment on appeal, and not jurisdictional error, authorizing annulment of judgment after affirmance.

2. Criminal law § 1137(2)—Continuance of trial after noon on Saturday at suggestion of counsel for accused not matter for objection.

Where counsel for accused suggested that he laish examination of witness, continuation of trial after noon on Saturday held not grounds on which accused might maintain error; right to object having been waived.

3. Indictment and Information § 137(2)—Irregularities in method of impanelment of grand jury not grounds for setting aside indictment.

Objection going merely to method of impanelment of grand jury held not to disclose grounds for setting aside indictment, especially in view of Pen. Code, § 995, as amended by St. 1911, p. 435.

4. Criminal law § 1144(3)—Regularity of indorsement and signing of indictment by one not the foreman of grand jury presumed.

In view of Pen. Code, § 930, providing that grand jury may select member to act as foreman pro tem., if regular foreman cannot act, regularity of indorsement and signature of indictment by other than regular foreman will be presumed, in absence of any proof that he was not foreman pro tem.

Edmund Murphy was convicted of rape, and after affirmance appeals from orders denying motions to annul judgment. Affirmed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. There are two appeals being prosecuted by the defendant in this case, both having been taken from orders made after final judgment. Although said appeals come before us on separate records, we think the questions arising thereunder may be considered and disposed of in one opinion.

The appellant, Edmund Murphy, was convicted of the crime of rape, and upon appeal the judgment of conviction was, on July 12, 1921, affirmed. People v. Murphy, 53 Cal. App. 474, 200 P. 484. On August 9, 1924, a motion was presented to the trial court, on behalf of appellant, to annul said judgment upon the ground that part of the trial took place after the hour of 12 o'clock, noon, on Saturday, December 18, 1920. Upon hearing the evidence submitted by the respective parties, said motion was by the trial court denied. The defendant appealed. On October 6, 1924, a second motion was made for the annulment of said judgment upon the grounds that the grand jury which found and presented the indictment, upon which appellant was subsequently tried and convicted, had been illegally selected, drawn, and impaneled, and that said indictment had been indorsed "A true bill" and signed by a person other than the foreman of said grand jury. Said motion was, after a hearing, also denied, and from the order denying the same the defendant has appealed.

[1, 2] Irrespective of the merits of the contention made by appellant in support of these motions, we are of the opinion that the alleged errors complained of were not jurisdictional, but if errors at all, constituted nothing more than mere errors at law, which occurred prior to the pronouncement of judgment in the case and therefore should have been presented for review, along with the other assignments of error upon which the appeal was taken from the judgment, and we believe that the appeals now before us might be properly disposed of upon that ground; however, we have examined into the contentions made by appellant, and find that they would be unavailing to appellant, even if seasonably presented.

Regarding the claim that part of the trial took place after the noon hour on Saturday, December 18, 1920, the record discloses that upon arrival of the noon hour on that day the court called attention of appellant's counsel to the fact that it was 12 o'clock, to which appellant's counsel replied: "We will make no objection to finishing with this witness." The court then said: "All right. On motion of the defendant we will continue. * * *" Thereafter the witness, who was under examination by appellant's counsel, was asked only three short additional questions by appellant's counsel, and after some discussion between counsel the witness was excused, and one of the assistant district attorneys was sworn and testified as a witness on behalf of appellant. He was asked by appellant's counsel the single question as to whether or not he knew that certain criminal cases against another defendant charged with a like offense had been dismissed, to which he replied that he did. Such were all the proceedings had after the noon hour, except some discussion between counsel on both sides and the court, during which certain facts were stipulated, and the entire proceedings, according to matters set forth in the record, consumed no more than three or four minutes.

The precise question arising here came before this court in an appeal from the judgment in People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 167 P. 547, and it was there held:

"Conceding, but not deciding, that the court erred in proceeding with the trial into Saturday afternoon, still the defendant cannot be heard to complain of this, for his attorney, on his attention being called to the fact that the hour of noon had arrived, distinctly and in open court waived the right to object to the trial proceeding into the afternoon, and this is a matter in which the defendant's waiver is binding upon him. It falls within the same class of rights, upon the subject of waiver, as a right to be present at a view of the premises by the jury, the right to have the judge present at such view, and other similar rights, and in such cases it has been held that the right may be waived. People v. Mathews, 139 Cal. 527, 73 Pac. 416; People v. White, 5 Cal. App. 329, 90 Pac. 471; People v. Bird, 132 Cal. 261, 64 Pac. 259."

Applying the rule above stated to the situation in the instant case, it is manifest that the point urged by appellant is not, and even if taken advantage of at the proper time would not be, maintainable as error.

[3] With respect to the point urged on the second appeal, it is claimed that in the impanelment of the grand jury the names appearing on the second panel, of which there were 4, were resorted to in the completion of the jury before the 16 names appearing on the original panel were exhausted; in other words, that the 20 names appearing on both panels were deposited in the jury box together, and that the grand jury was selected therefrom, instead of first depositing and drawing the 16 names appearing on the first panel and then depositing the 4 names appearing on the second panel and completing the personnel of the grand jury therefrom; that, consequently, in drawing 19 names from the box, one name which appeared on the original panel was not drawn, and that person did not become a member of the grand jury.

It thus appears that appellant's objection goes merely to the method employed in the impanelment of the grand jury, and it is well established in this state, as was stated in People v. Hatch, 13 Cal. App. 521, 109 P. 1097, in which numerous cases are cited, that no irregularities in the formation and impanelment of the grand jury constitute grounds for setting aside an indictment; and this was true even prior to the amendment of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 435) to section 995 of the Penal Code, which substantially narrowed down the provisions of that Code section.

[4] The fact, if it be a fact, that said indictment was indorsed "A true bill," and signed by a member of the grand jury, other than the one whom the minutes of the court show was appointed and sworn as foreman when the grand jury was impaneled, indicates no error, for the reason that section 930 of the Penal Code provides:

"In the absence of the foreman of a grand jury from any meeting of the same or in the event of his disqualification to act, the grand jury may select a member of that body to act as foreman pro tem., who shall perform the duties of, and have all the powers of the regularly appointed foreman in the absence or disqualifications of such foreman."

In the absence of any proof to the effect that the member of the jury who indorsed and signed said indictment was not the foreman pro tem., we must presume in favor of the regularity of the proceeding. People v. Hatch, supra.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

IVES v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5056.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 13, 1925.)

Master and servant — 389—Compensation insurance carrier held entitled to credit for amount received by employee in settlement with third persons.

Where employee was awarded compensation against insurance carrier, and thereafter brought suit against third person for same injuries, and entered into purported compromise with such third persons, releasing them from liability for a stipulated sum, held that, whether such compromise was valid or not, and even if made without consent of Industrial Commission or court, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, and sections 30, subd. (f), and 57, Industrial Commission properly amended its original award, and credited insurance carrier with payment in full of its share of award.

Application for certiorari by George A. Ives against the Industrial Accident Commission and others to review order of Commission modifying award of compensation to petitioner for injuries. Award affirmed.

Ernest A. Clausen, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Redman & Alexander and R. P. Wisecarver, all of San Francisco, for other respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for a writ of review directed against the Industrial Accident Commission. On the 15th day of January, 1923, George A. Ives was engaged in grading and building a new road.

He was in the general employment of Costello & Ritchie, and in the special employment of J. P. Holland. While engaged in his employment, he was riding on a tractor. Costello & Ritchie were insured by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation. While so riding on the tractor, a truck operated by the San Francisco Motor Drayage Company ran into the tractor on which Ives was riding and injured him. At the time of the accident mentioned J. P. Holland was insured by the General Accident Fire & Life Assurance Corporation. On the 2d day of March, 1923, Ives filed his application for adjustment of his claim under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831). Thereafter the commission made an award against the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation and against the General Accident Fire & Life Assurance Corporation. Thereafter it made a supplemental award against the same corporations, and thereafter it made a second supplemental award for permanent disability against said corporations, and each of them, in the sum of $2,687.07, payable at the rate of $20.83 a week, beginning as of January 23, 1923, for 129 weeks, until the whole of said amount shall have been paid, and that the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, and General Accident Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, be credited with all compensation theretofore paid by them on account of temporary disability.

On the 27th day of April, 1923, Ives commenced an action in the superior court against the San Francisco Motor Drayage Company et al., in which suit Ives sought to recover damages from the defendants therein for the injuries sustained by him, and which injuries are the same as those hereinabove referred to. On January 18, 1924, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation joined in said suit as a party plaintiff. Thereafter Ives, as the plaintiff in said action, entered into a purported compromise agreement with the defendants in said action, by the terms of which he attempted to release said defendants from all liability for the sum of $1,727.35. At the same time defendants in said action paid to the General Accident Fire & Life Assurance Corporation the sum of $872.65, and tendered a like sum to the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, but it refused to accept the tender. The total payments made or tendered being $3,472.65. On the 26th day of May, 1924, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation filed with the commission an application for a rehearing and set up the purported compromise as newly discovered evidence and asked for relief. Later a rehearing was granted and the commission made a supplemental award purporting to amend its award of May 14, 1924, so that the same, among other things, provided:

"It is further ordered that defendant Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation be and it is hereby credited with payment in full of its share of the supplemental award entered herein on May 14, 1924."

The petitioner does not challenge the figures as being incorrect, but the exact attack made by the petitioner is:

"That in making said amended supplemental award of September, 1924, in so far as it credits Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, with payment in full or in part of its share of the supplemental award made by the commission of May 14, 1924, the Industrial Accident Commission acted without and in excess of its powers. * * *"

Elaborating his contention in his brief, the petition says:

"It is conceded that the settlement made by the petitioner in full satisfaction of his claim in said action was without the written consent of either the commission or the court in which such action is pending. If, therefore, for that reason said settlement was invalid as provided by section 26 of said act, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, which is now the sole plaintiff in such action, can proceed to trial, and none of the defendants in such action can avail himself of the defense that one of the plaintiffs, to wit, the petitioner, had compromised his claim and dismissed the action as to him, such settlement being declared invalid by section 26 of said act."

As we view the rights of the parties, it seems to be unnecessary to determine whether the purported compromise was valid or invalid. It was one or the other. Let us suppose that it was valid, and that this petitioner received the sum of $3,472.65, and now holds the same. Then and in that event it is provided by statute:

"* * * The court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against any judgment recovered by the employee the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation. * * *" Section 26, Workmen's Compensation Act, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920.

And it is also provided that an insurance carrier, under the facts above recited, "shall be subrogated to all the rights and duties of such employer and may enforce any such rights of its own name." Section 30, subd. (f), Workmen's Compensation Act. From a comparison of the awards and the compromise, it will be noted that the employer and the insurance carrier, under the foregoing statutes, would be entitled to be wholly reimbursed under their first lien. Let us assume, on the other hand, that the compromise was not in the form of a judgment, and that it was made without the consent of the commission and without the consent of the court. No reason appears why the employers, or the insurance carriers, might not waive the irregularity and assert their rights against the moneys received under such circumstances, but every reason appears why they should be entitled to assert their rights. Whether the settlement was made in the statutory mode or otherwise is a question in which the tort-feasor may be greatly interested but in which the employer or his insurance carrier has no concern.

The manner in which the commission handled the compromise seems to have been in every respect according to approved forms and procedure. No statutory provision has been cited to us prescribing the particular form of procedure for the purpose of disposing of such a question, but it is provided:

"The commission shall have full power and authority: (1) To adopt reasonable and proper rules of practice and procedure. * * *" Section 57, Workmen's Compensation Act.

To us it seems clear that the rule of practice and procedure followed in this instance was reasonable.

The award is affirmed.

In re SNYDER'S ESTATE.

SNYDER v. RILEY, State Controller.

(Civ. 4852.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1925.)

1. Taxation ⚡893—Circumstances justifying inference that grantor was actuated by contemplation of death sufficient to sustain finding that transfer subject to collateral inheritance tax.

Though burden is on state to show that transfer is subject to collateral inheritance tax, under Inheritance Tax Act of 1921, it is not necessary that one making transfer should have made direct statement of his motives, but, if circumstances shown are such as might justify inference that grantor was actuated by contemplation of death, it is sufficient to sustain finding to that effect.

2. Taxation ⚡879(1)—In "contemplation of death" does not require transfer to be made with sense of impending death.

The phrase "in contemplation of death," as used in Inheritance Tax Act of 1921, does not mean that transfer in order to be taxable must be made with sense of impending death.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contemplation of Death.]

3. Taxation ☞893—Mere fact that transferor is advanced in years, and not in good health, is not alone sufficient to prove transfer in contemplation of death.

Mere fact that one is much advanced in years, or not in good health, is not alone sufficient to prove that transfer made by him was made in contemplation of death, within Inheritance Tax Act of 1921; and, if it appears that interests having relation to ordinary affairs of life rather than death constituted controlling consideration for making transfer, it will not be subject to tax.

4. Taxation ☞893—Evidence held to sustain finding that conveyance by mother to son was made in contemplation of death.

Evidence held to sustain finding that conveyance of property by mother to son was made in contemplation of death, within Inheritance Tax Act of 1921, and subject to collateral inheritance tax, as against contention of son that it was merely consummation of much earlier contract.

5. Taxation ☞893—Finding that deed of transfer was gift deed immaterial, where evidence clearly warranted finding that transfer was without adequate consideration.

Where evidence clearly warranted finding that conveyance of property by mother to son was made without adequate consideration, as defined by Inheritance Tax Act 1921, § 2, and hence was subject to collateral inheritance tax, further finding that deed of transfer was a "gift deed" was immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Proceeding by Ray L. Riley, State Controller, to subject transfer made by Jennie W. Snyder, deceased, to collateral inheritance tax, contested by John W. Snyder. From order imposing inheritance tax, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, for appellant.

Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This appeal is taken by John Whiteley Snyder, a son of the decedent Jennie W. Snyder, from an order of the superior court of San Diego county, imposing upon him an inheritance tax of $7,500 because of a conveyance made to him by his mother, prior to her death, of certain real property, here briefly designated as the Snyder Block. The same order fixed a tax of $17,377.78 to be paid by him on other properties to which he has succeeded under her will. The correctness of this portion of the order is undisputed. The contest in the court below and the object of this appeal is to determine whether or not the conveyance inter vivos of the mother to the son falls within the provisions of the Inheritance Tax Act, St. 1921, p. 1500. It is the contention of the grantee that it does not, for the reason that it was not made in contemplation of death. That it took effect in possession and enjoyment before the death of the grantor is not disputed.

The court found, however, that the conveyance was made in contemplation of death and without adequate or valuable consideration. The contention on which this appeal is based is that such finding is entirely unsupported by the evidence.

The deed of conveyance in question was executed on the 24th day of November, 1922. Mrs. Snyder died on the 9th day of January, 1923. The property covered by this deed comprised less than one-tenth of her estate. She did not make a will disposing of the large residue of her property until January 2, 1923.

The court found that the deed, although dated November 24, 1922, was not delivered until a few days thereafter; that the transfer of said Snyder Block by decedent to her said son, and all negotiations and agreements in relation or appertaining to the transfer thereof, were made without valuable or adequate consideration and, within the purview of the Inheritance Tax Act of California, in contemplation of the death of the grantor; that no consideration was paid by the grantee or by any other person on his behalf to the grantor for said property. The court further found that for a period of one year immediately prior to decedent's death she was ill and suffering from a fatal ailment from which she died, and that said decedent at the time of the making of said deed, to wit, November 24, 1922, and at all times thereafter, realized the seriousness of her condition and was fully aware during all of said time of the mortal character of said ailment.

The Inheritance Tax Act of 1921 provides for the imposition of the tax upon a transfer of property (when not exempt under certain conditions not applicable here)—

"when the transfer is of property made by a resident * * * by deed, grant, bargain, sale, assignment or gift, made without valuable and adequate consideration (i. e., a consideration equal in money or in money's worth to the full value of the property transferred): (a) In contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, assignor or donor."

It is further provided therein that the words "contemplation of death," as used in the act—

"shall be taken to include that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and in nowise shall said words be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person making a gift causa mortis; and it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

Appellant contends that there is nothing shown in the evidence to indicate that Mrs. Snyder contemplated a fatal termination of her malady, or was governed or influenced thereby in any management of her business or disposition of her property up to within a few days of her death. Appellant concedes that the testimony of the witness Mrs. Clarkson, notwithstanding that there is conflicting evidence, "is possibly sufficient to render immune from review the finding of the court that Mrs. Snyder's health was failing during the year prior to her death." We think that the evidence of that witness is sufficient to sustain that finding, not only concerning the fact of serious illness, but to include the further fact that Mrs. Snyder knew that she was in failing health. Mrs. Clarkson lived with Mrs. Snyder for about four years immediately prior to Mrs. Snyder's death. Mrs. Clarkson was one of the household from October 6, 1918, until March 5, 1923. She testified that during the last year Mrs. Snyder's health failed rapidly, and that Mrs. Snyder told her that she had kidney trouble and dropsy. She saw Mrs. Snyder at the hospital many times between the 4th of November, 1922, when Mrs. Snyder for the last time went to the hospital, and the time of her death at that place. We are satisfied that there is evidence sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that at the time of making said deed, to wit, November 24, 1922, and at all times thereafter, decedent realized the seriousness of her condition and was fully aware during all of said time of the mortal character of said ailment. According to the certificate of death, Mrs. Snyder's physical ailments included a chronic disease of the kidneys, and her age was 77 years. While it appears that she did not execute a will until one week before her death, it also is in evidence that during the preceding two years she had taken counsel on that subject, and had caused certain outlines or drafts of a will to be prepared for her.

But appellant then says that, even conceding that his mother was contemplating death at the time when the deed was executed, yet the execution thereof was not an act done in contemplation of death, because the transaction was one which merely carried into effect a previous contract which had been entered into months earlier, and that both parties had entered into the performance, and in part had performed, the conditions of that contract.

[1, 2] The evidence discloses that appellant was a teacher, and had been living away from San Diego county; that for several years Mrs. Snyder had been making efforts to induce appellant to give up this work as a teacher and assist her in the management of her property. There is evidence that she had expressed an intention to give the Snyder Block to appellant if he would comply with her wishes concerning these matters. This he did not do until August, 1922. It is admitted by him that in thus changing his plans he did so partly because of the realization of his mother's advancing years and failing strength. Assuming this to be so, it may well be that Mrs. Snyder on her part was also influenced by her own knowledge of her advancing years and failing strength. And, if this be so, it is a much shorter step to infer that, together with the contemplation of her age and weakness, she also was thinking of the end of life, or, in other words, was acting in contemplation of death. We are not unmindful of the rule that the burden of showing that a transfer is subject to a collateral inheritance tax is upon the state. Estate of Minor, 180 Cal. 291, 294, 180 P. 813, 4 A. L. R. 456. But it is not necessary that the decedent should have made a direct statement of her motives. If the circumstances shown are such as in the mind of a reasonable man might justify the inference that, in coming to an agreement with her son, as well as in making said deed, she was actuated by the contemplation of death, that will be sufficient to sustain the court's finding to that effect, for of course it is well understood that on appeal this court will not undertake to decide the fact contrary to evidence and inferences therefrom which are thus justified. The phrase "in contemplation of death," as used in the statute, does not mean that the transfer, in order to be taxable, must be made with a sense of impending death. Estate of Pauson, 186 Cal. 358, 364, 199 P. 331. A will is made in contemplation of death, but not necessarily, or even most frequently, under pressure of the knowledge that death is near.

[3] The mere fact that a person is much advanced in years or not in good health is not alone sufficient to prove that a transfer made by him of his property was made in contemplation of death. If it sufficiently appears that interests having relation to the ordinary affairs of life, rather than death, constituted the primary and controlling consideration for the making and ultimate consummation of an agreement to transfer property, the transfer will not be subject to the tax. Estate of Minor, 180 Cal. 291, 180 P. 813, 4 A. L. R. 456. In the cited case the transfer in question was made pursuant to an antenuptial agreement, and was held to be not made in contemplation of death, notwithstanding that the transferor was 78 years old at the time of the marriage; that, the controlling consideration of the transfer being the marriage, that circumstance necessarily excluded the idea that a desire to make a testamentary disposition was in a substantial sense a direct cause of the transfer.

In the case at bar, appellant relies upon the principles announced in the Minor Case, merely substituting an agreement of a different nature for the antenuptial agreement in the Minor Case. The argument is that, an oral agreement having been made between the mother and son, and the parties having entered upon the performance thereof, and appellant having entered upon the possession and enjoyment of the transferred property as early as October, 1922, the intention of Mrs. Snyder, and the motives and purposes which controlled her mind in making the transfer, must be deemed to be the intention, purposes, and motives which existed at and prior to the making of said oral agreement, and not those additional considerations which may have arisen in her mind at the time of actual execution of the deed in the latter part of November; that the court's finding that the decedent, on November 24, 1922, and at all times thereafter, realized and was aware of the mortal character of her ailment, implies that the same condition of her mind in relation to that subject did not exist prior to that date; that before November 24th, notwithstanding that she knew (as shown by the testimony of Mrs. Clarkson) that she had "kidney trouble" and other physical ailments, that fact, taken by itself alone, is without force as evidence that the agreement which she made with her son, including the promise to convey to him the Snyder Block, was an agreement made in contemplation of death.

[4] Nevertheless, we think that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court. In addition to the facts to which we have referred, there are other items of evidence such that, when all are considered together, they reasonably justify the inference that the probability of her death in the near future, as indicated by age and disease, was an important moving cause of the agreement and transfer. In delivering the deed, she asked that it be not recorded. In writing to her son, in March, 1922, Mrs. Snyder said:

"Once again I ask you if you will consider trying to look after our interests here at a salary equal to what you would receive elsewhere. I don't like the idea of turning it over to a trust or to real estate man."

The letter did not mention the Snyder Block. When, some months later, appellant accepted employment by his mother, his salary was computed and paid on the same basis which that letter suggested. The court might reasonably infer that in the mind of Mrs. Snyder her transfer of the Snyder Block to appellant was a gift, and not a compensation for services to be performed by the grantee. And, if she thought of the intended transfer as a gift, then, under the conditions which were well understood by her, there is reason in the conclusion that the transfer was made "in contemplation of death." Perhaps the opposite inference, from the facts proved, would have been so far within reason that if it had been adopted by the trial court it would have been sustained. But, assuming this to be so, we have a finding upon conflicting evidence, upon an issue of fact, concerning which reasonable and unprejudiced minds might differ; a finding which therefore must be sustained because it rests upon sufficient evidence.

[5] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that the deed of transfer was a "gift deed," made without any consideration paid therefor. But it is conceded by appellant that if this finding had been confined to a declaration that the conveyance was made without the adequate consideration defined by section 2 of the Inheritance Tax Act ("a consideration equal in money or in money's worth to the full value of the property transferred"), he might not feel justified in disputing its legal correctness. Of course, this is a fair admission, since the evidence clearly warranted the court in finding that the conveyance was made without adequate consideration as thus defined. This being so, it is comparatively unimportant that the court determined that the transfer was made by a gift deed.

The order is affirmed.

O'GORMAN et al. v. WACHTER.
(Civ. 2887.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 13, 1925.)

Venue $\Rightarrow$ 5(3)—Vendor's action for recovery of purchase price of real property is a "transitory action," and must be tried in county of defendant's residence.

An action by vendor for recovery of purchase price of land agreed to be sold is not a local action for recovery of real property or an interest therein, under Code Civ. Proc. § 392, subd. 1, but is a "transitory action," within purview of section 395, and must be tried in county where defendant resides.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Transitory Action.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by Timothy O'Gorman and another against Herman Wachter. From an order denying defendant's motion for change of venue, he appeals. Reversed.

Ernest Torregano, of San Francisco (Morgan V. Spicer, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Hilliard Comstock, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Defendant appeals from an order of the superior court of the county of Sonoma, denying his motion for a change of venue.

The record shows that on or about the 5th day of June, 1923, the plaintiffs, then the owners of certain parcels of land situate, lying, and being in the county of Sonoma, entered into an agreement with the defendant, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to sell, and the defendant agreed to buy, said parcels of land, and to pay therefor the sum of $12,750. This agreement provided for the payment of said sum in installments. All of said payments were due prior to the beginning of this action.

Payments not having been made according to the agreement hereinbefore referred to, the plaintiffs brought this action to recover the entire purchase price of $12,750, and in their complaint alleged tender of conveyance to the defendant, and also set forth their willingness to deliver to the defendant a good and sufficient deed of conveyance transferring to said defendant a clear title to the premises described in the agreement, and demanded judgment against the defendant in the sum of $12,750, to be paid upon delivery by plaintiffs to said defendant of such conveyance. The defendant, being a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, upon making his appearance in said cause, filed therewith a demand for a change of the place of trial of said action from the county of Sonoma to the city and county of San Francisco, and supported his demand with a good and sufficient affidavit as to his residence in the city and county of San Francisco, and, also, as to the other requirements necessary to be set forth in an affidavit supporting a demand for a change of venue. No question is made as to the sufficiency of the pleadings upon which the defendant based his demand for a change of venue, the only question involved being as to whether the cause set forth in plaintiffs' complaint is local or transitory. If local, the motion was properly denied. If transitory, the order of the trial court must be reversed.

These questions involve sections 392 and 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Subdivision 1 of section 392 provides that actions for the recovery of real property, or of an interest or estate therein, or for the determination in any form of such right or interest and for damages to real property, must be tried in the county where the land is situated; and section 395, supra, specifies that all other actions must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside.

It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs that this action comes within the terms of subdivision 1 of said section 392, and on the part of the appellant that section 395 applies and that the action should be tried in the county of the defendant's residence.

The complaint in this case is in the usual form of a complaint for the recovery of the purchase price of the land agreed to be sold. There is nothing in the complaint which asks for any relief concerning the premises, or which affects the title thereto, or any interest or ownership therein. The plaintiffs allege their willingness and readiness to tender and deliver to the defendant a good and sufficient deed of conveyance therefor, upon receipt of the purchase price agreed to be paid. It is true that the prayer of the complaint asks that the court specifically enforce the agreement herein referred to. This, however, is nothing more than praying that the court enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $12,750, the agreed purchase price. The judgment of the court to be entered in this case would not constitute any lien upon the premises, or require the plaintiffs to do anything in relation thereto which they have not already offered to do, to wit, to make conveyance. In this respect, this action is the exact opposite of the case upon which the plaintiffs rely, i. e. Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 P. 120. In that case, the plaintiff in the action was a vendee seeking to compel a conveyance of the land agreed to be purchased and asking, in addition thereto, an accounting of the proceeds thereof, and directly called for a judgment and decree of the court compelling a transfer of the title to the premises involved from the defendant to the plaintiff, and consequently necessarily involved the determination of the right and interest of the parties in and to the real property covenanted to be sold and conveyed.

In the present action, no question is presented involving any lien of the vendor upon the premises, and therefore differs directly from those cases where partial payments have been made and the vendor seeks either a judgment canceling the vendee's rights under the contract, and further adjudicating that the vendor is entitled to retain all the payments, or adjudging that the lands be sold to pay the balance remaining due upon the premises, or that the vendor's title be quieted as against any claim of the vendee thereto, such for instance, as was involved in the case of Robinson v. Williams, 12 Cal. App. 515, 107 P. 705. In that case, relied upon by the respondent herein, the purpose was not to obtain a judgment for the purchase price, but was, as the court said, "only to cancel the written instrument and quiet the vendor's title as against any claim that might be made by the vendee, or any of his assigns." It was further stated in that case that the character of the action is to be determined by the complaint, and not merely by the relief prayed for. Being essentially an action to quiet title and cancel an instrument that might become a cloud thereon, it necessarily falls within the terms of subdivision 1 of said section 392, Code of Civil Procedure.

That an action which involves merely the recovery of the purchase price of real estate is essentially an action for a debt the same as one founded upon a promissory note, and therefore transitory and not local, has been frequently adjudicated in this state as well as in other jurisdictions. Referring to cases outside of California, we find the rule well stated in Kerr, etc., v. Nygren, 114 Minn. 268, 130 N. W. 1112, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 538, where it is said:

"It is not necessary, in an action by the vendor for specific performance, that the land, the subject-matter of the contract sought to be enforced, be within the jurisdiction of the court, though the rule is different where the vendee seeks performance by decree of court. In such a case the court cannot decree a transfer of the title of land beyond its jurisdiction; but where the vendor brings the action, the whereabouts of the land is immaterial. The action is personal, and operates upon the person of defendant. The court requires a delivery to him of a valid conveyance of the land, and decrees that he thereupon pay the purchase price. 36 Cyc. 771 et seq., and cases cited; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 132; Fall v. Eastin, 215 U. S. 1, 30 Sup. Ct. 3, 54 L. Ed. 65, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 924; Garden City Co. v. Miller, 157 Ill. 225, 41 N. E. 753; Potter v. Hollister, 45 N. J. Eq. 508, 18 Atl. 204; Walsh v. Selover Bates & Co., 109 Minn. 136, 123 N. W. 291; Hawkins v. Ireland, 64 Minn. 339, 67 N. W. 73, 58 Am. St. Rep. 534."

In the case of Samuel v. Allen, 98 Cal. 406, 33 P. 273, in an action by a vendor upon a contract of sale prosecuted in Fresno county, the land being situate in the county of Los Angeles, the court, speaking through Justice Temple, thus described the character of the action:

"It is true that in some sense the vendor has a lien on the land for the portion of the purchase money which remains unpaid, and that it has been held that until a conveyance has been made the lien constitutes such security as will prevent the creditor from suing out an attachment, but it has also been uniformly held that such contract does not establish the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee. There is therefore no statutory prohibition upon the right to a personal action to enforce the debt when it becomes due. The action is for money due, as much so as though suit were upon a promissory note. It is not therefore a local action, and the court in Fresno county has jurisdiction, although the land which is the subject of the contract is in Los Angeles county."

The ruling of the trial court that the action was local rather than transitory was consequently reversed.

791, where the same questions were presented, the court reaffirmed its holding in Samuel v. Allen, supra, quoting with approval the language which we have just set forth. In North Stockton, etc., v. Fischer, 138 Cal. 100, 70 P. 1082, 71 P. 438, it was again held that a vendor, under a written contract of sale, who had demanded payment of the residue of the purchase price, might maintain an action for the balance due, after having tendered the deed, and recover the same, as in an action to recover a debt. In Herman Kraft Co. v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 73, 73 P. 745, the court again reaffirmed its holding in the case of Samuel v. Allen, supra, that an action could be maintained by a vendor for the purchase price without having resort to the lien retained by him as security for such payment. That an action for the purchase price is not purely local and does not involve anything embraced within the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, the case of Gallup v. Sac., etc., Drainage Dist., 171 Cal. 71, 151 P. 1142, is directly in point. In that case, an agreement had been made between the property owners and the drainage district settling the amount to be paid by the drainage district to the property owner. The action was begun in Yolo county. The situs or residence of the defendant was in Sacramento county. The defendant demanded a change of venue. This was denied. The court held, citing the cases to which we have referred, that it was merely an action for the recovery of money and—

"In view of the allegations of the complaint, construed in the light of the provisions of the act, we are of the opinion that the action cannot be held to be one for injuries to real property within the meaning of section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The order of the trial court denying a change of venue was reversed. The Appellate Court of this state, Second District, in Paramore v. Colby, 45 Cal. App. 559, 188 P. 72, cited many authorities and held that "it appears to be settled law that such an action brought merely to recover money due on the contract is an action at law." In that case, the action was brought by the vendor to recover unpaid installments due upon the purchase price of lands on a contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant. In Amaranth Land Co. v. Corey, 182 Cal. 66, 186 P. 765, in an action brought by a vendor for the purchase price of lands, the cases which we have cited were affirmed, and the court again said:

"A vendor retaining the legal title to land sold may waive his security and bring an action at law for the purchase money, or file his bill in equity for the specific performance of the contract."

The action in that case was held to be simply an action for a debt due. If the action were one for specific performance, the remedy in this case would be by the court laying hold of the defendant and compelling him to perform the covenants of his contract, which, of course, under the decisions which we have cited herein, is a mere personal action as against him and is enforceable against the defendant personally, or by judgment of debt against his property, and does not in any wise trench upon the title of the land agreed to be sold. The court does not deal with it in such case. It deals only with the defendant and requires him to perform the covenants of his agreement, to wit, pay the amount of the purchase price. It follows from what we have said, based upon the authorities cited, that the action in the instant case is purely transitory and not local, and the defendant having made such showing as the statute requires clearly establishing his residence in the city and county of San Francisco, at the time of the institution of this action, at the time of the service of summons, and also at the time of his demand for a change of venue, the order of the trial court should have directed such change.

The order of the trial court denying the defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial is hereby reversed.

Criminal law $\S$ 633(2) — Statute, providing that clerk in reading information to jury shall omit all that relates to previous conviction, held not violated.

Pen. Code, $\S$ 1093, subd. 1, providing that, where defendant has confessed previous conviction, clerk in reading information to jury shall omit all reference thereto, held not violated, where district attorney, after reading portion of information pertaining to offense for which defendant was being tried, continued, "and doth furthermore charge that prior to commission of offense," when he was then interrupted by court and proceeded no further.

Louis J. Hardie, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of a felony, to wit, the passing of a fictitious check with intent to defraud. The defendant pleaded "not guilty," but confessed to a previous conviction for a similar offense, which previous conviction was also charged in the information.

Subdivision 1 of section 1093 of the Penal Code provides that where the defendant has confessed the previous conviction the clerk, in reading the information to the jury, "shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction."

The only point made upon appeal is that there was a violation of the aforementioned provision of section 1093, Penal Code. The point is entirely without merit, for the record discloses that the district attorney, after reading the portion of the information which pertains to the offense for which the defendant was then and there being tried, continued reading as follows: "And the said district attorney doth furthermore charge that prior to the commission of the offense. * * * He was then interrupted by the court and proceeded no further. Appellant contends that the judgment against this defendant should be reversed because of the reading of this incomplete sentence, which made no reference at all to the previous conviction charged in the information. The mere statement of the objection demonstrates its triviality.

The judgment is affirmed.

FRANKFORT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5015.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 19, 1925.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 27—Person sentenced to state prison held convicted of felony.

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 17, one sentenced to state prison for violating Corporation Securities Act, $\S$ 14, was convicted of felony, notwithstanding offense would have been misdemeanor if other punishment had been imposed under statute.

2. Bail $\S$ 53—Court may increase amount of bail without preliminary notice to defendant.

Even if Pen. Code, $\S$ 1289, be applied to admission of bail after judgment, court's authority to increase amount of bail does not depend on giving preliminary notice to defendant.

3. Bail $\S$ 42—Granting bail after conviction of felony is matter of discretion and not of right.

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1272, granting bail after conviction of felony is matter of discretion and not of right.

Original application for writ of mandate by Norman B. Frankfort against Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Carlos S. Hardy, Judge, to require approval of an undertaking for bail. Writ denied.

Max Schleimer, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate, to require respondent court, and the judge thereof, to approve an undertaking of bail. The petitioner was convicted upon an indictment charging him with the commission of certain acts in violation of the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws [1923 Ed.] Act 3814). The offense was such that, under the provisions of section 14 of this act, the defendant might be punished—

"by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in a county jail not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The sentence pronounced against the defendant was that he be confined in the state prison at San Quentin until discharged according to law. This was in accordance with the indeterminate sentence law.

"A felony is a crime which is punishable with death or by imprisonment in the state prison. Every other crime is a misdemeanor. When a crime, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, is also punishable by fine or imprisonment in a county jail, in the discretion of the court, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison." Pen. Code, § 17.

[1] The effect of section 17 is that the defendant must be deemed to have been convicted of a felony, notwithstanding that the offense would have been reduced to the grade of misdemeanor if the judgment had imposed a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison.

[2] The petition herein alleges that petitioner, as defendant in said criminal action, appealed from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, and a certificate of probable cause was allowed on said appeal. Thereupon the defendant applied to be admitted to bail pending the appeal. The court granted the application, and fixed the amount of bail pending said appeal at $10,000 in cash, or an undertaking executed by a surety company in that amount. Contending that the court had no authority to so limit the kind of bail to be given and thereby to exclude defendant from furnishing bail by two or more qualified freeholders, he offered to the court an undertaking in the sum of $10,000, executed by several freeholders and householders who, so it is alleged, justified by testifying before the court that they were worth sums which, in the aggregate, amount to $42,100 over and above all debts and liabilities and property exempt from execution. The petition states that the court refused to amend its order so as to provide for the acceptance of freeholders as sureties on said undertaking. By an affidavit which accompanies and is annexed to the petition, and which the petitioner refers to as being a part thereof, affiant, who is the attorney for petitioner, states that upon said examination of sureties the judge stated that upon the previous day he had amended his order theretofore made regarding bail by providing that an undertaking be given by freeholders in the sum of $20,000, instead of $10,000 cash or surety company undertaking. We shall treat this statement as an allegation that such order was made. Petitioner contends that such amended order is contrary to law, because it was made without notice to petitioner or his attorney, and further that, under section 1289 of the Penal Code, the judge had no right to increase the amount of bail while petitioner was still in jail. Said section 1289 reads as follows:

"Increase or Reduction of Bail. After a defendant has been admitted to bail upon an indictment or information, the court in which the charge is pending may, upon good cause shown, either increase or reduce the amount of bail. If the amount be increased, the court may order the defendant to be committed to actual custody, unless he give bail in such increased amount. If application be made by the defendant for a reduction of the amount, notice of the application must be served upon the district attorney."

[3] It will be noted that said section 1289 refers only to admission to bail "upon an indictment or information." But, even if it applied to admission to bail after judgment, we think that the authority of the court to increase the amount of bail required does not depend upon the giving of any preliminary notice to the defendant. Considering that, as we have hereinbefore stated, petitioner stands in the position of a person seeking to be admitted to bail after conviction of a felony, the granting of such admission to bail is a matter of discretion, and not a matter of right. Pen. Code, § 1272.

Since it does not appear that petitioner has tendered to the court any undertaking of bail in the sum of $20,000 as required by the court's order, it follows that he is not entitled to the demanded writ of mandate.

The petition is denied.

Whether delivery of deed was effectual is question of fact for trial court from consideration of all the evidence.

3. Deeds ☞60—Delivery, upon verbal promise to reconvey upon contingency, complete.

Delivery of deed on verbal promise to reconvey on happening of given contingency held effectual, notwithstanding right to enforce verbal promise on happening of contingency.

4. Deeds ☞208(1)—Finding that grantor divested himself of title and invested same in grantees, sustained.

Where grantor, in contemplation of death, delivered deed on verbal promise to reconvey in case he recovered from affliction, evidence held to sustain finding that he, by his deed, divested himself of title and invested same in grantees.

5. Deeds ☞72(4)—Grantees held not to have abused confidential relation to procure deed.

Where grantor, in contemplation of death, originated idea of deeding property to brother and sister and took advice of counsel before informing grantees of intention, contention of wife that grantees abused confidential relations to procure deed held without merit.

6. Evidence ☞317(3)—Statements of physician of grantor's physical condition, to his wife, hearsay.

In controversy over deed to brother and sister, made in contemplation of death on verbal promise to reconvey if grantor recovered, statements by examining physician relative to grantor's condition, claimed to have been made to one who became grantor's wife, held mere hearsay, and properly refused.

7. Appeal and error ☞1056(1)—Rejection of evidence as to mental and physical condition of grantor three months subsequent to conveyance, and after he had married, not prejudicial.

In controversy over deed to brother and sister, made in contemplation of death on verbal promise to reconvey if grantor recovered, rejection of evidence having reference in main to mental and physical condition of grantor, made more than three months subsequent to conveyance and after grantor had married, held not prejudicial, especially where it was merely cumulative.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Mary Duffy and another against Alice Duffy, individually, and as administratrix with will annexed of the estate of Martin D. Duffy. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louitt & Stewart, of Stockton, for appellant.

Daniel V. Marceau, of Stockton, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title to certain real estate.

The complaint is in the usual form. The defendant filed an answer and cross-complaint, in which she denied the execution and delivery of the deed under which the plaintiffs claim title, and as an affirmative defense alleged that at the time of the delivery Martin Duffy, the grantor therein, being possessed of real property of the value of about $35,000, was desirous of arranging his affairs so that while he lived the property would remain his and be subject to his control, but that if he died without making further disposition thereof it would appear to have been deeded to the plaintiffs, his brother and sister, and they would inherit the same without the necessity of probating his estate, and that it was for this purpose that he executed the instrument in question; that Martin believed that the delivery of said deed would not divest him of his estate in the property, and he did not so intend to divest himself of title nor to invest plaintiffs with the same, but to exercise a right of recall at any time he saw fit; that Mary Duffy, one of the grantees named in said deed, promised to return the property therein conveyed upon the demand of the grantor, who relied upon said promise and was induced thereby and by the implicit trust and confidence he reposed in his said sister to make the aforesaid transfer of his property.

These allegations were denied by the plaintiffs in their answer to the cross-complaint.

The prayer of the cross-complaint was that it be decreed that the instrument in question, purporting to be a deed, be declared to be null and void; that plaintiffs acquired no rights by virtue thereof; and that the title of said defendant, as administratrix of the estate of Martin D. Duffy, deceased, in said property be quieted.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. This is an appeal from such judgment.

There is little or no dispute as to the main facts involved in the case, and they may be summarized as follows: Martin D. Duffy for many years had been engaged in the retail liquor business at Lodi, and had accumulated a substantial fortune composed of real and personal property. The former consisted of a parcel of land in Lodi devoted to business purposes and a 10-acre vineyard situated a few miles from that town, and was worth in the aggregate about $35,000, while the personal property amounted in value to about $10,000. Duffy was a bachelor and about 64 years of age. He had no father or mother living, but he had a brother and sister—his only blood relatives—both of whom were single and had never been married and who lived in the town of Camanche in Calaveras county. The relationship between Martin and his brother and sister was peculiarly close and affectionate, and he visited them at frequent intervals. On December 19, 1921, Martin became seriously ill and went to Oakland for medical advice, stopping at the home of Mrs. Alice McErlane, a widow, with whom he had been on friendly terms for many years. Martin at once consulted physicians in respect to his ailment, and was advised by them that he was suffering from cancer of the throat, an operation to relieve which might prove fatal, but that without an operation his speedy death was certain. Under these circumstances, he requested Mrs. McErlane to telephone to G. M. Steel, an attorney residing at Lodi, and also to his brother and sister at Camanche, requesting them to meet him in Lodi the following day, December 31, Martin arrived at Lodi that evening with Mrs. McErlane, and was met by Miss Mary Duffy and a mutual friend, C. A. Durfey, who had taken care of his business as a bartender for about 14 years. The following morning he called at the office of Attorney Steel and stated that he desired to make a change in his will, and also directed him to draw a deed conveying the above-mentioned real property to his brother and sister. Steel did so, and took occasion to caution Martin (as he had at a previous time) against delivering the deed, explaining to him that if he did so the property would be beyond his control. To this warning Martin replied: "That is all right; that is all right." Martin then signed and acknowledged the instrument. Immediately thereafter the parties retired to a hotel in Lodi, where, in the presence of Durfey and Alice McErlane, Martin handed the deed to his sister Mary Duffy. As to what was said at the time of the delivery there is a conflict in the testimony. Mary Duffy testified that Martin stated at that time, "I give to you and Bill my property. If I get well you will deed back," to which she replied, "Oh, yes." On the other hand, Mrs. McErlane's version of the remarks exchanged was that Martin said, "I am to have it back if I want it," to which Mary replied, "Certainly, Martin." After thus delivering the deed, Martin took out the contents of a safe deposit box which he had shortly before removed from the vaults of a local bank, and which contained money, Liberty bonds, promissory notes, and memoranda of indebtedness to him, and gave them to Mary, remarking that Durfey could help her out in the collection of the notes and other indebtedness. From the hotel Martin and Mary went to the bank, where the former caused the safe deposit box to be transferred to the names of Mary and Luke W. Duffy, and handed Mary the keys. While at the bank, his brother Luke arrived, and Martin informed him that he had deeded his property to him and his sister. He had reserved unto himself a few hundred dollars which he anticipated would be sufficient to take care of him through his sickness. After leaving the bank, all the parties proceeded to Martin's room. In the course of the afternoon a cousin of Martin, accompanied by her husband, arrived in response to a request made by telephone to Mrs. McErlane. To them Martin stated that he had deeded his property to Mary and Luke, and wanted them to put the deed on record right away. Turning to Mary, he said, "Mary, now I am leaving you comfortable, you don't have to work up in that old post office," and he informed other relatives of what he had done. Mary, although requested by Martin to go to the county seat that afternoon in order to have the deed recorded, was unable to do so, but she sent the document by mail and it was recorded on January 10, 1922.

Other facts and circumstances tending to support the testimony of Mary Duffy as to what took place at the time of the delivery of the deed show that she received the rentals from the Lodi property and placed the same to the credit of herself and brother in a local bank; that in attempting to discuss with the grantor the leasing of this property, he reminded her that it belonged to her brother and herself and that he had nothing to do with it; that upon another occasion one of the tenants of the same had consulted the grantor with reference to his lease, and the grantor advised him that the property belonged to his brother and sister. There is also testimony showing that Martin Duffy had made inquiry as to how his sister was managing her property.

After the execution and delivery of the deed in the manner above recited, Martin returned to Oakland to undergo treatment. On March 7, 1922, he married Alice McErlane. On the previous day he had instructed her to telephone to one W. C. Neumiller, the county treasurer of the county of San Joaquin and an old friend, and to Mr. Steel, his attorney, asking them to attend the wedding. He likewise communicated with his brother and sister, making the same request of them. On the morning of the wedding Martin announced to his sister that he was to be married that afternoon, and inquired if she brought the deed with her. She had not, and so informed her brother, upon which he stated that he was going to make a change, and that he was having Mr. Steel come for that purpose as he wanted Alice McErlane to have the vineyard together with $2,000 in cash, remarking, at the same time, "It is mine, and I can do with it as I please." According to the testimony of Mary, Martin said to her, "I thought if you would let Mrs. McErlane have the vineyard you and I will would still have the town property." Mary refused to acquiesce in the suggestion. Although she visited her brother subsequently and during his illness, nothing more was said in relation to the transfer of the property, and the two remained on friendly terms as theretofore. Subsequently, on May 5, 1922, Martin made a will by which he devised the Lodi property to his brother and sister and the vineyard to his wife. On May 17, 1922, he died. His will was admitted to probate, and his widow, Alice Duffy, was appointed administratrix with the will annexed of his estate. She thereafter qualified and letters of administration were issued to her.

On June 7, 1922, Mary and her brother, Luke W. Duffy, filed suit against Alice Duffy, individually and as administratrix, for the purpose of quieting their title to the real property in question, and it is from the judgment rendered in that suit in favor of the plaintiffs that this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant.

The trial court found, in substance, that at the time of the execution of the deed Martin Duffy was suffering from a malady which he believed would prove fatal; that he entertained at the date of the transfer and for many years prior thereto a strong affection for his brother and sister and reposed in them implicit trust and confidence. It also found him to be possessed on the day of the transfer of real property of the value of $35,000, and that on such day he caused the instrument in question to be drawn and signed, acknowledged and delivered the same to Mary and Luke W. Duffy free from any limitations, conditions, or restrictions; that prior to the execution of the deed the grantor had procured independent advice from an attorney of his own selection and that he made the deed with intent to divest himself of title to the property and invest the same in plaintiffs; that the sole inducement for the execution and delivery of the deed was love and affection.

It is admitted by the appellant that if these findings are supported by the evidence it is idle to assail them. The portion of the findings chiefly challenged by appellant is that with reference to the execution and delivery of the deed with intent to presently invest in plaintiffs title to the property in question without condition, limitation, or restriction. In this connection it is claimed by her that the evidence, given the most favorable interpretation for the plaintiffs, establishes, contrary to the finding, that there was not an absolute delivery, and that therefore either the deed was void, or that the plaintiffs hold the title in trust for the estate; the better reasoning being that the deed is void.

[1, 2] At the outset it may be stated that the rule is elementary that it is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title; and the true test under which the effect of the delivery is to be determined is to ascertain whether in parting with the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title. If he did, there is an effectual delivery of the deed; if not, there is no delivery. This is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence in a given case bearing upon the subject (Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 P. 803; Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 552, 91 P. 329; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 P. 544; Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 221 P. 191), and a finding based on conflicting evidence is conclusive here (Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 375, 39 P. 797; Smith v. Flynn, 64 Cal. App. 218, 221 P. 384). To prove this issue evidence of manual tradition of the instrument is not enough; its delivery to or on behalf of the grantee must be with the intent of presently passing title, and must not be hampered by the reservation of any right of revocation or recall. White v. Hendley, 185 Cal. 614, 198 P. 22. Where it appears from all the circumstances that the grantor has made known his intention to irrevocably part with his dominion and control over the instrument to the end that it may presently vest title in another, the delivery is sufficient and complete. McCully v. McArthur, 187 Cal. 199, 201 P. 323.

[3, 4] It is claimed by the appellant that the evidence here shows that the grantor had in mind undergoing an operation, which might prove fatal, and yet, on the other hand, he might recover. It is conceded that the conclusion is indisputable that in the event the ailment from which he was suffering should prove fatal the grantor wanted his brother and sister to have his property; and that if he recovered therefrom they were not to have it. It is her contention that the entire evidence shows that pending the outcome the respondents were to have merely a semblance of title, which would save them the expense of probating the estate if the operation proved fatal. It is accordingly argued that under such a state of affairs the grantor still retained control of the title so that in the event of his recovery he could regain the same, and that therefore he never intended by the instrument to completely divest himself of title, having in view that there was no absolute certainty of death resulting from his ailment. In support of this contention counsel for appellant relies upon the doctrine laid down in Brisson v. Brisson, 75 Cal. 525, 17 P. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189.

In that case the plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife. The former was the owner of certain real property. He was about to visit a foreign state and was apprehensive that he might be killed, and was therefore desirous of making a will before his departure so that this property should go to his wife in the event of his death. At the same time, being influenced by his desire to save the expense of probate, and having confidence in his wife, and relying upon her parol promise that she would reconvey to him upon his return, he made a deed to her absolute in form. His apprehensions of calamity befalling him proved groundless and he returned safely, but his wife refused his request to reconvey. The court held that he was entitled to a reconveyance, the wife merely holding title to the property in trust.

Counsel has cited us to other authorities in support of his contention that as the grantor was to be reinvested with his title in the event that he recovered from his malady, the delivery was hampered by a reservation, and that therefore there was no complete delivery. They are in the main cases where deeds were delivered with no intention of presently passing title, the grantors reserving the right of dominion over the deed, to revoke or recall it. These cases are extensively reviewed in Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, and require no detailed comment. In most if not all of them the delivery was made upon condition, with an express reservation of the right to a reconveyance upon the happening of the condition upon which the instrument was delivered. In such cases there is no question that a right to a reconveyance exists upon the happening of the condition. So here, had Martin Duffy recovered from his ailment he would undoubtedly have been entitled upon demand to a reconveyance; and, in fact, plaintiff Mary Duffy testified that she was ready to execute a reconveyance upon the happening of that event, and that her refusal to accede to the grantor's wishes was because the condition upon which she was to reconvey if requested had not been realized, namely, recovery from his malady.

There is a distinction between the right to recover the deed and the right to claim a reconveyance of the property embraced therein. To say that a promise on the part of a grantee to reconvey upon a certain contingency is the equivalent of retaining title is in effect to say that under such circumstances the grantor by his conveyance merely created a cloud upon his title. But this is not so. If an owner chooses to convey his land upon a verbal promise on the part of the grantee to reconvey on demand or upon the happening of a given contingency, he may do so; and if the delivery of his deed is regular in other respects he parts with the title, subject only to the contingent right to a reconveyance. An agreement on the part of grantee to reconvey negatives the idea of the retention by the grantor of a right to recall or revoke his deed. If it could be said that there could be no complete delivery because of a promise on the part of the grantee to reconvey upon the happening of a certain condition, then all conveyances made upon condition would be idle acts and of no legal effect unless and until the specified contingency should come to pass. The law affords a remedy where a grantee wrongfully refuses to reconvey according to his agreement. But this is not such a case. Martin Duffy never recovered from his illness, and this was the only condition upon which he would have been entitled to a reconveyance. Having unsolicited and without any suggestion on the part of the grantees limited his right to this single condition, he could not capriciously and as a matter of right ask for a reconveyance upon other grounds. His property had passed from him beyond recall by the delivery of his deed, subject only to his right to a reconveyance upon the happening of the single limitation with which it was burdened. Nor does the fact that the conveyance was made to avoid the expense of probate proceedings, or that the grantor may have cherished the secret hope of recovery, in any manner alter the situation. These facts are not necessarily inconsistent with an intent to presently and irrevocably pass title. Hefner v. Sealey, 175 Cal. 20, 164 P. 898.

We conclude, therefore, upon this subject that the evidence fully sustains the finding of the trial court that the grantor by his deed divested himself of title and invested the same in his grantees.

[5] Equally without merit is the further contention that there was a violation of trust and that the grantees used the confidential relation existing between them and Martin to procure the deed. There is no direct evidence that the grantees took advantage of this relation (assuming it to exist). On the contrary, the idea of making the deed originated with the grantor himself; he took independent advice of his counsel of long standing, and the grantees knew nothing of his most natural intention to make them—his only blood relatives—the objects of his bounty until he made announcement thereof.

And, finally, appellant urges some 41 objections to rulings of the trial court upon the admission of evidence and assigns such ruling as error justifying a reversal.

[6] In this connection it is claimed that the court erred in rejecting evidence as to statements made by an examining physician relative to the grantor's physical condition. The statements were claimed to have been made by the physician to Mrs. McErlane. Assuming them to have been material, evidence by her upon the subject was mere hearsay and properly rejected.

[7] Evidence relating to the purchase of a burial plot, and the fact that deceased had telephoned to his attorney in Stockton for the purpose of making a change in his affairs, together with certain declarations in disparagement of his title, were rejected, and these rulings are assigned as error. We have carefully examined these objections, and find them to be untenable. The evidence had reference in the main to the mental and physical condition of the grantor, and this matter had been gone into fully by the trial court; the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution and delivery of the deed and its purpose, including the grantor's apprehension of impending death, were also all before the court, and most of the rejected statements were made more than three months subsequent to the conveyance and after the grantor had married. Moreover, the testimony was cumulative, and we are clearly of the opinion that its rejection in no manner affected or invaded the substantial rights of the appellant.

From what we have said it follows that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

GALBRAITH et al. v. PANINI et al.

(Civ. 2764.)

1. Costs ⇐236—Appellant entitled to costs on reversal of judgment.

Appellant is entitled to costs on reversal of judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027.

2. Costs ⇐3—Prevailing party's right to recovery purely statutory.

Prevailing party's right to recover costs is purely statutory.

3. Costs ⇐254(4)—Prevailing party on appeal may not recover expenses of transcript not ordered by court.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, read with section 274, which was not repealed, prevailing party on appeal may not recover as costs expenses of transcript not ordered by court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Proceeding by Esta F. Galbraith and another against Dario Panini and others to revoke the probate of the will of Annie Gallo, deceased. From an order taxing costs, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for appellants. Arthur L. Levinsky and R. J. Jeffry, both of Stockton, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from an order taxing costs. Plaintiffs instituted a proceeding to revoke the probate of the will of Annie Gallo, deceased. At the close of plaintiff's case a nonsuit was granted. On appeal the judgment of nonsuit was reversed. 61 Cal. App. 163, 214 P. 496. For the purposes of that appeal plaintiffs ordered a transcript of testimony from the reporter at an expense of $282.60. Upon the return of the remittitur, in due time, plaintiffs filed their bill of costs, including this item for reporter's transcript. On defendant's motion to tax costs this item was disallowed. From this order the plaintiffs appealed. The bill of exceptions indicates that the plaintiffs procured this transcript of testimony without obtaining any order of court therefor.

[1, 2] A successful appellant is entitled to costs on reversal of the judgment. Section 1027, Code Civ. Proc.; Robinett v. Brown, 167 Cal. 735, 141 P. 368. The right of the prevailing party to recover costs is purely statutory. No costs may be recovered except when they are allowed by statute. Turner v. East Side Canal & Irrigation Co., 177 Cal. 570, 171 P. 299.

Section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the prevailing party "may recover all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal, and the preparation of the record for the appeal, including the costs of printing briefs. * * *

[3] There can be no doubt this transcript of testimony was necessary for the preparation of plaintiffs' appeal from the judgment of nonsuit, as the affidavit of A. H. Ashley, which is attached to plaintiffs' bill of costs, shows. But this section must be read in connection with section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides in part:

"In civil cases, the fees * * * for transcripts ordered by the court to be made must be paid by the parties in equal proportions, and either party may, at his option, pay the whole thereof; and, in either case, all amounts so paid by the party to whom costs are awarded must be taxed as costs in the case. The fees for transcripts and copies ordered by the parties must be paid by the party ordering the same. * * *

Section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the latest expression of the Legislature, but does not repeal the provision of section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure requiring the party ordering a transcript, without the order of the court, to pay for the same. Sime v. Hunter, 55 Cal. App. 157, 202 P. 967. Construing these two sections together, we must conclude that the statute allows all costs actually incurred by the prevailing party in preparation of the record on appeal, except in the absence of an order of court, where the party himself orders the transcript, he must pay for the same. The only way to properly charge the expense of a transcript as costs on appeal, is to obtain an order of court pursuant to section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Senior v. Anderson, 130 Cal. 290, 62 P. 563; Sime v. Hunter, 55 Cal. App. 157, 202 P. 967; Blair v. Brownstone Oil & Refining Co., 20 Cal. App. 316, 128 P. 1022; Kohn v. Kempner (Cal. App.) 225 P. 24; 7 Cal. Jur. 284. This order was not procured. It follows that the order disallowing the item of $282.60 was properly made.

The judgment is affirmed.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] In August, 1924, defendant's wife commenced an action against him for divorce. Thereafter she and their two children resided at the Bolden Apartments in Ft. Bragg, and the defendant occupied a room at the White House in the same town. On the 17th or 18th of September the defendant, who had not been in the habit of carrying a gun, purchased a revolver and a box of cartridges. In the afternoon of the 18th he asked his wife to let him take dinner with her and the children, at her apartment that evening, saying he was going away the next day, and she consented. He spent the evening in the apartment with them, and while there made statements from which it might be inferred that he intended to kill his wife and take his own life. His wife had difficulty in persuading him to leave, but, upon her promise that he might return the next morning at 9 o'clock, he finally left. The next morning about 7:30 he called at a barber shop of which he and his wife were both patrons, and while there said to the proprietor, "I don't think my wife will bother you any more." He then went to his wife's apartment and there took frequent drinks from a bottle of intoxicating liquor which he had with him. His wife testified that—

After the children left for school "he says to me, 'If you have any arguments make them quick. * * * You are not going to leave this room until I do. I am going to kill you. We are both going to die on that bed together. I have stood enough of this.' And I got up out of my chair and threw my right arm around his neck and said, 'No, let's not do that, let's be friends,' and he stooped over and pulled at his pants leg and said, 'No, I am going to use it.'

"Q. Where did he have the gun? A. On his right leg on the outside in his sock, and the sock was thin, and it shone through his sock and was shiny and the whole print of it was there, * * * and he said, 'No, I am going to do it,' and bent over and went at it that way (indicating) to get the gun. * * * He just made it like a madman. He had a garter on, which he never wore before, and he was trying to unfasten it, when he said, 'I am going to do it, I am going to do it,' just as fast as he could, like that (indicating). It seems as I stuck my head and shoulders out of the window something told me to get out of there, and I threw my legs out— * * * and he grabbed me by the coat collar. * * *

"Q. And you went out of the window and down to the street below? A. On the cement sidewalk, yes. * * * He never shot. * * * When he began so fast like this to get the gun, I never looked back, and when he grabbed me I slipped onto the sidewalk. * * *

"Q. Did he pull his pants leg up? A. Yes. * * * I should judge just under his knee. * * * He says: 'Do you see that thing? I am going to kill you on that bed and then kill myself.' * * * He said it fast and very low. * * * He was wrestling with it to get it out of his sock. * * *

"Q. You mean he had his hands down— A. He had both of them down going just that way, as fast as he could (indicating). * * * He was attempting to get it, but I didn't wait. I never saw it after he got it out. * * * He made an effort to get it out of his sock."

A witness who was across the street at the time testified that he heard screaming and saw Mrs. Hunter drop from the window to the sidewalk, a distance of 16 or 18 feet below; that she said, "He is going to kill me or trying to shoot me or something to that effect"; and that he saw the defendant standing in the window at the time. Another witness gave testimony to the same effect. About 30 minutes later, the defendant was found in bed, in his room at the White House, fully dressed. At about 8 o'clock in the evening of the 19th, the defendant's revolver, fully loaded, was found under a mattress in his wife's apartment. The defendant testified at his preliminary examination but not at the trial. His counsel introduced at the trial a transcript of all the testimony taken at the preliminary examination. At such examination the defendant testified that at the time of the alleged crime he "was pretty near rumdum with this booze they sell around here"; that he did not have the revolver at that time; that he had placed it under the mattress the evening before, "awhile after the children went to bed. * * * I didn't want it to be found on me"; that he did not know that his wife jumped out of the window, "I didn't have presence of mind enough. I was too crazy, I guess."

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to prove the alleged assault, in that it does not show that the defendant attempted to use the weapon. "An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another." Pen. Code, § 240.

[2] The evidence is ample to show that the defendant had the intention and the present ability to kill his wife. The only question remaining is whether he attempted to carry his purpose into execution. To accomplish that purpose, it was necessary for him to take the gun from his sock, to point it at his wife, and to pull the trigger. Any one of these would constitute an overt act toward the immediate accomplishment of the intended crime. He was endeavoring to take the gun from his sock when his wife thwarted the attempt to kill her by jumping out of the window. Naturally she did not wait to see whether he succeeded in getting hold of the gun or whether he pointed it at her, and it is immaterial whether he did either. The actual transaction had commenced which would have ended in murder if it had not been interrupted. In People v. Stites, 75 Cal. 570, 17 P. 693, the defendant approached a railroad track with an explosive in his possession which he intended immediately to place upon the track; but, because of the presence of police officers, he retreated without accomplishing his purpose. It was held that he was guilty of an attempt to place an obstruction upon the track. See, also, People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 256, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383, and cases there cited. The facts in the instant case are not essentially different in principle from those in People v. McMakin, 8 Cal. 547, and People v. Piercy, 16 Cal. App. 13, 116 P. 322, where like judgments were affirmed.

[3-6] Appellant contends that the evidence is not sufficient to show that the revolver was loaded, that it was error to admit the same and the cartridges found therein in evidence, and to admit proof that the defendant's wife jumped out of the window to escape from him. The contentions are so manifestly without merit, as appears from the evidence herein stated, that no discussion thereof is deemed necessary. The refusal of the court to give certain instructions proposed by the defendant is assigned as error. Several of these instructions are framed upon the theory that the evidence is insufficient to prove an assault by defendant. In so far as the proposed instructions contain correct statements of law, they are covered by instructions which the court gave. All other grounds urged for a reversal are trivial and need not be discussed. The evidence is clear and convincing, and no logical basis is suggested upon which the jury could have returned a different verdict.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. EKSTROMER. (Cr. 1177.)

1. Criminal law ⚡457—Intoxication is a matter of nonexpert opinion.

Intoxication is a matter of nonexpert opinion.

2. Criminal law ⚡825(2)—Instruction defining "under the influence of liquor," and permitting jury to accept ordinary definition of words, not prejudicial.

In prosecution for driving automobile on highway while intoxicated, instruction allowing jury to accept ordinary definition of words "under the influence of liquor" held not prejudicial, in absence of request by accused for more definite instruction, and where he practically asked definition which conceded common usage and understanding.

3. Highways ⚡186—"Under the influence of intoxicating liquor," within statute as to operation of automobiles, defined.

"Under the influence of intoxicating liquor," as used in statute relating to operation of automobiles, means such effect on the nervous system, brain, or muscles of driver of automobile as to impair to an appreciable degree his ability to operate car as an ordinary prudent and cautious man, in full possession of his faculties, would.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Under the Influence of Liquor.]

4. Highways ⚡186—Whether accused was under the influence of intoxicating liquor is question of fact from all the circumstances.

In prosecution, under Vehicle Act, § 112, question as to whether accused was under the influence of intoxicating liquor is one of fact to be determined from all the circumstances of case, and it is not necessary to prove any specific degree of intoxication.

5. Highways ⚡186—Evidence sufficient to justify conviction of driving automobile while intoxicated.

In prosecution under Vehicle Act, § 112, for driving automobile on public highway while under influence of intoxicating liquor, evidence held sufficient to justify conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Edward G. Ekstromer was convicted of driving an automobile on a public highway, while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendant was convicted of violating section 112 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) in driving and operating an automobile on a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. He was sentenced to 90 days in the county jail, and he now appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Section 112 of the vehicle act reads as follows:

"Persons under influence of liquor or drugs. No person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor or who is an habitual user of narcotic drugs shall drive a vehicle on any public highway within this state. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than ninety days nor more than one year or by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one or more than three years or by a fine of not less than two hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars."

A police officer arrested defendant soon after his automobile and that of one Bates collided at Bush and Leavenworth streets, San Francisco, between 7:30 and 8 o'clock p. m. of October 13, 1923. Defendant had been driving south on Leavenworth street, and crossed Bush, when the cars collided at the left front wheels. Defendant immediately backed from Bates' car and came in contact with a machine in the rear, which had stopped from curiosity of its driver. According to one statement, defendant was at the west curb on Leavenworth street when the officer came on the scene, started away from there down Leavenworth street, disregarded the officer's order to stop, was overtaken and again came to the curb some hundred feet further down on the second command of the officer, who then placed him under arrest. According to his own statement defendant backed from the impact with Bates' car, swung into Leavenworth street and was proceeding south on Leavenworth street when stopped by the police officer and placed under arrest. There is a conflict as to whether the defendant was merely crossing Bush street on his way south on Leavenworth, or turning from Leavenworth east into Bush, just preceding the collision with Bates. The prosecution's position is that defendant was crossing Bush street while proceeding south on Leavenworth, but "too far over" on the wrong side of the street, and a positive statement is made that the position of the car was such that he could not have been attempting any turn, but defendant and a friend with him in his car at the time, state he was making the turn into Bush, and that both cars were going very slowly on account of heavy traffic. No one saw defendant's car before the impact except Bates, and he did not see it until it got "right close up." He stated that he was back of the crossing on Leavenworth, his car stationary, waiting for traffic to pass before crossing, and witness Holmes' testimony bears this out.

The evidence was in direct and almost equally divided conflict, both on the question of details of the collision and on the subject of intoxication. Witness Holmes, standing on the corner preceding and at the time of the collision, and the arresting officer, Mantell, testified positively that defendant was intoxicated; and the driver of the other car featuring in the collision made the statement that he thought defendant was drunk by his actions in driving the machine, that he really meant he so judged by the collision. He further testified that although he stood on the running board of defendant's car, right next him, immediately following the collision, he smelled no liquor, and that about half an hour later at the police station defendant seemed "very much sober."

The defendant is accused by the police officer of attempting to run away after the collision, but the charge is denied by defendant and by his companion, Peterson, who was in the car with him at the time, and depends solely upon the facts of whether his car was parked at the curb and driven from there after the arrival of the officer and against his order to remain there, as the latter claims, or whether it merely came near the curb to clear away after exchange of data with the other drivers, started down the hill and came to the curb on the whistle of the officer, who boarded the car while in motion and accused the defendant of flight.

It was at this latter point that the officer ordered defendant out of his car, made him walk a line to a lamp post and back, and then placed him under arrest for driving while intoxicated. The officer testified that defendant was intoxicated. As basis for this opinion he stated that at first (on order) defendant "didn't seem to pay any attention to what I was saying to him"; that defendant's breath smelled of liquor; defendant admitted he had been drinking, it was his birthday; his walk was slow, not irregular, he walked to the lamp post, "kind of staggered against it"; he was dazed; he did not speak clearly, hard to understand.

The bystander, Holmes, testified that defendant was intoxicated. He so judged from the following: Defendant's breath smelled of liquor; he was not steady on his feet; he walked the line unsteadily; the manner in which he got out of the machine; his walking directly into a lamp post while walking the line.

Defendant testified that he had arrived in town in the afternoon following a business trip, had accidentally met his friend, invited him to dinner and driven him to call at the home of a mutual friend to ascertain the nature and time of an invitation on which acceptance or rejection of defendant's dinner invitation would be grounded; that while there they each had one drink, a ginger ale highball, and that was the only drinking he had done; that from that place he drove with his friend en route to dinner, and came to the corner where the collision took place; that after exchange of data with Bates he backed to clear, struck slightly a machine stopped behind him, exchanged data with the second driver, backed nearly to the curb, started off down the hill and came to the curb again on hearing the whistle of the officer, who boarded the car while it was on its way to the curb, accused him of running away, and used abusive language to him on denial of the charge. Arrived at the curb he was made to alight and climb out through the gear shift and brake at his right (the car being a right-hand drive car); he was then made to walk a line and back, and placed under arrest for driving while intoxicated. He stated to the officer, "I have had one drink—it is my birthday." He was not intoxicated. At the Hall of Justice he wrote a check for his bail.

His friend's story was substantially the same, with the additions that defendant was not to blame for the accident; that he was naturally slow of speech, had in fact a slight impediment in his speech; that his gait was unusual, somewhat of a straddling walk. He was quick-tempered, and resented the officer's charge that he was running away; the officer replied with the statement, "I am going to arrest you for being intoxicated, anyhow, in a car," and on defendant's remonstrance told him, "You be quiet," or some words, to "push him or something," and, "You get out of the car." He got out of the car awkwardly of necessity, because of the gear and brake lever. He walked to the lamp post, asked the officer, "What do you want me to do now?" and on being told, "Walk back," did so. He did not bump the lamp post; he denied he was intoxicated, and he was absolutely sober.

The jury found defendant guilty as charged in the information. Motion for new trial and motion for probation were denied.

The defendant requested five instructions, three on reasonable doubt and one for acquittal, which were "refused as given in substance elsewhere," and the fifth, which was given, as to the burden of proof. The term "under the influence of intoxicating liquor" is not defined in the California Vehicle Act, and the instructions requested by defendant contained no definition of it, but used the term in each of his proposed instructions as though it were one commonly understood. The court, among others, gave the following instructions:

(1) "I instruct you that the term 'under the influence of intoxicating liquor' means that he must have drank enough intoxicating liquor to have disturbed the actions of his physical or mental faculties so that they were no longer in their natural or normal condition"; and (2) "the law as herein set forth does not define the terms 'influence' or 'intoxicating,' and therefore the jury must accept the common, ordinary definition of these words according to their context and approved usage of our language."

Defendant now complains that the judgment, if allowed to stand, is authority for the proposition that any degree of intoxication, however slight, while driving an automobile, constitutes a crime under the statute, rather than such intoxication as, when applied to the driving of an automobile, shows an impairment of ability to drive as an ordinarily prudent person would do. He attacks the instructions of the trial court hereinbefore quoted, on the ground that the definition of the term "under the influence of intoxicating liquor" was insufficient and incorrect; and further, that the court not only failed to define the term "under the influence of intoxicating liquor" properly, but in the absence of any definition in the statute itself of the words "influence" and "intoxicating," left such definition for the jury to determine. He asserts that prejudicial and fundamental error resulted.

Appellant also attacks the validity of the conviction on the ground that it is contrary to law and the evidence, on the premise that the instructions did not correctly define the law and that there was no evidence directly bearing on defendant's ability to drive an automobile.

[1, 2] In disposing of the first point we may say that the record does not disclose any objection on the part of the defendant to the instructions given, and that, indeed, he himself practically asked a definition which conceded common usage and understanding, and which the court gave when, at his request, it instructed the jury:

"You are instructed that it is not necessary for the defendant to show that he was sober, but that the burden of proving that he was under the influence of liquor is upon the prosecution, and before you can convict it is necessary not only that the prosecution prove that he was under the influence of liquor, but to prove the same beyond all reasonable doubt."

In none of the other requested instructions did defendant question or define the phrase unless it may be said that in one, "refused as given elsewhere," he concedes that the slightest influence is sufficient by requesting the court to charge:

"You are instructed that if the testimony is so equally balanced that you are unable to determine one way or the other whether or not the defendant was under the influence of liquor or was wholly free of such influence, then you must acquit the defendant."

The requested instruction which was given clearly contrasts the condition of "sober" with "under the influence of liquor," thereby affording substantial ground for the substitution of the term "intoxicated" for the latter. It is generally recognized that intoxication is a matter of nonexpert opinion, and the charge to the jury to determine the meaning of the words "influence" and "intoxicating" by the approved usage of our language was, in fact, but such a statement. Two of the witnesses in the case testified positively that defendant was "intoxicated" and gave the reasons for their opinion. Elements of their opinions were matters which, if believed by the jury, would have operated to impair the ability of one to operate an automobile to an appreciable extent. Such being the case we cannot believe that any prejudicial error resulted either from the definition given by the court or its instruction to the jury to accept the common ordinary definition of the words.

[3] We have read and considered the cases of People v. Weaver, 188 App. Div. 395, 177 N. Y. S. 71; People v. Dingle, 56 Cal. App. 445, 205 P. 705, cited by appellant. We are not in accord with the holding of the former, but quote with approval the following language from the latter:

"* * * With respect to the meaning of the phrase 'under the influence of intoxicating liquor,' as used in this statute, we think we are well within the bounds of accuracy in saying that if intoxicating liquor has so far affected the nervous system, brain, or muscles of the driver of an automobile as to impair, to an appreciable degree, his ability to operate his car in the manner that an ordinarily prudent and cautious man, in the full possession of his faculties, using reasonable care, would operate or drive a similar vehicle 'under like conditions, then such driver is 'under the influence of intoxicating liquor' within the meaning of the statute."

We have also read cases from other jurisdictions showing in some that the term "intoxicated condition" or "under the influence of intoxicating liquor" was generally accepted and understood and unnecessary to define; and also showing "any degree" of intoxication or influence of liquor of drivers under highway acts, a crime. Nelson v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 210, 261 S. W. 1046; State v. Hatcher, 303 Mo. 13, 259 S. W. 467; Hart v. State, 26 Ga. App. 64, 105 S. E. 383.

[4, 5] Section 112 of the California Vehicle Act was designed to protect the public from the menace of automobiles operated upon the public highway with inadequate or no efficient control, in a world of traffic difficult of management under normal conditions, and should be liberally construed to effect its purpose. We think that such legislation is well in line with, and motivated by, the same impulses that inspired the enactment of statutes prohibiting railroad employees from drinking intoxicants while on duty; that in prosecutions under the statute it is not necessary to prove any specific degree of intoxication, but that in each case where a person is charged, as appellant is here, with violating the provisions of section 112 of the vehicle act, the question as to whether the defendant was "under the influence of intoxicating liquor" is one of fact to be determined by the court or jury from all of the circumstances of the case.

The point as to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, in view of what we have said, has no merit as based on a conflict of evidence.

We are of the opinion that the judgment and order should be, and they are, affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (Cr. 1173.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ☞1137(5)—Error cannot be predicated on objectionable evidence first brought out on cross-examination.

Where fact of commission of separate offense by defendant was first brought out on cross-examination of witness by defendant's counsel, and on re-examination objectionable evidence was repeated, defendant cannot predicate error thereon.

2. Witnesses ☞37(5)—Testimony as to portion of conversation overheard admissible if conversation itself admissible.

That witness has not heard all of conversation between others does not render portion heard inadmissible, if conversation itself was admissible.

3. Criminal law ☞404(5)—Pawn tickets covering portion of stolen property admissible in prosecution for larceny.

In prosecution for larceny of jewelry, pawn tickets covering some of stolen jewelry and which were signed in name other than defendant's, and other such tickets in handwriting of defendant to afford comparison, held properly admitted.

4. Criminal law ☞1163(3)—Refusal to strike answer, if error, not ground for reversal, where no prejudice shown.

Refusal to strike answer on ground that it was not responsive, even if error, is not ground for reversal, where appellant made no showing that he was prejudiced.

5. Criminal law ☞1036(1)—Alleged error in reception of evidence cannot be raised for first time on appeal.

Where no objection is made to evidence at time it was introduced, alleged error occurring through its reception cannot be taken advantage of for first time on appeal.

6. Criminal law ☞1120(6)—Assignment relating to exclusion of evidence not reviewed, where materiality of excluded evidence not shown.

Alleged erroneous exclusion of evidence will not be reviewed, where its materiality not shown or apparent to appellate court.

7. Criminal law ☞1036(1), 1044—Admission of evidence not ground for error, where not objected to or motion made to strike.

Error cannot be predicated on admission of evidence, where no objection was made to its introduction nor any motion made to strike it from the record.

8. Criminal law ☞1169(1), 1170(1)—Errors not possibly affecting outcome of case not considered.

Where, if rulings on admission or exclusion of evidence had been acted upon most favorably to defendant's advantage, they could not possibly have affected outcome of case, errors, if any, must be regarded as though they had not occurred.

9. Criminal law ☞788—Rule as to failure to produce most satisfactory evidence held inapplicable.

In prosecution for larceny of jewelry alleged to have been taken by defendant while a guest of prosecuting witness, defendant's requested instruction in language of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 7, as to failure to produce most satisfactory evidence within power of party, which was offered because some of guests were not called as witnesses, was properly refused, since defendant had same opportunity to procure attendance of such witnesses.

10. Criminal law ☞829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by given instructions not error.

Refusal of defendant's requested instructions which were substantially covered by other instructions given to jury is not ground for error.

11. Criminal law ☞825(1)—Defendant, desiring more specific instruction, must request it.

Defendant, complaining of court's instructions informing jury that witness may be impeached by evidence of inconsistent statements, and that witness, false in one part of testimony, is to be distrusted in others, on ground that it was not broad enough and should have singled out certain matters in evidence, should have presented a desired instruction for consideration of trial court, and, having failed to do so, such omission is not prejudicial error.

12. Criminal law ☞1166½(12)—Court's remark as to conflict in defendant's testimony not prejudicial, in view of instruction to disregard.

Remark by court that there was a conflict in defendant's testimony was not prejudicial, in view of instruction that any expression of opinion by court as to matters of fact was to be entirely disregarded.

13. Criminal law §1172(6)—Instruction as to who are persons of unsound mind, though unnecessary, was not harmful.

In prosecution for larceny, where no issue was raised as to state of defendant's mind, an instruction that all persons are of sound mind who are not idiots or lunatics or affected with insanity was unnecessary, but not harmful to defendant.

14. Larceny §77(4)—Instruction on failure of one in possession of stolen property to account therefore held proper.

Instruction in larceny prosecution, that, if stolen property was seen in possession of defendant shortly after being stolen, defendant's failure to account for its possession was a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and that defendant was bound to explain possession, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Robert Alton Brown was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

By the information defendant was accused of stealing certain articles of jewelry of the alleged aggregate value of $800. The evidence introduced on behalf of the prosecution showed that on the afternoon of March 13, 1924, several persons, including defendant, were visiting at the home of the prosecuting witness, at which time, in the presence of defendant, the prosecuting witness took the jewelry from a secret vault in a mantelpiece in his home and exhibited it to his guests. Five days later the prosecuting witness discovered that his jewelry was gone, and reported the loss thereof to the police authorities. At that time defendant was interviewed by an officer at the police station regarding the loss of the jewelry. He denied having any knowledge of its whereabouts, and, in the absence of sufficient incriminating facts, was released from custody. About two months later defendant was again taken into custody, at which time several of the stolen articles were found on his person, and the greater part of the remainder thereof was discovered in a pocket of a vest in the clothes closet of defendant's bedroom. One piece of the stolen jewelry was recovered from a pawnshop, where the jury was justified in believing from the evidence that, under an assumed name, the defendant had borrowed some money and deposited such article as security for the debt. Defendant accounted for his possession of the jewelry by stating that he had found it in his overcoat pocket a few days after he had been at the home of the prosecuting witness, and after he had been first questioned at the police station regarding the matter. Defendant also claimed to have obtained a matchbox, which was one of the stolen articles, from a man by the name of Pierce. Mr. Pierce, however, denied defendant's statement in that regard. It appeared also that at the time the jewelry was exhibited by the prosecuting witness one of the guests who was present lost a valuable Spanish shawl, which was later returned by defendant to the owner thereof.

The first reason advanced by appellant for a reversal of the judgment against him is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in permitting the prosecution, over defendant's objection, to introduce evidence relating to a separate criminal offense not charged against him. The matter related to the loss of the Spanish shawl by one of the persons who was at the home of the prosecuting witness at the time he was exhibiting the jewelry which was afterwards stolen. Under cross-examination by defendant's counsel a witness gave the following testimony:

"Q. And you didn't have any reason to believe at that time that Brown (defendant) might be the person who took it, either, did you? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you have some suspicion? A. Yes.

"Q. Tell me what it was. A. Because there was a shawl missing, that turned up and afterwards he brought back."

Subsequently the same evidence was adduced on redirect examination of the same witness.

[1] Considering that the record discloses the fact that the matter to which objection was made was first brought out on cross-examination conducted by defendant's counsel, and that thereafter, on redirect examination of the witness and against defendant's objection, the objectionable evidence was repeated, we are convinced that, if any harm resulted to defendant by reason of the circumstance, it was nothing of which appellant has a right to complain.

[2] The next specification of error by appellant relates to a part of a conversation had among defendant and certain police officers. It appears that the witness did not hear all the conversation, and related that part only which he had heard. Appellant insists that one who has not heard all of a material conversation is precluded from narrating any part of it. No authority is cited by appellant to sustain his position in that regard. The conversation to which the witness testified contained references to a sale by defendant of a ring belonging to a Mrs. Salisbury. With reference thereto the further point is made that the testimony was hearsay, in that the witness attempted to tell what Mrs. Salisbury, who was not present at the conversation, had said concerning the matter. An examination of the record shows that the witness was merely narrating what at that time another person had told defendant what Mrs. Salisbury had said. Such being the case, the statement made by the witness was a part of the conversation which he had heard, and, assuming that the conversation itself was admissible (of which no question is raised), the part to which objection was made was also admissible.

[3] Appellant also complains that certain pawn tickets purporting to have been signed by one "Arthur Bates," and which tickets covered one or more of the articles of jewelry which were the subject of the larceny in the case on trial, were introduced in evidence, and that there was no evidence that the signature "Arthur Bates" was in defendant's handwriting. However, while there was no direct evidence to that effect, certain other pawn tickets, admittedly signed by defendant, were made exhibits in the case for the express purpose of affording a comparison of the handwriting of the signature "Arthur Bates" with the acknowledged handwriting of defendant. The evidence was properly admitted.

[4] Another specification of alleged error is connected with the matter just mentioned. A witness was asked: "Q. Now, when you went to this pawnshop, did they show you a stub?" to which question the witness replied: "A. That was across the street there, this place that they showed me that stub." Defendant's motion to strike the answer on the ground that it was not responsive to the question was denied, and appellant urges that the action of the court was error. While the answer may not be directly responsive to the question, nevertheless, in a way, it does answer it. No attempt is made by appellant to show any resultant damage to defendant; and, even assuming that the motion to strike should have been granted, the error was of so little consequence that it cannot be seriously considered as a ground for reversal of the judgment. A similar situation exists with respect to several other of defendant's exceptions. Mere specification of error will not suffice. The rule is that, in order to avail an appellant, error must be shown to have prejudicially affected his case.

[5] Appellant suggests error in that a witness who was detailing a conversation had with defendant was permitted to state that—

"I asked him how he could account for the fact that he had this jewelry in his pocket up at his room, and he said that he found it in his pocket, in his overcoat pocket, a few days after he had been up to Mr. Payne's house. And I said, 'Well, why didn't you tell us about it at the time that we were up there, when Mr. Payne reported this stuff?' He said then that he hadn't found it yet at that time, and I said,

'Then why didn't you report it after you did find it?' and he didn't give any answer to that."

No objection was made to the evidence at the time it was introduced, and it is now too late for appellant to take advantage of any alleged error occurring through its reception.

[6] In the course of the trial defendant's attorney asked a witness the following:

"Q. All the rest of them were arrests, just like you made the first time; take him down some place, and then brought him back and released him; isn't that so?"

The court sustained an objection to the question on the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness. Like many of the other specifications of error, appellant's presentation of the foregoing alleged error is wanting, in that it is unaccompanied by either argument or citation of authority. In addition thereto the materiality of the question is not shown, nor is it apparent to the court. In such circumstances the point made by appellant requires no consideration by this court.

[7] "Fatal" error is predicated upon the action of the trial court in permitting certain evidence, to which attention is directed, to go to the jury. An examination of the record discloses the fact that no objection was interposed by defendant to any of the questions affecting the matter to which objection is now made; nor was any motion made by defendant to strike such evidence from the record. It is clear that appellant is too late in his contention.

[8] Various other alleged errors, either in the reception or the rejection of offered evidence, are assigned by appellant as reasons why a new trial should be awarded defendant. The majority of them are not seriously presented. Of those which are urged at all it need only be said that, even assuming that appellant's points with reference thereto are well taken, the matters which they cover in the aggregate are, to say the most for them, of very slight importance, and, had they been acted upon most favorably to defendant's advantage, could not possibly have affected the outcome of the case. In such circumstances the errors, if any, must be regarded as though they had not occurred.

[9] It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by defendant. The first of these was couched in the language of the statute (subdivision 7, section 2061, Code Civ. Proc.), "that if weaker and less satisfactory evidence is offered, when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory [evidence] was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust." The pertinency of the offered instruction is suggested in that certain persons who were present as the guests of the prosecuting witness at the time the jewelry was exhibited were not called by the prosecution as witnesses. It is admitted that the defendant was himself a guest of the prosecuting witness on the occasion referred to, and it would appear that, if the presence of such witnesses was desired at the trial, defendant was as able to procure the attendance of such witnesses as was the prosecution. We are unable to agree with appellant in the application of the statute to the existing facts.

It is contended that the court erred in its refusal to give to the jury the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that larceny is the felonious taking of the property of another without the knowledge or consent of the other, and with the intent of the party taking it, at the time of the taking, to permanently deprive the owner thereof, and with the further intent at said time to wholly and permanently appropriate the property so taken to the use of the party taking it. And, if you find from the evidence that it was not the intent of the defendant at the time of the taking to wholly and permanently appropriate it to his own use, then you cannot find him guilty of larceny."

The reason assigned by the trial court for refusing the requested instruction was that the subject was covered by other instructions which the court gave to the jury. In this connection it appears that the jury was instructed that "larceny is the felonious taking * * * of the property of another"; that "the intent or intention with which an act is done is manifest by the circumstances connected with the offense; * * * and that "the mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendant, however soon after taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction," etc.

Another instruction requested by defendant and refused by the court went more fully into the question of intent with which one's property may be appropriated by another, and included an illustration that—

"If, to illustrate, a man should take and carry away an article of property in an honest belief that it was his property, or that he had a right to remove it, or if he should take or carry away some article of property for any other purpose than the intent to steal it, it would not be larceny; it would be trespass."

Still another of defendant's proposed instructions which the court declined to give to the jury dealt particularly with the effect of possession by defendant of the stolen property. By a final instruction on the subject of larceny defendant sought and the court refused to instruct the jury practically in repetition of what was contained in the refused instructions to which reference has just been had.

Several other instructions along different lines, likewise suggested by defendant and refused by the court, such as the credibility to be given to defendant's testimony; the doctrine of reasonable doubt; the duty of the jury to decide the case according to the evidence and the law as given by the court; the presumption of innocence of defendant; and the weight of evidence necessary to justify a conviction—were all substantially covered by other instructions which the court gave to the jury.

[10] While each of defendant's offered instructions which were thus refused would appear to be a correct statement of the law respectively pertaining to the facts in the action, the authorities are clearly to the effect that, where the substance of a requested instruction is covered by other instructions given to the jury, the defendant has no cause for complaint. A comparison of the legal principles contained in the refused instructions with those contained in the instructions which were given to the jury leaves no substantial ground for believing that the jury was not fairly informed with reference to the law of the case.

[11] Some general criticisms are presented by appellant with reference to certain of the court's instructions; for example, the instructions which informed the jury that "a witness may be impeached by evidence that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony," and that "a witness false in one part of his or her testimony is to be distrusted in others." It is contended by appellant that such statements of the law are not broad enough and that the court should have singled out and emphasized certain matters appearing in the evidence as being proper subjects for the application of the rule to which reference was had. No authority is cited for the correctness of appellant's suggestion in that regard. At any rate, if defendant had thought such an instruction proper in the circumstances, he should have presented it for the consideration of the trial court. This he failed to do. Even assuming that defendant is right in his contention (which we are not prepared to do), as the matter stands, such omission cannot now be allowed as prejudicial error.

[12] Appellant further complains that, while the court instructed the jury that any expression of opinion by the court as to matters of fact was to be entirely disregarded by the jury, such instruction was not specific enough to cure a statement made by the judge during the course of the trial that "there is a conflict between the statements of the defendant." An examination of the proceedings of the trial which occurred at the time the court is credited with the foregoing remark shows that defendant was being asked to explain certain supposed inconsistencies in his former testimony. The record shows as follows:

"The Court: There is no conflict in what he testified to this time and what has been read.

"Mr. McGowen (attorney for defendant): No; no conflict in the testimony.

"The Court: Yes; a conflict in two points. One is he says he didn't know where she got them when she got them for him to wear. He says here she told him to go and get them. There is a conflict."

Even if there had been no inconsistency in defendant's testimony, the remark by the court, when considered with the instruction covering the point, could have produced no disadvantageous effect on the minds of the members of the jury, so far as defendant was concerned.

[13] In an instruction relating to the intent with which an act is done, that is, that such intent must be manifest by the circumstances connected with the offense and the sound mind and discretion of the accused, the court concluded with the statement that "all persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots or lunatics or affected with insanity." Appellant objects to that matter. Again, no authority is cited to support appellant's contention; nor is any argument attempted other than that it "clouds the issues." It may be that, in view of the fact that no issue was raised as to the state of defendant's mind, any reference thereto was unnecessary, but we are unable to perceive in what manner defendant was harmed thereby.

[14] The final contention by appellant relates to a part of an instruction given by the court to the jury as follows:

"If the jury believe the property was stolen, and was seen in the possession of defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and the accused is bound to explain the possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence discloses any such."

As is said in the case of People v. Gibson, 16 Cal. App. 347, 350, 116 P. 987, 988, where a similar instruction was given:

"The giving substantially in the form here used of instructions in like cases has been so often approved by the Supreme Court that it may be said the propriety thereof has become settled law in this state. People v. Horton, 7 Cal. App. 34, 93 Pac. 382; People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237; People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 646, 36 Pac. 129."

And see, also, People v. Davis, 14 Cal. App. 117, 111 P. 268; People v. Luchetti, 119 Cal. 501, 51 P. 707.

We find no prejudicial error in the record. The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

LOONEY et al. v. SCOTT. (Civ. 2805.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 16, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Findings of trial court, as to context of oral contract, conclusive on appeal, if supported by any testimony.

Where contract, under which plaintiffs are suing for services performed, was oral, it was for trial court to determine nature and context thereof, and findings of trial court, if supported by any testimony, are conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Truth of matter for trial court where evidence conflicting.

Where there is conflict of evidence, it is for trial court to determine truth of matter, and Court of Appeal can only look into record and find whether there is or is not any substantial testimony supporting findings of trial court.

3. Contracts ⇨214—Duty to use diligence in making sale, where compensation for services is to be made on sale of article on which services were performed.

Where compensation for services is to be made on sale of any article on which services have been performed, it is duty of other party to use reasonable diligence in making sale or finding market.

4. Contracts ⇨312(3)—Refusal to make sale of apples, upon which plaintiffs performed services and were to be compensated on sale thereof, authorized plaintiffs to immediately sue for services.

Where plaintiffs entered into oral agreement to dry apples belonging to defendant and were to receive compensation therefor when apples were shipped to market, refusal on part of defendant to accept an offer at market price for apples would authorize immediate institution of suit by plaintiffs to recover compensation for their services, as deliberate refusal to make sale constituted breach of agreement.

5. New trial ⇨91—Lack of knowledge as to admissibility of testimony and failure to present it on trial not ground for new trial.

Lack of knowledge or information as to admissibility of testimony and failure to present it on trial constitutes no ground for granting of new trial.

6. Contracts ⇨322(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiffs dried defendant's apples properly.

In action by plaintiffs for services performed in drying defendant's apples under oral agreement whereby plaintiffs were to be compensated upon sale of such dried apples, evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiffs dried such apples in a workmanlike manner and placed them in merchantable condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Fred Looney and another against H. R. Scott. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiffs for services performed in the drying of apples belonging to the defendant under an oral agreement. Plaintiffs had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

It appears from the transcript that defendant is the owner of an apple orchard situated in the county of Mendocino, state of California; that during the year 1922 he entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiffs for the drying of the apple crop then growing and being upon the orchard belonging to the defendant. The complaint in the action contains the following allegations:

"(1) That within two years last past defendant employed plaintiffs to dry his 1922 crop of apples at the agreed price of $50 per ton, and that said defendant agreed to pay said plaintiffs for said services when the last of said apple crop was shipped to market. * * *

"(2) That in accordance with said agreement, plaintiffs entered the employ of said defendant, and dried 33,287 pounds of apples at an agreed compensation of the sum of $832.15. That the said apples were all shipped to market on or before January 11, 1923, that the said defendant has not paid the plaintiffs the sum of $832.15," etc.

The plaintiffs had judgment for the amount sued for.

While a large number of assignments of error are presented by the appellant, only two need to be discussed herein, to wit: (1) That the action was prematurely brought; (2) that the findings of the court are not supported by the testimony.

It appears from the transcript that the plaintiffs, prior to performing any services for the defendant, had a conversation with him as to the agreed price to be paid, and also as to when payment therefor should be made. After the conclusion of the taking of testimony the court permitted an amendment to the complaint, substituting the word "Cloverdale" for the word "market." This amendment was permitted in view of the fact that the testimony in some instances showed that Cloverdale was the contemplated market of the parties when negotiating as to the time when payments should be made for the services to be performed by the plaintiffs for the defendant, the testimony clearly showing that all of the apples had been shipped to Cloverdale a considerable period before the institution of suit. The evidence was also to the effect that offers for the apples were made by prospective buyers while the same were at Cloverdale, and that the final sale was made of the apples at such place. The evidence further shows that prior to the delivery of the apples at Cloverdale the defendant was offered a considerable sum in excess of that at which the apples were finally sold. The defense to the action was that the apples were not properly handled, that the work was not performed in a skillful and workmanlike manner by the plaintiffs, and that the defendant had been damaged in a considerable sum of money, by reason of the failure of the plaintiffs to perform their work in a skillful and workmanlike manner, and that the apples dried by them were not merchantable, and were necessarily sold at a very low price. It also appears by the testimony of some of the witnesses that after the defendant had been offered 9 cents a pound for the apples, there was a very sharp decline in the price; that the price at Cloverdale dropped from 9 cents to about 5 cents a pound; that the defendant finally sold his apples, or at least 16 tons thereof, at the rate of 3 cents a pound. Upon the conclusion of the introduction of testimony the court made and entered its findings, in substance, as follows, to wit: That the plaintiffs and the defendant entered into the agreement hereinbefore set forth on or about the 4th day of September, 1922; that the plaintiffs dried the quantity of apples herein set forth; that the defendant agreed to pay plaintiffs for said services when said apples were hauled from the premises then owned by the defendant; that said apples were hauled from the premises on or about the 11th day of January, 1923; that there was no agreement that plaintiffs should or would thoroughly and properly or thoroughly or properly, handle, dry, and cure, or handle, or dry, or cure in a merchantable and marketable condition, or merchantable or marketable condition, free from peelings, cores, defective fruit, etc., any or all of said crop of apples; that the plaintiffs did not fail nor neglect to thoroughly and properly, or thoroughly or properly, dry and cure said apples in a merchantable and marketable condition; that the plaintiffs did thoroughly and properly handle, dry, and cure the said apples in a merchantable and marketable condition, and that said apples were thoroughly and properly handled, dried, and cured by said plaintiffs in a merchantable and marketable condition; that the defendant had not suffered any damages by reason of any handling and drying of the apples referred to by the said plaintiffs; that the apples were dried by the plaintiffs under the direction and personal superintendence of the defendant to his satisfaction, etc.

[1, 2] It is urgently insisted by the appellant that these findings are not supported by the evidence and, also, that the plaintiffs covenanted and agreed to perform all the work referred to in a skillful and workmanlike manner, etc. As to these findings, we may state that, irrespective of the agreement, the defendant is not injured thereby, for the reason that the court thereafter found that the work was all done in a skillful and workmanlike manner, and that the apples were dried and placed in a merchantable condition. In other words, that the work was properly done notwithstanding there was no agreement relating to the same. The testimony set out in the transcript is amply sufficient to justify the trial court in coming to the conclusion that the work was done under the personal supervision of the defendant in this case. It shows that the defendant was present every day upon the premises, that he delivered the apples to the dryer operated by the plaintiffs, that he was there a large number of times, gave directions as to having the apples quartered, instead of sliced or leafed, and generally saw and knew what was being done during the entire period covered by the process of drying the apples, that all the machinery being operated belonged to the defendant and was furnished by him, that some conversation took place between the plaintiffs and the defendant prior to the consummation of the agreement in which the plaintiffs stated to the defendant that they had had no experience in drying quartered apples, but had such experience in drying of leafed or sliced apples, and that the defendant stated, in substance, that this was immaterial, as he would be present and could look over what they were doing. This is in accordance with the version of the agreement and of what took place between the parties at the time it was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant as given by the plaintiffs. It differs quite materially from the version of the agreement as testified to by the defendant. However, as the contract was oral, it was for the trial court to determine the nature and the context of the agreement, and, if there is any testimony in the transcript supporting the findings of the court, such findings are conclusive herein. That such testimony does appear is clearly evidenced by the testimony given by the two plaintiffs. One of the plaintiffs testified that the defendant said, "I want you to dry the apples according to my way of drying"; that the defendant was present a number of times every day; that the defendant never objected to any of the work and showed the plaintiff several times as to how to perform different parts of the same. Outside of the testimony of the plaintiffs, there is also testimony by the witnesses Clow, Ward, and Burke, that the apples were dried in a workmanlike and merchantable condition, and were up to the average run of dried apples, especially when dried as quartered dried apples. In contradiction to the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs as to the quality of the work performed by them, the defendant introduced considerable testimony, including that of himself, that the work was not performed by the plaintiffs in a proper manner, and that the apples were not merchantable. Here, again, we are met by the rule governing Courts of Appeal in such instances. Where there is a conflict of evidence, it is for the trial court to determine the truth of the matter. All the Court of Appeal can do is to look into the record and find whether there is, or is not, any substantial testimony supporting the findings of the trial court. If believed by the trial court, there is ample testimony in the transcript to support the findings hereinbefore set forth, notwithstanding the fact that, if the findings had been to the contrary, such findings would also have found support from the testimony set out in the record. We do not find anything of merit in appellant's objection to the order of the trial court in permitting an amendment to the complaint at the conclusion of the taking of the testimony. If the trial court accepted the version of the plaintiffs as to the time of payment, it is clear that the parties had in contemplation the delivery of the apples at the town of Cloverdale.

[3] The rule seems to be pretty well settled that where compensation for services is to be made upon the sale of any article upon which the services have been performed, it is the duty of the other party to use reasonable diligence in making sale or finding a market. Williston v. Perkins, 51 Cal. 554; Earle v. Sunnyside Land Co., 150 Cal. 214, 88 P. 920; Campbell v. Kennedy, 177 Cal. 430, 170 P. 1107.

[4] There is testimony in the record to the effect that the defendant declined offers for the apples at a considerable time prior to their actual sale. Refusal on the part of the defendant to accept an offer at the market price for his apples would authorize an immediate institution of suit by the plaintiffs to recover compensation for their services. Under such circumstances, deliberate refusal to make sale constitutes a breach of the agreement. Spangenberg v. Spangenberg, 19 Cal. App. 439, 126 P. 379.

[5, 6] A motion for a new trial herein was supported by a number of affidavits, but none of the affidavits show that the proffered testimony could not have been presented to the court at the time of the trial, if reasonable diligence had been exercised. The excuse given by the defendant for the failure to present such testimony is that he was not advised of the fact that the kind and character of the testimony mentioned in the affidavits was admissible, until the trial of the action had taken place. Lack of knowledge or information as to the admissibility of testimony and failure to present the same upon the trial of an action constitutes no ground for the granting of a new trial. While we have carefully examined, it would serve no useful purpose to discuss the half hundred assignments of error, because they are all reducible to the real important question in this case. Are the findings supported by the testimony? The testimony to which we have referred is amply sufficient to warrant the findings made and entered by the trial court, and there are no errors at law materially affecting any of the rights of the defendant herein.

The judgment and order of the trial court are hereby affirmed.

COVELL et al. v. LEE, Superintendent of Schools. (Civ. 2907.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 19, 1925. Rehearing Denied March 20, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1925.)

1. Schools and school districts $\S$ 42(2)—Elementary school district cannot be made part of high school district against will of majority of registered electors of elementary district.

Under Pol. Code, $\S$ 1728, no elementary school district can become a part of high school district without petition of majority of registered electors of elementary district but, after proper petition is presented to county superintendent of schools, question of forming proposed high school district is determined by majority vote of all electors of proposed district.

2. Elections $\S$ 71—Married woman who had not seen nor heard of her husband for 25 years held resident and elector.

A woman, who had not seen nor heard of her husband for 25 years, held, irrespective of Pol. Code, $\S$ 52, subd. 5, $\S$ 1239, subds. 7, 9, and Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 26, a resident of the school district in which she lived and a registered elector within Pol. Code, $\S$ 1728.

3. Schools and school districts $\S$ 42(2)—Signers of petition for formation of high school district may withdraw prior to presentation.

Signers of petition for formation of high school district may withdraw their names from such petition prior to presentation of petition to county superintendent of schools by notice of withdrawal presented to superintendent.

On Petition for Rehearing.

4. Schools and schools districts $\S$ 42(2)—When petition for high school district not signed by majority of registered electors of one district, immaterial whether signed by majority of electors of other districts.

Where petition of registered electors of elementary school districts seeking formation of a high school district did not contain signatures of majority of registered electors of one of such districts, it was immaterial whether petition was signed by majority of electors of other districts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. I. Redding, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by C. A. Covell and another against Harriett S. Lee, as Superintendent of Schools of Yolo County. From a judgment denying the application, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 230 P. 208.

Dixwell L. Pierce, of Sacramento, for appellants.

George T. Kern, Dist. Atty., A. C. Huston, A. C. Huston, Jr., and Harry L. Huston, all of Woodland, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Petitioners applied to the trial court for a writ of mandate requiring the respondent, as county superintendent of schools, to call an election for the determination of the question of establishing a high school district to be named "Davis Joint Union High School District." Respondent answered the petition and after a hearing the application was denied. This appeal is from the judgment.

A petition in due form was presented to the respondent praying for the formation of such high school district to be composed of four elementary school districts. Respondent found that the petition was signed by a majority of the registered electors of three of the districts, but that in one of them, Plainfield, there were 54 registered electors, and that only 27 of them had joined in the petition. She therefore refused to call an election to determine the question. Section 1728 of the Political Code provides:

"Whenever a majority of the registered electors, residing in each of two or more contiguous school districts, having in the aggregate at least one hundred pupils in average daily attendance in the elementary schools of such districts, shall unite in a petition to the superintendent of schools of the county who would have jurisdiction over the joint high school district proposed to be formed, which petition shall pray for the formation of a joint union high school district, under a name specified therein, such superintendent shall, within twenty days after receipt of such petition, verify the signatures thereto, and, if he finds it sufficient,"

—he shall call an election for the determination of the question of establishing such high school district. If a majority of the votes cast at such election are in favor of the formation of such high school district, the superintendent shall so certify to the county clerk, and thereupon the district shall be deemed to be formed.

[1] It is to be observed that no elementary school district can become a part of the high school district against the will of a majority of the registered electors of the elementary district. Such will, however, can be expressed effectively only by signing or refusing to sign the petition for the formation of the high school district. After a proper petition is presented to the superintendent, the question of forming the proposed high school district is determined by a majority vote of all the electors of the proposed district. If such majority be in favor of the proposition, then all of the elementary districts are included in the high school district, even though the electors of some one of them may have voted unanimously against the proposition. It is of great importance, therefore, that the petition represent the will of a majority of the electors of every elementary district proposed to be included in the high school district.

[2] Appellants contend that there were only 53 legally registered electors in Plainfield district; that a certain woman whose name appeared upon the register and was counted by respondent in making up the 54 electors was not a resident of the district, because she was a married woman whose husband did not reside in the district and "the residence of the husband is the residence of the wife." Pol. Code, § 52, subd. 5; section 1239, subd. 9. It may be observed in passing that "the place where a man's family resides must be held to be his residence." Section 1239, subd. 7. It is not necessary, however, to follow these two rules around a circle in determining the question here presented. The woman testified that she had once been married, but that she did not know whether she was still married at the time of the trial, because she had not seen or heard of her husband for 25 years. It is presumed "that a person not heard from in 7 years is dead." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 26. But aside from this presumption, in this day of woman's rights, it would be a startling pronouncement to hold that a woman continuously separated from her husband could not establish a residence of her own in a quarter of a century. Whether or not the woman's residence is a proper subject of inquiry in this proceeding, the only rational inference from the evidence is that she was a resident and legally registered elector of the district at the time the petition was presented.

[3] Thirty registered electors of Plainfield district signed the petition while it was being circulated. Three of them later signed written requests, addressed to the superintendent, for the withdrawal of their names from the petition in the following language:

"After reconsideration of the high school problem as affecting the Plainfield school district we, the undersigned, respectfully request that our names be withdrawn from the petition calling for an election on the proposed Davis high school district."

These requests were presented to the superintendent at a time prior to the presentation or filing of the petition. In computing the number of signers the superintendent rejected these three names, thus reducing the number to 27. Appellants contend that these names should have been counted. It is not contended that the signers could not have withdrawn their names from the petition in some manner before it was filed, but it is suggested that the request for such withdrawal should have been made to the person who circulated the petition. It is not suggested what remedy would be available to one seeking to withdraw, if the person who circulated a petition should refuse to accede to the request.

It is not necessary to review the many decisions of other jurisdictions relied on by appellants. They go no further than to hold, as was held in Beecham v. Burns, 34 Cal. App. 754, 760, 168 P. 1058, 1061, where the right to withdraw from a petition for the recall of a public officer was considered, that "the signers of such petitions may not withdraw their names or have their names withdrawn by the clerk at any time after the petition has been filed." The California Irrigation Act (Stats. 1897, p. 254) provides that the board of supervisors of a county, upon presentation of a petition signed as therein provided, and after due proceedings had thereon, shall call an election to determine the question of organizing an irrigation district. The act provides that:

"Said petition shall be presented at a regular meeting of said board, and shall be published for at least two weeks before the time at which the same is to be presented, in some newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the county where said petition is presented, together with a notice stating the time of the meeting at which the same will be presented." Section 2.

In McAulay v. Board of Supervisors, 178 Cal. 628, 174 P. 30, the question of the right of petitioners to withdraw from such a petition was in issue. An examination of the record in that case discloses that, after the commencement of publication of notice and prior to the time designated therein for the presentation of the petition to the supervisors, certain signers of the petition filed with the clerk of the board a writing which recited that they had signed the petition and ended as follows:

"We hereby ask that our names be stricken from the same, and that the said petition be denied."

The supervisors found that "by reason of such withdrawals" the petition was insufficient and refused to proceed further in the matter. At that time the act made no provision for the withdrawal of signatures from the petition. In the argument before the Supreme Court many of the cases on which appellants herein rely were cited. The court held that:

"Petitioners * * * may effectively withdraw from the petition for the organization of such district at any time prior to the presentation of the petition to the board of supervisors on the date fixed in the published notice for such presentation, with the result that at the time of such presentation they can no longer be considered by the board as petitioners."

The right of withdrawal, the procedure adopted, and the stage of the proceeding at which the withdrawals were effected in that case were the same in principle as in this, and the decision therein must be held controlling here.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; PLUMMER, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In their petition for a rehearing appellants state that the opinion filed herein does not dispose of their contention that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment.

[4] The findings were considered in Covell v. Lee (Cal. App.) 230 P. 208, and what is there said need not be repeated here. The finding there set out is necessarily decisive against the appellants and is sufficient to support the judgment. Since the petition did not contain the signatures of a majority of the registered electors of Plainfield district it was immaterial whether it was signed by a majority of the electors of other districts. Phillips v. Stark (Cal. App.) 223 P. 443. The finding is not outside the issues, but it is responsive to the only issue raised by the pleadings.

The petition is denied.

PEOPLE v. JAMES. (Cr. 1164.)

1. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 162—Statute punishing felons for owning or carrying concealed weapons held not unconstitutional as double jeopardy.

St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, punishing certain felons for owning or carrying weapons that may be concealed, held not unconstitutional as imposing double jeopardy for same offense, since prior conviction constitutes no new offense itself, but merely brings defendant within a class capable of committing offense with which he is charged.

2. Weapons $\hookrightarrow$ 2—Legislature may say that ownership or possession of concealed weapons by felons is harmful.

Legislature may say that ownership or possession of concealed weapons by persons convicted of felony may be harmful to public welfare and may prescribe a penalty therefor.

3. Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 200—Statute punishing felons for owning or carrying concealed weapons held not unconstitutional as ex post facto law.

St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, punishing certain felons for owning or carrying weapons that may be concealed, held not unconstitutional as an ex post facto law because applying to convictions had before statute became effective.

4. Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 203—Law not ex post facto because authorizing offender's conduct in past to be taken into account.

Law is not ex post facto because, in providing for punishment of future offenses, it authorizes offender's conduct in past to be taken into account and punishment to be graduated accordingly.

5. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 72—Statute prohibiting certain felons from carrying or owning concealed weapons held not violative of Constitution requiring all laws to have uniform operation.

St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, prohibiting certain felons from owning or carrying weapons that may be concealed, held not violative of Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring all laws to have uniform operation.

6. Weapons $\hookrightarrow$ 17(1)—Sufficiency of information not affected by failure to allege that defendant was within disability prescribed by statute.

Failure in information in prosecution under St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, prohibiting certain felons from owning or carrying concealed weapons, to allege that defendant was within disability prescribed by statute, held not to affect defendant's substantial rights or to justify sustaining of general demurrer under Pen. Code, § 1004, without leave to amend.

7. Weapons $\hookrightarrow$ 17(1)—Sufficiency of information not affected by failure to allege that defendant's weapon could be concealed.

Failure of information, in prosecution under St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, prohibiting certain felons from carrying or owning concealed weapons, to allege except in terms of a mere conclusion that defendant's weapon was capable of being concealed, held not to affect defendant's substantial rights or justify sustaining of general demurrer under Pen. Code, § 1004, without leave to amend.

8. Indictment and information $\hookrightarrow$ 111(1) — Sufficiency of information not affected by failure to aver that weapon did not come within exception.

Sufficiency of information in prosecution under St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, prohibiting certain felons from carrying or owning concealed weapons, held not affected by failure to allege that defendant's revolver was not an antique or incapable of use as a revolver as provided in section 15; such section being a proviso and not being required to be negative.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Joe James was indicted for unlawful possession of a revolver, and from order sustaining demurrer to information the People appeal. Reversed, and cause remanded.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.
Gearhart, Carling & Cummings, of Fresno, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal by the people from an order of the superior court of Fresno county sustaining, without leave to amend, a demurrer to an information charging defendant with the commission of a felony.

The charging portion of the information alleged that defendant on the 22d day of August, 1923, had in his possession under his custody and control a certain firearm, to wit, a revolver, capable of being concealed upon his person, and that he, prior to the date named, to wit, on or about the 24th day of December, 1914, had been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another.

The information was premised upon the provisions of section 2 of chapter 339 of the Statutes of 1923, approved June 13, 1923, p. 696, and in effect on the 17th day of August of that year. That section reads as follows:

"On and after the date upon which this act takes effect, no unnaturalized foreign-born person and no person who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another or against the government of the United States or of the state of California or of any political subdivision thereof shall own or have in his possession or under his custody or control any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person. The terms 'pistol,' 'revolver,' and 'firearms capable of being concealed upon the person' as used in this act shall be construed to apply to and include all firearms having a barrel less than 12 inches in length. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year nor for more than five years."

The demurrer to the information specified all the grounds permitted under section 1004 of the Penal Code. As above stated, the court below sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and the people appeal.

[1, 2] In support of the ruling of the trial court, it is here claimed by respondent that the demurrer was properly sustained for the reasons: (1) That the act upon which the information is based is unconstitutional; and (2) disregarding its unconstitutionality and assuming its validity, still the information does not state a criminal offense.

Several grounds are urged against the constitutionality of the statute. It is first asserted that it violates the constitutional guaranty that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. In this connection it is argued that section 5 of the act makes it plain that owning, possessing, or having in one's custody a firearm capable of being concealed upon the person is a perfectly innocent act, and that this being so defendant is not charged with any new offense, but is again being informed against for his prior offense, and is, consequently, being twice put in jeopardy therefor.

But the ownership or possession of firearms capable of being concealed upon the person is not an innocent act so far as the defendant is concerned. Section 5 of the act provides, in part:

"This section shall not be construed to prohibit any citizen of the United States, over the age of 18 years, who resides or is temporarily sojourning within this state, and who is not within the excepted classes [one of which is the ex-convict class] prescribed by section 2 hereof, from owning, possessing or keeping within his place of residence or place of business any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person, and no permit or license to purchase, own, possess or keep any such firearm at his place of residence or place of business shall be required of any such citizen."

By the very terms of the act defendant is excluded from the right to own or possess firearms, and it is within the power of the Legislature to say that such ownership or possession in a person convicted of a felony may be harmful to the public welfare and to prescribe a penalty therefor. Ex parte Rameriz, 193 Cal. 633, 226 P. 914, 918, 34 A. L. R. 51. By being prosecuted upon the present charge the defendant is not again being punished for his past offense, but his conviction of such offense creates a condition in which the subsequent commission of another and different act renders him amenable to prosecution for that act. The prior conviction constitutes no new offense itself, but merely brings defendant within a class capable of committing the offense with which he is charged. People v. King, 64 Cal. 340, 30 P. 1028; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401. It is to be observed in this connection that unnaturalized foreign-born persons, bearing no stigma of any prior conviction, are by the act placed under the same disability. It seems to be plain that the inhibition against ownership or possession of a certain class of firearms is referred to the status of the persons affected.

The constitutionality of the act is also assailed upon the ground, as claimed, that it is an ex post facto law and retroactive in operation if construed as applying to the present charge against defendant, since the prior conviction pleaded was had before the instant act became operative.

[3, 4] A law is not objectionable as ex post facto which in providing for the punishment of future offenses authorizes the offender's conduct in the past to be taken into account and the punishment to be graduated accordingly. Heavier penalties are often provided by law for a second or any subsequent offense than for the first; and it has not been deemed objectionable that in providing for such heavier penalties the prior conviction authorized to be taken into account may have taken place before the law was passed. Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 429; Rand v. Commonwealth, 9 Grat. (Va.) 738; Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 382. In such case it is the second or subsequent offense which is punished, not the first.

[5] It is also urged that the act in question is violative of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution, requiring all laws to have a uniform operation; it being claimed that the classification here adopted is arbitrary, unreasonable, and not based upon any natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction.

This objection is answered in the Rameriz Case, supra, where the cases on the subject are extensively reviewed. It is there said that it cannot be assumed that the Legislature did not have evidence before it or that it did not have reasonable grounds to justify the legislation and to conclude that unnaturalized foreign-born persons and persons who have been convicted of a felony were more likely than others to unlawfully use firearms or to resort to force in defiance of law. Nor does the fact that the Legislature, in adopting a classification comprising persons who have committed offenses "against the person or property of another," thereby omits those who may have been convicted of other crimes, alter the situation. In the case of Patson v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 34 S. Ct. 282, 58 L. Ed. 539 (cited with approval in the Rameriz Case), it is said that—

"A state may classify with reference to the evil to be prevented, and that if the class discriminated against is or reasonably might be considered to define those from whom the evil * * * is to be feared, it properly may be picked out. A lack of abstract symmetry does not matter. The question is a practical one dependent upon experience. * * * It is not enough to invalidate the law that others may do the same thing and go unpunished, if, as a matter of fact, it is found that the danger is characteristic of the class named." Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 35 S. Ct. 342, 59 L. Ed. 628, L. R. A. 1915A. 829; Armour & Co. v. North Dakota, 240 U. S. 510, 517, 36 S. Ct. 440, 60 L. Ed. 771, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 548.

[6-8] And, finally, with reference to the claim that, disregarding the unconstitutionality of the act and assuming its validity, the information filed under its provisions does not state a public offense. The information charged that defendant "did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously have in his possession and under his custody and control a certain firearm, to wit, a revolver capable of being concealed on the person of the defendant, and that the defendant prior to the date hereof, to wit, on or about the 24th day of December, 1914, in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Fresno was convicted of a felony against the person and property of another, to wit, the crime of robbery." The point of this objection is that the information does not directly allege that at the time of having the revolver in his possession defendant was suffering from the disability prescribed by the statute.

The omission of such a conclusion could in no manner affect the substantial rights of the defendant, and in any event it could not possibly justify the sustaining of a general demurrer without leave to amend. The same may be said of the further claim that the information fails to allege, except in terms of a mere conclusion, the fact that the weapon, which defendant is accused of having in his possession, was capable of being concealed upon the person. Section 15 of the act provides as follows: "This act shall not apply to antique pistols or revolvers incapable of use as such." Absence from the information of an averment of the fact that the revolver did not come within the exception did not, as claimed, affect its sufficiency. It is not required to be negated as it is a mere proviso. 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 639.

The order sustaining the demurrer to the information is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial.

SLY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4934.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 14, 1925.)

1. Prohibition $\S$ 29—Finding that continuance of receivership is unnecessary or unjust not disturbed in absence of evidence, or showing that financially irresponsible defendant would be given control of properties.

Order for discontinuance of receivership, on ground that further continuance is unnecessary and would work hardship, will not be disturbed, though solvency of defendant is disputed, where there is no showing that latter will be given possession or control of property pending suit, though there has been no adjudication of rights, within provisions of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 564, subds. 3, 4.

2. Prohibition $\S$ 29—Receivers $\S$ 60—Discontinuance of receivership within court's sound discretion; discontinuance of receivership not disturbed when judgment must be given for defendants.

Discontinuance of receivership is within court's sound discretion, and will not be disturbed by appellate court when it appears after trial that judgment must be given for defendants.

3. Prohibition —29—Peremptory writ to prevent discharge of receiver, as directed by court order, unless plaintiff furnished bond by certain time, denied.

In absence of express stipulation exempting plaintiff from furnishing bond on appointment of receiver, or sufficient information in record as to need of additional security, or any showing of abuse of discretion in fixing amount of bond, peremptory writ of prohibition to prevent discharge of receiver, as directed by court order, if bond in stated sum were not furnished by certain time, will be denied, though no bond was required by order appointing receiver or subsequent modifications thereof.

Original application by Elmer L. Sly for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Charles S. Burnell, Judge, to prevent discharge of receiver in action for accounting. Peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

Craig & Bromley, of Los Angeles, J. F. Seymour, of El Centro, and V. L. Ferguson, for petitioner.

Glen Behymer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Petitioner herein seeks a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court of Los Angeles county from discharging a receiver in an action wherein petitioner is plaintiff, and William Abbott, John Gray, and Lena Abbott are defendants. The action was commenced for an accounting, and involved certain real estate transactions, contracts, and moneys which were in dispute between the parties. One Charles R. Morfoot was appointed by the trial court to act as a referee to take evidence and report his findings to the court as a basis for final judgment. He was, at the same time, appointed receiver to take charge of all contracts, to collect the amounts due, and to pay the same to the plaintiff in settlement of such amount as an accounting should show to be due, with the usual powers of receivers, upon filing a bond in the usual form in the penal sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties. The appointment was included in the terms of an order, which also directed that the default of said defendants be entered for failure to answer the complaint. It was thereafter stipulated that the default be vacated and set aside, but that the receiver be continued in office. The lower court thereupon set aside such default and directed that the order appointing the receiver be continued in full force and effect during the pendency of the action, and that the receiver hold all sums of money received by him during his incumbency until the final determination of the action.

It does not appear that the referee heard evidence or made any report, but it does appear that thereafter, and on July 9, 1924, the referee receiver was ordered to immediately return to various banks all purchase and sale contracts received by him, which they should hold as agents for the receiver, and collect all past due and future payments; that all moneys thereafter received should be held and disbursed upon the orders of the court, and not otherwise, but that, "other than as herein specified, said order heretofore made appointing said receiver shall remain in full force and effect." A further order was made on September 13, 1924, directing payment to the record owners of 21 lots of certain moneys due them, and on the 7th day of October it was stipulated by the parties that any sums of money then due and payable to original owners under these contracts be paid by the receiver and the banks.

The case was brought to trial before the superior court during the month of October, and the judge thereof recites in the return filed in this court:

That it appeared at the conclusion of the evidence "that the plaintiff herein should not recover as against the defendant John Gray, and that the further continuation of the said receivership would work an irreparable loss and injury to the defendant John Gray, and it appearing to the said superior court, department 4 thereof, Charles S. Burnell, judge presiding therein, that no proper bond to indemnify the said John Gray for loss and damage he might sustain by reason of said receivership had been filed in said action."

On October 16, 1924, the plaintiff, petitioner herein, was ordered to furnish bond in the sum of $30,000, and the trial court then stated that, unless such indemnity be filed by 5 o'clock of the following day, said receiver would be discharged.

[1] Petitioner avers that on the final day of the trial briefs were ordered filed, but that no briefs have been served or filed, and that no judgment has been rendered. The nature of the transactions involved, or the amounts in controversy, do not appear, and there is no showing that a $30,000 bond is excessive. It does appear that upon the conclusion of the trial upon the merits the lower court determined that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any of the relief sought by him from the defendant Gray, and that there was no probability of an ultimate recovery by the plaintiff in said action. Of course, the facts here do not bring the application within subdivisions 3 or 4 of section 564, Code of Civil Procedure. Otherwise, as was held in Wiencke v. Bibby, 15 Cal. App. 50, 113 P. 876, a trial court would not be justified in continuing the receiver in office after the rights of the parties to the action had been adjudicated. It was there said:

"The action of the court cannot be disturbed for the simple reason that error is not shown. It was probably not necessary for the court to make this formal order, but appellant has shown no ground for complaint. The presumptions are, of course, in favor of the regularity of the proceedings, and we must assume that the court was entirely justified in making the order. Kahn v. Mattai, 115 Cal. 692, 47 P. 698. The evidence is not brought up, and hence there is nothing for us to review. If necessary, several reasons could be suggested why the court's action should be considered warranted. Upon the assumption that the order appointing the receiver was void as being in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, it was proper, although not essential, to vacate and set it aside. Again, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant. This of itself would terminate the authority of the receiver who is appointed to hold and preserve the property only during the pendency of the action. The court assuredly would not be justified in continuing the receiver in office after the rights of the parties to the action had been adjudicated, although he could be required to render his account and deliver the property to the person to whom the court awarded it. To the suggestion that the account of the receiver should have been settled and his compensation allowed, there is this additional answer to be made, that the receiver is not here complaining, and if these considerations should be deemed material, we must presume that everything required by the law was done before this order—treating it as a discharge—was made."

As we have said, the court below heard all the evidence, which is not before us, and although there is a dispute as to the financial responsibility of defendant Gray to respond in damages in the event of plaintiff's ultimate recovery, there is no showing that said defendant would be given possession and control of the properties in suit. Several banks are now holding the contracts, and collecting the moneys, to be held by them, subject to orders of the trial court, and not otherwise, "as the agents of said receiver." We cannot say, therefore, that the continuation of the receivership would be necessary, or that it would not work an injustice. The court below has found otherwise and provided depositaries which are apparently responsible, and under its control. It was held in Copper Hill Mining Co. v. Spencer, 25 Cal. 11, that an order appointing a receiver might be vacated before trial upon a proper showing, and "with much greater reason after it had appeared upon the trial, to the satisfaction of the judge, that there was no probability of an ultimate recovery in the action." We would hesitate to say upon the showing here made that the appointment of a receiver was, or was not, justified in the first instance.

[2] The power to discharge a receiver being a necessary adjunct to the power of appointment, the question of his removal is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and will not be disturbed by an appellate court when it appears after trial that judgment must be given in favor of the defendants. High on Receivers (4th Ed.) § 8.

[3] Petitioner's argument and entire case before us is based upon the assumption that the trial court threatens to and unless enjoined will discharge the receiver. This is not entirely true, nor is it an accurate statement of the situation. The court's action was to require that the plaintiff furnish a bond of $30,000. It must be conceded that in a proper case the trial court has full authority to require that such bond be given. It is true that no bond was directed to be supplied by the plaintiff under the terms of the first order appointing a receiver, nor by the subsequent modifications thereof made upon stipulation. However, there is no express stipulation exempting the plaintiff from the necessity of furnishing a bond. While none appears to have been asked by the defendants, upon the taking of testimony the court may well have concluded that the facts presented were such that the protection of the interests of the defendants made additional security desirable and necessary. The record before us on this application contains insufficient information to advise us upon the absence or existence of such a need. Where no abuse of discretion in a matter of this character is shown, an appellate court is not justified in concluding that the trial court was in error. Also, the record is barren of any showing which would indicate that the order involved an abuse of discretion as to the amount of bond required. Since the trial court has signified no intention of discharging the receiver if the undertaking named in its order is furnished, and as we cannot say that the fair protection of property rights involved does not demand such security, the peremptory writ must be denied, and the alternative writ discharged, and it is so ordered.

EBERHART v. SALAZAR et al. (Civ. 4756.)

1. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 158—Where defendants filed verified amended answer after default judgment, no affidavit of merits was necessary to support motion to vacate default.

Where defendants filed amended answer duly verified setting forth defense to cause of action alleged in complaint two days after default judgment was entered, it constituted part of record and files in case, when motion to vacate default was served and presented, and no affidavit of merits was necessary.

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 161—That copy of amended answer previously filed was not served on plaintiff nor produced in court on hearing of motion to vacate default held immaterial.

Where defendants filed verified amended answer two days after default judgment was entered, it constituted part of record and files in case, and fact that no copy thereof was served on plaintiff nor produced in court on motion to vacate default judgment was immaterial, where notice of motion stated that it was made on notice and record.

3. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 957(1)—Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 139—Trial court has discretion to vacate default and its ruling will not be set aside except for clear abuse.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, trial court has discretion to grant or refuse application to vacate default, and its action thereon will not be set aside on appeal unless abuse of discretion clearly appears, and any doubt should be resolved in favor of application.

4. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 143(12)—Affidavit supporting motion to open default judgment held sufficient.

Affidavit supporting defendant's motion to vacate default judgment alleging that amended answer was mailed by defendant's attorney in San Francisco to county clerk of Contra Costa county, 35 miles away, on last day to file pleading, and that there was regular mail between such places, held to justify court in vacating default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by C. G. Eberhart against A. J. Salazar and another. From an order setting aside a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Royle A. Carter, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is plaintiff's appeal from an order vacating and setting aside a default judgment in an action wherein defendants failed to file their amended answer within the time fixed by the order of court, after a demurrer to the original answer had been sustained.

The record discloses that the court by ex parte order had extended defendants' time to file said amended pleading until and including Friday, March 30, 1923. On the day following, Saturday, March 31, 1923, the amended pleading, not then having been filed, the clerk of said court, at plaintiff's request, entered judgment by default against said defendants. On April 11, 1923, defendants served notice of motion to set aside said default judgment, and pursuant to an order shortening time, said motion was heard on April 13, 1923, and, on May 8, 1923, was granted.

It appears from the affidavit presented in support of defendants' motion to vacate said default judgment that said amended pleading was mailed in San Francisco on March 30, 1923, by defendants' attorney to the county clerk of Contra Costa county, at Martinez, and it is averred in said affidavit that the distance from San Francisco to Martinez is 35 miles and that between the places there is a regular communication by mail. The exact time said amended pleading arrived in Martinez is not shown, but it positively appears that, notwithstanding the entry of said default judgment on Saturday, March 31, 1923, said amended pleading was filed by the county clerk on Monday, April 2, 1923, and that the same thereafter continued to remain a part of the files in the action. Such fact is established by the duly authenticated amendment to the record brought up on a motion for diminution thereof.

[1] Appellant's first contention on this appeal is that the order appealed from was based upon a defective affidavit of merits in that said affidavit was made by the attorney for defendants, and not by the defendants themselves; that no reason was given therein why said affidavit was not made by one of the parties; that it contained no averment that said attorney was familiar with the facts, and that the statement made therein that "the defendants have a good and sufficient defense on the merits to said action" was insufficient.

[2] We think that appellant's contention cannot be sustained, for the reason that it clearly appears from the record that on Monday, April 2, 1923, within two days after the default judgment had been entered, said amended pleading, duly verified by one of the defendants, and setting forth the defense to the cause of action alleged in the complaint, was filed in the office of the county clerk, and constituted a part of the record and files in the case when the motion to vacate the default was served and presented. Therefore, no affidavit of merits was necessary. Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 P. 932;

Fulweiler v. Min. Co., 83 Cal. 126, 23 P. 65; San Diego Realty Co. v. McGinn, 7 Cal. App. 264, 94 P. 374.

The fact, if it be a fact, that a copy of said amended answer was not served upon appellant nor produced in court on April 11, 1923, at the time of the hearing of said motion, does not alter the situation. Respondents' notice of motion stated that said motion would be made on said notice "and on the entire record in the action, the minutes of the clerk, the files, and records and pleadings." As above pointed out, on April 2, 1923, said amended answer became and thereafter continued to be a part of the records and files in the action, with which appellant was charged with notice, and was available as an affidavit showing a meritorious defense. Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Savage v. Smith, supra.

[3] Appellant's second point is that the facts averred in said affidavit were not such as to show excusable neglect on the part of defendants. In Savage v. Smith, supra, it was said:

"As we have recently had occasion to say: 'The law governing this class of cases is so well settled and has been so often declared in the decisions of this court that we may dispense with the citation of authorities. An application to be relieved from a default under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court and the action of that court will not be set aside on appeal unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. Any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application to the end of securing a trial upon the merits.' " Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 P. 426.

[4] We are satisfied that the facts averred in the affidavit fully justified the court in vacating the default.

The order appealed from is, therefore, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ALBEXSTONDARE.

1. Physicians and surgeons §6(10)—Evidence held to show accused practiced healing without license.

Evidence held sufficient to establish beyond reasonable doubt that accused practiced healing without license, even if testimony by members of patients' families was incompetent as being that of accomplices.

2. Criminal law §1186(4)—Errors not resulting in miscarriage of justice disregarded.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, errors at trial as to accomplice testimony, where conviction was sustained by other evidence, must be disregarded.

3. Criminal law §1173(2)—Refusal of instruction relating to corroboration of accomplices held not error where accused's guilt established beyond reasonable doubt.

Refusal to instruct as to corroboration of accomplices was not error, where uncontradicted evidence established accused's guilt of practicing healing without license beyond reasonable doubt, even if testimony of members of patients' families was incompetent as that of accomplices.

4. Physicians and surgeons §6(1)—Compensation not necessary to conviction for practicing healing without license.

Compensation for his services is not necessary to conviction of accused for practicing healing without license.

5. Criminal law §728(1)—Instruction held to cure impropriety of court's remark in jury's presence.

In absence of objection or motion to strike out court's remark in presence of jury that motion for postponement was scheme to obtain delay rather than to get justice, refusal of charge to disregard remarks of court indicating its opinion was not error, where court instructed that any conversations between court and counsel had nothing to do with case.

6. Criminal law §1172(1)—Instruction that credibility of accused's testimony is to be weighed by rules applicable to other witnesses held harmless.

In prosecution for practicing healing without license, instruction that credibility of accused's testimony is to be weighed by same rules applicable to that of other witnesses, though erroneous, was harmless, where only effect of disbelieving accused's testimony would be to discredit his testimony that he was not physician licensed to practice in state.

7. Physicians and surgeons §6(10)—Admission of testimony check was delivered to accused practicing healing without license held not prejudicial.

Admission of testimony that check was delivered to accused for services in practicing healing without license without competent proof that he cashed check was not prejudicial, since compensation is immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

R. H. W. Albexstondare was convicted of practicing healing without a license, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Richardson and Wm. J. Clark, both of Los Angeles, and Otto Sanaker, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen. (A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of practicing a mode and system of treating the sick and afflicted without having a valid unrevoked certificate or license from the board of medical examiners of the state of California so to do. The evidence shows that two young women of different families were the subjects of defendant's ministrations, and that he was actively assisted therein by the members of their respective families. Many reasons are urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Among them are the following:

(1) That the court erred in its refusal to grant defendant's motion for a continuance of the trial of the action against him; and that because of such refusal defendant was unable to procure the attendance of certain witnesses who would have testified in effect that they told all the different members of the family of one of the said two patients of defendant that he (defendant) "was not a physician nor licensed to practice medicine; that he would not attempt to treat a patient as a physician; * * * that he had made a study and had conducted research work in dietetics; that he did not profess any medical skill; that he would not examine or treat the patient, nor would he make any suggestions as to such patient's diet, without the presence and approval of such patient's physician."

(2) That the court erred in sustaining objections made by the prosecution to questions asked by defendant of witnesses, both on direct examination and on cross-examination, which questions, had they been answered by such witnesses, would have proved, or at least tended to prove, that at all times when defendant either treated or attempted to treat the said two patients all the members of their respective families had knowledge of the fact that defendant was not a physician nor licensed to practice medicine within the state of California.

(3) That the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by defendant relating to the law appertaining to accomplices.

The theory upon which each of such points is presented is that the several members of the family of the patient, having prior knowledge of the fact that defendant was not a licensed medical practitioner within this state, and they with such knowledge having co-operated with defendant in the treatment of the patient, these facts brought them within the rule that one who in any manner, knowingly and with criminal intent, aids and abets another in the commission of a criminal act is as guilty of the offense as is the person who actually commits it, and consequently that the members of the family who, with such knowledge of the facts, assisted defendant in the treatment of the patient were accomplices of defendant, and that their testimony was subject to the statute which required that before defendant could be convicted on the testimony of accomplices it was necessary that it be corroborated by evidence which tended to connect defendant with the commission of the offense. The entire question in that regard, therefore, revolves around the solution of the problem of whether or not the members of the family were accomplices of defendant.

Section 31 of the Penal Code, so far as its provisions are here applicable, is as follows:

"All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, * * * whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, or, not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission, * * * are principals in any crime so committed."

Section 1111 of the Penal Code provides:

"A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof. An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given."

Considering, first, that both by the witnesses whose presence at the trial could not be had because of the refusal of the court to grant a continuance of the hearing of the action, and as well by questions which were propounded by defendant on direct examination and on cross-examination of other witnesses who testified on the trial, defendant sought to establish the fact that all the members of the family of one of the patients had been informed that defendant was not a physician, nor licensed to practice medicine in this state, it is apparent that if the members of the family of the patient are not excluded from the general rule which makes an accomplice of one who with criminal intent assists in the commission of a criminal act, knowledge on the part of such members of the family of the nature or character of the act to be committed by defendant was an essential element in determining the question of whether or not such persons were accomplices.

It is apparent that if the member of the family of the patient in good faith believed that defendant was a physician and licensed by the state board of medical examiners to act as such, their co-operation with defendant in treating the patient would not have been criminal. Their knowledge of defendant's lack of statutory qualifications in the premises was prerequisite to any constructive criminal intent on their part. Assuming such actual knowledge by the members of the family, and constructive knowledge on their part that the law forbade any one to treat the sick without "then and there having a valid unrevoked certificate of license from the board of medical examiners of the state of California," it would seem probable that they occupied a position not differing in the law from that occupied by any person not a member of the patient's family who assisted in such treatment.

It may perhaps be considered a hard law which, without incurring severe legal consequences, will not permit the members of the family of an afflicted person to actively assist and co-operate with one who is not licensed to practice the medical profession in what may be an honest endeavor in good faith to alleviate human suffering. The belief may be strong and possibly well founded that such disqualified person may be able materially to assist in restoring the health of the patient, and yet the demands of the law are such that if the statute regulating such practice be disobeyed, all who aid and abet in the commission of the inhibited act shall be equally guilty with the one who actually commits it. The degree of blood relationship in which the members of the family stand to the patient cannot be a factor in determining whether or not the persons assisting in the unlawful act are subject to the provisions of the statute. If it were not so, possibly a mother or a father who actively assisted an unlicensed practitioner in the treatment of a daughter of such parent might be immune from punishment for an infraction of the statute; while a cousin or even a brother or a sister of the patient would be compelled to suffer the penalties imposed by the law.

The language of the law is "all persons concerned in the commission of a crime" who aid and abet in its commission are principals in the crime so committed. Neither would the worthiness of the contemplated ultimate object of the act to be committed in any manner affect the construction of the statute. If the father of his starving children should "aid and abet" or encourage a highwayman in committing a robbery for the express purpose of relieving the distress of the loved ones, while perhaps no one would deny the existence of such extenuating circumstances as should possibly operate, partly if not wholly, to excuse the commission of the crime, the strict interpretation of the law would undoubtedly be that the father by his assistance or encouragement was as much a principal in the robbery as though he had assisted another in the commission of any other offense against the criminal statutes without such impelling motive on his part being present. In such circumstances the cry of the agonized parent would not be heard to prevail as against the unsympathetic words of the law. And so here, assuming that the members of the family of the patient in the highest good faith were engaged in the praiseworthy business of attempting to alleviate the suffering, or to effect a permanent cure, of the afflicted one, yet the language of the statute and the decisions of the courts do not permit of the exercise of discretion as to when or under what circumstances the letter of the law may be disregarded.

The constructive criminal intent of the members of the family of the patient was a very important factor in determining whether or not such persons were accomplices of defendant. Section 1111 of the Penal Code contains the definition that an accomplice is "one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given."

It therefore should have become a question in the instant case for the determination of the jury whether or not the members of the patient's family had knowledge of the fact that defendant was not a physician and not licensed by the state board of medical examiners of this state to practice "a mode or system of treating the sick and afflicted." Without attempting to determine the question of defendant's legal right to a continuance of the hearing of the action against him, if defendant was not afforded a reasonable opportunity to prepare his defense by subpoenaing witnesses who would testify that they informed the members of the patient's family who assisted defendant in his treatment of such patient that defendant was not so licensed to practice as a physician in this state; and if, as appears from the record, defendant was likewise prevented by the court from establishing such fact by means of questions propounded to other witnesses on their direct examination or on cross-examination, it is clear that, in the absence of other controlling conditions, defendant's substantial rights were invaded. In addition thereto, if, as also appears from the record, the court refused to instruct the jury with reference to the law of accomplices, and especially that part thereof which requires that "a conviction (of a defendant) cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense," it is likewise apparent, assuming that no countervailing circumstances were present, that the rights of defendant were not safeguarded as by the law entitled.

But even if it be assumed as an established principle of law affecting the trial of the case that defendant should have been permitted to show the guilty knowledge on the part of the persons who assisted him in the treatment of the patients as to defendant's lack of statutory qualifications to practice a "system of treating the sick and afflicted," and that defendant was entitled to have the jury fully instructed regarding the subject of "accomplices," the further question is presented as to whether or not the failure and refusal of the trial court to recognize such rights in defendant, and appropriately to accord to him the full measure thereof, was error of such nature and extent as should result in the granting to defendant of a new trial.

[1] The point which was covered by the testimony of the "accomplices" was that defendant administered medical treatment to the patient. Evidence which came from the testimony of witnesses of whom it is not claimed that they were accomplices was to the same effect. To very briefly summarize:

Arthur C. Merrick testified that on several occasions he drove defendant to the patient's home; that on other occasions, at defendant's request, he delivered at the home of the patient small boxes "wrapped up with some stuff" of which defendant said they were "to follow the inscription on it."

Dr. Marsden, who was a physician and surgeon, testified that on one occasion he met defendant at the home of the patient, and that at that time, in answer to a request by the witness of defendant that he "outline his treatment," defendant stated that he "manufactured his own medicines."

Alice Anderson, who was a practical nurse in attendance upon the patient, testified that defendant ordered the witness to give and that under his direction she gave to the patient certain medicines which were contained in probably 10 or 12 different boxes and bottles which defendant brought to the home of the patient.

Florence D. Smiley testified that she overheard a conversation between the sick girl and defendant in which conversation defendant stated to the patient, "Take this medicine, Myrtle, take it and you will get better"; and at that time that defendant "had a glass with some medicine, some brown liquid in it."

[2] It is clear that in the absence of any evidence to the contrary the combined testimony of these several witnesses was sufficient to establish the guilt of defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, and that without considering the evidence given by the "accomplices," if the jury conscientiously performed its duty, no conclusion other than that of guilt of defendant could have been reached. Although serious errors in the matter of the testimony of the "accomplices" occurred in the trial of the action, such errors did not result "in a miscarriage of justice"; and in accordance with the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, it follows that, so far as the errors to which reference has been had are concerned, they must be disregarded. People v. Dial, 28 Cal. App. 704, 707, 153 P. 970.

Appellant complains that, although requested by defendant, the court refused to give to the jury certain instructions. A comparison of defendant's proposed instructions which were thus refused by the court with the instructions which the court gave to the jury impels the conclusion that (without important exceptions) in meaning and intent the jury was fully and fairly instructed as to all subjects presented in such refused instructions.

[3] The first refused instruction to which attention is directed deals with a definition and an illustration of the meaning of the word "corroboration." The only purpose of such an instruction would be that of more fully informing the jury with reference to the law of accomplices. With that subject considered as being definitely out of the case, for the reason that, without the testimony of the "accomplices," sufficient uncontradicted evidence remained to justify and demand the verdict against defendant, the question of whether or not the accomplices were corroborated became immaterial. A similar situation is presented with reference to each of the many of defendant's other instructions on the same subject. As heretofore stated, while evidence should have been admitted touching the complicity of several of the witnesses with defendant in the commission of the offense, and in such event the jury properly instructed regarding such evidence, because of the fact that the remaining evidence in the case is so strong that in the absence of any contradictory evidence, without a violation of their oaths, the jury could not do otherwise than find the defendant guilty—defendant's appeal in that regard must be considered as though such errors had not occurred.

[4] Several instructions which defendant requested the court to give to the jury, but which the court refused, in their substance attempted to place an interpretation on the language of the statute with reference to the phrase "practicing or attempting to practice any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted." The apparent object of such offered instructions was to bring about an acquittal of defendant, because the evidence perhaps was not deemed conclusive that defendant had received compensation for his services. In the case of People v. Vermilion, 30 Cal. App. 417, 158 P. 504, it is held (syllabus): "The State Medical Act makes it unlawful for a person to practice any art of healing without having first obtained a certificate from the medical board, and the act is intended to cover such practice whether the service is gratuitous or not." The court was therefore right in refusing such instructions.

[5] As heretofore indicated herein, on the day when the action against defendant was set for trial, defendant's counsel presented a motion for postponement of the hearing of the case. In the course of the hearing of such motion, in the presence of prospective jurors, the court remarked that the proceeding appeared to be "some kind of a scheme to put this trial off rather than to get justice." No objection was made by defendant to such statement, nor was any motion ever made by defendant to strike such remark from the record. Defendant did, however, offer a general instruction, which the court refused and which included the admonition to the jury that "if any expression of mine has seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters such expression must be entirely disregarded by you." In the course of the trial the court instructed the jury that "all conversations between counsel and the court or between counsel have nothing to do with the case and is not for your consideration." It is therefore apparent that, even if it be admitted that defendant is not too late to complain of the remark made by the court, the situation was covered by the court's instruction.

"You are instructed that while the defendant in a criminal action is not required to take the stand and testify, yet, if he does so, his credibility, and the value and effect of his evidence are to be weighed and determined by the same rules as the credibility and effect and value of the evidence of any other witness is determined. If a defendant elects to take the stand and testify in his own behalf, his testimony is to be weighed in the same manner and measured according to the same standard as the testimony of any other witness, and the tests for determining credibility of witnesses as given you in another part of the instructions are to be applied to his testimony alike with that of all other witnesses. No greater presumption attaches in favor of his testimony than attaches to that of any other witness."

By a long line of authorities the giving of such an instruction is held to constitute error. People v. Faulke, 96 Cal. 20, 30 P. 837; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 182, 31 P. 45; People v. Curry, 103 Cal. 548, 37 P. 503; People v. Lang, 104 Cal. 368, 37 P. 1031; People v. Anderson, 105 Cal. 35, 38 P. 513; People v. Hertz, 105 Cal. 663, 39 P. 32; People v. Shattuck, 109 Cal. 681, 42 P. 315; People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 152, 43 P. 520; People v. Boren, 139 Cal. 210, 72 P. 899; People v. Fritz, 54 Cal. App. 137, 201 P. 348; People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 P. 187.

Defendant was a witness in his own behalf. The only testimony which he gave on direct examination was the following:

"Q. Mr. Albrexstondare, are you a physician licensed to practice in the state of California? A. No, sir."

And on cross-examination his testimony was as follows:

"Q. Have you ever been convicted of a felony? A. No, sir."

Of course, appellant cannot argue that defendant's credibility as a witness was so affected by the giving of the instruction in question that his statement on his direct examination that he was not a physician, licensed to practice in the state of California, was disbelieved by the jury, for the reason that such disbelief on the part of the jury would have resulted in defendant's acquittal. As to the testimony given by defendant on cross-examination that he had never been convicted of a felony, even though the jury disbelieved it, the only effect of such disbelief would have been that it would have tended to discredit defendant's testimony in his statement on direct examination that he was not a physician licensed to practice in the state of California. It therefore follows that no harm resulted to defendant by the giving of such instruction.

[7] Appellant further complains that the court erred to defendant's prejudice in the admission in evidence of testimony going to show the delivery to defendant of a certain check, which it appears was given in partial payment of defendant's services. The principal objection in connection therewith is that no competent evidence was introduced showing that defendant cashed the check. According to the rule laid down in the case of People v. Vermillion, 30 Cal. App. 417, 158 P. 504, the matter of compensation for services of the nature of those alleged to have been performed by defendant is wholly immaterial, from which it would follow that whether or not defendant received any consideration in compensation for his services as a physician was of no consequence, so far as establishing the violation of the terms of the penal statute was concerned.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellant's petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court after judgment in the district court of appeal is denied.

We neither approve nor disapprove the conclusion of that court that under the circumstances outlined in the opinion the members of the patient's family would be accomplices, if they had knowledge of the fact that the defendant did not have a license to practice medicine. We do not deem it necessary to express an opinion upon that question at this time.

GREENBERG et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 5137.)

1. Prohibition ☞3(1)—Writ issued only when petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1103, a writ of prohibition may issue only on showing that petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law.

2. Prohibition ☞3(3)—Petitioners held to have plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, precluding issuance of writ of prohibition.

An order entered after final judgment, appointing a receiver to whom defendants were commanded to pay rentals, being appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, and subject to stay by filing of undertaking under section 943, defendants had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law, within section 1103, and were not entitled to writ of prohibition.

3. Prohibition ☞20—Mere allegation that petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy insufficient, when remedy by appeal exists.

One seeking remedy of prohibition must plead facts or circumstances taking case out of general rule, and mere allegation that petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy is insufficient, when it appears that remedy by appeal exists.

Application by Isaac Greenberg and others for writ of prohibition directed to the Superior Court of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and others. Writ denied.

Sylvain J. Lazarus and Eugene H. O'Donnell, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Harry K. Wolff and A. Spivock, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Petitioners are joint defendants in an action pending in the respondent court in which Dora Adelstein is plaintiff. That action is one in unlawful detainer, wherein the plaintiff, as owner of certain real property, sought the forfeiture and cancellation of her lease to said premises against the defendants, the petitioners herein, as lessees of said property. Judgment went for the defendants, and the plaintiff in due time filed and perfected her appeal, which is now pending in this court.

Thereafter the plaintiff made a motion before said court, requesting that the court order said defendants to deposit in court, or in bank, all moneys then due or thereafter to become due from said defendants as rent for said premises under the lease which was the subject-matter of the litigation. Said motion was granted by respondent court, and pursuant thereto an order was entered on November 5, 1924, commanding said defendants to pay said rentals to E. M. Levy, who was therein designated and appointed receiver for the purpose of receiving and collecting said funds. Said order particularly commanded the defendants to pay to said receiver the sum of $2,750, being rental due for said premises from the 1st day of February, 1924, to the 30th day of November, 1924, and thereafter the sum of $275 monthly; this being the rental stipulated in the lease. The defendants refused to abide by this order, but offered to pay the rentals (which are admitted to be due and payable) to the plaintiff alone, but on the condition that she would give them a receipt for payment under the lease. This the plaintiff refused to do, because she felt that such a receipt would be an acknowledgment from her that the lease was in all respects in full force and effect, and that this would jeopardize her position on the appeal from the judgment.

It is the enforcement of this order which the petitioners seek to restrain in this proceeding. The petition is framed on the theory that the respondent court was without jurisdiction to appoint a receiver or to compel the impounding of the rentals after the plaintiff's appeal was perfected. The facts stated are not controverted, and are taken from the petition for the writ and from respondents' answer thereto. The petitioners seek to confine the hearing to the single issue of want of jurisdiction to make the order, but the respondents go further, and insist that the writ should not issue, because the petitioners had an adequate remedy by appeal from the order.

[1, 2] We are satisfied that the writ must be denied upon the grounds urged by the respondents, and therefore do not deem it necessary to consider the interesting question of the power of the superior court, after an appeal has been perfected, to appoint a receiver to preserve the funds involved in the litigation. The writ of prohibition may issue only upon a showing that the petitioner has no "plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law." Section 1103, Code Civ. Proc. The right of appeal from the order complained of has always been held a "remedy in the ordinary course of law." Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 101, 103, 27 P. 49; White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 54, 58, 42 P. 471; Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 326, 39 P. 604; Jacobs v. Su-

Cases have been cited wherein the reviewing court held that the want of jurisdiction to make the order complained of was apparent, and that, though an appeal would lie from the order, it could not be said to be a "speedy and adequate remedy," because of the expense and trouble incident to the particular litigation. These cases all rest on the principle that the writ of prohibition is a writ of discretion, and not a writ of right, and the discretion of the reviewing court was exercised in each case in view of the exceptional circumstances presented. Ophir Silver Mining Co. v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 479, 82 P. 70, 3 Ann. Cas. 340; Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 696, 195 P. 390; Consolidated Adjustment Co. of California v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 92, 96, 207 P. 552. Here the order complained of is an order made after final judgment, and as such is an appealable order within the meaning of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure. The filing of an undertaking on an appeal from the order would have stayed the appointment of the receiver and the command to impound the rentals. Section 943, Code Civ. Proc.; Jacobs v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 364, 366, 65 P. 826, 85 Am. St. Rep. 204; White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 54, 59, 42 P. 471; Campbell v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 228 P. 354, 355.

[3] Those who seek the extraordinary remedy of prohibition must plead the facts or circumstances which take the case out of the general rule; the stereotyped allegation that they have no "plain, speedy, and adequate remedy" is insufficient, when it is apparent that the remedy by appeal exists. The petitioners here have merely alleged that they would be greatly harassed by the efforts of the receiver, resulting in actions at law, attachments, etc., in his attempt to enforce the order of the respondent court. But, as we have said, the filing of a sufficient undertaking would have completely nullified the power of the receiver, and would have forestalled all these actions. The only inconvenience to which the petitioners would have been subjected pending the appeal from the judgment, if such an undertaking were not filed on the appeal from the order, would be that they would have been required to pay the rentals which are admittedly due for the premises during the period when they were enjoying the possession.

For these reasons we conclude that this is not a proper case for prohibition.

2. Sales ⚡176(3)—Buyer held to have waived objection to tender not specified.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1501, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, buyer rejecting tender, of delivery order for goods in warehouse, made with intent to pass title, on other and unjustified grounds, held to have waived objections that invoice accompanying order was for gross shipping weights rather than net landed weights, and that import duty was unpaid; objections being of such character that sellers could have obviated them.

3. Customs and usages ⚡15(2)—Trade custom and usage as to what constitutes "usual" size bag in shipment of peanuts admissible.

Where contract called for quantity of peanuts in usual size packages, evidence of custom and usage in shipment of shelled peanuts from Shanghai at the time held properly admitted, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 12, in aid of interpretation of contract.

4. Sales ⚡176(3)—Statutory sections relating to waiver for failure to object to offer of performance and for failure to object to tender must be read together.

In view of Pol. Code, § 4480, held, that Civ. Code § 1501, providing that objections to mode of offer of performance which creditor has opportunity to state, and which could be obviated by offerer, are waived if not stated, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, providing that objections to tender are waived if not specifically made, must be read as though parts of same statute.

5. Sales ⚡176(3)—In statute providing for waiver of objections to mode of performance which creditor has "opportunity" to and fails to make, scope of word stated.

In Civ. Code, § 1501, providing that objections to mode of offer of performance which creditor has opportunity to state, and which offerer could obviate, are waived if not stated, "opportunity" includes such knowledge, or information charging knowledge, as would enable person to act with intelligence in protection of rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Opportunity.]

6. Sales ⚡176(2)—Buyer held to have knowledge of, and therefore to waive objection to, tender by failure to make it.

Knowledge by buyer at time of sellers' tender of Chinese peanuts by delivery order that invoice accompanying it was improperly based on gross shipping weights, rather than net landed weights, held inferable, where bill of lading containing gross weights was twice inspected by buyer's representatives, and it had time to ascertain correct amount, and therefore that objection is waived under Civ. Code, § 1501, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2076.

7. Sales ⚡176(3)—Sellers should have opportunity to recede from excessive demand accompanying tender of goods.

If sellers in making tender of goods in good faith demanded something to which they were not entitled, they should have had opportunity to recede from such demand.

HIND et al. v. ORIENTAL PRODUCTS CO., Inc. (S. F. 10056.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡930(1)—Jury's implied findings sufficiently supported where evidence substantially supports verdict.

Intendments being in favor of judgment, implied findings of jury will be deemed sufficiently supported if evidence substantially supports verdict.

8. Sales $\S$ 176(3)—Buyer estopped to raise objections not made at time of tender.

Under Civ. Code, § 1501, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, buyer is estopped to raise objections to tender not made at time.

9. Sales $\S$ 153—Ascertainment of weight or measure of goods not condition precedent to valid tender where goods otherwise identified.

Where there is no question as to identity of goods, valid tender may be made, though weighing or measuring is necessary to ascertain price.

10. Sales $\S$ 153—Tender held valid though import duty not paid.

Where sellers placed goods in bonded warehouse because of buyer's failure to furnish shipping instructions, tender by delivery order held valid, though import duty was not paid, and contract called for goods "duty free," in view of evidence of custom and usage under such contract of paying duty when shipping instructions are given and goods are withdrawn from bond and loaded for shipment to terminal designated by buyer.

11. Customs and usages $\S$ 13—Contract presumed made in reference to known usage of trade.

Where there is known usage of trade, persons carrying on that trade are deemed to have contracted in reference to usage unless contrary appears.

12. Customs and usages $\S$ 15(1)—Evidence of trade usage always admissible unless it alters contract.

Evidence of a known trade usage is always admissible to supply deficiency or as means of interpretation, where it does not alter terms of contract.

13. Appeal and error $\S$ 999(1)—Jury question whether sellers in making tender were ready to transfer actual possession.

Insufficiency of delivery order to enable buyer to receive goods without further action of sellers will not be considered on appeal, since it was for the jury to determine whether sellers were ready to do things necessary to transfer actual possession.

14. Sales $\S$ 176(3)—Objection to form of delivery order tendered, waived for failure to raise at time.

Buyer's objection to form of delivery order tendered, that it would not enable it to receive goods without further action of sellers, held waived under Civ. Code, § 1501, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, for failure to object on that ground at time of tender.

15. Sales $\S$ 202(1)—Payment on arrival and inspection not equivalent to payment on delivery prohibiting passage of title by tender.

Provision of contract for payment on arrival and inspection held not equivalent to payment on delivery prohibiting passage of title by tender, where by its terms contract was clearly not a C. O. D. contract.

16. Sales $\S$ 202(1)—Submission of invoice with tender of delivery order held not to condition passage of title on payment.

Where contract provided for payment on arrival and inspection and by its terms was clearly not a C. O. D. contract, submission of invoice with tender of delivery order held not to condition passage of title on payment.

17. Contracts $\S$ 335(1)—Complaint must allege either performance or excuse for nonperformance, since they are not same.

Complaint must either allege performance or valid excuse for nonperformance, since they are not the same.

18. Sales $\S$ 340—Buyer's failure to furnish shipping instructions does not prevent sellers offering, and thereafter alleging, performance.

Though buyer's failure to furnish shipping instructions might have justified sellers in proceeding on theory of excuse for nonperformance, it did not prevent them from offering to perform and thereafter alleging performance.

19. Trial $\S$ 251(4)—Giving of instruction predicated on excuse for nonperformance held erroneous where performance alleged.

Where, in action for purchase price, sellers alleged performance, giving of instruction predicated on excuse for nonperformance held erroneous.

20. Trial $\S$ 296(2)—Instructing on excuse for nonperformance not prejudicial error, though performance alleged, in view of instructions as whole.

Instructing on excuse for nonperformance by sellers, in their action for purchase price, held not prejudicial error, though performance was alleged, in view of other proper instructions as to necessity of proof of full performance.

21. Trial $\S$ 193(1)—Instruction to draw inferences favorable to fair dealing, rather than corrupt practice, held not objectionable.

Instruction that if two inferences were equally reasonable, to draw one favoring fair dealing, rather than corrupt practice, held not objectionable as being susceptible of construction as opinion of court that one of parties had dealt fairly and the other corruptly.

22. Trial $\S$ 260(3)—Modification of instruction by removal of burden of proof and preponderance of evidence clause not objectionable where covered elsewhere.

Modification of instruction by striking the clause on burden of proof and preponderance of evidence held not objectionable where charge elsewhere fully instructed in these matters.

23. Appeal and error $\S$ 959(3)—Permitting amendment to complaint to conform to proofs not disturbed except for abuse.

Ruling on application to file second amended complaint to conform to proofs, being addressed to sound discretion of court, will not be disturbed except for abuse.

Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco (Theodore M. Levy, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment on a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $26,349.36. On the 29th day of November, 1919, the defendant purchased from the plaintiffs through W. J. Withers, a broker, a quantity of Chinese shelled peanuts. The contract was reduced to writing, and the provisions thereof with which we are here concerned are as follows:

"Quantity: One hundred (100) tons. Article and description: Chinese shelled peanuts, 30/32s from Shanghai, F. A. Q. (fair, average quality) of the season. Package: Usual. Price: Thirteen cents (13¢) per pound, F. O. B. coast, duty paid, net landed weights, net cash on arrival and inspection. Shipment from China during December/January. Routing: Seller reserves the privilege of routing all freight, but will give terminal delivery by line requested by buyer."

The contract was signed by the plaintiffs as sellers and by the defendant as buyer. The peanuts were shipped from Shanghai in due time, arrived at Seattle by the steamship Eastern Victor on March 2, 1920, and were inspected by the defendant. Prior to, at the time of and after, the arrival of the vessel, shipping instructions were requested by the plaintiffs from the defendant, so that the plaintiffs could fulfill their contract to place the merchandise f. o. b. cars or carrier with terminal designated by the defendant. Shipping instructions were not given as requested nor at all. Pending the delay incident to the refusal of the defendant to furnish shipping instructions, the merchandise was placed in a bonded warehouse, where it was located at the time of the tender and rejection next to be noted.

On March 8, 1920, the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant the following delivery order:

"San Francisco, March 8, 1920. Hind, Rolph & Co., Seattle, Wash. — Warehouse. Deliver to Oriental Products Company, Inc., or order one hundred tons shelled peanuts (1112 bags) marked: H. R. No. 18. San Francisco. (100 tons only) Peanuts. No. 18. ex S. S. — Eastern Victor. [Signed] Hind, Rolph & Company, per J. L. Keegan."

Accompanying the delivery order was the following invoice:

"No. 2112. San Francisco, March 8, 1920. The Oriental Products Company, Inc. San Francisco, Calif. Bought of Hind, Rolph & Co., 230 California Street, Payable net cash on arrival and inspection. In U. S. gold coin. Peanuts No. 18. 33—Eastern Victor. 1112 bags (180 lbs. net) Chinese shelled peanuts. Gross 202,940 lbs. Tare 2,780 lbs. Net 200,160 lbs., at 13 cents per lb. f. o. b. Coast, duty paid, net landed weights, $26,020.80. E. & O. E. (errors and omissions excepted) JLK—EK."

Thereafter the defendant on the date it bears delivered to the plaintiffs the following document:

"March 11, 1920. Hind, Rolph & Co., 230 California Street, San Francisco, Calif.—Gentlemen: We are herewith enclosing delivery order and invoice, covering 100 tons shelled peanuts tendered. We regret exceedingly that we are obliged to reject this tender because of the fact that the goods are packed in 180-pound bags instead of 100-pound bags as purchased, and in addition to this that the report from Seattle on the count is thirty-two thirty-four instead of thirty thirty-two, as purchased. Regretting the necessity of rejecting this tender, we beg to remain, Oriental Products Co. E. W. Rosston."

Subsequent to the foregoing rejection of tender, this action was brought and went to trial on an amended complaint filed August 23, 1920, which charges in two counts. The first count alleges, among other things the contract of purchase and sale, the arrival of the goods and the inspection thereof by the defendant, the tender of the goods with an intention to transfer the title to the defendant, the rejection of the tender, the refusal to accept the goods or pay for the same, and the purchase price based on the gross shipping weights. The second count alleges damages in the sum of $490.68 on account of warehouse charges. During the course of the trial the plaintiffs, by leave of court, filed a second amended complaint to conform to the proof wherein the alleged purchase price was based on the net landed weights less three-quarters of a cent per pound duty. The defendant admitted by its answer that it had agreed to purchase the peanuts, but set forth that the price alleged in the amended complaint was not based on the net landed weights with duty fully paid; that the sum demanded was not based on the true net landed weights, but upon the gross shipping weights from the Orient; that the plaintiffs had not paid the duty on the merchandise; that the same was not properly prepared for delivery, in that the peanuts were packed in 180-pound bags and not in 100-pound bags; and that the peanuts were not of the size or quality contracted for. The verdict was for the purchase price alleged in the second amended complaint under the first cause of action and for the damages alleged in the second cause of action.

[1] The complaints were drawn and the case was tried, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, upon the theory that the tender was made with the intention to pass title; that the title thereby passed to the defendant; and that because of the rejection of the tender the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the purchase price in accordance with the provisions of sections 1141, 1485, 1502, and 3310 of the Civil Code. It was and is the contention of the defendant that the tender was not made with the intention to pass the title; that the title did not thereby pass; that the measure of damages as provided by section 3311 of the Civil Code should have been applied; and that the plaintiffs have therefore mistaken their remedy. In its conduct of the case the trial court adopted the theory of the plaintiffs as applied to the facts, and the verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiffs on that theory. The intendments are in favor of the judgment, and if the evidence in support of the verdict be substantial, either with or without conflict, the implied findings of the jury will be deemed sufficiently supported. Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 139 P. 800; Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753; 2 Cal. Juris. 879, and cases cited.

[2] It appears without conflict that at the time of the tender, on March 8, 1920, the plaintiffs had not paid the duty, had not ascertained the net landed weights, and based the amount of the invoice on the gross shipping weights. From these facts it is contended by the defendant it must follow that the plaintiffs had not complied with their contract, had conditioned the tender on an excessive demand, and therefore could not pass title and place the defendant in default. The plaintiffs counter that in the defendant's letter rejecting the tender the defendant specified objections to the tender on two grounds only, that the objections stated were unjustified, were found by the jury to be unjustified, and that by the failure of the defendant to object at the time to the tender on other grounds later insisted upon, all such other objections were waived under section 1501 of the Civil Code and section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] The objections to the tender specified in the defendant's letter of rejection were "that the goods are packed in 180-pound bags instead of 100-pound bags as purchased," and "that the report from Seattle on the count is thirty-two thirty-four instead of thirty thirty-two as purchased." As to the size of the bags, the only provision in the contract having reference to the subject is, "Package: Usual." There is nothing in the contract requiring shipment in 100-pound bags. It therefore became necessary for the jury to determine what packages were usual in the trade of which this particular shipment was a part; that is to say, whether in the shipment of shelled peanuts from Shanghai at the time in question it was customary and usual to use 180-pound bags. The court properly permitted evidence of custom and usage on this point for the reason that the term "usual" required explanation, not in derogation of the contract, but in aid of its interpretation (subdivision 12, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc.). It was in evidence that in the absence of a specific provision of the contract as to size of bags to be used, it was optional with the shipper at Shanghai to select the size. There was abundant evidence that under such circumstances a bag of from 100 to 200 pounds capacity, including a 180-pound size, was usual and customary. Witness Withers, the broker who negotiated the sale, so testified, as did also witnesses Barrichow, Ward, Newhall, Dill, Sternau, Groom, and Hadden.

Concerning the quality of the peanuts the contract provided that they should be 30-32s, that is, from thirty to thirty-two whole peanuts to the ounce. It will be noted that the letter rejecting the tender did not state as a fact that the peanuts were not of the required size, but only that "the report from Seattle on the count" was that they were 32-34s. The agent of the defendant at Seattle inspected the goods and took samples before the rejection. Samples were also mailed to the defendant at San Francisco prior to the rejection. The plaintiffs procured samples and had counts made prior to that time. The evidence was in conflict as to the result of the several countings, but there was substantial, direct, and positive evidence of those who had weighed the sample that the peanuts were 30-32s as required. The testimony of the witnesses O'Brien, Keegan, Beamer, and Newhall was sufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the peanuts satisfied the description required by the contract.

As to the objections not mentioned in the letter rejecting the tender, it is the contention of the plaintiffs that they were, and each of them was, waived by the defendant because of its failure to specify the same as provided in the Code sections mentioned. Section 1501 of the Civil Code reads:

"All objections to the mode of an offer of performance, which the creditor has an opportunity to state at the time to the person making the offer, and which could be then obviated by him, are waived by the creditor, if not then stated."

Section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The person to whom a tender is made must, at the time, specify any objection he may have to the money, instrument, or property, or he must be deemed to have waived it; and if the objection be to the amount of money, the terms of the instrument, or the amount or kind of property, he must specify the amount, terms, or kind which he requires, or be precluded from objecting afterwards."

[4-6] These two sections must be read together as though they were parts of the same statute. Pol. Code, § 4480; Allen v. Chatfield, 172 Cal. 68, 156 P. 47. When so read and applied to the present case, they would mean that when the tender was made to the defendant it was incumbent upon it to specify any objections which it had the opportunity to make to the instruments tendered by the plaintiffs or to the terms thereof, and to specify the terms which it required and which could be obviated by the plaintiffs or be precluded thereafter from making such objections. The "opportunity" which the statute provides must be available to the objector would include, of course, such knowledge or such information charging knowledge of the facts surrounding the transaction as would enable the person whose rights were to be affected to act with intelligence in the protection or preservation of his rights. In this connection it is earnestly insisted by the defendant that the tender by plaintiffs was attended by an unauthorized condition of payment, in that the amount of the bill as specified in the invoice, although appearing as based on the net landed weights, was in reality based on the gross shipping weights from the Orient, and that the defendant had no knowledge at the time it specified its objections to the tender that such amount was not based on the net landed weights.

At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs and particularly that there was no evidence that the defendant knew prior to its rejection of the tender what the gross shipping weights were. The motion was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error. But there was evidence introduced during the plaintiffs' case in chief from which the jury might infer that the defendant knew the amount of the gross shipping weights prior to and at the time of rejection. The bill of lading showing the oriental shipping weights was received by the plaintiffs at San Francisco on February 25. On the following day the representative of the plaintiffs called at the office of the defendant with the weight certificate and bill of lading showing the gross shipping weights and a surveyor's certificate showing the peanuts to be 30-32s and asked for shipping instructions, which were refused. Later on in the trial there was evidence that prior to the rejection the original bill of lading showing the gross shipping weights was inspected by a representative of the defendant. From this evidence the inference might also be drawn that the defendant had knowledge of such weights before its letter of rejection.

[7] Furthermore, the tender was made on March 8 and was rejected on March 11. During the intervening time the defendant had full opportunity to ascertain from its agent in Seattle whether the amount specified in the invoice was excessive, and, if so, to specify the correct amount so that the plaintiffs might obviate the objection by a corrected invoice. There was no showing of bad faith on the part of the plaintiffs in offering to perform. They were entitled to the presumption of good faith in the transaction. Under such circumstances, if the plaintiffs demanded something to which they were not entitled, they should have had the opportunity to recede from such demand. In the case of Kofoed v. Gordon, 122 Cal. 314, 54 P. 1115, it was said:

"If the person offering to perform is acting in good faith, and makes the mistake of demanding something to which he is not entitled, he ought to be given the same opportunity to recede from such demand that he is allowed for tendering the correct amount where he has tendered too little, or the right thing when he has tendered the wrong thing. * * * This principle is the necessary basis of the numerous decisions in which it has been held that an express objection to a tender upon one ground is as clearly a waiver of unauthorized conditions as of other objections not mentioned." (Italics added.)

See, also, Hoover v. Wolfe, 167 Cal. 337, 139 P. 794; 6 Cal. Jur. 412 and cases cited.

[8] The principle of estoppel embodied in section 1501 of the Civil Code and section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure is generally recognized. Railway Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. Ed. 693; Bank of Taiwan v. Union Nat. Bank (C. C. A.) 1 F. (2d) 65 and cases cited; 2 Williston on Contracts, §§ 743, 744.

[9] Defendant cites the case of Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 P. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199, in support of its contention that the ascertainment of the net landed weights was a condition precedent to a valid tender. But that case does not hold that weighing is necessary if the goods be otherwise identified. The court there quotes the following rule laid down by Mr. Benjamin:

"Where anything remains to be done to the goods for the purpose of ascertaining the price, as by weighing, measuring, or testing the goods, where the price is to depend on the quantity or quality of the goods, the performance of these things also shall be a condition precedent to the transfer of the property, although the individual goods are ascertained, and they are in the state in which they ought to be accepted.' Benjamin on Sales, b. 2, c. 3."

And then goes on to say:

"So far as concerns the proposition that where weighing or measuring is necessary to the identification of the goods, the title does not pass until they have been weighed or measured, the American cases are generally in accord with the above rule. [Cit. cas.] In California the cases are to the same effect. [Cit. cas.] Some of the American cases are not in accord with the rule laid down by Mr. Benjamin in this: that if the goods are identified, it does not matter that weighing or measuring is necessary to ascertain the price or the quantity. And this seems to be the law in California. For the Civil Code contains the following: 'Sec. 1140. The title to personal property, sold or exchanged, passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not.' This section does not dispense with identification. On the contrary, it requires it. It only dispenses with segregation when the property is otherwise identified. Therefore, where the identification consists in the segregation, weighing, or measuring, they are still necessary. And the present case was of the latter character."

There is no question in the case at bar as to the identity of the goods, irrespective of the weights or quality.

[10] The defendant further contends that, under the contract, the plaintiffs were required to pay the import duty before they could be in a position to make a valid tender. It is unquestionable that the plaintiffs obligated themselves to deliver the merchandise free of duty. However, there is nothing in the contract as to when the duty should be paid. The defendant knew at the time of rejection that the goods were in a bonded warehouse, and it was uncertain whether any duty would have to be paid until after shipping instructions had been furnished. If the terminal to be indicated by the defendant were domestic, the payment of the duty would, of course, be necessary in order that the goods be released from bond. But if the designated terminal were a foreign port or in a foreign country, which it might have been, no duty would have been required. Even though the payment of duty by the plaintiffs were certain, it was in evidence that, according to custom and usage under such a contract, the time of payment of the duty was when the shipping instructions had been furnished and the goods were withdrawn from bond and loaded for shipment to the terminal designated by the buyer. There was also evidence that, in the absence of such instructions, the demand for the purchase price would by custom and usage be made on the presentation of the delivery order, gross shipping weights, and invoice, and that when payment was made in accordance with the tender any difference in weights that might develop would become a matter of subsequent adjustment between the parties.

[11,12] It satisfactorily appears that the parties to the contract contemplated that shipping instructions should be furnished by the buyer before the goods were placed f. o. b. carrier. The written contract is not as explicit on the subject as it might be, for it merely provides that the "seller reserves the privilege of routing all freight, but will give terminal delivery by line requested by buyer." This language might reasonably be said to import an obligation on the part of the defendant to designate the terminal at the appropriate time, but whatever uncertainty or omission occurs in the language of the contract is clarified and supplied by the evidence herein that, pursuant to custom and usage of the trade, unless otherwise specifically provided by contract, it was the duty of the buyer to furnish shipping instructions before the seller was required to pay the duty or ascertain the f. o. b. weights. It is the general rule that when there is a known usage of the trade, persons carrying on that trade are deemed to have contracted in reference to the usage unless the contrary appears; that the usage forms a part of the contract; and that evidence of usage is always admissible to supply a deficiency or as a means of interpretation where it does not alter or vary the terms of the contract. Brown v. Howard, 1 Cal. 423; Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367; Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 371, 33 P. 916; Union Ins. Co. v. American Ins. Co., 107 Cal. 333, 40 P. 431, 28 L. R. A. 692, 48 Am. St. Rep. 140; 6 Cal. Jur. 315, and cases cited; Miller v. Germain, etc., Co., 193 Cal. 62, 222 P. 817.

[13,14] The defendant also contends that the form of the delivery order was insufficient; that it was an order by the plaintiffs at San Francisco on the plaintiffs at Seattle and was not accompanied by an assignment or other document which would enable the defendant to receive the goods without further action on the part of the plaintiffs; and that under the form of order submitted it still remained within the power of the plaintiffs to withhold the goods until the purchase price had been paid. It is not suggested that the plaintiffs were unable to do any of the things which it is claimed by the defendant they should have done to effectuate actual possession in the defendant. It was for the jury to determine under the evidence presented whether the plaintiffs were ready and willing to perform all things necessary to transfer actual possession. In addition, there was no objection to the form of the delivery order in the defendant's letter of rejection. Therefore, any objection to the terms of the order were waived under the Code sections above quoted. Also there was evidence that the delivery order here employed was in form in accordance with the custom and usage under similar situations.

The defendant earnestly insists that the present case is governed by the rules laid down in Gopcevic v. California Packing Corp., 64 Cal. App. 132, 220 P. 1078. That was an action to recover the purchase price of the entire crop of prunes grown by plaintiff on his orchard. The contract provided that the seller was to harvest, properly dry and cure the crop for the season of 1920 and deliver the same to defendant. By the express terms of the contract title to the prunes was to pass to the buyer after completion of weighing and payment, and thereafter the crop was to be at buyer's risk. The plaintiff claimed to have properly dried and cured the prunes and made them ready for shipment and to have offered to deliver the same in accordance with the terms of the contract, but that the defendant refused to accept them. The plaintiff claimed to have made an unconditional tender of the goods. There was neither allegation nor proof of an intent to pass the title at the time of the tender, nor was there allegation or proof of a waiver on the part of the defendant as to the sufficiency of the tender. The proof showed that the plaintiff insisted upon standing on the letter of his contract to the effect that payment should be made at the time of delivery. It was held that the plaintiff had mistaken his remedy, was not entitled under the pleadings and proof to maintain his action for the purchase price but should have proceeded under section 3311 of the Civil Code. Assuming the correctness of that decision, the rules there laid down do not apply to the present case for the reason that the allegations and proofs were not the same. Numerous propositions of law, however, properly applicable to the facts in this case are there stated. It is said:

"The question of the passing of title being one of intention of the parties, in the ascertainment of this intention resort must be had to the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties and the circumstances of the case. The intention being the governing principle, the question in the main is one of fact. * * * If the seller transfers to the buyer the title to the property sold, he may under section 3310 recover the full purchase price. * * * If tender is made by the vendor with intent to pass title in the goods to the vendee, title is thereby deemed to have passed, and the vendor may sue for the contract price (Civ. Code, § 1141). If tender is made without intent to pass title until payment is made, title is not deemed to have passed, and the situation is controlled by section 3311."

[15] We are not impressed with the argument of the defendant that the clause in the contract here in question providing that payment should be made on "arrival and inspection" is equivalent to a provision for payment upon delivery. Actual delivery in this case would take place upon the placing of the goods f. o. b. carrier and transmission of the bill of lading. It is clear that the intention of the parties was that when the goods had arrived, been inspected by the defendant, and found to be in accordance with the contract, the purchase price would be due and payable. This is not by its terms a cash on delivery contract.

of the tender. We think the circumstances here shown, including the admitted fact that the defendant had the delivery order in its possession from the 8th to the 11th of March, were sufficient to entitle the jury to conclude that the plaintiffs had waived immediate payment as a condition to the transfer of the title.

Taking into consideration the terms of the contract, the evidence of custom and usage not inconsistent with those terms, the conduct of the parties, especially of the defendant in waiving objections which it might have interposed, and the other circumstances appearing in the case, it is concluded that the evidence was sufficient to support the findings of the jury implied from the rendition of the verdict.

[17] It is contended by the defendant that the plaintiffs' pleadings are insufficient to justify recovery. It is suggested that the theory of the plaintiffs' case is that the failure of the defendant to furnish shipping instructions was an excuse available to the plaintiffs for not performing the alleged conditions precedent under the contract. The plaintiffs allege full performance on their part, and it is insisted that under the facts they should have alleged excuse for nonperformance if they expected to recover. The case of Peek v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 124 P. 834, is relied on. In that case the allegation was that the plaintiff had performed on his part. The proof did not show performance, but did show excuse for nonperformance. The court said:

"Such an allegation will not justify a recovery on proof of a valid excuse for nonperformance. 'The rule is fundamental that the complaint must either allege performance or a valid excuse for nonperformance. One is not the same as the other.'"

[18] But here full performance was alleged. Keeping in mind the waiver of objections to which the defendant committed itself, the proof showed a sufficient offer of performance on the part of the plaintiffs. Although the failure of the defendant to furnish shipping instructions might have justified the plaintiffs in proceeding on the theory of excuse for nonperformance, that circumstance did not prevent them from offering to perform and thereafter alleging performance.

[19, 20] The giving of certain instructions requested by the plaintiffs and the refusal of certain proposed instructions requested by the defendant are alleged as error. It is insisted that it was error to give that portion of instruction XXI to the effect that if the jury should find that the defendant failed to furnish shipping instructions when it was required to do so within a reasonable time after the arrival of the goods, and such failure delayed or prevented the plaintiffs from performing their obligations under the contract, then the plaintiffs were excused from performing such obligations to the extent that they were so delayed and prevented by the act of the defendant. The case of Peek v. Steinberg, supra, supports defendant's contention that when full performance is alleged and excuse for nonperformance is not alleged, such instruction is error. But it cannot be said that the defendant's rights were prejudicially affected by the instruction in view of the fact that the court properly instructed the jury as to the necessity of proof of full performance before a recovery could be had, and that in the absence of such proof by a preponderance of the evidence the verdict must be for the defendant.

[21] Instruction No. VIII, given at the request of plaintiffs, was to the effect that if there be two inferences equally reasonable and equally susceptible of being drawn from the proved facts, the one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it was the duty of the jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing. The defendant contends that this instruction was ambiguous and misleading; that it may have been misconstrued by the jury as intending to indicate that in the opinion of the court one of the parties had dealt fairly and the other had favored corrupt practice. We do not think the instruction is subject to the criticism offered. It was a correct exposition of the law on the subject. Ryder v. Bamberger, supra, and cases cited.

[22] Complaint is made of the modification of instruction No. V proposed by the defendant, whereby the clause "and that the burden of proof is upon plaintiffs to establish that fact by a preponderance of the evidence" was stricken out. But elsewhere in its charge the court fully instructed the jury as to the burden of proof and the preponderance of evidence.

The defendant criticizes other instructions given as proposed or given as modified. They have been examined and are found to be not subject to the objections interposed. Complaint is also made that numerous instructions proposed by the defendant were not given. They constitute an exposition of the law from the defendant's point of view and, where applicable to the facts, were covered by instructions given.

[23] There was no error in denying the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, for reasons hereinbefore stated. There was no error in admitting evidence of custom and usage as the facts developed during the course of the trial. The application to file the second amended complaint to conform to the proofs was addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and no abuse of that discretion is shown. No prejudicial error appears from any instruction given or refused. The jury found on sufficient evidence that it was the intention of the plaintiffs to pass the title to the goods at the time the tender was made.

The defendant had the opportunity at the time of rejecting the tender to specify all of the objections which it did not then specify but which it later insisted upon. If those objections had been made at the opportune time, they were of such a character that they could have been obviated by the plaintiffs as contemplated by the statute. Since they were not so made, they were waived.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARNETT v. SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.
(Sac. 3651.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 27, 1925.)

1. Elections —Electors have equal weight in exercising right of suffrage.

That electors have equal weight in exercising the right of suffrage is cardinal principle of representative government.

2. Statutes 89—Equality of representation required by statute, enacted under constitutional authority, is fundamental requirement of form of government prevailing in state.

Equality of representation required by Pol. Code, § 4029, is fundamental requirement of form of government prevailing in state, and enactment of such section is exercise by Legislature of power conferred by Const. art. 11, § 4.

3. Statutes 89—Practical equality in population in supervisorial districts is not purely local matter.

Practical equality of population in supervisorial districts is not a purely local matter; it being a vital part of government established in counties, which must be adhered to if consistency in form is to be maintained throughout state.

4. Statutes 89—Alteration of any material component part of governmental system in any one county constitutes deviation from uniform system established for counties.

Fact that Const. art. 4, § 1, reserving initiative powers to electors of counties, itself applies to all counties, does not in itself satisfy requirements of article 11, § 4, as to uniformity, since latter section requires establishment by Legislature of system of county government applicable throughout entire state, and alteration of any material component part of system would constitute deviation from uniform system.

5. Statutes 89—Reservation of initiative powers to electors of counties does not authorize legislation in contravention of statute requiring establishment of uniform system of government.

Since Const. art. 4, § 1, reserving initiative powers to electors, and article 11, § 4, providing Legislature shall establish uniform system of county government, may be harmonized without restricting operation of either, reservation of initiative power to electors of counties does not authorize legislation by them in contravention of Pol. Code, § 4029, passed under authority of article 11, § 4.

6. Statutes ☞89—Electors of county acquire by initiative amendment no greater powers than board of supervisors possess as to matters within statute under uniform government provision of Constitution.

When Legislature has enacted statutes, under constitutional authority to establish uniformity throughout state, electors of county acquire, by Const. art. 4, § 1, no greater powers than board of supervisors possess as to matters within Pol. Code, § 4029, enacted under article 11, § 4, to establish uniform system of county government.

7. Counties ☞18—Valid ordinance creating supervisorial districts not rendered invalid by subsequent inequalities of population.

If supervisorial districts were practically equal when ordinance creating them was passed, subsequent inequalities, resulting from movement of population, would not render ordinance invalid.

8. Counties ☞18—Necessity of redistricting county to avoid present inequalities did not justify proposed ordinance which itself provided for gross inequalities.

Notwithstanding proposed initiative ordinance redistricting county would result in less inequality in population, and that county should be redistricted so as to avoid present inequalities, it could not justify ordinance which itself provided for gross inequalities.

9. Constitutional law ☞70(1)—Passage of legislative act not enjoined solely on ground that it will be void.

Courts will not enjoin passage of legislative act solely on ground that it will be void.

10. Injunction ☞80—Generally courts will not interfere with holding of valid election, where prescribed forms have been complied with.

Generally courts will not interfere with holding election when it is provided for by valid law, and forms prescribed have been complied with.

11. Counties ☞196(3)—Taxpayer may sue to enjoin holding election on ground that it would be useless expenditure of public money.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 526a, where it is proposed to hold election for submission of measure to popular vote, which would be inoperative if adopted, court may, in suit by resident taxpayer, enjoin election because it will be useless expenditure and waste of public money.

Action by Charles E. Harnett against the County of Sacramento and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., Ben P. Tabor, Asst. Dist. Atty., Theo. W. Chester and J. M. Inman, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Hughes, Bradford, Cross & Prior, of Sacramento, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment enjoining and restraining them from submitting to the electors of the county of Sacramento a measure proposed by initiative petition under the provisions of article 4, § 1, of the Constitution of the state of California. The purpose of the measure is to change the boundaries of three of the five supervisorial districts of the county of Sacramento, leaving the remaining two districts as they now stand.

Judgment was rendered upon the pleadings. From the complaint it appears that the population of Sacramento county is distributed among the five proposed supervisorial districts as follows: District No. 1, 35,187; district No. 2, 34,500; district No. 3, 29,583; district No. 4, 17,877; district No. 5, 11,712. The plaintiff, who is a resident, taxpayer, and qualified elector of proposed supervisorial district No. 2, contends, and the trial court held, that the contemplated election would be a waste of the public money of the county of Sacramento and an improper and illegal expenditure thereof, for the reason that, even if the initiative proposition sought to be submitted at such election were adopted by the electors it would be a nullity, because it would constitute a violation of section 4029 of the Political Code, which provides that:

"The board of supervisors may, by a two-thirds vote of the members of said board, change the boundaries of any or all of the supervisorial districts of a county. Said districts shall be as nearly equal in population as may be. * * *

Article 4, § 1, of the California Constitution, by virtue of which it is sought to submit the proposed ordinance to the electors, after reserving to the people of the state the power to propose laws and amendments to the Constitution, and to reject any act enacted by the Legislature, provides:

"The initiative and referendum powers of the people are hereby further reserved to the electors of each county, city and county, city and town of the state, to be exercised under such procedure as may be provided by law. * * * In the submission to the electors of any measure under this section, all officers shall be guided by the general laws of this state, except as is herein otherwise provided. This section is self-executing, but legislation may be enacted to facilitate its operation, but in no way limiting or restricting either the provisions of this section or the powers herein reserved."

Placing reliance upon this constitutional provision, defendants urge that the state Legislature is without power to limit or restrict the initiative power thus reserved to the people of the various counties, cities, and towns of the state, and therefore that section 4029 of the Political Code, above referred to, has no application to the initiative proposition here under consideration.

[1-6] That electors shall have equal weight in exercising the right of suffrage is a cardinal principle of representative government. State v. Hitchcock, 241 Mo. 433, 146 S. W. 40, 64. The matter of equality of representation was regarded as so much a principle of our American system of free government that an unequal division of a county into commissioner districts was held to be void, even where no statute specifically required an even division. State v. Moorhead, 99 Neb. 527, 156 N. W. 1067. The equality of representation required by section 4029 of the Political Code is a fundamental requirement of the form of government prevailing in this state, and the enactment of that section of the Code is plainly an exercise by the state Legislature of the power conferred on it by article 11, § 4, of the Constitution, which provides: "The Legislature shall establish a system of county governments, which shall be uniform throughout the state." Practical equality of population in the supervisorial districts is not a purely local matter. It is a vital part of the structure of government which has been established in the counties, and must be adhered to if consistency in form is to be maintained throughout the state. It cannot be said, as contended by defendants, that the fact that article 4, § 1, of the Constitution, reserving initiative powers to the electors of the counties, itself applies alike to all counties, is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of article 11, § 4, as to uniformity, for the latter section requires the establishment by the Legislature of a system of county government applicable throughout the entire state; and the alteration of any material component part of this system in any one or more counties by the electors thereof would constitute a deviation from the uniform system originated by the state Legislature, and contemplated and commanded by article 11, § 4. Since article 4, § 1, and article 11, § 4, of the Constitution may be harmonized without unduly restricting the operation of either, and since there is a total absence of any indication to the contrary in the Constitution, we conclude that the reservation of the initiative power to the electors of the counties does not authorize any legislation by the electors of a county in contravention of any statute passed by the state Legislature under the authority of that section of the Constitution requiring the establishment of a uniform system of county governments, and that section 4029, Political Code, is a statute within the section last mentioned. Nothing stated in the case of Hill v. Board of Supervisors, 176 Cal. 84, 167 P. 514, is contrary to this conclusion, for the court was there considering the right of the county electors directly to adopt or reject an ordinance passed by the board of supervisors which was unquestionably within the legislative powers of the board. Likewise this conclusion is not in conflict with the cases of Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 P. 120, and Scheafer v. Herman, 172 Cal. 338, 155 P. 1084, for sections 7½ and 8 of article 11, which those cases discuss, expressly provide that sections 4 and 5 of article 11 shall not be operative as to counties and municipalities which adopt charters in accordance with sections 7½ and 8, mentioned above. It is pointed out by defendants that section 4029, Political Code, does not mention the electors of the county, but refers only to the board of supervisors. This fact is immaterial. For the reasons previously stated, when the state Legislature has enacted statutes under its constitutional authority to establish a system of county governments uniform throughout the state, the electors of a county acquire, by virtue of article 4, § 1, of the Constitution, no greater powers than the board of supervisors possess as to the matters within the terms of those particular statutes.

[7, 8] Defendants' answer sets forth the fact that, under the ordinance now in force, the population of Sacramento county is distributed among five supervisorial districts, as follows: District No. 1, 18,966; district No. 2, 19,071; district No. 3, 61,233; district No. 4, 17,877; and district No. 5, 11,712. It is therefore contended that the ordinance now in force is invalid by reason of inequality in population, and that "courts will not declare a legislative apportionment act unconstitutional when there is no prior valid apportionment act to fall back on." State v. Schnitger, 16 Wyo. 479, 95 P. 698. The invalidity of the ordinance now in force will not be presumed. It does not appear, from evidence or allegations, when this ordinance was passed, or whether the districts now in existence were unequal in population at that time. If the districts were practically equal in population when the ordinance was passed, subsequent inequalities, resulting from movement of population, would not render the ordinance invalid. While it is true that the proposed ordinance would result in less inequality than now exists, and that the county should be redistricted so as to avoid present inequalities, this cannot justify the proposed ordinance, which itself provides for gross inequalities.

There is also a contention that the ordinance proposes a mere change of boundaries between existing districts and not a redistricting of the county. We believe that the ordinance is in form a complete redistricting, notwithstanding the fact that it does not change the boundaries of two of the five districts. It makes important alterations as to districts now known as 1, 2, and 3, and thus alters the situation of districts 4 and 5 with respect to each of the other districts in the county. We are the more inclined to this view when we consider that the proposed ordinance does not provide that the board of supervisors may amend it, and therefore, if adopted, would put it beyond the power of the board to change the boundaries of districts 4 and 5 as well as of the other districts. Const. art. 4, § 1.

[9-11] In addition to defendants' petition for a hearing in this court, there was filed a petition by an amicus curiæ, raising the point that an injunction cannot issue to restrain a legislative act. It is true that courts will not enjoin the passage of an act by the legislative body solely upon the ground that it will be a void enactment, nor as a general rule will they interfere with the holding of an election when the election is provided for by a valid law, and the forms prescribed by that law have been complied with by the authorities. Nevertheless, there are exceptions to these rules. For example, in the case of Felt v. Waughop, 225 P. 862, this court interfered to the extent of requiring the omission of the name of a candidate from a ballot, notwithstanding that all prescribed forms had been adequately observed, where it appeared that the candidate would be ineligible to hold office even if elected. Where it is proposed to hold an election for the submission of a measure to the popular vote, and that measure will be wholly void and inoperative even if adopted by the people, the courts may, at the instance of a resident taxpayer, enjoin the holding of the election upon the ground that it will be a useless expenditure and waste of public funds. Code Civ. Proc. § 526a. There is no other adequate remedy for the protection of the rights of the taxpayers in such a situation, and political rights are not curtailed. The present situation obviously merits the relief sought.

The judgment is affirmed.

MYERS v. STRINGHAM et al. (S. F. 11548.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚡11(1)—Ordinance adopted under initiative provision of charter must be such as might legally be adopted by council.

Where, under initiative provisions of Berkeley city charter, proposed ordinance must first be submitted to council, and may thereafter be submitted to electors in event council refuses to adopt it, ordinance, which may be adopted under initiative provision, must be such as council could adopt.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡114—Proposed amendatory ordinance held not to conform to charter requirements.

Where proposed ordinance under initiative provisions of Berkeley city charter was in effect amendment to section of existing ordinance by adding a subsection, and section itself was not set forth, it was void as not conforming to requirement of charter.

3. Mandamus ⚡16(1)—Mandamus will not lie to compel examination and certification of proposed ordinance which if passed would be ineffective.

If proposed ordinance would be void, mandamus will not lie to compel city clerk to examine and certify it under initiative provisions of Berkeley city charter, as writ may not be used to compel performance of act which would have no effect in law.

In Bank.

Original application for writ of mandate by Alfred Myers against Frank D. Stringham and others as members of the City Council of the City of Berkeley and another. Peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

Frank V. Cornish, of Berkeley, for petitioner.

E. J. Sinclair, of Berkeley, and James M. Koford, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to compel the city clerk of the city of Berkeley to examine and certify as sufficient a petition prepared and presented under the initiative provisions of the city charter; also to compel the city council to adopt a proposed ordinance set forth in the petition, or, in the event the proposed ordinance be not adopted, to submit the same to a vote of the electors of the city as provided by law. The proposed ordinance purports to amend Ordinance No. 666, N. S., which is the city's general zoning ordinance, by adding a new subsection to section 3, to be known as subsection (a-59), and by repealing subsection 30 of section 7 of said ordinance. The purpose of the amendment, as shown by the petition herein, is to reclassify certain property on Dwight way near Grove street. Section 1 of the proposed ordinance provides:

"That Ordinance No. 666, N. S., entitled 'An ordinance regulating and districting the location of residences, trades, industries, businesses and the several classes of public and semipublic buildings, and the location of buildings designed for specified uses, and establishing the boundaries of districts for the said purposes, and repealing certain existing ordinances or portions thereof,' be and the same is hereby amended by adding thereto a new subsection to section 3 to be known as subsection (a-59) to read as follows: Subsection (a-59). Beginning at the point of intersection of the western line of Grove street and the southern line of Dwight way, running thence westerly along said southern line of Dwight way one hundred and fifteen (115) feet; thence one hundred twenty-nine and $\frac{69}{100}$ (129.69) feet southerly parallel with said western line of Grove street; thence easterly one hundred and fifteen (115) feet to said western line of Grove street; thence northerly along said western line of Grove street to the place of beginning; also beginning at the point of intersection of the western line of Grove street and the northern line of Dwight way, running thence westerly along said northern line of Dwight way one hundred thirteen and $\frac{60}{100}$ (113.60) feet; thence northerly one hundred thirty-four and $\frac{80}{100}$ (134.80) feet parallel to said western line of Grove street; thence easterly one hundred thirty-eight and $\frac{83}{100}$ (138.83) feet parallel to said northern line of Dwight way to the said western line of Grove street; thence southerly along said western line of Grove street to the place of beginning."

Section 2 of the proposed ordinance provides:

"Subsection 30 section 7 of said Ordinance No. 666 N. S. is hereby repealed."

The respondent city clerk refuses to examine the petition for the reason, among others, that—

"The proposed ordinance attempts to amend the existing ordinance (666, N. S.) by amending a section or portion of section without setting forth the section in full as provided by article 8 of the charter of the city of Berkeley."

[1] Subsection 10 of section 44 of article 8 of the Charter reads as follows:

"No ordinance shall be revised, re-enacted or amended by reference to its title only; but the ordinance to be revised or re-enacted, or the section or sections thereof to be amended, or the new section or sections to be added thereto, shall be set forth and adopted in the method provided in this section for the adoption of ordinances." Stats. 1909, p. 1229.

Section 44 of the Charter, it is true, purports to govern the action of the city council as the legislative body of the city, and does not purport in terms to govern legislation by the initiative. But under the initiative provisions of the charter the proposed ordinance must first be submitted to the council for its adoption or rejection, and may thereafter be submitted to the electors of the city only in the event the council refuses to adopt it.

Under such circumstances any ordinance which may be adopted under the initiative provisions of the charter must be such an ordinance as might properly and legally be adopted by the council itself. State v. Reno City Council, 36 Nev. 334, 136 P. 110, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 195.

[2] The proposed ordinance is not in conformity with the requirements of the charter. In effect it is an amendment of a section of the ordinance by adding a subsection and the section itself is not set forth as prescribed. The purpose of the charter provision is plain. It is to compel an ordinance to disclose on its face something of its purpose and effect as a legislative enactment. The wisdom of the requirement is at once apparent from an inspection of the proposed ordinance. The new subsection sought to be added to the section by amendment is no more than a description of certain real property. It does not purport to disclose what the effect of its adoption would be, either on the status of the particular property described, or on its relation to the general zoning classifications in the city. Considered in and by itself, it is unintelligible and meaningless. It cannot be determined from its inspection what is sought to be accomplished. If the petition were examined and certified, and the proposed ordinance were submitted to the council for adoption, and were passed by that body, it is obvious that it would not constitute a valid enactment, because it is not in form in accordance with the requirements of the charter. If the council should refuse to adopt the proposed ordinance and were required to submit it to a vote of the electors of the city, and the requisite number of votes were to be cast in favor thereof, it would still lack the sanction of the charter to give it legality.

[3] If, in any event, the proposed ordinance would be void, mandamus will not lie to compel its examination and certification, for the reason that the writ may not be used to compel the performance of an act which would have no effect in law. Wilson v. Blake, 169 Cal. 449, 147 P. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 205; Hyde v. Wilde, 51 Cal. App. 82, 196 P. 118; 16 Cal. Jur. 777, and cases cited.

Other points are made in opposition to the issuance of the peremptory writ, but the foregoing discussion and determination renders it unnecessary to consider them.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

GALVIN et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CONTRA COSTA COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 11326.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 35 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Initiative amendments interpreted as providing for same general scope and nature of power reserved to people at large and people of particular locality and same general method for its exercise.

Provisions of Const. art. 4, $\S$ 1, reserving to people powers of initiative and referendum, in so far as they relate to initiative, provide for same general scope and nature of power reserved, respectively, to people of state at large and to people of particular locality and to same general method for its exercise.

2. Statutes $\S$ 35 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Initiative amendment held not to reserve to particular locality greater right to initiate local legislation than that provided for in respect to enactment by that means of state legislation.

Const. art. 4, $\S$ 1, providing for exercise of initiative by local divisions of state government, did not reserve to people of particular localities greater right to initiate local legislation or give other and greater powers in that regard than those possessed by people of state at large, or provide or permit different method for exercise of such powers than that provided for in respect to enactment by that means of state legislation.

3. Counties $\S$ 55—Initiative ordinances, before being submitted to people of county, must first be submitted to board of supervisors for legislative action.

In view of Pol. Code, $\S$ 4058, and Const. art. 4, $\S$ 1, initiative ordinance, before being submitted to people of county for adoption or rejection, must first be submitted to board of supervisors for its legislative action.

4. Constitutional law $\S$ 15—Initiative amendment interpreted in harmony with other organic law of state.

Initiative amendment (Const. art. 4, $\S$ 1), must be interpreted in harmony with other provisions of organic law of state of which it is a part.

5. Counties $\S$ 55—Counties inhibited from adopting local laws in conflict with general laws.

Const. art. 11, $\S$ 11, providing that counties may make and enforce such laws within its limits as are not in conflict with general laws, is inhibition against making laws in conflict with general laws.

6. Counties $\S$ 55—Grant of power to Legislature to enact general and uniform laws is limitation on power of counties to enact ordinances which would destroy uniformity Legislature is required to maintain.

Grant of power to Legislature by Const. art. 11, $\S\S$ 4, 5, to enact general and uniform laws, constitutes in itself limitation on power of counties, whether acting through legislative body or through initiative legislation, to adopt ordinances or regulations which would destroy uniformity as to matters which Legislature by general and uniform laws is required to create and maintain.

7. Counties $\S$ 55—Legislation submitted by initiative to people of county must be such as supervisors had jurisdiction and power to enact.

Since legislation by electors of counties must first be submitted to board of supervisors for its enactment, it must be such legislation only as supervisors, under Constitution and laws granting, defining, and limiting powers of that body, had jurisdiction and power to enact.

8. Counties $\S$ 55—Board of supervisors, having no jurisdiction to enact ordinance granting franchise for toll bridge across navigable waters between counties, could not submit it to initiative vote of people.

In view of Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 2843-2881, and section 4041, subd. 35, where, until notice of proposed application for franchise for toll bridge across navigable waters, defining boundaries of counties, had been given as required by section 2870, and until hearing has been had thereon under section 2871, and county engineer has acted thereon under St. 1881, p. 76, $\S\S$ 4, 5, board of supervisors had no jurisdiction to enact ordinance granting franchise, it could neither proceed to enact ordinance nor submit it to vote of people.

In Bank.

Original mandamus by John F. Galvin and another against the Board of Supervisors of Contra Costa County and others. Writ denied.

Brittain & Weise, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Archibald B. Tinning, of Martinez, for defendants.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, amici curiæ, for American Toll Bridge Co.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioners herein apply for a writ of mandate to be directed to the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa and the individual members of said board, the respondents herein, commanding them in their said official capacity to submit to a vote of the electors of said county, at a general or special election, a proposed initiative ordinance, a copy of which is attached to said petition, under and pursuant to the provisions of section 1 of article 4 of the state Constitution relating to initiative legislation, and of section 4058 of the Political Code. By the terms of the said ordinance, which accompanies said petition, it is proposed that there be granted to the Northern California Development Company, a corporation, and one of the petitioners herein, a franchise to construct, erect and maintain a toll bridge across the Straits of Carquinez between the county of Contra Costa and the county of Solano, and to take tolls thereon according to a schedule for such tolls as provided in said proposed ordinance, and which also provides for the location and details of the construction and maintenance of said bridge and for the term of said franchise. The petitioners allege that, having submitted said ordinance and franchise to the said board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa for enactment or for submission to the electors of said county for their adoption or rejection in an initiative election, at a regular meeting of said board, it and the members thereof have refused to either enact the same or to submit the same to the said electors of said county for their vote thereon; wherefore they apply for this writ. The respondents herein have appeared and demurred to said application, and, while they have also filed an answer herein, denying certain of the averments therein contained, they have, upon the hearing, submitted the cause upon said demurrer and upon the issues of law presented thereby, and to these we shall therefore address ourselves in this decision.

[1-3] The provisions of the state Constitution, under which the petitioners herein assert the right to initiate the legislation embraced in the ordinance in question, and to have the same submitted to the electors of the county of Contra Costa for their adoption or rejection at an initiative election, is that embodied in the amendment to the Constitution adopted in the year 1911, purporting to amend section 1 of article 4 thereof, so as to reserve to the people those powers of legislation which are known as the "initiative and referendum." The provisions thereof applicable to the first of these reserved powers cover the power to initiate amendments to the Constitution, state legislation, and local legislation. These provisions of said amendment to the Constitution, in so far as they relate to the initiative, are to be read together and are to be interpreted as providing for the same general scope and nature of the power reserved respectively to the people of the state at large and to the people of the particular locality, and to the same general method for its exercise. It was held by this court with respect to the referendum clauses of said amendment in the case of Hopping v. Council of the City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 609, 150 P. 977, and a like principle of interpretation equally applies to the initiative clauses thereof. When so read and so interpreted it must be concluded that it was not the intention of the framers of the particular portion of said amendment providing for the exercise of the initiative by local divisions of the state government through the use of the more brief and general phrasing thereof to reserve to the people of such particular localities a greater right to initiate local legislation or to reserve or give other or greater powers in that regard than those possessed by the people of the state at large, or to provide for or permit a different method for the exercise of such powers than that specifically provided for in respect to the enactment by that means of state legislation. We are thus led to the conclusion that, when the framers of this amendment provided therein that proposed initiative legislation in regard to matters of general concern should first be submitted to the state Legislature for enactment before being presented to the people of the state for adoption or rejection at the next ensuing general election, they intended that a like procedure should obtain in the use of the initiative by particular communities in matters of local concern, and that the method and procedure for submission in each case should be substantially the same. The Legislature so interpreted these initiative provisions of the Constitution in the enactment of section 4058 of the Political Code, in the same year in which the said amendment to the Constitution was adopted, and at the session thereof immediately following its adoption. It is this section of the Political Code upon which the petitioners expressly depend for their procedure and with the terms of which they allege themselves to have complied in all the preliminary steps taken for the initiation of the ordinance in question, which they are seeking by this application to compel the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa to submit to the electors thereof at an initiative election to be called and held as in said section provided. Section 4057 of the Political Code provides the procedure for the enactment of ordinances directly by boards of supervisors. Section 4058 of said Code provides that—

"Ordinances may also be enacted by and for any county of the state in the manner following."

Then follows the procedure for initiative legislation in compliance with which the signatures of a petition or petitions by the qualified electors of a county to the number of a certain percentage thereof, properly verified, requesting the adoption or submission to the people of the proposed legislation, are to be procured; and which petition or petitions, when signed and certified, shall be presented to the clerk of the county for his examination and certification as to the sufficiency in number and qualifications of the electors signing the same, and which petition or petitions, when so found to be sufficient, and when so certified by said official, shall by him be submitted to the board of supervisors of the county at the next regular session of said board. This being done, the section proceeds to provide that—

"The board of supervisors shall either: (a) Pass such ordinance without alteration at the regular session at which it is presented and within ten days after it is presented; or (b) forthwith the supervisors shall proceed to call a special election at which such ordinance, without alteration, shall be submitted to a vote of the electors of the county."

The section also provides for certain contingencies upon which the ordinance may be submitted to the electors of the county at the next general election.

[4, 5] It thus far appears that, under the intendment of the initiative amendment to the state Constitution in its application to local legislation, as well as under the express provisions of section 4058 of the Political Code, enacted in order to give effect thereto, initiative ordinances, before being submitted to the people of a county for their adoption or rejection, must first be submitted to the board of supervisors for legislative action in the way of adoption or rejection by said board. This being so, it would seem to follow of necessity that the proposed ordinance must be in the nature of such legislation as the board of supervisors has power to enact. It was in fact so held by this court in the case of Giddings v. Board of Trustees, 165 Cal. 695, 133 P. 479, in interpreting the act entitled "An act to provide for direct legislation by cities and towns, etc.," approved January 2, 1912 (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 131), and which in its general terms coincides with the provisions of section 4058 of the Political Code. See, also, Matter of Ellsworth, 165 Cal. 677, 686, 133 P. 272. In determining, therefore, whether the petitioners herein, in the course of their effort to have the ordinance in question submitted to the electors of the county of Contra Costa for their approval or rejection at a general or special election, had the right to request that the board of supervisors should themselves enact without any change the proposed measure, and, to have such request granted, we must look elsewhere than to the petition embodying such request. We must look to the Constitution and laws of the state which contain, define, and limit the powers of boards of supervisors of counties such as the county of Contra Costa is. The initiative amendment to the Constitution itself must be interpreted in harmony with the other provisions of the organic law of this state, of which it has become a part. To construe it otherwise would be to break down and destroy the barriers and limitations which the Constitution read as a whole, has cast about legislation, both state and local. For example, the Constitution provides in section 11, of article 11 thereof, that—

"Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

[6] This provision of the Constitution constitutes an inhibition against the adoption by counties, whether acting by means of the initiative or otherwise, of local laws and ordinances which are in conflict with general laws; and it was clearly not the intendment of the framers of the initiative amendment or of the people who adopted it to wipe out this salutary provision of the Constitution. Again, the Constitution, in sections 4 and 5 of article 11 thereof, provides as follows:

"Sec. 4. The Legislature shall establish a system of county governments, which shall be uniform throughout the state; and by general laws shall provide for township organizations, under which any county may organize whenever a majority of the qualified electors of such county, voting at a general election, shall so determine; and whenever a county shall adopt township organization, the assessment and collection of the revenue shall be made, and the business of such county and the local affairs of the several townships therein shall be managed and transacted, in the manner prescribed by such general laws.

"Sec. 5. The Legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment, in the several counties, of boards of supervisors, sheriffs, county clerks, district attorneys, and such other county, township, and municipal officers as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their duties and fix their terms of office."

[7, 8] This grant of power to the Legislature to enact general and uniform laws relating to the matters referred to in the foregoing clauses of the Constitution constitutes in itself a limitation upon the power of counties, whether acting through their regularly constituted legislative bodies, or attempting to act directly through initiative legislation, to adopt ordinances or regulations which would have the effect of destroying the uniformity in regard to such matters which the state Legislature, by the enactment of general and uniform laws, was required to create and maintain. In the case of Harnett v. Sacramento County, 235 P. 445, just decided by this court, it was held that section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, referring to the initiative powers reserved to the electors of counties, could not be held to authorize initiative legislation on the part of the electors of a county in contravention of an enactment of the state Legislature under the authority of the foregoing provisions of the Constitution, providing for the creation and maintenance of a uniform system of county governments. A like principle applies to the initiation generally of local legislation. Since such legislation by the electors of counties must first be submitted to the board of supervisors for its enactment, it follows that it must be such legislation only as the board of supervisors, under the Constitution and laws of the state granting, defining, and limiting the powers of that body, has jurisdiction and power to enact. Myers v. Stringham (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 448 (March 26, 1925). In applying this principle to the immediate matter before us, we find that the proposed initiative ordinance, which the petitioners herein have requested the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa to enact or to submit to the electors of said county for their action thereon, is an ordinance granting a franchise to one of said petitioners for the erection and maintenance of a toll bridge across the navigable waters of the Carquinez straits, which form the boundary line between the counties of Contra Costa and Solano. The power of the board of supervisors with relation to the grant of franchises of this character are set forth in part 3, tit. 6, c. 4, of the Political Code, and in the sections thereof between 2843 and 2881, inclusive, and also in subdivision 35 of section 4041 of said Code. By the last-named section the general permanent powers of boards of supervisors are defined. It is therein provided:

"4041. The boards of supervisors, in their respective counties shall have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law: * * *

"35. To grant licenses and franchises for the construction, keeping and taking tolls on roads, bridges, ferries, wharves, chutes, booms and piers, and to grant franchises along and over the public roads and highways for all lawful purposes, upon such terms and conditions and restrictions as in their judgment may be necessary and proper, and in such manner as to prevent the least possible obstruction and inconvenience to the traveling public."

Section 2843 of said Code provides:

"When authority to construct a toll bridge, or to erect and keep a ferry over waters dividing two counties is desired, application must be made to the board of supervisors of that county situated on the left bank descending such bay, river, creek, slough, or arm of the sea."

Section 2844 places the limitations upon the grant of power embraced in the above-quoted provisions thereof which are therein referred to, viz.:

"The board of supervisors must not grant authority to construct or erect a toll bridge or ferry until the notice of such intended application has been given as respectively required in articles two and three of this chapter."

The sections of said Code, embraced in articles 2 and 3 of the chapter thus referred to, define these limitations. Section 2870 provides that:

"Every applicant for authority to construct a toll bridge must publish a notice in at least one newspaper in each county in which the bridge or any part of it is to be, or if no paper is published therein, in an adjoining county, once in each week for six successive weeks, specifying the location, the length, and breadth of the bridge, and the time at which the application hereinafter required will be made. After notice is given, application must be made to the board of supervisors of the proper county, at any meeting specified in the notice, for authority to construct it."

Section 2871 provides for a hearing before said board after the giving of the notice required by the previous section. It reads as follows:

"On the hearing, any person may appear and be heard. The board may take testimony or authorize it to be taken by any judicial officer of the county, and it may adjourn the hearing from time to time. A copy of the articles of incorporation, certified by the secretary of state, or by the clerk where they are filed, must be attached to and filed with the application if made by a corporation."

Section 2854 of said Code provides:

"The owner of land on either side of the waters to be crossed, and the owner of the land on the left bank descending over the owner of land on the right bank, is entitled to preference in procuring authority to construct a bridge or ferry; but where such owner fails or neglects to apply for such authority within a reasonable time after the necessity therefor arises, the board of supervisors may grant such authority to another."

Section 2875 of said Code contains the following provision:

"All bridges constructed under this chapter crossing navigable streams must be so constructed as not to obstruct navigation, and must have a draw or swing of sufficient space or span to permit the safe, convenient, and expeditious passage at all times of any steamer, vessel, or raft which may navigate the stream or water bridge."

The foregoing provisions of the Political Code were enacted upon its adoption in the year 1872. In the year 1881 the state Legislature adopted a general law entitled "An act to provide for bridges across navigable streams, and across estuaries, ponds, swamps, or arms of bays that may be outside of the line of navigable waters," which act is still in full force and effect. Stats. 1881, p. 76. By section 4 of said act it is provided:

"Whenever the supervisors of any county, or counties, desire to erect a bridge on any public highway, or to grant the privilege so to do to any individual or corporation, across a navigable stream, under the provisions of this act, said board or boards shall notify the state engineer of such purpose, and of the precise point where such bridge is proposed to be located. The state engineer shall, within ten days of the receipt of such notice, designate the width of the draw to be made in such bridge, and also the length of the spans necessary to permit the free flow of water."

Section 5 thereof further provides:

"The communication from the state engineer, fixing the draw and spans, shall be spread upon the minutes of the board, and any bridge constructed at that point shall be in conformity therewith; provided, however, that the state engineer may, upon hearing before him, had upon application of any person or body interested, made within ten days after the receipt by said board of supervisors, of said communication of said engineer, change his first plans, in which case the modified plans must be so spread upon the minutes, and shall stand in place of the original; provided, however, that before such hearing is had, the said engineer must give ten days' notice by publication in some newspaper published in the county or counties from which the application came, of the time and place of the hearing."

The foregoing provisions of the Political Code and of the general law, above quoted, define and limit the powers of the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa in the matter of enacting legislation granting franchises for the erection and maintenance of toll bridges across the navigable waters which form the boundary line between said county and the county of Solano, and provide expressly and exclusively for the procedure which must precede such grant. Until the notice of the proposed application for such franchise has been given as required by section 2870 of said Code, and until a hearing has been had thereon as provided in section 2871 thereof, and until the state engineer has been notified of the purpose of the board of supervisors to make such grant, and has acted thereon in the manner and to the extent provided in the sections of the act of 1881 above referred to, the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa have neither jurisdiction nor power to enact any ordinance purporting to grant a franchise for a toll bridge across said navigable waters and between the counties whose contiguous boundaries are defined thereby. It is not shown or claimed by the petitioners herein that the notices required by the foregoing sections of the Political Code or of the general law above referred to have been given, or that in pursuance thereof any such hearing as is therein provided for has been held, or that the state engineer has acted in regard to those matters wherein, by the statute of 1881, his action prior to the grant of the proposed franchise is required, nor are we referred to any authority which would sustain a holding that the giving of such notices, the holding of such hearing, and the notification to and action of the state engineer as to the matters wherein his action is required by said statute, are not jurisdictional prerequisites to the exercise by said board of the power to enact legislation granting said franchise.

The two contentions which the petitioners make in that regard are: First, that these are merely administrative acts on the part of said board, not jurisdictional in their character or requirement. We are unable to approve this contention. It is true that under the terms of section 2843 of the Political Code the board of supervisors of the county upon the left bank of the stream or straits, descending, which is to be spanned by the toll bridge in question, is given preference in the matter of the initiation and enactment of the legislation embracing the grant of a franchise therefor, but the officials, the electors, the residents, and property owners of the adjoining county are also vitally interested in the matter of granting or refusing to grant such franchise and in the terms and conditions of such grant. The owners of the land on each bank of the waters, at the points thereon where the structure is to be placed, are also vitally interested in the question as to whether such franchise should be granted, and are entitled to notice of the application therefor, to the end that they may have an opportunity to exercise the preferences on the matter of awarding such franchise which is accorded to them by the terms of section 2854 of said Code, or, in case they do not see fit to exercise such preference, to resist, if they are so advised, the granting of a franchise for a structure, the erection of which would compel the transfer or condemnation of the respective holdings. The requirement of notice to the state engineer is equally vital, since the state at large is interested in the construction of bridges across its navigable waters. The second contention of the petitioners, as to the jurisdictional necessity of the notices and hearings above referred, is that as to the notices the initiative ordinance is a substitute for these in the opportunity afforded to the people to vote upon the passage of the ordinance. This, however, is not the fact as to either the people upon the right bank of the strait, nor is it true as to the notice required to be given to the state engineer. As to the latter, the petitioners insist that, in providing for the subsequent approval by the state engineer, of the details of construction of the bridge, this requirement of the statute is satisfied. But this would not be so, for the double reason that the vital requirements of a statute cannot be dispensed with by any sort of substitution, and that the subsequent action of the state engineer, even if allowable, would or might so change the substantial form of the structure as to require the construction of such a bridge as the grantee of the franchise would not be willing to construct, or as the electors would not have been willing to approve. Other reasons might well be suggested, showing that the foregoing prerequisites to action on the part of the board of supervisors of said county, in either adopting an ordinance purporting to grant such a franchise as the petitioners herein are seeking, or in submitting to the electors of their county at an initiative election the question as to whether such franchise should be granted or denied, are jurisdictional, and that, in the absence of a showing that these prerequisites to the exercise of such power have been complied with, the board of supervisors have no power to take either course of action in the premises. The conclusions thus far arrived at render unnecessary a consideration of the question as to whether the so-called Broughton Act (Stats. 1905, p. 777) is applicable to the form and content of the franchise applied for in this particular case.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the application of the petitioners herein for a writ of mandate must be denied. It is so ordered.

71 Cal. App. 272

LOMBARDI v. SINANIDES et al.
(Civ. 2894.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 13, 1925.)

1. Deeds ⚡25—Vendor and purchaser ⚡224—Transfer of grantor's "right, title, and interest" is in effect mere deed of quitclaim; grantee under quitclaim deed not innocent purchaser.

The conveyance of the "right, title, and interest" of grantor vests in grantee only what grantor himself could claim, and is in effect a mere deed of quitclaim, and grantee can make no defense to action for rescission by vendee under contract of sale, which was not available to the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Right, Title, and Interest.]

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚡99, 118—Defaulting vendor cannot rescind; default by vendee does not prevent him from rescinding, where vendor first in default.

A vendor, who is in default, cannot terminate right of vendee until vendor has performed or offered to perform his part of contract, and, where vendor was first in default, in that he failed to deliver possession of all land, which he agreed to deliver to vendee, vendee's subsequent default does not preclude him from rescinding.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚡118—Vendee, defaulting in payments, not precluded from rescinding on ground of alleged misrepresentations of vendor.

A vendee, in default on payments under contract of sale, is not precluded from rescinding on ground of alleged misrepresentations as to boundary line of property involved.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚡34—Untrue statements by vendor as to boundary line, when without information or belief, constitutes "actual fraud."

Positive untrue statements of vendor as to boundary line of property, when he had no information or belief on the subject, constitutes "actual fraud," within Civ. Code, § 1572.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Actual Fraud.]

5. Contracts ⚡94(1)—Actual or constructive fraud ground for rescinding contract.

Either actual or constructive fraud is sufficient ground for rescission of contract.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⚡31—Misrepresentation as to line by vendor who did not know true line held to entitle vendee to rescission on ground of mutual mistake.

Where vendor misrepresented boundary line, but did not know true line, vendee held entitled to rescission on ground of mutual mistake.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⚡119—Vendee held not guilty of laches in giving notice of rescission.

Delay of a month by vendee in giving notice of rescission, on ground of vendor's misrepresentations as to boundary line, did not constitute laches, where it does not appear that vendor could have suffered any prejudice from such delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by A. Lombardi against Sinan Sinanides and W. R. Groshel, in which the last-named defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John A. Steele, of Fresno, for appellant.

T. R. Thomson and J. C. Hammel, both of Fresno, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. December 28, 1921, the plaintiff and defendant Sinanides entered into an agreement, by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to purchase and Sinanides to sell "the north half of the east half of the west half of the southwest quarter" of a certain section of land, together with certain personal property, for $21,000; $2,700 was paid upon the execution of the agreement, and the remainder was to be paid in annual installments of $1,000 on the 15th day of November of every year thereafter. Plaintiff was "to erect upon said premises a substantial four-room house and barn on or before July 1, 1922," and to pay all taxes which thereafter became a lien upon the premises. There was a mortgage on the premises in the sum of $6,500, and the agreement provides that the "buyer agrees to assume and agrees to pay said mortgage according to the terms thereof." The agreement provided that "time is expressly made of the essence hereof," and that, upon default by plaintiff in payment of any installment of the purchase price or of taxes upon the premises or in the performance of any other covenant or condition of the agreement, the "seller may consider this agreement at an end, and may re-enter and take possession of said premises, * * * and all payments theretofore made shall be held and retained by seller as and for compensation for the reasonable use and rental of said premises." At the time of the execution of the agreement "Sinanides represented to plaintiff that defendant Sinanides was in possession of all the land described in said contract, and that he would deliver possession of all thereof to plaintiff, subject to easements for roads and ditches," and that "a certain fence then standing near the east boundary line of said premises was the easterly boundary line thereof; whereas, in truth and in fact, the true easterly boundary line was and is approximately 39 feet east of said fence. * * * The amount of land contained in the described premises set out in said contract is 19.78 acres, according to the government description thereof. * * * The area of the strip of land lying between the true easterly boundary line of said premises" and said fence is 1.20 acres. "At the time of making said contract defendant Sinan Sinanides did not know the true boundary of said premises" and believed that the said fence was upon the true easterly boundary line. The plaintiff believed the representation that the fence was upon the true boundary line and "he would not have entered into said contract had he known that the true easterly boundary line of said premises was not as pointed out to him." Sinanides did not make such representation "with the intent to deceive or defraud plaintiff," nor did he make any representation as to the number of acres contained in the tract of land described in the agreement. He delivered to plaintiff possession of all the land so described, except the 1.20 acres lying east of said fence.

Plaintiff failed to build a barn upon the premises, but placed other permanent improvements thereon of the reasonable value of $2,000. "Plaintiff discovered a shortage of approximately 1.25 acres in said premises on or about September 1, 1922, and made no complaint thereof to either of the defendants prior to December 29, 1922, and then only to defendant Sinan Sinanides." Thereafter "plaintiff harvested from said premises a crop of raisins during the year 1922 of the reasonable value of $1,602.48" and, while in possession of the premises, performed labor "in connection with producing a crop of raisins thereon" of the reasonable value of $741. He "did not discover or ascertain the correct easterly boundary line of said premises until on or about December 1, 1922." December 29, 1922, plaintiff served upon Sinanides a written notice of rescission of the agreement, stating that the strip of land lying between the fence and the easterly boundary of the land "has been held in possession by other parties for a number of years and who claim they have held the easterly portion of said land adversely during this period," offering to restore the premises of which plaintiff had been placed in possession and execute all necessary papers to effect a retransfer, and to account for the rents and profits, and demanding the return of the $2,700 paid on the purchase price and payment of the reasonable value of the improvements made by plaintiff upon the land. No notice or demand was served upon defendant Groshell and he had no notice or knowledge of the attempted rescission until this action was commenced. The action is based upon the notice of rescission.

Sinanides denies the alleged false representations and prayed for judgment for costs. Groshell filed a separate answer, denying the alleged false representations, and by way of cross-complaint, alleged that "on or about March 27, 1922, defendant Sinan Sinanides assigned his right, title, and interest in and to said land * * * to W. R. Groshell, defendant and cross-complainant herein, and that said W. R. Groshell is now the owner of said land"; that plaintiff had failed to build a barn on the premises; that he had failed to pay the second installment of taxes for the year 1922-1923; that he had failed to pay the installment of $1,000 upon the purchase price, which became due November 15, 1922; that, "by reason of said default of plaintiff, * * * cross-complainant has elected to consider said agreement at an end, and he has been released from all obligation in law or in equity to convey said property. All moneys heretofore paid under said agreement are retained as a reasonable rental for use and occupation of said premises." Groshell set up a further cross-complaint in the usual form of an action to quiet title. He prayed for judgment canceling the agreement between plaintiff and Sinanides and quieting cross-complainant's title to the land.

The court found the foregoing facts, including those alleged in the cross-complaints, to be true; that Groshell had no knowledge of plaintiff's rights, except such as appeared upon the face of the agreement, until this action was commenced; and that "plaintiff in March, 1922, had knowledge and notice that * * * Groshell had acquired all the interest of * * * Sinanides in said property." The court made no finding as to the rental value of the premises during the time the plaintiff was in possession thereof. Judgment was entered in accordance with the prayers of defendants and cross-complainant. This appeal is from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] There is neither allegation nor finding that Sinanides assigned his interest in the agreement to Groshell, but, for the purposes of this opinion only, it may be conceded that the assignment of the vendor's interest in the land carried with it his interest in the agreement and the payments to be made thereunder. The transfer of Sinanides' "right, title, and interest in and to said land" to Groshell was, in effect, a mere deed of quitclaim. O'Sullivan v. Griffith, 153 Cal. 502, 505, 95 P. 873, 96 P. 323. "It has been uniformly held that a conveyance of the right, title, and interest of the grantor vests in the purchaser only what the grantor himself could claim. * * * This construction is in accord with the obvious meaning of the language. The grantee in such a deed necessarily takes only what the grantor then had, and subject to all defects and equities which could then have been asserted against the grantor." Allison v. Thomas, 72 Cal. 562, 564, 14 P. 309, 310 (1 Am. St. Rep. 89); Southern Pacific Co. v. Dore, 34 Cal. App. 521, 168 P. 147; O'Sullivan v. Griffith, supra. It follows that Groshell could make no defense in this action which was not available to Sinanides.

[2] Respondent contends that a vendee in default cannot rescind; but a vendor, who is in default, cannot terminate the right of the vendee until the former has performed or offered to perform his part of the contract. Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 739, 174 P. 657. In this case the vendor was first in default, in that he failed to deliver possession of all the land which he agreed to deliver to plaintiff. It is true the court found that Sinanides had kept and performed all the covenants and conditions of the agreement on his part, but this general finding is overcome by the express finding that Sinanides represented that he would deliver possession of all the land described in the agreement, but that, in fact, he placed the plaintiff in possession of only 18.58 acres thereof. The consideration failed to the extent of the 1.20 acres not so delivered. The default of Sinanides was a material one. According to the purchase price of the land, the value of the 1.20 acres is more than $1,500.

[3] Neither did plaintiff's default preclude him from rescinding on the ground of the alleged misrepresentation of Sinanides. In the denial of a hearing by the Supreme Court in De Bairos v. Barlin, 46 Cal. App. 665, 674, 190 P. 188, 192, where the facts were similar to those of the instant case, it is said that—

The rule invoked "applies only to cases where a rescission is sought or claimed by one party to an executory contract on the ground of a breach of the contract by the other party. * * * We know of no case which holds that such rule applies to a case where the vendee in default on payments due on the contract seeks to avoid and rescind it for fraud of the vendor in procuring its execution, or for mistake inducing its execution."

The complaint alleged and the court found that the misrepresentation as to the easterly boundary line of the land was, in fact, made by Sinanides. The complaint alleged that—

"The true easterly boundary line of the premises described in said contract was and is approximately 40 feet east of the line as represented and pointed out by defendant Sinan Sinanides."

The denial of this allegation in the answer of Sinanides is as follows:

Cal. Rep. 233-236 P.—35

"The defendant states that he has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer the same, and, placing his denial upon that ground, he denies said allegations, and each and every part thereof."

The court found that—

"At the time of making said contract, the defendant Sinan Sinanides did not know the true boundary of said premises; * * * that said representations as to said boundary lines were untrue, but, at the time of making said statements, and at all times thereafter, until the commencement of this action, said defendant Sinan Sinanides believed said statements to be true."

[4] The positive untrue statement of Sinanides as to the boundary line, when he had "no information or belief upon the subject," constituted actual fraud. Section 1572 of the Civil Code provides:

"Actual fraud, within the meaning of this chapter, consists in any of the following acts, committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract: * * * 2. The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true."

In Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 387, 92 P. 1011, 1013, it is said:

"If one makes material false statements to another, to induce that other to buy an article, and which does induce him to buy to his injury, the defrauding party, either knowing them to be untrue, or believing them to be true, but having no sufficient ground for such belief, he will not be protected from liability for his fraudulent conduct by the fact that he did not intend to deceive the other party. Having actually deceived such other party and having profited by such deceit, he cannot be allowed to retain the advantage, or defeat liability, on the ground that he acted in good faith without actual intent to deceive."

[5] Fraud, either actual or constructive, is a sufficient ground for rescission of a contract. In a note appearing in Ann. Cas. 1913C, 63, where a large number of cases are cited, it is said:

"In equity it is generally held that, where a vendor of realty makes a false representation of a material fact, it is not a good defense to an action by the vendee seeking relief that such representation was innocently made. * * * This rule is most frequently applied in actions for the rescission of contracts, it being held that a false representation by a vendor of realty of a material fact constituting an inducement to the contract of purchase, and on which the purchaser had the right to rely, is a ground for the rescission of his contract by a court of equity, and that, too, though the party making the representation may have been ignorant as to whether it was true or false; the real inquiry being not whether the vendor knew the representation to be false, but whether the vendee believed it to be true and was misled by it in entering into the contract."

"A party will always be held to make good his statement in the form in which he makes it. If he states a thing as true in general terms without qualification, then he is presumed to do so upon his own knowledge, or at his own peril, and must make good his assertion." Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 503, 507.

In Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 312, 77 P. 954, 957, after quoting the foregoing language, it is said:

"The same rule is laid down by all the authorities."

In De Bairos v. Barlin, supra, page 670 (190 P. 190) it is said:

"Constructive fraud is defined by our Code as 'any breach of duty which without an actual fraudulent intent gains an advantage to the person in fault * * * by misleading another to his prejudice.' Section 1573, Civ. Code. It was certainly a breach of the vendor's duty not to inform himself correctly regarding the boundaries of the land he was seeking to sell."

In Del Grande v. Castelhun, 56 Cal. App. 366, 367, 205 P. 18, an action to rescind a contract, it is said:

"On the merits of the case, it is said that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of fraud, because there is no showing of a confidential relation between the parties or of appellant's knowledge of the falsity of the representations. Under the particular circumstances, it was not necessary to show either. One dealing with the owner of real property may assume that he knows the true boundaries, and may rely on his representations to that extent."

In Scott v. Delta Land, etc., Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 328, 207 P. 389, 392, it is said:

"Aside from the provisions of section 1572 of the Civil Code, it is not established by the weight of authority in the United States that a party to a contract may innocently and with belief in the truth of his statements misrepresent to the opposite party conditions material to the consideration to be rendered by the former and escape liability. In a civil action, the good faith of the party who procures the assent of another to the making of a contract by material misrepresentations is of no moment."

Hearings in the Supreme Court were denied in the last three cases cited.

[6] It may be further stated that the complaint, supplemented by the answer of Sinanides, to the effect that he did not know the true boundary line, states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for rescission on the ground of mutual mistake, and the findings are sufficient to support a judgment rescinding the contract on that ground.

[7] Respondent further contends that the plaintiff waived his right to rescind by remaining in possession and harvesting the grape crop on the land after he discovered the shortage in acreage. The court found that there was no misrepresentation as to the acreage contained in the tract and therefore the mere shortage gave the plaintiff no right to rescind. Government subdivisions of land are often found to be short in acreage. The court found that the plaintiff did not discover the location of the true boundary line, and that he had not been placed in possession of all the land described in the agreement until December 1, 1922, and that he gave notice of rescission on the 29th of that month. It may be presumed that the grape crop was completely harvested by the 1st of December. It does not appear that the defendants could have suffered any prejudice from the delay of less than a month in giving notice of rescission. Mere delay for so short a time does not amount to laches. Stone v. McCarty, 64 Cal. App. 158, 168, 220 P. 690; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 589, 217 P. 515.

In the absence of a finding as to the rental value of the premises while in plaintiff's possession, there is no basis upon which to direct the entry of judgment in favor of plaintiff. All the parties should be given leave to amend their pleadings, if they so request, in order to more certainly determine their respective rights.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: PLUMMER, J.; HART, J.

71 Cal. App. 281

Ex parte NORTHCOTT. (Cr. 1246.)

1. Habeas corpus ☞4—Error in exercising jurisdiction not reviewable in application for habeas corpus.

Failure of trial court to follow Pen. Code, § 1164, in receiving verdict, being merely error in exercise of jurisdiction, could not be reviewed on writ of habeas corpus, but should have been presented on appeal from judgment.

2. Habeas corpus ☞4—Conviction after affirmation cannot be collaterally attacked on habeas corpus for error reviewable on appeal.

Conviction, after affirmation on appeal, cannot be collaterally attacked on habeas corpus for error reviewable on appeal.

3. Criminal law ☞240—Lack of probable cause for holding accused on preliminary examination held not to avoid conviction.

Holding of accused by committing magistrate before whom preliminary examination was conducted, without reasonable or probable cause, held not to avoid conviction, which is founded entirely on evidence adduced at trial and verdict of jury.

4. Constitutional law §250—Criminal law §1206(1)—Indeterminate Sentence Law not unconstitutional as depriving of equal protection of law.

Indeterminate Sentence Law, Pen. Code, § 1168, is not violative of equal protection of the law clauses of federal and state Constitutions, as depriving one convicted of crime of benefits and privileges conferred by section 1588, providing for credits for good behavior; for it operates uniformly against all of the class to which it applies.

5. Statutes §68, 71—"General law" defined; requirement of uniformity satisfied if law applies to all of class alike.

A law is "general" which applies to all of a class, the classification being a proper one, and the requirement of uniformity is satisfied, if it applies to all of the class alike.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, General Law.]

Application for writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Ephraim Northcott, directed to Warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure release of petitioner on ground of error by court in receiving verdict. Writ denied.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

KNIGHT, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner is confined in the California state prison at San Quentin under an indeterminate sentence for the crime of murder in the second degree, after having been tried and convicted by a jury in the superior court of San Mateo county. An appeal was taken from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a motion for a new trial, in which all errors alleged to have been committed prior thereto were reviewed, and on February 2, 1920, said judgment and order were duly affirmed. People v. Northcutt, 45 Cal. App. 706, 189 P. 704.

[1, 2] The petitioner now alleges in this application that the trial court, in receiving the verdict, failed to follow the procedure prescribed by section 1164 of the Penal Code, and that therefore the judgment is void. Assuming such allegation to be true, and that the requirements of said section were not complied with, such omission did not divest the court of jurisdiction. It amounted to nothing more than an error committed in the exercise of jurisdiction, which error should have been presented for review upon the appeal from the judgment. A writ of habeas corpus may not be invoked to inquire into mere errors committed in the exercise of jurisdiction. Ex parte Philbrook, 47 Cal. App. 678, 191 P. 77. Furthermore, a judgment of conviction, after affirmance on appeal, cannot be collaterally attacked on habeas corpus, for grounds which were reviewable on that appeal even though they were not mentioned in the decision thereof. Matter of Application of Smith, 161 Cal. 208, 118 P. 710.

[3] Secondly, the petition alleges that said judgment of conviction is void because the magistrate before whom the preliminary examination was conducted held the petitioner for trial without reasonable or probable cause. The point is without merit. It appears that petitioner is now being held as a prisoner in the state prison pursuant to a commitment issued by the superior court, based upon the judgment of conviction obtained therein. Said judgment is not related to, nor is it dependent upon, the order of the committing magistrate holding the defendant to answer for trial; its foundation being in the evidence adduced at the trial and the verdict of the jury, and not in the proceedings occurring before the committing magistrate.

[4, 5] Lastly, it is alleged that the Indeterminate Sentence Law (section 1168, Pen. Code), under which petitioner was sentenced, is repugnant to the "equal protection of the law" clauses of the federal and state Constitutions (Const. U. S. Amend. 14, § 1; Const. Cal. art. 1, § 13) because it deprives petitioner of "the benefits and privileges which are conferred by section 1588 of the Penal Code. * * * That Code section granted to prisoners confined in the state prison a statutory right to credits for good behavior. The Supreme Court, in the case of In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958, held that the Indeterminate Sentence Law was constitutional, and in so holding declared that its provisions repealed by implication the provisions of said section 1588, and substituted "the discretion of the * * * board of prison directors for an absolute statutory right, thus making what had been before a right now a matter of grace." In re Mann, 192 Cal. 165, 219 P. 71. The case of In re Lee, supra, further established the proposition that the deprivation of the right theretofore conferred upon prisoners by said section 1588 operated uniformly against all prisoners who are sentenced under said Indeterminate Sentence Law; and that being so, it is obvious said law does not contravene the constitutional inhibition relied upon by petitioner.

"It has been repeatedly held that a law is general which applied to all of a class—the classification being a proper one—and the requirement of uniformity is satisfied if it applies to all of the class alike." 5 Cal. Jur. p. 819.

Illustrative of the legality of such laws may be cited statutes which by their terms apply only to that class of prisoners serving life sentences. People v. Finley, 153 Cal. 59, 94 P. 248; Finley v. California, 222 U. S. 28, 32 S. Ct. 13, 56 L. Ed. 75.

The mere fact that said Indeterminate Sentence Law does not apply to persons who are convicted of offenses which were committed prior to the enactment of said law (In re Lee, supra), and also to persons convicted of crimes the punishment for which the statute fixes no minimum or maximum penalty (People v. Sama, 189 Cal. 153, 207 P. 893), does not affect the situation, for the simple reason that the character of those cases constitutes a different class.

The application for the writ is denied.

Ex parte KINNEY. (Cr. 1253.)

1. Criminal law §168—Judgment of conviction not void as involving double jeopardy.

Where petitioner for habeas corpus had been convicted on several charges of burglaries and receiving stolen goods, but the stolen goods were the fruits of the burglaries, and court granted new trial as to the stolen goods charges, denied new trial as to burglary charges, and sentenced on each burglary conviction, the judgment was not void as violating Const. art. 1, § 13, as to double jeopardy, in that two separate felony charges were based upon one alleged act.

2. Criminal law §964—New trial on one of two charges based on same act held not to require new trial as to other.

Where accused was charged with burglaries and receiving stolen goods, the latter being the fruits of the burglaries, but charges were embodied in independent counts upon which separate verdicts were rendered, grant of new trial as to charges of receiving stolen goods did not operate to set aside convictions for burglary.

3. Habeas corpus §96—Nonjurisdictional errors not available.

Errors not jurisdictional will not be inquired into in habeas corpus proceeding.

Application on petition of Myrtle Kinney for writ of habeas corpus to require release from imprisonment on charge of burglary. Writ denied.

James P. Montgomery, of Oakland, for petitioner.

KNIGHT, J. Application for a writ of habeas corpus.

The petitioner, Myrtle Kinney, was accused, with one George Hart, in San Diego county, of seven separate acts of burglary and seven separate charges of receiving stolen goods, upon which they were jointly tried and convicted. The stolen goods alleged to have been wrongfully received by defendants were the fruits of the burglaries set forth in the information. Upon motion of defendants the trial court granted a new trial as to the charges of receiving stolen goods, denied a new trial as to the charges of burglary, and thereupon sentenced the defendants to indeterminate sentences on each conviction of burglary. Appeals from said convictions were announced by the defendants, but not perfected.

It is alleged in the petition for the issuance of the writ that the judgment entered in said action was and is void for the following reasons: First, that two separate felony charges are based upon one alleged act, and that therefore petitioner's conviction thereon was "in contravention of article 1, § 13. of the Constitution of the State of California, wherein it is provided that 'no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense'"; secondly, "that the granting of a new trial on seven counts for alleged possession of stolen goods, ipso facto, granted a new trial on the seven counts for alleged burglary"; thirdly, that there was no evidence proving that petitioner was guilty of any of the alleged burglaries.

[1-3] We find no merit in any of petitioner's contentions. It is manifest that she has suffered no prejudice from the charges of receiving stolen goods for the reason that as to them a new trial was granted. But the granting of a new trial on those charges did not operate to set aside the convictions on the charges of burglary, because the latter charges were embodied in independent counts upon which separate verdicts were rendered, and consequently constituted distinct judgments of conviction. People v. Dillon (Cal. App.) 229 P. 974. And in any event the petition for the writ must be denied for the reason that the errors complained of are not jurisdictional, but, if errors at all, relate merely to the exercise of jurisdiction and therefore may not be inquired into in a habeas corpus proceeding. Ex parte Philbrook, 47 Cal. App. 678, 191 P. 77; In re Ephraim Northcott (Cal. App.) 235 P. 458.

1. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 461(1)—Parol evidence admissible to ascertain intention of parties and construe writing.

Parol evidence is admissible to show situation of parties and circumstances under which a written instrument was executed for purpose of ascertaining intention of parties and properly construing writing.

2. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 448—Parol evidence inadmissible where instrument clear and unambiguous.

Where written instrument is clear and unambiguous on its face, parol evidence is inadmissible to give it a construction other than that which it plainly expresses; but it must be interpreted according to its terms, and will be enforced without resorting to proof of surrounding circumstances.

3. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1170(7)—Error, if any, in admitting parol evidence to aid in interpreting written contract, held not to require reversal where defendants not taken by surprise and no injury shown.

In suit on written contract, where plaintiff did not allege an ambiguity in such contract, but both plaintiff and defendants presented opposing constructions thereof, error, if any, in admitting parol evidence to aid court in interpreting such contract, does not require reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, since defendants were not taken by surprise by admission of such evidence, and they do not show any injury by reason of its admission.

4. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1052(5)—Error, if any, in admitting parol evidence to aid in construction of written contract, harmless where contract correctly interpreted.

Where interpretation placed on written contract by trial court was correct, admission of parol evidence to aid in its construction, if error, was harmless.

5. Factors $\hookrightarrow$ 30—Defendants held to have guaranteed plaintiff grape growers a certain stated sum for grapes shipped to defendants to be handled by latter.

Under contract between plaintiff grape growers and defendants, whereby plaintiffs agreed to deliver grapes to defendants in good merchantable and marketable condition, which defendants agreed to sell for highest market price available, with a minimum guaranteed price, held, that defendants undertook to guarantee such stated price to plaintiffs, defendants' compensation to be gained from whatever sums might be realized over and above such guaranteed prices; as any other construction would make a "jug-handled" agreement, in which the brokers took all the opportunities for profits and the grower took all the chances for losses.

PLUMMER, J. On the 6th day of September, 1922, the plaintiffs, being the owners of a certain vineyard, entered into a contract for the delivery to the defendant of two varieties of grapes then being and growing on said vineyard. This contract is in the following words and figures, to wit:

"This certifies that R. Lewis and G. N. White, of Lewis & White Garage, of Madera, agree to deliver and consign to Ardzrooni Bros., all the hereinafter mentioned fruit crops which the grower agrees to harvest at his own expense all of the said fruit and deliver in good merchantable and marketable condition, and quality at Rattlesnake or Italian Swiss Madera, not later than October 20, 1922, all fruits found not suitable for marketing is to be weighed back and deducted from total deliveries.

"Ardzrooni Bros. agree to pay picking expenses at time of harvest and settlement to be made consignee as fast as returns are made.

"In consideration therefore, Ardzrooni Bros. agree to use their best efforts to obtain the highest market price available in transcontinental markets for said fruit. It is further agreed that after all packing and marketing expenses have been deducted and a commission of (5 per cent.) 5 per cent. is allowed to Ardzrooni Bros., out of the gross proceeds, as compensation for marketing services, the balance of net proceeds shall be paid to it being understood that title and ownership of the fruits herein mentioned vests in the name of the grower and until proceeds have been actually received all risk and liability for diminishing returns or loss lies with the grower herein mentioned.

"Time is of the essence of this agreement and no understanding other than herein expressed shall vary or modify this transaction.

"O. K. Ardzrooni Bros., Agents, by Leo Sarkisian."

The grapes referred to in said agreement having been delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants and payment not having been made therefor, this action was begun to recover the amount claimed by the plaintiffs to be due. Plaintiffs had judgment, and from this judgment the defendants appeal.

The controversy between the parties, as shown by their pleadings, presents two questions: (1) Whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to at least the amounts claimed to be due them by the defendants for each ton of grapes delivered without deductions for brokerage, defendants' commissions, and market expenses, though defendants did not succeed in selling the grapes for a price sufficient to meet these charges; and (2) the amounts which defendants were entitled to deduct from the returns for marketing expenses, brokerage, and commissions in those cases where they were entitled to deduct any amount. The plaintiffs in their complaint set forth their interpretation of the contract to the effect that they were entitled to the guaranteed prices mentioned in the contract irrespective of whether the selling prices obtained by the defendants in transcontinental markets equaled the stipulated guaranteed prices; in other words, that the guaranteed price was net to the growers and the commissions, expenses, etc., incurred by the defendants were to be obtained, if any, out of selling prices in excess thereof. On the part of the defendants, it is set forth in their pleadings that the guaranteed price did not mean a net sum to the growers, but that their commissions and expenses should be deducted therefrom, and that the guaranteed price was a basis of calculation rather than a stipulation as to the amounts to be paid to the plaintiffs for the different varieties of grapes mentioned in the contract.

The trial court in its findings determined that the defendants promised and guaranteed in said contract to pay the plaintiffs not less than the sum of $60 per ton for each ton of Carrigan grapes and the sum of $20 per ton for each ton of Muscat grapes delivered to the defendants in good merchantable and marketable condition at the places designated, and that such guaranteed minimum prices were not subject to any deductions for or on account of commissions alleged to be earned by the defendants or expenses incurred by them; that the plaintiffs were to pay the expenses of harvesting and delivering the grapes; and that settlement was to be made upon each shipment as returns were made for the same.

Upon the trial of the case there was offered and admitted in evidence testimony of the surrounding circumstances leading up to the execution of the contract and under which it was executed for the purpose of ascertaining the intentions of the parties and also for the purpose of properly construing the written agreement. The trial court, being of the opinion that the contract was ambiguous, admitted such oral testimony to aid it in construing the terms thereof and for the purpose of being able to declare its true legal purport and meaning. We do not find any testimony in the transcript, and none has been pointed out to us, which tends in any particular to vary or contradict its terms. The appellants objected to the admission of the oral testimony to which we have referred on the ground that the contract was not ambiguous, and that such testimony was not admissible to vary the terms of the written instrument. In this particular the appellants' objection, while possibly technically good on the grounds which we shall hereafter mention, was not well taken on the theory that the offered testimony tended to either contradict or vary the terms of the written instrument. In the briefs presented to us upon this appeal, the objection is urged that the offered testimony was not within the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint, that the question of any ambiguity or uncertainty in the written instrument was not expressly alleged, and therefore it was an error on the part of the trial court to admit the same.

[1, 2] The rule as to the admission of oral testimony for the purpose of aiding the court in arriving at a correct interpretation thereof is well set forth in 22 C. J. p. 1186 et seq., § 1590, as follows:

"Parol evidence is admissible to show the situation of the parties and the circumstances under which a written instrument was executed, for the purpose of ascertaining the intentions of the parties and properly construing the writing. In other words, the court may, by receiving evidence of the circumstances under which the writing was made, place itself in the situation of the parties who made it, and to that extent look in upon their minds and so judge of the meaning of the words, and of the correct application of the language to the things described, from the point of view of the parties who wrote or executed the instrument. Such evidence is received, not for the purpose of importing into the writing an intention not expressed therein, but simply with the view of elucidating the meaning of the words employed; and in its admission the line which separates evidence which aids the interpretation of what is in the instrument from direct evidence of intention independent of the instrument must be kept steadily in view, the duty of the court being to declare the meaning of what is written in the instrument and not of what was intended to be written. Accordingly where the instrument is clear and unambiguous on its face, and no intimation is given of a disclosure of a latent ambiguity, no evidence is admissible to give to it a construction other than that which is plainly expressed. It must be interpreted according to its terms, and it will be enforced without resorting to proof of the surrounding circumstances."

By this rule it will be seen that if the instrument is clear and unambiguous on its face, and no intimation is given of a disclosure of a latent ambiguity, the evidence referred to is inadmissible.

[3] While, as just stated, the complaint contains no specific allegations of any claimed ambiguity in the written instrument, the complaint and the answer in this case are antithetical and present direct and opposing constructions alleged as the correct construction or interpretation to be placed upon the written instrument, and therefore the defendants were not taken by surprise by the proffer of testimony to support the interpretation or aid the court in interpreting the instrument upon which the action was being prosecuted; hence, if the appellants' contention be correct, that admission of such testimony was error, it does not necessarily lead to reversal. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is applicable here, in providing that—

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

Appellants in this case do not argue that any injustice has resulted by reason of the admission of the testimony referred to, but confine themselves to the following succinct statement of the cause of complaint:

"The points to be raised on this appeal are few. Briefly, appellant's principal contention can be summoned up in this one statement: Where a party in his pleading relies solely upon an alleged written contract between himself and the other party, he is bound by his pleading and cannot object to treatment of the writing as the whole contract of the parties, and hence he cannot introduce parol evidence to vary said contract. In short, it is our contention that the court erred in allowing the plaintiffs in the case at bar to introduce evidence to the effect that the contract referred to and specifically pleaded in plaintiffs' first amended complaint did not state the whole agreement between the parties. It is our earnest contention that the plaintiffs in the case at bar were not entitled under their pleading to inject evidence into the trial of the case pertaining to a matter not referred to in their complaint. We would go further and say, irrespective of whether or not the court was of the opinion that the contract was ambiguous, it was none the less error to allow the plaintiffs to go outside their pleadings in order to sustain their theory of the case."

It will be noticed that their whole ground of appeal is based upon the theory that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of the written contract and also that, irrespective of whether or not the court was of the opinion that the contract was ambiguous, it was none the less error to allow plaintiffs to go outside of their pleadings. The first objection, as we have stated, was not raised at the time of the introduction of the testimony, and overlooks the fact that the testimony was admitted to explain, not to vary the writing, and the second objection is governed by the constitutional provision which we have quoted, unless prejudicial injury has thereby been suffered by the appellants. That they have been thus injured is not set forth in the appellants' brief, and we cannot assume that the appellants have been injured in the absence of any claim to that effect, and in the absence of anything being called to our attention which would lead to that conclusion. There is no controversy in this case as to the fact that oral testimony is properly admissible as to the surrounding circumstances attendant upon the execution of the written instrument in order to determine the true intent and meaning thereof, whenever the writing is ambiguous.

[4] Irrespective of whether the court did or did not err in admitting oral testimony touching upon the construction which should be given to the written instrument, we have arrived at the conclusion that the interpretation placed thereon by the trial court is correct and, as stated in Provident G. Min. Co. v. Manhattan S. Co., 168 Cal. 304, 142 P. 884:

"In an action by the seller to recover the purchase price due under such contract, the admission of evidence touching the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract, which tended to confirm its proper legal construction, is without injury."

[5] Thus, if the guaranteed price in the contract entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants has the meaning given to it by the trial court, the fact that the oral testimony of the surrounding circumstances admitted by the court tended to confirm the correctness of the construction of the instrument as finally given in this case, then the appellants are in no wise injured. The writing itself provides for a minimum guaranteed price. If deductions were to be made from the guaranteed price, then that term in the written agreement would become practically meaningless. We think the true construction of the instrument, and which carries out the intention of the parties, to be that the defendants undertook to guarantee certain returns to the growers for the grapes to be handled by them and were to be compensated out of whatever sums might be realized over and above such guaranteed prices. If this be not true, then the grower had no guaranteed price. Any other construction would make the instrument a "jug-handled" agreement, in which the defendants were to be compensated in any event, and the growers took all the chances of losses and the brokers all the opportunities for profit.

If the written instrument means what is now claimed by the appellants that it means and what appellants claim in their answer, then, and in that case, the writing is ambiguous, because that construction does not appear upon its face, and did not necessarily appear upon its face to the trial court, and therefore the oral testimony admitted by the trial court was properly admitted, and an examination of that testimony shows that it very strongly supported the interpretation of the written instrument given by the trial court herein.

In conclusion, the appellants claim that the judgment must be reversed in so far as it is in favor of the plaintiff Hopper. This claim arises, however, by reason of the fact that the writer of the appellants' opening brief appears not to have been the attorney conducting the trial in the lower court, because the transcript shows that it was there stipulated that the plaintiffs in this case are the parties entitled to recover in the event that the court awards judgment as claimed in plaintiffs' complaint.

The judgment and order of the trial court are hereby affirmed.

McKEON v. O'TOOLE et al. (Civ. 4899.)

Municipal corporations — 197—"Veteran" taking promotional examination entitled to additional credits, although he had not served three months in army.

Provision of San Francisco Charter, art. 13, § 22, requiring three months' service in army or navy before veterans are entitled to preference in appointment to police or fire departments, does not apply to subsequent clause in same section allowing additional credits to veterans taking promotional examinations, and a hoseman who had taken such examination is entitled to additional credits, although he had served less than one month in army.

Application by Joseph B. McKeon for writ of mandate against John J. O'Toole and others. Writ granted.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. A petition for a writ of mandate has been filed herein, praying that such writ be issued requiring the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco to give to petitioner a credit of three points upon his examination for lieutenant in the fire department; and, after having so credited petitioner, to revise his standing upon the register of eligibles, accordingly, so as to give him first place upon such register for appointment to said position of lieutenant.

The petitioner alleges that he is a hoseman in the fire department of this city and county, which is a rank below the rank of lieutenant therein; that he has taken the civil service examination for lieutenant, and has obtained a grade in such examination which placed him seventh upon the list of "eligibles"; that petitioner is a veteran as said term is used in section 22 of article 13 of the Charter of the City and County of San Francisco, having served in the army of the United States in time of war and received an honorable discharge from said service; that by reason of said service petitioner is entitled to a credit of three points in said examination; that since the adoption of the list of eligibles for appointment to the rank of lieutenant, three persons upon said list have been appointed to the rank of lieutenant, and, if petitioner is accorded the three credits to which he claims he is entitled, he will be first upon the list of eligibles.

The respondents deny that the petitioner is a veteran as said term is used in said section of said charter, and this is the only issue in the present controversy. Upon said question, evidence was taken before a commissioner and transmitted to this court. There is no dispute about the facts. The petitioner was drafted into the army of the United States on September 22, 1917, and sent to Camp Lewis. Before leaving San Francisco, and again upon arrival at Camp Lewis, he took the oath of allegiance. At Camp Lewis he did regular duty in the army—drilling, training, and standing guard duty until October 12, 1917, when he was honorably discharged because of physical disability.

Section 22 of article 13 is as follows:

"The term 'veteran' as used in this section shall be taken to mean any person who has served in the army, the navy or the marine corps of the United States in time of war, or in any expedition of the armed forces of the United States in time of war, or in any expedition of the armed forces of the United States and received an honorable discharge or certificate of honorable active service.

"The civil service commission shall by rule establish preferences for veterans as follows: In the case of entrance examinations to establish eligible lists in the police and fire departments, veterans who become eligible for appointment by attaining the passing mark established for the examination, and whose services as veterans exceeds three months, shall be classified on such eligible lists in the relative order of the individual ratings attained, and ahead of all non-veterans passing such examinations, and shall be eligible for appointment on the basis of such order of standing on such eligible lists. * * *

"In the case of all other entrance examinations, veterans with thirty days or more of service * * * who become eligible for appointment by attaining the passing mark established for the examination, shall be allowed an additional credit of five points, which shall be added to the percentages attained in such examinations by such veterans. * * * All ties shall be decided in favor of veterans; provided, however, *in the case of promotional examinations credit of three points shall be allowed to veterans * *  who shall have been in the city and county service prior to July 1, 1920."

The portion of the section last italicized is the one involved here. The precise question is: Does the word "veterans" in connection with promotional examination credits, carry with it, by implication, the limitation applied previously in the case of entrance examinations for the police and fire departments; i. e., "whose service as veterans exceeds three months"?

There are no authorities available upon this peculiar question. It seems reasonable to conclude, with the attorney for respondents, that it was, perhaps, intended by those who framed the charter amendment in question that the limitation of three months' service should attach in the case of a veteran seeking promotion, but we may not guess at unexpressed intentions and read, by implications, into the charter provisions which do not appear therein. The plain language is that in case of promotional examinations a credit of three points shall be allowed to "veterans," and a "veteran" is defined in the amendment as a person "who has served in the army * * * of the United States in time of war, * * * and received an honorable discharge. * * *" The petitioner is such a person. The inconsistency of requiring three months' service in the army for an allowance of credits in the case of entrance examinations and of merely requiring service in the army without limitation of time for the allowance of credits in promotional examinations may cause us to believe that the charter provisions under consideration may not exactly express the intention of those who drafted them nor of those who adopted them at the polls. But, be that as it may, we are not at liberty to read our surmise into the charter.

The writ of mandate is granted as prayed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by John H. Coulter, as the guardian of the person and estate of M. Marie Tomblin, an incompetent, against O. D. Collins and another. From the judgment plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh L. Dickson and Duke Stone, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal from a judgment entered in an action brought to obtain a decree of annulment of a contract made in violation of the usury law, and to recover treble damages.

The act known as the usury law was an initiative measure submitted and approved at the general election of November 5, 1918. Stats. 1919, lxxxiii; Deering's Gen. Laws (1923 Ed.) Act 3757. This act repealed sections 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 of the Civil Code, all relating to interest. The usury law, after prescribing certain limits or rates of interest that can be charged, and particularly limiting contract interest to not exceeding 12 per cent. per annum, provides in section 2 as follows:

"Any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with the provisions of this section shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest and no action at law to recover interest in any sum shall be maintained and the debt cannot be declared due until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed."

"Rights of person paying illegal interest. Every person, * * * who for any loan or forbearance of money, goods or things in action shall have paid or delivered any greater sum or value than is allowed to be received under the preceding sections, one and two, may either in person or his or its personal representative, recover in an action at law against the person * * * who shall have taken or received the same, * * * treble the amount of the money so paid or value delivered in violation of said sections, providing such action shall be brought within one year after such payment or delivery."

The facts of this case as determined by the court in its findings of fact are as follows: On or about March 1, 1921, M. Marie Tomblin was an incompetent person, and by reason of mental disease, and unsound mind was incapable of managing her affairs or property or of safeguarding or protecting her business interests or assenting to or making contracts; but was not wholly without understanding. In November, 1921, she was by decree of court judicially determined to be an incompetent person, and the plaintiff, Coulter, was appointed guardian of her person and estate. On March 1, 1921, said Mrs. Tomblin, being at that time in financial difficulties, borrowed from J. O. Mouser and O. D. Collins the sum of $25,000. In consideration of said loan the borrower executed to the lenders a 60-day note for the sum of $35,000, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and to secure the same executed a deed of trust on certain real property owned by her in the city of Los Angeles. Nothing was ever paid on account of said note. Prior to the commencement of this action Mouser transferred to Collins his interest in the note and trust deed. In August, 1921, pursuant to notice of default in payment of the note, and pursuant to other notice given in accordance with the terms of the trust deed, the real property described in said deed was advertised to be sold by the trustee, and said sale was about to take place at the time of the commencement of this action. At all times mentioned in the complaint, the real property was of the value of $54,000, but was incumbered by a mortgage of $12,000; the same being a lien prior to said trust deed.

At the time of the making of said promissory note and trust deed, the said Mouser and Collins, well knowing the financial condition of Mrs. Tomblin, and that she was in dire financial difficulties, demanded and exacted from her, as a condition for lending her the sum of $25,000 for the period of 60 days, that she agree to pay them a bonus of $10,000, and that the promissory note should be for $35,000, to be secured by said trust deed. Said Tomblin being then and there in the mental condition aforesaid, and being greatly in need of money, executed and delivered said note and trust deed, but received therefor no other consideration than the sum of $25,000. The court found that by means of said transactions "thereby said Mouser and Collins did exact and receive of and from the said M. Marie Tomblin things in action greater by $10,000 than is allowed to be received under the usury law of the state of California"; and that the exaction of said bonus was inequitable, illegal, void, and usurious.

By reason of the facts thus found and its conclusions of law thereon, the court by its judgment declared the note and trust deed to be "void, rescinded, canceled and annulled"; that defendant Collins recover from "the plaintiffs" the sum of $25,000, without interest. Plaintiff also had judgment for costs. There is a cross-complaint in the action.

The plaintiff in his amended complaint demanded that he have judgment against the defendants for the sum of $30,000 as damages in treble the amount of said bonus, and that said damages be set off against any amount adjudicated to be due the defendants, and that plaintiff have judgment for the overplus, if any. His appeal is based solely upon the failure of the court to allow those damages. The contention of appellant is that under the findings of the court the plaintiff was entitled to recover said $30,000 damages, and that by offsetting the $25,000 due defendants, a net judgment should have been entered in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000.

The appeal thus presents a single question, the answer to which must be found in the terms of the said act known as the "usury law." It will be remembered that no part of the money loaned has been repaid and no interest thereon has been paid. Nevertheless appellant claims and contends that by executing the note and by executing the trust deed, the borrower thereby delivered to the lenders for said loan a "greater sum or value" than the statute allows; that because the trust deed was a thing of value, the delivery thereof created the condition under which the borrower became entitled to recover from the lender, "treble the amount of the money so paid or value delivered in violation of said sections."

Let it be assumed, in accordance with the contention of appellant, that the exaction of the bonus was in the nature of an interest demand, in excess of the interest rate allowed by law. Nevertheless, in the absence of any payment made, we think that the right to treble damages did not accrue. Recognizing that the plaintiff's ward, although of unsound mind when she borrowed the money, was not entirely without understanding and her incapacity had not been judicially determined, the court, in effect, declared a rescission. Civ. Code, § 39. By the judgment, from which defendants did not appeal, the note and trust deed are annulled. It is not consistent that appellant should be permitted to proceed on that theory, and at the same time recover as damages thrice the amount of the bonus that was included in the note. We do not need the decisions cited by appellant to convince us that ordinarily a trust deed is "a thing of value." But no authority has been produced holding that, under such a statute as the one here considered, the note given for a loan, or any instrument of security therefor, is "a thing of value" paid or delivered, within the terms and intention of the statute providing for such damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BLANCHARD. (Cr. 1202.)

1. Criminal law ☞1159(4)—Accomplice testimony held sufficiently corroborated to withstand reversal.

In prosecution for sending prisoners hack saws to aid them in making their escape, in violation of Pen. Code, §§ 108, 110, accomplice testimony held sufficiently corroborated to withstand reversal on appeal.

2. Criminal law ☞427(3)—Failure to prove conspiracy before showing further acts in pursuance thereof not reversible error, where conspiracy later established.

Though it is proper to first establish conspiracy before evidence of further acts done in pursuance thereof are admitted, reversible error will not be predicated on different order, if conspiracy is later established.

3. Criminal law ☞1169(7)—Erroneous admission of extrajudicial declarations out of presence of defendant not reversible, where introduced by coconspirators to establish conspiracy.

Error in admission of extrajudicial declarations out of presence of defendant does not require reversal, where introduced by alleged coconspirators to establish conspiracy.

4. Criminal law ☞829(1)—Requested instructions, covered by given instructions, properly refused.

Requested instructions, covered by given instructions, were properly refused.

5. Criminal law ☞757(4)—Requested instruction to view testimony of accomplice with distrust properly refused.

A requested instruction that testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust is a charge as to matters of fact, and was properly refused.

6. Criminal law ☞742(2)—Whether witness an accomplice for jury.

Though court might properly have specifically charged that a certain witness was an accomplice, such charge was not mandatory, since, where facts are in dispute, it is for jury to determine whether such witness is an accomplice.

7. Criminal law ☞768(3)—Court's remark to jury held not improper as directing them to hurry.

Remark of court to jury that, thanks to gentlemen conducting case, jury would be able to get home early because facts were few and they would be able to decide quickly guilt or innocence of defendant, when taken in connection with instruction admonishing jury to calmly and carefully consider evidence before them, held not improper as directing jury to hurry.

8. Criminal law ☞1037(1)—Assignment that question asked defendant was misconduct cannot be first made on appeal.

Where district attorney's questioning of defendant as to former conviction and as to alleged charges on which he was presently wanted were shown to have been seriously asked, and hence were proper, unless asked in bad faith, defendant cannot assign such questions as misconduct for first time on appeal.

9. Criminal law ☞413(1)—Defendant's diary properly excluded under rule excluding self-serving declarations.

Defendant's diary was properly excluded under rule that oral or written declarations of a defendant, not falling under specific exceptions to rule, are not admissible in his favor as self-serving.

10. Witnesses ☞392(1)—Reading of statement from defendant's diary to impeach defendant's testimony held proper.

Action of district attorney in reading statement from defendant's diary to impeach defendant's testimony held proper, since it was an independent declaration against interest, and admissible as such, and use of method provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, was unnecessary, especially where court stated that diary might be used to refresh memory, as permitted under section 2047.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Francis Blanchard was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 110, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel W. Hone, of San Francisco, Wm. F. Kiessig, of Berkeley, (B. W. Kemper, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Appeal by defendant, Blanchard, from conviction, on separate trial, under information brought jointly against him and two others, for violation of section 110, Penal Code, viz.:

"Every person who carries or sends into a prison, jail, public training school, or reformatory, anything useful to aid a prisoner or inmate in making his escape, with intent thereby to facilitate the escape of any prisoner or inmate confined therein, is punishable as provided in section one hundred and eight."

Section 108 provides punishment of imprisonment in the state prison not to exceed 10 years, and fine not to exceed $10,000.

The information charged that appellant did willfully and wrongfully carry to and send into the San Mateo county jail two hack saws useful to aid certain prisoners therein in making their escape from said jail.

The evidence shows that James Clinton, Maurice Allen, and George Dawson were legally imprisoned in the San Mateo county jail on charge of crime committed in that county on which they were arrested in San Francisco and thence brought to San Mateo county under proper legal process.

The sheriff testified that on February 23,

1924, the appellant visited Dawson at the jail. Appellant also testified to this visit, and that he was asked by Dawson at that time to bring saws to the jail, which request he refused. He admitted having known Humphrey, one of the defendants under the joint information herein, for a short time, and that he saw the latter between six and ten times prior to and immediately following the 23d, at his own room, at one of which times, and at that place, there were a can of milk and two hack saw blades. A discussion was had as to the possibility of putting the blades into the can of milk, or other means of getting the blades into the jail. He stated:

"There was a discussion as to—if those blades could be put into a milk can, and no one had any suggestions to make as to how it could be done. It seemed implausible, and my advice was that the thing be forgotten, and that everything be thrown away, and the discussion dropped on that subject."

Later he stated he had reason to believe the blades were thrown away, because he saw Humphrey throw something away. On further question he testified he had reason to believe "now" that it was the can of milk.

Appellant admitted that following his arrest he had denied acquaintance with Humphrey, and also denied any conversation between himself and Dawson regarding saws. He admitted that he had previously been convicted of a felony. He stated that his visit to the jail on the 23d was with relation to some pawn tickets which the San Francisco police had sent him, and that his first visit from Humphrey, whom he had not theretofore known, was occasioned by Dawson, one of the prisoners, sending Humphrey to him to arrange about attorneys. He stated that he and Humphrey were out one evening "looking for three people." He did not name the people. His employer for 4 years testified as to his honesty, as did a woman in whose home she testified he had lived for 3 years. They stated they knew nothing of his former conviction, nor of any charges on which he was presently wanted in San Francisco.

[1] To this point, and standing alone, has been stated the evidence on which reliance must be placed as corroborating the evidence to show guilt of the charge and a conspiracy necessary to its proof given by four people who either might have been instructed by the court or found by the jury to be accomplices either in the conspiracy or the crime itself. Taken with the bare evidence, as stated, were the inferences the jury might draw from statements denying acquaintance with Humphrey and conversation with Dawson at the time of arrest but testified to on the trial; the fact that pawn tickets were sent him by the police in San Francisco, which fact he stated was the occasion of his visit to Dawson; and his association with one stated to be a stranger to him theretofore, but known by him to have been arrested with the prisoners and with whom he discussed the matter of the possibility of getting saws into the jail, and whom he thereafter continued to see. In this connection is a discrepancy as to the occasion on which he stated Humphrey brought the can of milk and saws to his room; it being stated as the 26th, 27th, or 28th, and later, in other connection, positively and certainly stated to be the 25th. There was unexplained the evident lack of connection between his testified continuous residence from the age of a few weeks to the time of trial with his aunt, and the visits testified to "up to my room" and the testimony of the character witness not shown to be his aunt that he lived in her home for 3 years; circumstances probably noted by the jury. We cannot say, as matter of law, with the above and other inferences which might be drawn by the jury, or disbelief by them of the statements of appellant on disputed points, that this was not sufficient corroboration, though standing by itself as a cold record it may be slight and entitled to but little weight. There was ample evidence by those who might be considered accomplices of both the conspiracy and the crime here charged.

[2, 3] Part of the same evidence, given here as corroboration of the main charge, was also corroborative of the testimony of one or more of the conspirators to establish the conspiracy said to be necessary as foundation for proof of the main charge. As the main charge, so the conspiracy was testified to by a coconspirator or accomplice, and the corroboration served to establish it. The proper order of proof to have the conspiracy first established before evidence of further acts done in pursuance thereof is not deemed to be essential, and reversible error will not be predicated on a different order if the conspiracy be later established. People v. Donnelly, 143 Cal. 394, at 397, 398, 77 P. 177; People v. Carson, 155 Cal. 164, 171, 99 P. 970. In this connection, error in the admission of extrajudicial declarations out of the presence of defendant, in evidence by coconspirators to establish the conspiracy, becomes insufficient for reversal.

[4-6] Appellant's main argument is grounded on the foregoing propositions: He further complains of error in refusal to give instructions, and in prejudice resulting from instructions given. The first of the requested instructions was as to the weight to be given the testimony of appellant. The point was covered by other instruction given by the court, and the request was not improperly refused for that reason alone. The seventh requested instruction that "the testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust" has been held to be a charge as to matters of fact and unconstitutional. Hirshfeld v. Dana (Cal. Sup.) 223 P. 451. The jury were properly instructed on the prohibition against conviction on the testimony of an accomplice, as to who are principals, and the code definition of accomplices. Though it might have been proper for the court to charge specifically that Humphrey was an accomplice, the cases have not held that it is mandatory to do so; the general rule being that it is for the jury to determine where the facts are in any dispute. People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 436, 119 P. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704; People v. Truax, 30 Cal. App. 471, 158 P. 510. It has been held not to be reversible error to so charge. Vails v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 340, 128 S. W. 1117.

[7, 8] A remark of the court to the effect that the jury, thanks to the gentlemen conducting the case, would be able to get home early because the facts were few, and they would be able to decide quickly the guilt or innocence of defendant, does not bear appellant's construction of it as a mandate to hurry and prejudicial to due consideration. The instructions are to be taken as a whole, and the concluding instruction admonished the jury in terms to "calmly and carefully consider the evidence before you. * * * Discuss the evidence as presented to you as a business proposition, not acrimoniously, but in a calm manner, and pass upon the question of the guilt or innocence of this defendant." The same may be said regarding the attack on the instruction given by the court with reference to the presumption of innocence attaching, and the opening of opportunity for character attack on defendant by himself putting his character in evidence. We think it bore no such construction as appellant claims for it as comment on the character of the defendant as bad. In this connection also objection was made to the question of the district attorney as to former conviction of appellant and as to alleged charges on which he was presently wanted in San Francisco. The question was asked on cross-examination after character evidence had been introduced by appellant, and was shown to have been seriously asked. Appellant admitted the former conviction. The questions were proper, unless asked in bad faith, and so assigned as misconduct. There was no such assignment made, and the point may not be first taken advantage of on appeal.

Alleged error as to the admission of evidence has been covered in discussion of the evidence of conspiracy testified to by coconspirators.

[9, 10] Attack is made on the refusal of the trial court to allow the introduction of a diary kept by appellant, in appellant's behalf, and the "indirection" by which the district attorney used the same matter to prove appellant's acquaintance with Humphrey. It is well settled that oral or written declarations of a defendant, not falling under specific exceptions to the rule, are not admissible in his favor as self-serving. The diary constituted such declarations. The district attorney did not introduce the diary in evidence; it is true that he asked a question of defendant, reading a statement from a page of the diary, but it was asked on one point to impeach the appellant's testimony on that one point, and in the form, "Did you, on the 15th day of February, 1924, write the following language, in your own wording: 'Nothing unusual today. Humphrey came up in eve. Sat around and played records?'" The appellant answered, "Yes."

It might well, so far as the diary was concerned, have been written anywhere else, and the question could have been asked with the same effect. It was an independent declaration against interest, admissible as such. The use of section 1854, Code of Civil Procedure, was not necessary. As to section 2047, Code of Civil Procedure, concerning the refreshing of memory by the use of writings, the court explicitly stated that the diary might be used for that purpose.

The jury found the defendant guilty, and motion for probation was denied.

Taken as a whole, and with the mandate of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution before us, we are of the opinion that the judgment of conviction should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

SAMUEL EDWARDS ASSOCIATES v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 8207.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 16, 1925.)

1. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Evidence held to justify finding water company was operating as public utility.

Evidence held to justify finding of Railroad Commission that water company was operating as public utility under St. 1913, p. 85, §§ 2 and 3.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨254—That waters were once considered as appurtenant to land of first users not inconsistent with subsequent dedication to public use.

That in early history of water company water may have been considered as appurtenant to land of first users is not inconsistent with theory of subsequent dedication to public use.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Dedication to public use may arise from dealings of owners.

Dedication of property to public use may arise by implication from acts of owners and their dealings and relations to such property, without regard to statutes; test being in case of water companies whether those offering service have expressly or impliedly held themselves out as engaging in business of supplying water to public as class.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Waters subject to dedication not revoked retain impress of public use.

Waters subject to dedication to public use, which has not been revoked, retain impress of such use.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Dedication of water to public use cannot be revoked without consent of beneficiaries.

Dedication of water to public use cannot be revoked without consent of all beneficiaries of such use.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Evidence held to establish water company had held itself out as willing to sell, giving customers right to insist on continuance of supply.

Evidence held to establish that water company had consciously offered to sell water to all those within area of its service, giving customers right to insist on continuance of supply.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨217—Objections not urged before Commission in proceeding to establish water rates should not be urged on appeal.

Grounds not urged before Commission in proceeding to fix water rates chargeable by public utility should not, under Public Utilities Act, § 66, be urged on appeal.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨252—Corporation organized by owners of water rights held not to have taken rights as trustee for distribution at cost to original owners.

Contention that corporation organized by individual owners of water rights took such rights to extent necessary to supply original owners, as trustee, to operate system and distribute water at substantially cost of operation, so that, on loss of its corporate capacity from failure to pay license tax, those continuing its affairs took such rights, impressed with trust in favor of original owners, held not sustained by evidence.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨217—Decision of Railroad Commission in proceeding to fix water rates as to effect of evidence is binding and conclusive on reviewing court in certiorari proceeding.

Where evidence is substantial and justifies inference of existence of facts necessary to jurisdiction of Railroad Commission in proceeding to fix water rates, then, under law regarding proceedings in certiorari, Commission's decision as to effect of such evidence is binding and conclusive on reviewing court.

In Bank.

Certiorari by the Samuel Edwards Associates and others to annul an order of the Railroad Commission of California, establishing public utility and fixing rates, as respects the Piru Water Company and others. Orders of the Commission affirmed.

Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, and Hugh Ward Lutz, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon and Carl I. Wheat, both of San Francisco, for respondent Railroad Commission.

R. M. Clarke and D. G. Bowker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Piru Water Co.

WASTE, J. In this proceeding, petitioners, who are consumers of irrigation water in Ventura county, seek annulment of certain orders of the respondent Railroad Commission, declaring that Piru Water Company, a defunct corporation, and the individual respondents are conducting and operating a public utility, and fixing the rates to be charged for water supplied to consumers for irrigation purposes.

From the return of the Railroad Commission, filed in response to the writ issued herein, it appears that on May 24, 1923, the Piru Water Company and the individual respondents herein filed with the Railroad Commission a petition representing that the water company was engaged in the business of supplying, delivering, and selling water in the county of Ventura, and owned and operated a system for supplying and selling water, known as the Piru Water Company System. It was further alleged that the rate of $8 per acre per year for water, charged to its consumers, did not afford the company or its stockholders a reasonable return on its property; wherefore it prayed for an order authorizing the applicants to make such increase in rates for water delivered through the system as would afford a reasonable return on the investment. A public hearing was had, at which, in opposition to the application, it was contended by the protestants that the Piru Water Company, by reason of having forfeited its charter through failure to pay corporation taxes, had had no corporate existence for a period of 18 years, and that during all of that period it had been carried on in all respects as a mutual company, and was not subject to regulation by the Railroad Commission. The Commission declined to enter into a discussion as to the legal status of the utility as a corporation, or to fix the ownership other than to find that it was not a mutual company, but that, on the contrary the owners of the system were operating a public utility water company, as defined in the Public Utilities Act (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1911, p. 18), and, as such, were subject to regulation by it. It further found that the rates charged by the utility were unjust and unreasonable, and that the company was entitled to an increase, which it authorized in an order made on the third day of October, 1923.

Certain of the protestants, among them these petitioners, filed an application for a rehearing before the Commission, which was granted. After another public hearing, the matter was resubmitted, and the Commission entered a new order, in which it found that no new evidence had been introduced which justified it in modifying or changing its order theretofore made. Consequently, on the fifth day of June, 1924, it made its order, affirming its decision of October 3, 1923. These orders and the proceedings leading thereto the petitioners seek to have reviewed.

As the basis of its conclusion, the Commission found the following facts:

"The evidence indicates that the pioneer settlers in Ventura county, located west of Piru Creek, in the area locally known as the 'Piru and Buckhorn District,' appropriated and diverted water from Piru Creek for the irrigation of their lands. The notice of appropriation was signed by Prudencio Dominguez on January 9, 1875, and thereafter the landowners constructed ditches for irrigation use; the water system being commonly known as the 'Piru Water Ditch.' On June 29, 1887, Robert Strathearn, R. P. Strathearn, J. M. Horton, Hugh Warring and Prudencio Dominguez executed articles of incorporation of the Piru Water Company, and in return for its 2,600 shares of capital stock of the par value of $10 per share, issued to themselves, transferred to the company their interests in the Piru water ditch.

"The articles of incorporation of the company stated that the purpose for which the company was formed was 'to acquire and conduct water by means of ditches and flumes from the Piru river in and upon the lands lying between said river and the Sespe river in Ventura county, Cal., and to sell, use, and dispose of said water for the purpose of irrigation, stock, household, and general domestic use.'

"The by-laws of the company, adopted March 19, 1888, provided for the election of officers and directors, their duties; and, among other things, that the board of directors 'shall declare dividends whenever the surplus profits shall admit of it.'

"Shortly thereafter David C. Cook acquired from Robert Strathearn a large portion of the land which was irrigated by the ditch, and from Strathearn and others in excess of 1,800 of the 2,000 shares of stock of Piru Water Company. He held this stock until 1900 or 1901, when he disposed of his land holdings and stock to the Piru Oil & Land Company.

"The Piru Oil & Land Company sold parcels of the land which had been irrigated through Piru Water Company's system, sometimes transferring stock to the buyer and sometimes not. In 1922 it sold its last remaining tract of land to Hugh Warring, together with approximately 1,749 shares of the stock of Piru Water Company.

"In the early stages of its history the Piru Water Company had an open earth ditch system, which was improved from time to time by the construction of concrete and terra cotta pipe lines to replace sections of ditch. It has supplied water, not only to stockholders, but to some consumers who own no stock. The rates charged in the earlier years provided for a lower price for water to stockholders than to non-stockholders. This distinction in rates was apparently wiped out about 1910, and at the present time all consumers pay a rate of $8 per acre for four irrigations per annum, when sufficient water is available.

"No dividends were ever paid upon the stock of the company, and only one assessment, amounting to a total of $500, has been levied against the stockholders. Improvements of the property have been paid for entirely out of earnings, with the exception of a few instances, where the company has paid for the pipe, and consumers have furnished the labor of installation of extensions of the system.

"In 1896 an action was commenced in the superior court of Ventura county, entitled Hargrave et al. v. Cook et al. In this action the Piru Water Company was a party defendant. The judgment in this action decreed that Piru Water Company was the owner of 285 inches of water, measured under a four-inch head, of Piru Creek, and that this water was appurtenant to certain parcels of land through which the company's ditch ran.

"In 1905 the Piru Water Company failed to pay the license tax required by statute, and has never paid any license tax since. It was stipulated at the hearing in this proceeding that it had forfeited its charter in 1905, and that it has never been revived or restored to corporate capacity. Since that time the affairs of the concern have been carried on substantially as before; the stockholders meeting annually, as was the practice during the period prior to 1905. It appears that consumers who were nonstockholders attended many of these meetings, and in some cases voted with the stockholders. Rates were fixed through agreement at these meetings."

In the earlier stages of its history, the Piru Water Company had a primitive system of delivery of water, and its charges to the consumers were just about enough to defray the upkeep and expense of maintenance. It supplied water, not only to its stockholders, as found by the Commission, but to nonstockholders owning land adjoining the property of the original incorporators. From its records it seems quite definitely established that, during the earlier period of its existence, it charged the nonstock-owning consumers more than it charged its stockholders for the same service. Since 1910, it appears no discrimination in charges has been made. No effort seems to have been made at any time to fix rates that would enable the company to do anything more than cover its operating expenses. No dividends were ever paid. The whole system, as it was at the time application was made to the Railroad Commission for an adjustment of rates, had been built up out of funds provided by the consumers, irrespective of their holdings of stock; their contribution being in proportion to their respective use of water. The most extensive and expensive improvements to the system were made after the corporation forfeited its charter. No previous application had been made to have the water rates fixed by the Commission. On these facts, the protestants against the increase in rates argued that the water system had never been dedicated to a public use, but that it had always been regarded by the water consumers as a mutual water company. Their contention was, therefore, that the Commission had no jurisdiction of the matter. At the same time, they were compelled to admit that the water company did not fall within the strict interpretation of section 2 of the act providing for the regulation of water companies (Stats. 1913, p. 84), defining what kind of a water company is not a public utility.

The record returned by the Commission clearly establishes that there never was any relation between the shares of stock of the company, owned by landowners, and the acreage irrigated. From the inception of the enterprise, there was "a holding out" to sell water to any applicant within the area adjacent to the system and within the limits of supply. At the time of the hearing, the owners of 28.5 per cent. of the irrigated land had no interest whatever in the water system. The deeds from the original owners of the water rights to the company specifically declared that the company might use the water rights, ditches, and lands granted for rights of way to supply any who might desire to purchase water from the Piru Water Company. The recital of purposes for which the corporation was formed did not limit the sale, use, and disposition of the water to those who might hold stock in the corporation. In the early minutes of the corporation there is a notation that household water might be sold to "new customers." In 1891, in an action (Hargrave et al. v. Cook et al.) brought in the superior court of Ventura county by the lower riparian appropriators on Piru creek to determine the respective rights of the parties to the waters of the creek, the company, in its answer, alleged that it had diverted the waters for the purpose of furnishing same to its stockholders and others for irrigation and domestic uses, and it sought to have it decreed that it be entitled to divert a designated number of inches of water for distribution to its stockholders and others, as alleged. In the judgment in that action it was declared that the ditch and right of the water company to divert water was appurtenant to the lands of the original incorporators, and that the water company was the owner of and entitled to divert continuously, by means of its ditch, 285 inches of water for irrigation and domestic purposes upon such lands, "and, when not necessary for such uses upon the said lands, to use the same upon any other lands or for any other purposes," as against the plaintiffs in the action. There is no evidence that the water company ever refused to sell water to any owner or occupier of land within its irrigable area; and there is evidence that it continually served many persons who were not stockholders. No distinction was ever made between landowners with stock and those without stock in the company, when it came to extending its system and rendering service. The Piru Oil & Land Company, which, for many years, was the largest stockholder of the water company, and a landholder under the system, sold much of its land separate from the stock, and later sold its remaining stock to other parties.

[1, 2] We are satisfied that, on the evidence before it, the respondent Commission was fully justified in holding that the applicants before it were conducting a public utility. The act providing for the regulation of water companies (Stats. 1913, p. 84, § 3) provides that:

"Whenever any private corporation or association organized for the purpose of delivering water solely to its stockholders or members at cost does deliver water to others than its stockholders or members for compensation, such private corporation or association becomes a public utility and subject to the terms of the Public Utilities Act and the jurisdiction, control and regulation of the railroad commission of the state of California."

Clearly, the Piru Water Company, and those continuing to conduct its affairs after it forfeited its charter, come within the meaning and definition of the act. The company was not organized for the purpose of delivering water solely to its stockholders at cost. Since its organization, it has at all times been willing to, and has actually sold, water to every one who applied. So far as the record indicates, it never refused to supply water to any one when it was able to meet the demand. The fact that in the early history of the company the water may have been considered appurtenant to the land of the first users is not inconsistent with the theory of a subsequent dedication to public use.

Traber v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 304, 312, 191 P. 366. In that case the court said:

"The offer of the company was a general offer to any and all persons who should apply for the water upon its terms for their lands. Whether in all cases such an offer would constitute a dedication to public use or not, it is clear that evidence of such offer and acceptance is sufficient to justify a finding of such dedication."

Reference was made, in the finding of the Commission, to the declared purposes of the Piru Water Company, as set out in its articles of incorporation. The whole history of the enterprise, from the time the original owners of the water formed the corporation until the present, affords substantial evidence of such a carrying into effect of the originally declared purposes of the pioneer holders of the water, and of the corporation formed by them, to justify a finding that the water acquired and utilized by the corporation, was, from its inception, dedicated to a public use, and that such corporation was a public utility. Williamson et al. v. Railroad Commission, 193 Cal. 22, 222 P. 803; Brewer v. Railroad Commission, 190 Cal. 60, 80, 210 P. 511.

[3] Property may be shown to have been devoted to a public use by implication from the acts of its owners and their dealings and relations to such property, without regard to statutory provisions. Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co., 170 Cal. 221, 227, 149 P. 161; Camp Rincon Resort Co. v. Eshleman, 172 Cal. 561, 563, 158 P. 186; Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 380, 384, 160 P. 228. The test to be applied in a case like this is whether or not those offering the service have expressly or impliedly held themselves out as engaging in the business of supplying the water to the public as a class, "not necessarily to all of the public, but to any limited portion of it, such portion, for example, as could be served by his system, as contradistinguished from his holding himself out as serving or ready to serve only particular individuals, either as a matter of accommodation or for other reasons peculiar and particular to them. [Citing cases.] The rule, of course, is that if there was any evidence before the Commission which would justify its finding, its order cannot be annulled." Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 184 Cal. 553, 554, 194 P. 1003, 1004.

[4-6] If it be a fact, as was found by the Commission, that the Piru Water Company at its inception, or at any subsequent time, dedicated its water to a public use, and such dedication has not since been revoked, said waters have since continued to retain the impress of a public use. Williamson v. Railroad Commission, supra; Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 175 P. 466, 3 A. L. R. 249. Having dedicated its water to a public use, the company could not revoke such dedication, and convert its waters into a private use, without the consent of all the beneficiaries of such use. Brewer v. Railroad Commission, supra; Franscioni v. Soledad L. & W. Co., supra. No attempt at such revocation has been shown. We are fully satisfied that the Piru Water System was not operated as a private water company within the doctrine laid down in Thayer v. California Dev. Co., 164 Cal. 117, 128 P. 21, and Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra. We therefore deem it unnecessary to distinguish these and other cases cited by the petitioners. The evidence heard by the Commission satisfactorily establishes the fact that the water company at times consciously offered and held itself out to sell water to all those within the area of its service. The consumers to whom it has heretofore sold water have a right to insist upon the continuance of the supply to their lands. Butte County Water Users' Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 185 Cal. 218, 224, 235, 196 P. 265. Being a public utility, it was within the jurisdiction of the respondent Railroad Commission in the matter of the fixing of rates.

[7] When these petitioners were before the Commission in opposition to the making of any order fixing water rates, the ground of their protest was that the Piru Water System was, in fact, a privately owned mutual water company, and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the rate-making body. Stats. 1913, c. 80, p. 85. They have shifted their ground, and are here contending that the evidence shows that the corporation held the system and water rights to the extent necessary to supply the original landowners, under the system, as trustee for the owners of the land, to operate the system and distribute the water at substantially the cost of operation, maintenance, replacement, and improvements, and that after it ceased to exist as a corporation, by reason of the non-payment of its license tax, those succeeding it, who are the individual respondents here, assumed the same obligation. That contention was not made in the first instance before the Commission, nor was it embodied in the grounds advanced on petition for rehearing. Under the mandatory provision of the Public Utilities Act (section 66), petitioners should not urge or rely on it in this court; but we have given it careful consideration nevertheless.

[8] Petitioners admit that no express written agreements were ever entered into by the water company, or its successors, and the landowners, which would establish the relationship they not contend for, but argue that such an agreement is to be implied. They cite Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 P. 395, in support of their position. The case is not in point. It is true the court there held, by way of dictum—for the decision went off on a point of pleading—that the owners of private rights to waters in a stream may join together to form a corporation to construct diversion and other necessary works, making the corporation their agent to collect and distribute water, while reserving to themselves and retaining their individual ownership in the respective water rights. There is no doubt that that may be done, but in the instant case all the private water rights of the incorporators of the Piru Water Company were specifically deeded to the company, and became its property, to be devoted to the general purposes for which it was formed. In Copeland v. Fairview Land, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 148, 131 P. 119, also cited by the petitioners, the facts were essentially different from those involved in the case here. The owner of the tracts formed a water company and transferred to it the riparian rights of the land along the river, taking in return all the stock of the water company. It continued to sell parcels of land, together with a proportional number of shares of water stock. There were recitals in the certificates that the holders thereof should be entitled to receive a proportional share of the water "belonging to" the water company. The court said (page 161 [131 P. 124]) that the device "was a scheme for the apportionment of the water right to the several parcels of land so that each could thereafter be conveniently sold with its proper share of the water right," and that for such purpose the landowner "stood in the relation of trustee for the owners of the several parcels of land so conveyed." In neither of these cases was the court called upon to consider a situation arising out of facts similar to those of the case now here.

[9] We are not convinced that the petitioners, by shifting their ground from the position they took before the Commission to that taken by them in this court, placed themselves in a more advantageous situation than they were in before the rate-making body. In the last analysis, they are met by the evidence and the well-established principles of law we have already sufficiently discussed. Where evidence in proof of facts is substantial in character and justifies the inference or conclusion that the facts necessary to the jurisdiction of the Commission did exist, then, under the general principles of law regarding proceedings in certiorari, its decision as to the effect of such evidence is binding and conclusive on the reviewing court. Traver v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 304, 307, 191 P. 366.

The orders of the Commission are affirmed.

TOLLEY v. ENGERT et al. (Civ. 4480.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 26, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1925.)

Master and servant ☞333—Verdict against automobile stage company, but exonerating codefendant driver, held to require new trial as to both.

Verdict against automobile stage company for death of one struck by stage, but exonerating codefendant driver, held to require reversal of judgment thereon and new trial as to both defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Bertha Belle Tolley against M. V. Engert and the Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Incorporated. From a judgment against the last-named defendant, it appeals. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 235 P. 652.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Lennon, J., dissenting.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, Theodore Hale and Barry J. Colding, both of San Francisco, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Franklin Swart, of Redwood City, and John H. Machado, of San Jose, for respondent.

CABANISS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This action was brought by Bertha Belle Tolley, widow, and the other plaintiffs, children, of Walter Ennor Tolley, deceased, to recover damages resulting from his death due to the alleged careless and negligent operation of an automobile stage owned by the defendant Pickwick Stages, and driven by the defendant Engert, as its servant and employee. The complaint further alleges in substance that, as deceased, mounted upon a bicycle, was passing southerly along the right-hand side of a public highway at or near its intersection with Santa Inez avenue in the city of San Mateo, a passenger automobile stage driven by Engert was moving southerly, directly behind said decedent; and that thereupon the defendant Engert, while driving the stage recklessly and at an unlawful rate of speed, attempted to pass decedent, who was struck, run upon, and killed by the stage. The owner denies the negligence charge, and also sets up contributory negligence. The verdict was in this form: "We, the jury, * * * find for the plaintiff, Bertha Belle Tolley, and against the defendant Pickwick Stages * * * in the sum of $1,000, and we exonerate the driver, M. V. Engert."

This eccentric and self-stultifying verdict is the counterpart of one considered in Bradley v. Rosenthal & Sunset Telephone Co., 154 Cal. 420, 97 P. 876, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171. In his opinion, written in that case, Judge Henshaw approvingly quotes the following argument presented by appellant, Sunset Telephone Company:

"Appellant argues that the evidence establishes without conflict that if it be responsible at all it is responsible solely because of the relationship of principal and agent found to exist between itself and the codefendant Rosenthal; that not one word of evidence tends to establish any direct personal participation, personal knowledge or personal culpability upon its part, or that its employee Rosenthal was in any way carrying out its express instructions in the particular matter for the doing of which negligence is charged; that under such circumstances the employer is liable only because of the rule of law which holds him responsible, as well for the undirected as for the directed act of the agent within the scope of his employment; that in such kind of cases where there have been no express instructions for the doing of the act complained of in the particular way, the principal and agent, master and servant, are not joint tort-feasors as the law employs that term. The employee's responsibility is primary. He is responsible because he committed the wrongful or negligent act. The employer's responsibility is secondary, in the sense that he has committed no moral wrong, but under the law is held accountable for his agent's conduct. While both may be sued in a single action, a verdict exonerating the agent, must necessarily exonerate the principal, since the verdict exonerating the agent is a declaration that he has done no wrong, and the principal cannot be responsible for the agent if the agent has committed no tort."

Of this argument Judge Henshaw says:

"These legal propositions, it will be seen, receive universal recognition. Applying them to the present case, appellant argues that the verdict of the jury in favor of Rosenthal must be construed as their finding that he was not negligent, and as the appellant could be responsible only because Rosenthal was its agent, the judgment against it must be reversed, and upon the authority of Doremus v. Root, 23 Wash. 710, 63 Pac. 572, this court should order a like judgment in favor of it."

The opinion elaborates and indorses the above quoted excerpts; and the order was that the judgment in favor of Rosenthal and that against the appellant (the employer) be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. By parity of reasoning a new trial must be had in the instant case as to both defendants. This we may order because here, as in Bradley v. Rosenthal, supra, both defendants are before the court—the respondent in another action (No. 4663), 235 P. 652, this day decided, having appealed from the verdict and judgment in favor of defendant Engert.

As for the reasons above stated, this action must be reversed, we will not consider appellant's contention that the court should have directed a verdict in favor of defendants, further than to say that the court was warranted in denying the motion.

The formal order is that judgment be reversed and the action remanded for a new trial.

TOLLEY et al. v. ENGERT et al. (Civ. 4663.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 26, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1925.)

Death §86(2)—Adult daughters held entitled to damages for loss of deceased father's training and guidance.

Adult daughters, maintained by father in family home without charge, though both were employed and capable of self-support, and married daughter, not member of her father's household, held entitled to damages for his death and consequent loss of his training and guidance.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Berthe Belle Tolley and others against M. V. Engert and another. Judgment for the named defendant, and against codefendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial as to both, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; LENNON, J., dissenting.

Franklin Swart, of Redwood City, and John H. Machado, of San Jose, for appellants.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, Theodore Hale and Barry J. Colding, both of San Francisco, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CABANISS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This appeal from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial as to both respondents is one of two taken in the same action, the other appeal, by defendant Pickwick Stage Company, having been this day determined (see opinion today filed in appeal No. 4480, 235 P. 651). For the reasons stated in the companion opinion (appeal No. 4480) the cause should be remanded for a new trial—that is to say (and this we add to avoid misunderstanding), as to both defendants, in view of the form of the verdict returned in the case.

Appellants complain that several instructions were erroneously given to their prejudice, and others properly requested by them, refused. We think these criticisms untenable except as to one instruction later herein to be noted. The plaintiffs sued in the capacity of widow, Berthe Belle Tolley, and daughters and sole surviving heirs of Walter Ennor Tolley. The evidence having to do with the earning capacity and family relation existing at the time of his death between decedent and plaintiffs is to the effect that he was then 52 years of age, in good health, and earning from several responsible and permanent employments approximately $200 per month; that the household consisted of said Tolley, the wife, and two of the three adult daughters, Elsie and Alice Tolley, all of whom were comfortably maintained by the father in the family home without charge or cost, though both daughters were employed and capable of maintaining themselves; that the third daughter was a married woman and not a member of her father's household; and it is gatherable from the record that the decedent was a kindly husband and father, of the home-loving type. Appellant contends that the court erred in giving the following instruction:

"The only plaintiff that you will consider in this case is the wife; there is no evidence before the court to show that the three children were dependent on the father at all, so you will not consider any evidence as to them, as to whether or not they are entitled to anything—that you will not consider for any purpose."

In thus eliminating the children the court erred. In support of this statement it is sufficient to cite Redfield v. Oakland, 110 Cal. 277, and to quote therefrom, pp. 288, 289, 42 P. 822, 825, the following:

"It is contended, however, that no special or any circumstances were shown which would cause the children to depend upon their mother after they arrived at majority, or that after that time they would suffer loss from her death. It is true that the only evidence which tended to show an injury to the children resulting from the loss of the mother was her care and labor bestowed upon them, her education, her character, her ability to train and guide them, and efforts for their welfare; and, in applying such testimony, the jurors were authorized to draw such conclusions therefrom as their intelligence, experience, and observation should justify.

"Nor are we prepared to say that her intelligent care and assistance would be less valuable to them at the critical period of their lives when they are about to enter, or have entered, upon a more or less distinct and separate life, after attaining their majority. Besides, the statute does not limit the right to prosecute the action, or to recover damages, to minor children or minor heirs."

This language applies to instant case notwithstanding that the deceased parent in the Redfield Case was the mother, as the training and guidance of his daughters by a devoted father does not differ in kind, though it may in degree, from that of a good, dutiful mother.

It is ordered that judgment be reversed and the cause remanded for new trial.

MURPHY v. MURPHY et ux. (Civ. 2908.)

1. Husband and wife §262(1)—Property in wife's name presumed purchased by her separate funds.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 162-164, property in name of wife will be presumed to be her separate property and purchased by her separate funds, and therefore, in absence of allegation of fraudulent conveyance to her, judgment against husband will not be held lien against her property.

2. Fraudulent conveyances §278(2)—Conveyance will not be presumed fraudulent.

In absence of allegation or proof of fraud, conveyance from husband to wife, though made after judgment has been entered against him, will not be presumed fraudulent.

3. Costs §32(1)—Plaintiff entitled to costs on recovery of judgment for more than $300.

Where plaintiff recovered judgment for more than $300, though failing to have it declared lien on property, she was entitled to costs of suit as of course, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1022, 1033.

4. Paupers §37(2)—Attorney's fees not allowable in action to renew judgment.

In action by daughter against father to renew a judgment for maintenance, not being action for maintenance under Civ. Code, § 206, attorney's fees held not allowable, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1021; there being no agreement of parties, especially in absence of showing of necessity as required by Civ. Code, § 137, in divorce action.

5. Limitation of actions §182(5)—Statute of limitations waived on failure to plead it.

Statute of limitations, being strictly affirmative defense, will be waived on failure to plead it, and court could not apply it to deprive plaintiff of installments due under judgment in action to renew same, where not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Lulu Mignon Murphy against S. S. Murphy and wife. From part of a judgment for plaintiff, she appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to render.

A. P. Hayne and B. M. Bainbridge, both of Stockton, for appellant.

John R. Cronin, of Stockton, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding in the nature of an action to renew a judgment for maintenance of a dependent daughter, and to declare said judgment to be a lien upon certain real property standing in the name of the wife of the judgment debtor. The appeal is from part of the judgment only which holds that the statute of limitations has barred the first two installments of the original judgment, and for failure on the part of the trial court to declare the judgment a lien upon the real property described in the complaint, and for failure to award plaintiff her costs and counsel fees. The appeal is from the judgment roll alone. No evidence is before this court. A demurrer was sustained as to defendant Alice K. Murphy without leave to amend. From the judgment of dismissal entered pursuant thereto, the plaintiff appealed. On appeal that judgment of dismissal was affirmed. 57 Cal. App. 182, 207 P. 43. The material portions of the complaint here involved appear in that opinion of this court.

The plaintiff is the daughter of the defendant S. S. Murphy. In an action for maintenance under the provisions of section 206 of the Civil Code of the state of California, filed March 13, 1911, the plaintiff secured a judgment against her father for the sum of $15 per month. This judgment was entered nunc pro tunc as of March 21, 1912. The present case was commenced July 23, 1919. The trial court found that said judgment for maintenance was paid and satisfied to May 5, 1914, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant S. S. Murphy for the accrued and unpaid installments, with interest from August 5, 1914, to November 5, 1923, in the aggregate sum of $2,234.28. The trial court held that the statute of limitations had run against the two installments immediately prior to August 5, 1914, and found that the judgment did not create a lien, and failed to award plaintiff her costs or counsel fees.

The statute of limitations was not pleaded by the defendant by either demurrer or answer.

[1, 2] Since the defendant Alice K. Murphy is no longer a party to this action, and there is no allegation of fraudulent conveyance of property to her the presumption of law is that the property standing in her name was purchased by her separate funds, and that it is her separate property. Sections 162-164, Civ. Code. The court therefore properly found there was no lien against her property.

Even though we assume that the 10-acre almond tract described in the complaint was transferred from S. S. Murphy to his wife after the entry of the original judgment, still, in the absence of an allegation or proof of fraud, we cannot hold that the conveyance was void. Fraud is never presumed. It must be alleged and proven. 12 Cal. Jur. 800; Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 631, 22 P. 404, 13 Am. St. Rep. 200; Murphy v. Murphy, 57 Cal. App. 185, 207 P. 43.

[3] Having recovered a judgment for more than $300, plaintiff was entitled to her costs of suit as of course, without any order of court. Section 1022, Code Civ. Proc. She was entitled to file her memorandum of costs as provided by section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure.

[4] This is not an action in which the court is authorized by statute to allow attorney's fees. Except where attorney's fees are specifically allowed by statute, or by contract of the parties, they are not recoverable by a successful litigant as costs or otherwise. 7 Cal. Jur. 286. The compensation of attorneys is left to the agreement of parties. Section 1021, Code Civ. Proc. This is an action to renew a judgment. It is not an action for maintenance under section 206 of the Civil Code. Even though in such an action attorney's fees were recoverable as in an action of divorce by a wife against her husband, pursuant to section 137, Civil Code, yet such allowance is dependent upon a showing of a "necessity for the prosecution of the action." No such showing of necessity was made in this case. Under no circumstances could the court allow attorney's fees in this class of case.

[5] The trial court found that the original judgment was paid only to May 5, 1914, but disallowed the first two installments due thereafter, on the ground that the statute of limitations had run against them. This statute was not set up as a defense by either demurrer or answer. The defendant is therefore presumed to have waived it. The defense of the statute of limitations is strictly affirmative in its nature. In order to make it available, it must be pleaded. The court cannot of its own motion apply the defense of this statute for the benefit of one who has failed to plead it. It is a personal privilege which may be urged by demurrer where the limitation appears upon the face of the complaint or by answer where it does not so appear. Otherwise the defense is waived. 18 Stand. Ency. of Proc. 1036; 16 Cal. Jur. 603; Manning v. Dallas, 73 Cal. 420, 15 P. 34. These two omitted installments should have been included in the judgment.

The judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter its judgment in favor of plaintiff for $2,234.28, plus the two installments of $15 each, together with accrued interest thereon.

SHROPSHIRE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE IN AND FOR THE COUNTY OF RIVERSIDE et al. (Civ. 5012.)

1. Certiorari ⇐6—Writ of review not available to party who has had right of appeal.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, providing that the writ of review may not be granted in any case where the party demanding such writ has a right of appeal, held applicable, where such party has had a right of appeal.

2. Certiorari ⇐5(1)—Judgment for physician for services held not reviewable, in view of right of appeal.

Superior court's judgment for physician for services rendered on appeal from justice's court held not reviewable by writ of review on theory that the court had no jurisdiction under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, § 17, subd. (b) (Laws 1917, p. 846), since facts relied on could have been established by evidence in the justice's court, and there was a right of appeal from justice's court to superior court precluding issuance of writ of review, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068.

Writ of Review to Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

Application by M. M. Shropshire and M. Y. Kellam, Jr., partners, for certiorari against the Superior Court of the State in and for the County of Riverside, Hon. Wm. H. Ellis, Judge thereof, and another, to review a judgment of such court. Writ denied.

William Guthrie, of San Bernardino, for petitioners.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioners ask for a writ of certiorari to review a judgment of the superior court.

The facts as shown by the petition are as follows: In the justice's court of San Geronio township, in the county of Riverside, one J. W. Cook, a physician, sued petitioners on a claim for an amount stated as the reasonable value of professional services performed by him for one Roy Henderson. It was alleged that the plaintiff rendered those services at the special instance and request of the defendants. Judgment having been rendered in favor of Cook, the defendants appealed to the superior court on questions of law and fact. At the trial in the superior court the evidence proved conclusively that the services of the plaintiff were required and rendered by reason of injuries received by Henderson while in the employ of the defendants; that at the time of the injuries Henderson was performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment, and was acting in the course of his employment. Therefore both petitioners and Henderson were subject to the compensation provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831). The petition alleges that by reason of said facts the superior court did not have jurisdiction to render the judgment which it rendered against petitioners as the result of said trial in the superior court, and it is further alleged that petitioners have no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. The petition further alleges that the evidence produced at the trial in the superior court proved conclusively that no agreement was made by petitioners with Dr. Cook wherein and whereby the amount to be paid for his said surgical and medical services was fixed.

Petitioners rely upon section 17, subd. (b), of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, which provides that the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission shall include any controversy concerning compensation or concerning any right or liability arising out of or incident thereto, jurisdiction over which is fixed by this act in the Commission, "unless an express agreement shall have been made between the persons or institutions rendering such treatment and the employer or insurance carrier fixing the amount to be paid for the services." Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, Deering's Gen. Laws (1923 Ed.) Act 4749.

The contention is that, as soon as the evidence established the fact that no such agreement had been made fixing the amount to be paid for the services of the plaintiff, the superior court should have dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction. And, further, upon the point that this court in a certiorari proceeding may examine the evidence to test the jurisdiction, counsel for petitioners refers to the decision of the Supreme Court in the matter of the Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 178 P. 143.

[1, 2] Let it be assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that we are in agreement with counsel for petitioners concerning both of these propositions. Nevertheless, we think that the petition should be denied. The writ of review may not be granted in any case where the party demanding such writ has a right of appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068. This includes a case where the party has had a right of appeal. For aught that appears in the petition, it may be that the same facts which were shown by the evidence in the superior court were also produced in evidence before the justice's court. Or, if they did not so appear, it was in the power of the defendants to have established or offered to have established those facts by evidence in the justice's court.

They were facts therefore either actually included in the appeal to the superior court, or, if they were not so included, they were omitted because the defendants failed to produce them. Under such circumstances, although there is no right of appeal from the judgment of the superior court, it cannot be said that for that reason the case was one in which there was no right of appeal, for there was a right of appeal from the justice's court to the superior court.

The petition is denied.

Evidence held to raise question for court, trying case without jury, as to pedestrian's contributory negligence in crossing street after dark during heavy traffic.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Ida Pauline Evers against O. W. Stratton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred Mansur and E. B. Drake, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant in an action for damages for personal injuries, and defendant appeals.

Practically the only uncontroverted fact in the case is that plaintiff was struck by defendant's automobile at a street intersection in the city of Los Angeles. Sufficient evidence, however, was introduced on the trial, from which the judge was justified in concluding that the following were the circumstances surrounding the happening of the accident from which plaintiff sustained the injuries of which she complains: At an intersection of two streets plaintiff wished to cross one of such streets upon which there was heavy automobile traffic, as well as considerable traffic by street cars. Just before plaintiff attempted to make the crossing, a street car stopped for the discharge of passengers on the side of the street nearer to plaintiff. Thereupon several automobiles, which were traveling two or three abreast in the same direction as was the street car, stopped in the rear of the street car. Either immediately before or immediately after the street car had thus stopped, plaintiff either walked rapidly or ran into the street at a point near the front end of the street car. After the street car had discharged such of its passengers as wished to alight therefrom at the street intersection at which plaintiff was standing, the street car and the several automobiles which had stopped in the rear of the street car started forward, and plaintiff, who had remained in the street near the front end of the stopped street car, was struck by defendant's automobile. There was testimony which warranted the conclusion that, after plaintiff had reached a position near the front end of the street car, she had not moved until the accident occurred, and that, during the time she was thus situated, plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care for her own safety. She testified:

"Q. After you started across the street, after you had stepped down from the sidewalk into the street, did you look for automobiles? A. Yes, I did; I looked all around for the way for me to go.

"Q. Did you keep on looking for the way for you to go? A. I did; many, many times.

"Q. Were you walking at the time? A. I knew in that car track I was all right, and I stayed there and waited.

"Q. And you were standing still at the time the automobile ran into you? A. Yes; that is right.

"Q. Can you tell me about how long you had been standing still? A. I waited at least four minutes. There was so many automobiles—I waited about four minutes; I did not have my watch, but it was a long time."

Another witness testified:

"I seen the car stop just before or about the time of this accident. * * * I seen a lady standing there, but don't know who she was. It was the lady that was afterwards taken away from there. I seen the lady standing right across from the little church where the vestibule is, clear to the track; probably about four or five feet away from the street car track. And when the car stopped, if my recollection is right, everybody started to move, a lot of machines held up by the street car. Now, probably there was four or five cars started to move at one time. I couldn't tell. I didn't count them. What I saw was a lady standing there, the machines coming up, and of course there was one machine hit the lady—that is a sure thing. I couldn't tell whether it was going fast or slow. I know where there is a crosswalk there. Respecting right near the crosswalk, she was this side, west. I could not tell the distance she was from the crosswalk. She stopped for the street car to pass. The street car had gone on. At the time the machines started up, it looked to me like four or five, but there was some more back of that. There was a whole lot of cars tied up on account of the street car. I mean they were practically abreast. As she stood there on the north from the car track, she did not move any at all until she was hit by this machine. * * * Oh, I seen her before the car started, but, when the street car went between me and her, I couldn't see her. The next thing I heard was a crash. Somebody—something hit somebody. I could easy say that. And of course I seen no more woman there, or no more lady. The last I saw of this lady standing in the street at the point 'C' was before the street car pulled between me and the lady. After that I wouldn't say whether I have seen her or not."

[1-4] From the evidence appellant assumes an entirely different state of facts, and therefrom he argues that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence and consequently that no recovery could be had by her for the injuries which she sustained. A great many authorities, not only from this state, but as well from other jurisdictions, are cited and parts thereof quoted by appellant to sustain his position based upon what he urges that the evidence shows were the facts in the case. But the difficulty encountered in appellant's position is that every intendment is in favor of the judgment of the court, and that, if there is any substantial evidence to support the findings of fact upon which the judgment is founded, this court is unauthorized to interfere. In determining the question of plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence, this court "must take the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff." Haines v. Fewkes, 190 Cal. 477, 478, 213 P. 490. It should be remembered that the contributory negligence of plaintiff is not presumed, but, to the contrary, that defendant was obliged to bear the burden of establishing such facts that the legal conclusion of contributory negligence would follow therefrom. The case was tried without a jury, and consequently the credibility to be given to the testimony of the several witnesses and the weight of the evidence rested exclusively with the trial judge. His ultimate conclusion of fact was:

"That it is not true that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as alleged in the defendant's separate and second defense; nor was she guilty of contributory negligence at all at the time and place of accident; nor was she guilty of any negligence, contributory or otherwise, at the time and place of said accident."

A case similar in its facts is that of Haines v. Fewkes, 190 Cal. 477, 213 P. 490. It there appears that a woman was injured by being struck by an automobile at a street intersection. She recovered judgment, and the defendant in the action appealed. The theory of the appellant was that the plaintiff started through a line of traffic and ran in front of his automobile before he had the opportunity to either discover her or to stop his machine. In the course of the opinion the court said:

"There was evidence to support this view, but in considering the appeal we must take the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff. According to her testimony the accident occurred about 5:30 p. m., December 10, 1920, when it was comparatively dark and the headlights of the automobiles were lighted. She passed rapidly and successfully through the stream of traffic on the west side of Figueroa, proceeding south, which, she states, was an almost continuous procession, reaching the center of the street where she stopped midway between the north and south bound tracks of the electric railway on Figueroa street, paused a few moments, and then stepped forward to a position between the rails of the north-bound track. There, looking southward, she saw approaching her two automobiles, with headlights lighted, near the east curb of Figueroa street, proceeding northward; that she was not in the line of their travel; that while she remained standing at this point she was struck by the defendant's automobile, which had apparently swerved over toward her from the position in which she first saw it. It is apparent from this statement that she was guilty of no contributory negligence, but that she was making the best of her way across the street through the very heavy traffic on the street at that time."

[5, 6] Considering the instant case, it is perhaps true that a very cautious person would not have ventured into the street in close proximity to the street car at a time and in such circumstances as were present just prior to the happening of the accident in question. But plaintiff's conduct in the premises is not to be judged by such a standard. She is to be held accountable for such care only as would have been exercised by a reasonably prudent person similarly situated as was the plaintiff. Assuming what must be conceded, that plaintiff had an equal right with defendant in the use of the street, and that, as her evidence indicates, she was keeping a reasonable lookout to the end that she might not be struck and injured by a passing automobile, it cannot be said as a matter of law that plaintiff was not in the exercise of reasonable care for her own safety. It follows that she was not guilty of contributory negligence.

No other points being presented for reversal, it is ordered that the judgment be and the same is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COHEN. (Cr. 1190.)

1. Embezzlement ⚡6 — Express company checks held "property" subject to embezzlement.

Express company checks, which had not been signed or countersigned by original payee, but in other respects were complete, held "property" subject to embezzlement, being evidence of debt, within Pen. Code, § 7, subds. 10, 12, and sections 484, 503, 510, 514.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Property.]

2. Criminal law ⚡320—Laws of another state presumed same.

Laws of another state, not introduced in evidence, will be presumed the same as laws of California.

3. Associations ⚡3 — Partnership ⚡44 — Written articles of association or partnership, of unincorporated organization, not presumed.

That an unincorporated organization has written articles of association or partnership will not be presumed.

4. Embezzlement ⚡35—Failure to prove general ownership as alleged immaterial, where special ownership pleaded.

In prosecution for embezzlement of checks executed by American Express Company to Bank of Italy, failure to prove capacity of American Express Company held immaterial in view of allegation of special ownership in Bank of Italy.

5. Criminal law ⚡400(1)—Oral evidence of character of maker of checks, alleged embezzled, as an unincorporated association proper.

In prosecution for embezzlement of express company checks, oral evidence that company was unincorporated association held proper as against contention that it was not the best evidence, but that articles of agreement should have been introduced; the case not presenting a controversy between the parties signing the articles of incorporation.

6. Corporations ⚡32(3)—Oral evidence admissible to show corporation de facto.

Oral evidence is admissible to show that company is corporation de facto.

7. Embezzlement ⚡38—Evidence as to character of unincorporated association not incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

In prosecution for embezzlement of express company checks, testimony as to character of company showing it a de facto corporation, organized as a nonstock company, held not incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

8. Embezzlement ⚡35—Names of members of association having general ownership in property claimed embezzled immaterial.

In prosecution for embezzlement of checks executed by American Express Company, an association, pleading and proof of names of persons comprising association were not required.

Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, Anthony Caminetti, and Albert T. Roche, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was indicted on a charge of embezzlement. From an order denying him a new trial and from a judgment of conviction he has appealed.

[1] The first point which he calls to our attention and which he contends was a reversible error is this, he claims that the properties which it was alleged he embezzled were of such a nature and in such form that they amounted to mere scraps of paper and had no value. That contention is based on these facts:

On the 27th day of February, 1922, the defendant was a clerk, agent, or servant of the Bank of Italy, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California. On that date there came into his possession, care, custody, and control certain indentures of various different numbers, some for the face value of $100, others for $50, others for $20 and still others in the sum of $10, and all aggregating the sum of $3,000. For all the purposes of this case the form of each instrument, except as to the number, the date and place of cashing, and the person to whom paid, was at the time of the trial as follows:

Company (at its paying agencies): Pay this check from our balance to the order of Weber & Heilbronner, 42nd St. & Madison Ave., $100.00, one hundred dollars. Jas. F. Fargo, Treasurer. Countersigned here in presence of person cashing: Lewis Luce."

When the American Express Company delivered the indentures to the Bank of Italy no one of them was signed or countersigned, Lewis Luce, or otherwise. Neither was the name of the payee inserted, nor was anything inserted in the blank at the top for the date and place of cashing. In all other respects the indenture was in the form as hereinabove set out. It will be observed that one of the checks was susceptible of having the blanks filled in by a holder, rightfully or wrongfully, and thereupon the instrument would become on its face the check of the American Express Company. Ordinarily the signature at the top would be inserted at the time the check was issued by the bank or other agency having authority to issue the same. Nevertheless such blank could be filled in (if perchance the instrument came into his possession) by any one at any time. It was the theory of the prosecution that the name "Lewis Luce" was inserted in each place by the defendant, and that the name is a fictitious name. The appellant contends that, because an additional crime had to be committed before one of the checks could properly be cashed, that then and for that reason, the appropriation by the appellant of the checks before they were signed or countersigned did not constitute embezzlement. However, a most cursory reading of the checks before the appropriation thereof discloses that they were in form checks executed in blank. Because the blanks thereof were filled in by a wrongdoer in a false manner does not alter the main fact.

"Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503.

"Any evidence of debt, negotiable by delivery only, and actually executed, is the subject of embezzlement, whether it has been delivered or issued as a valuable instrument or not." Pen. Code, § 510.

"Every person guilty of embezzlement is punishable in the manner prescribed for feloniously stealing property of the value of that embezzled; and where the property embezzled is an evidence of debt or right of action, the sum due upon it or secured to be paid by it must be taken as its value. * * * Pen. Code, § 514.

"The word 'property' includes both real and personal property." Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 10.

"The words 'personal property' include * * * evidences of debt." Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 12.

"Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another." Pen. Code, § 484.

It is settled law in California that a check is an evidence of debt that may be sued on. Nassano v. Tuolumne County Bank, 20 Cal.

App. 603, 130 P. 29. There is nothing in the point that at the time the checks were taken from the Bank of Italy they had not been signed nor countersigned. In a case almost parallel in its facts it was so held. People v. Hart, 28 Cal. App. 335, 152 P. 947. In other jurisdictions which have similar statutory provisions to those cited above the same ruling obtains. 36 C. J., p. 744, § 27; Roberts v. State, 181 Ind. 520, 104 N. E. 970; Fulshear v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 376, 128 S. W. 134; State v. McClellan, 82 Vt. 361, 73 A. 993, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1063. In the case last cited, 82 Vt. 363, 73 A. 993, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 1065, the Supreme Court of Vermont says:

"The respondent argues that the value of stolen property is to be determined by its condition when taken; that a check payable to order is an incomplete instrument as long as it remains undorsed; that no one could have drawn the money on the check in question—not even the payee—and that consequently it was only of nominal value. * * * The holder of a paper thus transferred can enforce his right, by a suit in equity in his own name or by a suit at law in the name of the payee. All these considerations point to the conclusion that this check as it existed at the time of the taking was of substantial, and not nominal, value. Moreover, the law treats it as something more than a paper of nominal value in the hands of the wrong giver. If the respondent were sued for it in trover, he could not say that its value was merely nominal. He would be held for its actual value to the lawful owner, which prima facie would be the amount due on it. * * *

[2-4] The second point made by the appellant is that the evidence introduced was incompetent and insufficient to prove the incorporation of American Express Company. To understand the importance of that contention, it is necessary to state the charge in the indictment. That pleading contained the following allegations:

"* * * The said Abraham L. Cohen on or about the 27th day of February, A. D. 1922, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, was the clerk, agent and servant of the Bank of Italy, a corporation then and there and at all times herein referred to organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and then and there, to wit, on or about the 27th day of February, 1922, in said city and county of San Francisco, there came into the possession, care, custody, and control of him, the said Abraham L. Cohen, American Express Company's Traveler's Checks * * * all of the value of $3,000 in gold coin of the United States the personal property of the American Express Company, an unincorporated association of more than seven persons organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York, which said personal property was then and there held by said Bank of Italy in trust for said American Express Company and he, * * * etc.

In the first place, it will be noted that it is alleged that the American Express Company is not incorporated, but that it is organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York. The laws of that state were not introduced in evidence. In the absence of such evidence, it will be presumed that the laws of New York are the same as the laws of California. If an organization is not incorporated, we cannot assume, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that it has written articles of association, or partnership, or otherwise. In the second place it will be noted that the indictment pleaded a general ownership in the American Express Company, and a special ownership in the Bank of Italy. It may be conceded that the pleader was bound to plead facts showing the general ownership or special ownership. The pleader was not bound to plead both ways. As to the special ownership in the Bank of Italy, the record presents no point whatever. The allegation of general ownership in the American Express Company can therefore be treated as surplusage. So treating it we may concede that there was a failure of proof as to the capacity of the American Express Company, and notwithstanding that fact the appellant has not been injured.

[5, 6] In the third place the evidence objected to was given by F. G. Athearn, Esq. That witness testified that he had been practicing law in San Francisco since 1912, and that the American Express Company, to his knowledge, had been doing business in the state of California since 1913 or 1914; and that it had so conducted business during the time mentioned as an unincorporated association consisting of more than seven persons organized under the laws of the state of New York. To each question the appellant objected, and afterwards moved to strike out the testimony. The appellant contended that oral testimony was not the best evidence. Conceding for the moment that the American Express Company is an organization purporting to be organized under a statute of New York, and that it is an organization similar to a nonstock corporation as known in California, and that it has, or should have, articles of incorporation, the appellant's contention is without merit, because the case on trial did not present a controversy between the parties who had signed the articles of incorporation. Bituminized B. & T. Co. v. Simons Brick Co., 183 Cal. 687, 693, 192 P. 528.

[7] Again, if the objection on the ground stated were good then oral evidence would not be admissible to show that the American Express Company is a corporation de facto. But the contrary is the rule. People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648, 44 P. 312. Further objecting to the evidence given by the witness, the appellant contended that the evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

But it was competent, relevant, and material as tending to prove that the American Express Company was a de facto corporation organized as a nonstock company or, if it be the fact, that the American Express Company is a fictitious name under which seven or more persons transact business. The trial court therefore did not err in overruling the objection or in denying the motion to strike out.

[8] Moreover, it is settled law in this state that it was not necessary for the pleader to plead the names of the persons comprising the association called American Express Company, nor was the prosecution bound to introduce proof as to the names of the members of the association. People v. Mahlman, 82 Cal. 585, 23 P. 145.

We find no error in the record.
The judgment is affirmed.

CRAIG v. SHEA. (Civ. 4799.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. March 4, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1201(1)—Refusal to allow amendment held not abuse of discretion.

It is not an abuse of discretion to refuse amendment of a complaint, which had been on file nearly eight years, where plaintiff on retrial, after reversal permitting amendment, first contended that the complaint was sufficient, and only sought to amend after trial court had held complaint insufficient.

2. Fraud $\hookrightarrow$ 42—Complaint held insufficient to state cause of action for actual fraud.

Complaint, which alleges that defendant represented walnut trees to be from 12 to 18 years old and income therefrom to be 12 to 18 per cent. of purchase price, that plaintiff was not familiar with age of trees or value of land and so informed defendant, that plaintiff, relying on such representations, purchased grove, and that neither age of trees nor income was as represented, and contained no allegation of the untruth of the representations or fraudulent intent of the defendant, is insufficient to state a cause of action for actual fraud as defined by Civ. Code, § 1572.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Emogene A. Craig, executrix of the estate of J. H. Craig, against R. P. Shea. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hugo D. Newhouse and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dryer & Castle and David D. Stuart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action to recover damages for false representations alleged to have been made by the vendor to the vendee in the sale of a walnut grove.

The action was commenced in the early part of 1915. An amended complaint was filed May 26, 1915. Later the defendant answered the amended complaint and thereafter a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,750. An appeal was taken from that judgment and the judgment was reversed (Craig v. Shea, 45 Cal. App. 351, 188 P. 73) on December 31, 1919. The record does not disclose that any further proceedings were had until the 15th day of March, 1923. From the recitals of the judgment as printed in the clerk's transcript, the action came on regularly for trial in the lower court on the date last mentioned. The record before us is not clear, but, as we understand from the abbreviated recitals, it appears that upon the calling of the case for trial the defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence by the plaintiff, because the amended complaint did not state a cause of action. The appellant's counsel did not seriously oppose the objection, but, in the arguments before the trial court, counsel admitted that the amended complaint was defective, and stated item by item the amendments that should be made. The objection was sustained. Thereupon counsel asked permission to amend, and stated the amendments which plaintiff proposed to make. The judgment further recites that thereafter counsel for defendant moved said court to enter a judgment of nonsuit, because the plaintiff had introduced no evidence and none could be admitted upon a pleading which did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. That motion was granted and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

[1] At this time the appellant complains because the trial court did not, on March 15, 1923, grant her permission to amend. She claims that the refusal was an abuse of discretion. In the first place it will be borne in mind that the amended complaint on which she attempted to go to trial is the same pleading that was before this court in Craig v. Shea, supra. In writing that decision Mr. Justice Wood, speaking for the court, said:

"Plaintiff should be permitted to amend the complaint. It is unnecessary to lengthen the opinion by pointing out the defects, for they were discovered by counsel at the time of drawing his proposed findings."

That language was placed of record December 31, 1919. Thereafter the plaintiff took no action looking toward the amendment of her complaint, but slept on her rights until the action was called for trial the second time. Then, in the trial court, she first contended that her pleading was altogether sufficient, and continued to maintain that position until the trial court held otherwise. Thereupon she did, for the first time, ask leave to amend. When the trial court had denied that permission, she took an appeal, and in this court, in one and the same breath, she again claims that her pleading is sufficient, and in the next breath she asks that we hold that the trial court abused its discretion in not allowing her to amend. On such a record we do not hesitate in holding that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing the appellant permission to amend. The appellant also complains because the trial court did not allow her to introduce any evidence. In reply to that point, the respondent contended in the trial court, and now contends, that the amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

(1) "That heretofore, to wit, prior to the 6th day of April, 1914, the defendants were the owners and in the possession of that certain real property situate, lying and being in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and bounded and described as follows, to wit, (description) together with improvements thereon consisting of walnut trees, 20 and 40 years old, also certain buildings and other improvements.

(2) "That theretofore, to wit, on or about the 4th day of April, 1914, the defendants, by themselves and their agents, represented to your affiant that the said walnut trees, located on said property, were about equally divided between 12 and 18 years old. That said defendants further represented that the income from said property ranged from 12 per cent. to 18 per cent. per annum upon the asking price, to wit, thirty thousand dollars ($30,000).

(3) "That at all times mentioned in this complaint, your affiant has never been and is not now familiar with or able to determine the age of walnut trees or the comparative value of land planted to walnut trees of the age of 18 or the age of 40 years or more.

(4) "Your affiant avers that on or about the 6th day of April, 1914, plaintiff, having implicit faith and confidence in the honesty of the defendants and in the truthfulness of the representations of said defendants and their agents, and relying upon said representations, purchased said above-described property together with the improvements thereon for the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00).

(5) "That at the time of the purchase of said property hereinabove described, your affiant represented to the agents of said defendants that he knew nothing of the value of walnut property or of the age of trees or of the probable returns of walnut groves, and further represented that he was purchasing said property based upon the representations made to him by said agents.

(6) "Your affiant is informed and believes, and therefore alleges on information and belief, that a portion of said orchard, to wit, 15 acres thereof, is planted to trees of the age of over 40 years, the remainder thereof, to wit, 15 acres, being planted to trees of the age of over 20 years.

(7) "Your affiant further avers that the annual income from said property for the year ending December 31, 1914, was less than 4 per cent. of the purchase price of said property."

The fourth paragraph above quoted is an allegation that:

"Your affiant avers that on or about the 6th day of April, 1914, plaintiff * * * purchased said above-described property together with the improvements thereon for the sum of $25,000."

The rest of the contents of that paragraph is merely a recital and not an allegation. 1 C. J. 1149. In paragraph two it is alleged that the defendants "further represented that the income from said property ranged from 12 per cent. to 18 per cent. per annum upon the asking price, to wit, $30,000." The complaint contains no allegation that such representation was untrue. The allegations of paragraph seven are a statement of what the income thereafter was, and not an allegation as to what the income had been prior to the making of the purchase. In the entire pleading the word "fraudulently" is not used. No words of similar import are used. The pleading on its face is an attempt to plead actual fraud. To plead that cause of action it is necessary to plead a fraudulent intent. Civ. Code, § 1572; Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 539, 166 P. 808, and cases there cited. The trial court was clearly correct in holding that the amended complaint did not state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

HEARD v. TATE. (Civ. 4907.)

Bills and notes §523—Findings that payee's agent fraudulently obtained note from her, with maker's knowledge, held supported by evidence.

In action on note given in part payment for property exchanged and subsequently transferred by payee to agent, who negotiated exchange for her, evidence held to support findings that agent obtained note by fraudulent means, with defendant maker's knowledge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Estrella E. Heard against C. R. Tate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse Robinson, of Oakland, for appellant.
O. G. Follker and E. C. Miles, both of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover the amount due on a promissory note. The defendant appeared and answered; a trial was had before the judge sitting without a jury, and from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

As stated by the appellant, the record presents two points: First, was fraud proved or shown with respect to appellant? second, were certain findings supported by the evidence. Prior to the first day of June, 1921, C. R. Tate and J. E. Nichols were real estate agents. At that time Edith M. Heard, the mother of the plaintiff, was the owner of lands in the city of Santa Cruz of an alleged value of $45,000, mortgaged in the sum of $6,000. At the same time the defendant was the owner of lands in San Joaquin county of an alleged value of $20,000, mortgaged in the sum of $18,000. Thereafter J. E. Nichols asked Mrs. Heard to employ him as agent to negotiate an exchange, which she did, and as a result of the employment her lands were exchanged for the defendant's lands, and a part of the payment was the promissory note for the face value of $1,000, which is involved in this case, and also a note and mortgage in the sum of $15,000. After that transaction had been completed, Nichols approached Mrs. Heard and undertook to negotiate another exchange. At this time Tate and Nichols were occupying the same office in Oakland. Nichols' written authorization dated March 30, 1922, recited that Mrs. Heard was the owner of the above note and mortgage in the sum of $15,000, also a house and lot in Sunnyvale of the alleged value of $2,000, also a quantity of hay of an alleged value of $300, also the promissory note in the sum of $1,000, which is the subject of this suit. One Roddick was the owner of an apartment house known as 560 Thirty-Third street in Oakland. J. E. Nichols at the same time owned some worthless real estate contracts of the face value of $7,000 or more. When the defendant offered the above-mentioned written authorization in evidence, it contained a covenant authorizing Nichols to keep for his own use any portion of the properties owned by Mrs. Heard, which he was not compelled to turn over to Roddick. Later Nichols reported to her that Roddick would not accept the accrued interest on the mortgage note, $525; that he would not accept the promissory note, $1,000; that he would not accept the hay, $300; that he would not accept the Sunnyvale property, $2,000; but, if she would transfer those items to him, that he would turn over to Roddick properties to make up the difference. She acted on his statement so made to her. She executed a deed to the Sunnyvale property to Nichols, and Nichols erased the name of the grantee and inserted the name of the defendant. The promissory note in the sum of $1,000 was at Santa Cruz. Later Nichols told Mrs. Heard that, owing to a business transaction which he had with this defendant, he would like the plaintiff to execute a writing as follows:

"April 25, 1922. Mr. C. R. Tate, Oakland, Calif. Dear Sir: This is to certify that I have sold that certain note signed by yourself to myself for $1,000 due on demand and dated on or about December 1, 1921. This note I sold to Mr. J. E. Nichols and I will turn over to you the said note in a few days as it is in Santa Cruz and I have sent for it but it has not arrived as yet and when it comes I will return it to you so this will act as a receipt in full for the same. I am giving you this letter so that you and J. E. Nichols can transact your business without delay. Yours truly, Edith M. Heard."

Still later Nichols wrote below Mrs. Heard's signature: "The above said note is paid in full. J. E. Nichols."

Within a month after Mrs. Heard had signed the paper quoted above, her attorney, Mr. Netherton, met Nichols in Santa Cruz and had a talk with him, and later repeated the conversation to Mrs. Heard. Thereupon such court proceedings were commenced that later Mr. Netherton had a talk with Tate. In that conversation Mr. Netherton testified:

"I asked him if he didn't know all the time that he was dealing with Mr. Nichols, that Nichols had defrauded Mrs. Heard out of many thousands of dollars. He said he did."

In the same conversation Mr. Netherton said:

"In my opinion, Mr. Tate, you have no title to that property [the Sunnyvale property] whatever, but the deed which you hold is a forgery for the reason that I have ascertained that Mr. Nichols erased his name from the deed and wrote yours in."

In another place Mr. Netherton testified regarding the same conversation:

"We discussed at this conversation the matter of the deal by which Mr. Tate came into possession of the Santa Cruz property, and Mr. Tate said at that time that he told Mr. Nichols when that deal was done that he hadn't favored putting that deal over on a widow woman, and that he couldn't understand why Mrs. Heard wanted the Manteca property, and that Nichols' reply was that Mrs. Heard was going to let him farm; that was the reason they wanted the Manteca property. * * * I asked Mr. Tate if it wasn't a fact that he had office room for some time with Mr. Nichols and if he didn't know his unsavory reputation; he said he had ascertained it while he was in the office and that his friends had told him of the unsavory reputation of Nichols and advised him to get out of the office, which he said he had done."

Estrelle E. Heard, called as a witness in her own behalf, testified that the agreement of exchange when signed by herself and mother had a blank space, and that the passage which we have mentioned above authorizing Nichols to keep for his own use any portion of the properties owned by Mrs. Heard which were listed in the agreement and which he was not compelled to turn over to Roddick was not on the paper at the time she and her mother signed it, and that the passage was inserted afterwards over their signatures. She further testified that her mother had so much confidence in Nichols that she did not read the instrument before she signed it. She would guess at them. She took his word for them. As to the alteration of the deed, she testified that in a conversation between Mrs. Heard and the defendant the defendant stated that he "thought, to save the expense of making a new deed and revenue stamps and so forth, he would insert his name in the deed."

Mrs. Edith Heard testified that at one time Nichols said that he put one over on Roddick; that the contracts which he gave him were not worth the paper they were written on. She also testified that Nichols did not pay to Roddick anything excepting the $15,000 mortgage, although Nichols represented to her that he was to pay Roddick the mortgage and $3,825, consisting of the other properties which we have mentioned above, or the equivalent thereof. She also testified that the defendant had stated to her that the change in the deed "was simply done in regard to save expense in making out a new deed; they [Nichols and Tate] did not see what difference it made." She stated that she had signed papers in blank for Nichols, but, on being asked if the agreement to exchange was one of those papers, she answered that she did not believe it would be one of them.

The defendant Tate took the stand in his own behalf, and testified that the change in the deed, made by erasing the name of Nichols and inserting the name of Tate, "was initialed by the same initials as the notary who had acknowledged Mrs. Heard's signature. * * * There appeared on the margin the initials of either Mrs. Heard or the notary." However, the deed being presented, no initials appeared on the margin thereof.

If the trial court believed Miss Heard as a witness, he was entitled to draw the conclusion that Nichols made large amounts of secret profits while acting as the agent of Mrs. Heard, and that among the profits which he attempted to so acquire was the note in suit. If the trial court believed the testimony of Mr. Netherton, then the trial court was bound to reach the conclusion that Tate knew all the time that he was dealing with Nichols that Nichols defrauded Mrs. Heard out of many thousands of dollars. If the trial court took into consideration that during all of these times Tate and Nichols occupied the same office, and if it took into consideration all of the other circumstances which we have enumerated, certainly the trial court was at liberty to infer that among the other properties which Tate knew Nichols had obtained by fraudulent means the note in suit was one of the items. For these reasons Tate stood in no better position than Nichols. It is patent, therefore, that the trial court made no error in making findings 3, 4, and 6, the findings complained of.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

O'CONNELL v. JUDNICH et al. (Civ. 5106.)

Attorney and client ⚡58—Constitutional law ⚡87—Enactment, prohibiting disbarred attorney from personally appearing in court in his own behalf, held unconstitutional.

Code Civ. Proc. § 300, prohibiting disbarred attorney from appearing in his own behalf as plaintiff, in action where subject has been assigned subsequent to entry of judgment of disbarment, held unconstitutional interference with right to lawfully acquire and protect property guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Daniel O'Connell against Antone Judnich and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, pro. per.

J. E. Manning and Wilford H. Tully, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action for money had and received.

What is described as a bill of particulars forms a part of the complaint. Recitals contained therein allege Anna M. O'Connell to have been the owner of certain real property which, together with all her right, title, and interest thereto and therein, she assigned to the plaintiff. Other recitals are to the effect that, with full knowledge of such facts, defendants have collected certain rents and sold the property, in consequence of which there is in their hands a total sum of $4,321.91, to which plaintiff is entitled. The complaint concludes without a prayer.

Defendant Antone Judnich demurred upon numerous grounds. At the same time a motion was filed to strike the complaint from the files upon the ground that plaintiff was a disbarred attorney, and as such, under section 300 of the Code of Civil Procedure, had no right to prosecute the action. This motion was granted by reason of a judgment of disbarment at that time existing against plaintiff, who now appeals from the final judgment entered upon such order.

The section of the Code invoked reads as follows.

"No person who has been an attorney and counselor shall, while a judgment of disbarment or suspension is in force, appear in his own behalf as plaintiff in the prosecution of any action where the subject of said action has been assigned to him subsequent to the entry of the judgment of disbarment or suspension."

This act became effective August 17, 1923. The original complaint, it is admitted, was filed prior to the time when the act took effect, but the amendment to the complaint was filed subsequent thereto and on the 31st day of August, 1923. It is here urged that the judgment of dismissal was erroneous and void, for the reason that the section involved is violative of several sections of the federal and state Constitutions. In this contention we are of the opinion that appellant is correct.

Mr. Kerr, in an editorial note to the section in his Annotations to the Code of Civil Procedure, states that the provision is thought to be plainly unconstitutional (1) as class legislation and (2) as invading a fundamental right guaranteeing to every citizen the right to personally conduct his own business if he so desires.

The very first section of the Constitution of this state declares that all persons have certain inalienable rights, among which are the rights to acquire and protect property. The right to acquire and protect property must of necessity include the right to use all proper and legal means to accomplish those ends. While the Legislature may in its discretion, for the public good, regulate the pursuit of a remedy, it cannot thereby destroy the right. One of the prime objects of the courts is to protect the constitutional rights of the citizen. To say that one may not defend his own property is a usurpation of power by the Legislature. If by legislation a right vouchsafed by the Constitution could be so abridged or limited, the right would not be an absolute or inalienable one, but a mere privilege revocable at the will of the lawmaking body.

It is suggested by respondent that to permit appellant to act as his own attorney in the pursuit of his property is to permit him to do by indirection that which he has been directly forbidden to do.

While the right to practice law is not a constitutional right but rather a mere statutory privilege, the plaintiff here does not purport to be practicing law. He is not acting as an attorney. One acts as such only when he represents another, not when he appears for himself. Appellant, having the right to lawfully acquire property, has under the Constitution the equal right to its perfect enjoyment, and, as a necessary incident to that right, the full power accorded to all of appearing in person to prosecute or defend all actions for its protection or preservation. Philbrook v. Sup. Ct., 111 Cal. 31, 43 P. 402. In so far, therefore, as the section purports to prevent one from personally appearing in a court of justice in pursuit or defense of a constitutional right, whether of person or property, it must be regarded as unconstitutional.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

GILMORE v. PEARSON, Treasurer.
(Civ. 4931.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞108—Salary of one elected after passage of ordinance increasing salary but before taking effect of ordinance under referendum law not increased.

Under Act Jan. 2, 1912, amended Act May 3, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 319), ordinance increasing city clerk's salary was not effective until 30 days after final passage, notwithstanding there was no petition for referendum, and under Const. art. 11, § 9, and Municipal Corporation Act, § 855 (St. 1909, p. 148), increase in salary of city clerk elected after passage but before it became effective would not be allowable, but his salary would be that fixed by the former ordinance; the constitutional and statutory inhibition not being rendered inapplicable by the fact that the mischief sought to be remedied thereby would not exist, where the ordinance was passed prior to the office holders' election.

2. Municipal corporations ☞108—Ordinance has no validity as a law during period when it remains subject to referendum.

Ordinance has no validity as a law during period when it remains subject to referendum.

3. Municipal corporations ☞164—Provisions against increase in salary of officer after election require law fixing compensation to be in force at date of election.

Const. art. 11, § 9, and Municipal Corporation Act, § 855 (St. 1909, p. 148), prohibiting increase of compensation of officer after his election, means that the law fixing the officer's compensation must be in force at the date of his election.

Application for writ of mandate on petition of Paul Gilmore against Richard W. Pearson, as Treasurer of the City of Whittier, to compel payment of salary as City Clerk. Writ denied.

William M. Hiatt, Edmund H. Hinshaw, and Ralph F. Graham, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Arthur G. Wray and Moore & Woods, all of Whittier, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, commenced in this court, to compel respondent, as treasurer of the city of Whittier, to pay to petitioner, the city clerk of that city, the sum of $600, which he claims to be due him as salary for two months commencing, respectively, April 21 and May 21, 1924.

The city of Whittier is a city of the sixth class, organized under the general laws of this state relating to municipal corporations. At the general municipal election held April 14, 1924, petitioner was elected to the office of city clerk for the term commencing April 21, 1924. Prior to his election the board of trustees, by an ordinance adopted by it and approved by its president on February 9, 1920, had fixed the salary of the city clerk at the sum of $150 per month. Thereafter, on April 7, 1924, an ordinance was adopted by the board of trustees and approved by its president whereby the salary of the clerk was increased to the sum of $300 per month. No referendum petition was ever presented to the board protesting against the passage of the last-mentioned ordinance. Petitioner claims that under the terms of that ordinance the salary of the city clerk was increased from $150 to $300 per month, and that therefore he should be paid for the two months in question a total sum of $600.

[1] It is contended by respondent that the ordinance passed by the board of trustees and approved April 7, 1924, did not take effect until 30 days after its passage; that it became effective, therefore, after petitioner's election and during his term of office; and that for this reason the increase in salary did not and does not apply to him, because section 9 of article 11 of the state Constitution declares that:

"The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office."

A similar provision is contained in that part of the Municipal Corporation Act which relates to cities of the sixth class; it being declared in section 855 of that act that:

"The clerk, treasurer, marshal, and recorder shall severally receive, at stated times, a compensation, to be fixed by ordinance by the board of trustees, which compensation shall not be increased or diminished after their election, or during their several terms of office." Stats. 1909, p. 148.

The act providing for direct legislation by cities and towns—the act of January 2, 1912, as amended by the act approved May 3, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 319)—provides for the enactment of ordinances by the initiative method, and also for a referendum upon ordinances passed by the legislative body of a city or town. In the provisions dealing with the referendum we find the following:

"No ordinance passed by the legislative body of a city or town [with exceptions which are inapplicable to the present case] shall go into effect before thirty days from its final passage"; and if, during such 30 days, a petition signed by the requisite number of qualified voters, protesting against the passage of the ordinance, be presented to the legislative body of the city or town, the ordinance "shall thereupon be suspended from going into operation," and it shall be the duty of the legislative body to reconsider the ordinance, and, if it shall not thereupon entirely repeal the ordinance, the legislative body shall submit it to a vote of the electors at a regular municipal election or at a special election to be called for that purpose, "and such ordinance shall not go into effect or become operative unless a majority of the voters voting upon the same shall vote in favor thereof."

Without citing any authority to sustain his position, petitioner advances the novel contention that the ordinance which increased the city clerk's salary "was merely in a state of suspended animation during the thirty days necessary for the invocation of the referendum," and that upon the failure of the electors to take the steps necessary to procure a referendum vote the ordinance immediately took effect as of the date of its passage—April 7, 1924. Wherefore he claims that the increase of salary was in force prior to his election and before the commencement of his term of office. The claim is devoid of merit. The act providing for direct legislation unequivocally declares that no ordinance of this character shall "go into effect" before 30 days from its final passage. An ordinance speaks for the first time when it goes into effect. Until then it is not a law and has no force for any purpose.

[2] "A statute has not, ex proprio vigore, any force until it becomes a law of the land, and that is when, by its terms, it takes effect." Gilbert v. Ackerman, 159 N. Y. 118, 53 N. E. 753, 45 L. R. A. 118, 120. "A statute must be understood as beginning to speak the moment it takes effect, and not before." Price v. Hopkin, 13 Mich. 318. See, also, Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 145, 8 P. 813. "It must have the same construction as if passed on the day when it took effect." Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 135, 136. "It was as though the Legislature was in session on the day the act took effect and passed the law on that day." Nickerson v. Winslow, 22 Wyo. 259, 138 P. 184, 140 P. 834. "The act of March 9th did not in terms prescribe when it should take effect, and hence did not become a law [italics ours] until the sixtieth day thereafter." Santa Cruz Water Co. v. Kron, 74 Cal. 223, 15 P. 772. "* * * An ordinance or statute during the period when it remains subject to referendum, has no validity as a law." Cline v. Lewis, 175 Cal. 320, 165 P. 916. "The decisions are uniform in this state that, until the time arrives when it is to take effect and be in force, a statute which has been passed by both houses of the Legislature and approved by the Governor has no force whatever for any purpose, and all acts purporting to have been done under it prior to that time are void." Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 76, 82 P. 677. Mr. Bishop lays down the general rule in the following language:

"A statute which is to become a law at a future date is a nullity in the meantime, and does not even operate as notice to persons to be affected by it, nor does a repealing clause in it put an end to the law to be repealed." Bishop, Stat. Crimes, § 31.

"A law speaks for the first time when it goes into effect. Whether it has a retroactive effect depends not upon when it speaks, but how it speaks. This act of 1911 does not speak retroactively." Walker v. Lanning, 74 Wash. 253, 133 P. 462.

[3] In the light of reason and of the above authorities the operative effect of this ordinance must be determined as of the time when it became a law; i. e., when it went into effect, which was 30 days after its passage. Until then the ordinance, notwithstanding its "final passage" by the board of trustees, had not become a law and had no force. Until it became a law, the compensation fixed for the office of city clerk remained at the sum at which it had been fixed by the ordinance of February 9, 1920—the sum of $150 per month. It follows, therefore, that the increase in the city clerk's compensation took place after, and not before, petitioner's election and the commencement of his term of office, and that, as to him or any other incumbent during the term for which petitioner was elected, the old ordinance measures and determines the compensation to be paid the city clerk.

It next is contended by petitioner that neither section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution nor the corresponding provision in section 855 of the Municipal Corporation Act is applicable for the reason that, so it is claimed, the mischief sought to be prevented by the inhibition of the organic law and of the statute is not a possibility where, as here, the ordinance increasing the compensation is passed prior to the office holder's election. This argument was put forward by counsel in Harrison v. Colgan, supra, and was decided adversely to petitioner's contention. Our Constitution expressly declares that its provisions are mandatory and prohibitory. Whatever may have been the reason for the inhibition, the people in their Constitution and the legislators in their statutory enactment have declared, in terms plain and positive, that the compensation of a municipal officer shall not be increased after his election. This means that the law fixing the compensation must be in force at the date of the officer's election. "The Constitution," says the court in Cline v. Lewis, supra, "clearly implies that there must be a law in force, fixing the compensation of every county and township officer at the date of his election." In Harrison v. Colgan, supra, the court says:

"But, in any event, the Constitution plainly forbids an increase during the term, and no exception is made in favor of a law passed before the term begins, but not in force until afterwards." See, also, Woods v. Potter, 8 Cal. App. 46, 95 P. 1125.

It follows from the foregoing that no incumbent of the office during the term for which petitioner was elected is entitled to receive the increase in compensation provided for in the later ordinance.

The alternative writ of mandate is discharged and the peremptory writ is denied.

MATOT et al. v. INGLEWOOD SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4918.)

Schools and school districts  32—Territory outside of city of sixth class, when annexed to city, becomes part of city school district.

Under Pol. Code, § 1576, as amended by St. 1917, p. 208, territory outside of city of sixth class, when annexed to such city, becomes part of the school district comprised by the city to which the territory is annexed.

Application for a writ of mandate by Bertha Klumpf Matot and another, minors, by A. Frances Matot, their guardian ad litem, and others, against the Inglewood School District of the County of Los Angeles, and W. W. Hodgkins and others. Writ granted.

Kenneth E. Matot, Marshall Stimson, Noel C. Edwards, and W. C. Hintze, all of Los Angeles (Allen, Allen & Eagan, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioners.

Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, of Los Angeles, and J. H. O'Connor, Asst. County Counsel, of Hynes, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The city of Inglewood is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, within the county of Los Angeles, and prior to August 22, 1924, its boundaries were admittedly coterminous with those of the Inglewood school district. On that date certain territory lying within the limits of Jefferson school district, and embracing the residence property of petitioners, was annexed to the city of Inglewood. After said annexation the above-named minors enrolled as pupils of Inglewood school district, but respondents ejected them therefrom on the ground that they were pupils of the Jefferson district, and not entitled to attend the Inglewood school. An alternative writ of mandate issued herein, based upon a petition alleging the foregoing facts and a stipulation of the parties that the annexed territory is still a part of the Jefferson school district, unless such annexation had the effect of removing the same therefrom and adding it to Inglewood school district.

Petitioners contend that, by virtue of said annexation to the city of Inglewood, the respondent school district was similarly extended, and therefore that they no longer reside in the Jefferson district, and they invoke the provisions of section 1576 of the Political Code as authority for their alleged right to attend school in the respondent district. The part of said section here involved reads as follows:

"Every city or incorporated town, except cities and towns of the sixth class, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, shall constitute a separate school district which shall be governed by the board of education or board of school trustees of such city or incorporated town; provided, however, that in no instance shall the territory within an incorporated city of the sixth class be in more than one school district."

The italicized proviso was added to said section in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 208), prior to which amendment the section did not apply to cities of the sixth class, but every other city or incorporated town constituted a separate school district, unless subdivided by its legislative authority. Following the addition of the prohibitory clause, said section, not only excepted cities of the sixth class from permissive legislative subdivision for school purposes, but expressly forbade that territory embraced in a city of the sixth class should be in two or more school districts. And said act of 1917 contains a further significant provision:

"That whenever a city or town shall be incorporated, except a city or town of the sixth class, the board of supervisors of the county may annex thereto, for school purposes only, the remainder, or any part of the remainder, of the district or districts from which such city or incorporated town was organized, whenever a majority of the heads of families residing therein shall petition for such annexation."

If, therefore, respondents are correct in their theory that the annexed territory is not now in the Inglewood school district, it must follow that, under the provisions of the statute as amended, it is no longer in any school district, since, if embraced in the Jefferson district, the city of Inglewood, since the annexation, lies within two districts, and this cannot be, under the prohibition of the provision above quoted. If we read the whole statute, of which the quotation from section 1576 Political Code is a part, it appears to have been intended that neither municipal nor county legislative authority may extend the limits of a city of the sixth class, without extending the boundaries of the single school district which must be coextensive with it. A further consideration opposed to respondents' contention is that, if an original school district be not enlarged to embody added territory, annexation to a city of the sixth class would be impossible, though expressly authorized by statute.

Petitioners rely upon Mitchell v. Henry, 184 Cal. 266, 269, 193 P. 502, 503, wherein the question here presented was not decided, but the Supreme Court said it would be reasonable to conclude that the prohibition against more than one school district in a city of the sixth class is limited to the matter of forming school districts, and does not extend to a forbidding of the creation or extension of a city when such creation or extension will happen to have the purely incidental effect of causing the territory of the city to be divided between two school districts. It was therefore further said, however:

"In the second place, a not unreasonable construction of the code section is that by it the annexed territory is upon annexation ipso facto taken out from the school district of which it was before a part and made part of the district of which the city is either the whole or a part. This, in fact, would seem to be the probable effect in the case of the annexation of territory to a city other than one of the sixth class. Such cities have each as a part of its municipal organization a school department. Even in the absence of any express statute on the matter, it would seem likely on the principle declared in Petition of East Fruitvale Sanitary District, 158 Cal. 453, 111 P. 368, that it would not be permitted that the municipal school organization and an entirely distinct school organization should both function within the same municipality at the same time, and that the annexed territory by virtue of the mere fact of its annexation would pass under the jurisdiction of the municipal school department. It would seem probable that this would also follow from the language of the code section under consideration that 'every city * * * except cities and towns of the sixth class * * * shall constitute a separate school district.'

"It may be said that the reason for the distinction which the portion of the section just quoted makes between cities of the sixth class and others is that the former do not have school departments as parts of their organizations, and that for this reason likewise the rule of the Sanitary District Case mentioned would not apply to such cities. This is true, but it might well be replied that the prohibition of the section on a city of the sixth class being in more than one school district means that nevertheless the same rule shall apply as to it, so that, when territory is annexed to it, it follows as an incident that the territory becomes a part of the same school district as the city."

From the provisions of the law quoted, and others to which it is not necessary here to make reference, it is apparent that the Legislature intended to provide a system by which school districts should be made coterminous with the boundaries of other municipal entities. To be sure, the board of supervisors is given authority in certain classes of cities to provide otherwise, but this exception only emphasizes the general rule. There is sound reason for such a policy. The further consideration, of procedure for annexation, and for taxation, present themselves, whereby the qualified electors of a municipality, and of the proposed addition, declare by ballot whether or not they shall unite in a common interest and assume common burdens for the maintenance of a larger municipality. After annexation electors residing in the new territory become residents of the city, subject to taxation of their property for street, school, sanitation, and general funds (Laws 1917, p. 1664, c. 796, § 1, subd. 9); Frankish v. Goodrich, 157 Cal. 613, 108 P. 685. Should the petitioners be required to attend school in the Jefferson district, they would be debarred from the privilege of educational facilities which they are by statute required to join in financially maintaining, because residing within the Inglewood district and municipality, subject to taxes for such purposes, while the latter district would reject them, and the Jefferson district would be obligated to receive and educate pupils from an outside district who are no longer under obligation to contribute toward its support through taxation.

Respondents set up various contingencies which might arise to confront persons of school age remaining in outlying territory should it be held that the annexation had the effect of transferring to Inglewood school district pupils residing within the area annexed. For instance, it is said, suppose such action had left the Jefferson district without a schoolhouse, or that the supervisors should fail to provide facilities for those whom the annexation did not transfer. But, as was said in People v. Rinner, 52 Cal. App. 757, 199 P. 1066, the outlying territory would be subject to the authority of the board of supervisors, and we must assume that they would take the proper action. The consensus of all the authorities in this and other jurisdictions supports the policy of affording to those residing within the limits of a city or a county, and paying for the establishment and maintenance of its public institutions, the benefits of those advantages in preference to persons from outside who are under no civic obligations to such political subdivision.

The case of Frankish v. Goodrich, supra, is authoritative as to the issue presented in the instant proceeding. A comparison of the statutory provision in force at the time that case was decided with the law as it is now shows that no change has been made which would affect the issue here involved. In the statutes of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1340) we find the words, "except cities and towns of the sixth class," inserted where they now are, and in 1917 the clause that "in no instance shall the territory within an incorporated city of the sixth class be in more than one district." In that case it appeared that the city of Upland, a municipality of the sixth class, was incorporated in 1906, and its boundaries included certain territory formerly embraced within the school district of the city of Ontario, which was also a city of the sixth class. The Ontario district having previously established a high school and constituted itself a high school district which included all of the territory embraced within the Ontario school district, the school authorities of the two cities, because of the absorption of a portion of this latter district within the boundaries of the new city of Upland, sought to maintain said high school as the Ontario-Upland high school district. A resident taxpayer of Ontario high school district petitioned the superior court of San Bernardino county for an order restraining the trustees of the two school districts from acting as a union high school board, and from exercising authority or control over the property or funds of the Ontario high school district. The Supreme Court there said:

"It is unquestioned that the outside territory formerly belonging to the Ontario school district, upon its inclusion within the boundaries of the city of Upland, became a part of the Upland school district. Pol. Code, § 1576; Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 P. 1067; Bay View School District v. Linscott, 99 Cal. 26, 33 P. 781; Kramm v. Bogue, 127 Cal. 122, 59 P. 394. But while it is admitted that the outside territory formerly belonging to the Ontario school district ceased to be a part of that school district by its inclusion within the boundaries of the Upland school district and became a part of the Upland school district, nevertheless it is insisted that this territory is not severed from the Ontario high school district, as distinguished from the Ontario school district; that it still remains a part of the Ontario high school district, subject to its burdens and entitled to its rights; and that by virtue of this, through some method not defined in appellants' brief, it is declared that 'by operation of law there was thus created the Union high school district composed of Upland school district and Ontario school district.'

"But a reading of section 1670 of the Political Code and of the other sections bearing upon the question make it manifest that a high school district, so far as its territorial limits are concerned, is not a distinct entity from the school district. * * *

"The contention that the portion of the Ontario school district now belonging to the Upland school district is still subject to taxation for the support of the Ontario high school district, and that therefore it must continue to be a part of the Ontario high school district, is without foundation in law. The territory is no longer subject to taxation in the Ontario high school district, but in the Upland school district alone."

It is thus definitely asserted that, where under the law when existing territory outside of a city of the sixth class is annexed thereto, it becomes a part of the school district comprised by the city to which the territory is annexed. It is true that in the case under consideration a high school district was involved, as distinguished from the school district in the instant proceeding, but as the opinion above quoted holds, so far as territorial limits are concerned, the high school district and the school district are not distinguishable. With the authority of this decision before us, it remains only to be adjudged as to whether or not the clause excepting cities of the sixth class and the additional prohibitory clause have made a change in the law which would have altered the decision in the former case.

At that time the statute read:

"Every city or incorporated town, * * * unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, shall constitute a separate school district which shall be governed by the board of education or board of school trustees of such city or incorporated town."

The apparent idea of the Legislature in subsequently inserting the provision, "except cities and towns of the sixth class," was to treat such cities as unincorporated territory for the purposes in question. This is indicated by other provisions of the school law and the absence of legislation relating to such municipalities.

As the law read when thus changed, territory within a city of the sixth class could be annexed to that of another school district, and also it could be divided so that a portion of its area might be placed in one school district and a portion in another. But the undesirability of permitting a city even of the sixth class to be divided is apparent. It may have been emphasized by the cases of Scott v. San Mateo County, 27 Cal. App. 708, 151 P. 33, and Petition of East Fruitvale Sanitary District, 158 Cal. 453, 111 P. 368. At any rate, in 1917 the Legislature added the provision that in no instance should the territory within an incorporated city of the sixth class be in more than one school district. If under the law as it stood at the time of the decision in Frankish v. Goodrich it was held that the provision that every city or incorporated town should constitute a separate school district, etc., resulted in the conclusion that where territory was added to a city it ipso facto became a part of the district comprised by the city, the conclusion is irresistible that a prohibition against territory within an incorporated city of the sixth class, being in more than one school district, must produce the same result. The purport of the former provision was to prevent territory within an incorporated city from being in more than one school district. It is true that, in addition to this, it carried an inhibition against the territory of an incorporated city being in a school district outside of the city itself, but that is immaterial here.

I am of opinion that the annexation brings petitioners within the Inglewood school district, from which it follows that they are entitled to attend school in the district in which they reside.

Let the peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J. We concur in the judgment on the ground that the question presented is concluded by the provisions of section 1576 of the Political Code as amended in 1917.

In re BACKESTO'S ESTATE.

KENNEDY et al. v. HOUSTON et al.

(Civ. 5100.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1925.)

1. Wills ⚡531(1)—Rule as to determination whether legatees are to take per capita or per stirpes, stated.

In ascertaining whether legatees are to take per capita or per stirpes, the intention of the testator, reached only by an examination of the language used as applied to all the surrounding circumstances and conditions present in testator's mind at time will was written, is the determining factor.

2. Wills ⚡531(3)—Children of named brothers and sisters of testator and testator's wife named in will held to take per capita and not per stirpes.

Under will giving surviving wife life estate, and providing that on wife's death proceeds of property "shall be equally divided, except as otherwise specified, between the children of" named brothers and sisters of testator and of testator's wife, and that children of named person "shall have only one-half the amount of the other children mentioned," the children on distribution of proceeds take per capita and not per stirpes; the word "among" being substituted for the word "between."

3. Wills ⚡634(14)—Remainder held to vest at time of testator's death.

Under will giving surviving wife life estate, and providing that on wife's death proceeds of property "shall be equally divided, except as otherwise specified, between the children of" named brothers and sisters of testator and of testator's wife, and that children of named person "shall have only one-half the amount of the other children mentioned who are benefited by this will," a remainder vested in the children at time of testator's death; the devise being a "testamentary disposition to a class," within Civ. Code, § 1337, in view of sections 1310, 1341-1343.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John P. Backesto, deceased. Proceeding by Mary J. Kennedy and others against John P. Houston, etc., and others, to determine succession to estate. From separate portions of decree rendered, Sadie Seaton Wagner and George W. Hazzard separately appeal. Affirmed on Hazzard's appeal, and reversed on Wagner's appeal, with directions.

See, also, 63 Cal. App. 265, 218 P. 597.

NOURSE, J. John P. Backesto died testate on March 17, 1890. In his will he gave to his wife a life interest in all his estate and provided that, after her death, the property should be sold and the proceeds equally divided among the children of certain brothers and sisters of decedent and of decedent's wife, excepting the children of the decedent's brother Henry, who should receive only one-half of the amount of the other children mentioned. The testator's wife died on January 2, 1918. Thereafter this proceeding was instituted under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, to determine the succession to the estate. The trial court held that the bequest of the will was made to the beneficiaries as a class composed of all the children of the persons designated living at the time of the death of the testator's wife and that they should all take equally per capita, except that each of the four children of the brother Henry should receive only one-half of the amount taken by each of the other children. It was then found that 22 children were entitled to take under this ruling—18 in equal portions, and each of the 4 children of Henry in one-half of the portion of the others. The estate was then divided into fortieths and each of Henry's children was awarded one-fortieth and each of the remaining 18 children was given two-fortieths.

From this decree, Sadie Seaton Wagner, who was a daughter of Irene Seaton, a daughter of Jacob, brother of testator, appeals on the ground that the trial court erroneously excluded her from participation in the estate when it found that the bequest to her mother, Irene Seaton, lapsed upon her mother's death in 1908, prior to the death of testator's wife. Another appeal is prosecuted by George W. Hazzard, a son of a sister of testator's wife. He assigns as error the finding that the beneficiaries should take per capita instead of per stirpes. By stipulation both appeals are to be heard on the same record. The appeals are presented on the judgment roll which contains the stipulation of facts upon which the cause was heard.

The pertinent portions of the will, which was an olographic one, are that—"I, John P. Backesto, of San Jose, California, do hereby bequeath, or will to my beloved wife Anna E. C. Backesto, all my property, real and personal, during her natural life, to own the same. * * * *After her death, the property shall be sold, and the proceeds shall be equally divided, except as otherwise specified, between the children of Jacob Backesto. * * * Between the children of (other designated brothers and sisters of testator and of testator's wife). The children of Henry Backesto, of Shiloh, Richland county, Ohio, shall have only one-half the amount of the other children mentioned, who are benefited by this will, by virtue of him (Henry Backesto) having received a legacy, from our uncle. * * * Within one year after the death of my wife, the executors, shall sell the property, and divide the proceeds within three years, between the heirs as above specified.*" (Here follows an explanation of the different forms of spelling the name of testator by other members of the family.) (Emphasis ours.)

[1] Directing our attention first to the Hazzard appeal, which attacks the ruling that the distribution should be per capita and not per stirpes, we find little aid in the cited cases because none of them involve the same state of facts. In a case of this kind, the intention of the testator is the determining factor, and this can be reached only by an examination of the language used as applied to all the surrounding circumstances and the conditions present in the mind of the testator at the time the will was written. In re Pearsons, 99 Cal. 30, 34, 33 P. 751. The general rule of interpretation is stated in 40 Cyc. 1495, as follows:

"A devise or bequest to the children of two or more persons, whether expressed as to the children of A. and B., or to the children of A. and the children of B., or to other relatives of different persons, usually means that such children or relatives shall take per capita and not per stirpes unless it is apparent from the will that the testator intended them to take per stirpes."

Mr. Jarman, in his work on Wills, says:

"Where a gift is to the children of several persons, whether it be to the children of A. and B., or to the children of A. and the children of B., they take per capita, not per stirpes. The same rule applies, where a devise or bequest is made to a person and the children of another person; or to a person described as standing in a certain relation to the testator, and the children of another person standing in the same relation. * * *" 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) 1051, p. 205.

[2] The significant portions of the Backesto will are that—

"After the death of his wife "the property shall be sold and the proceeds shall be equally divided, except as otherwise specified, *between the children of Jacob, * * * between the children of Rebecca, * * * between children of Maria Hazzard, deceased, only one of whom is now known to be living, * * * between the children of David. * *  The children of Henry * * * shall have only one-half the amount of the other children mentioned who are benefited by this will. * * * Within one year after the death of my wife, the executors shall * * * divide the proceeds * * * between the heirs above specified."

The confusion in the language of the will arises from the repeated use of the word "between." In its strict grammatical sense, the preposition "between" is used when applied to two things or two groups of things. When more than two are referred to, the word "among" is more properly used. However, the use of the word "between" as applying to more than two is not uncommon; in fact, the failure to make this distinction between the words "between" and "among" is quite common. It is plain that the testator did not use the word with this grammatical distinction because, if he had, he would not have said "between children of Maria Hazzard" when only one was known to be living; nor would he have said "between the children of Jerome B. Conwell" when Jerome had but one child. It seems clear that the word was used in the sense of "among," particularly as the same word is used later in the will with this meaning when the testator directed his executors to divide the proceeds "between the heirs as above specified."

If we substitute "among" for the word "between" in the clauses naming the various beneficiaries under the will, as well as in this later clause, we find a clear direction to divide the proceeds equally "among" the children of the brothers and sisters mentioned except as to the children of Henry, and they would then take per capita. Precedents supporting this interpretation of the will are found in Estate of Morrison, 138 Cal. 401, 404, 71 P. 453; Estate of Fisk, 182 Cal. 238, 240, 187 P. 958; Neil v. Stuart, 102 Kan. 242, 169 P. 1138, 1139; Kean's Lessee v. Hoffecker, 2 Har. (Del.) 103, 29 Am. Dec. 336, 343; Hill v. Bowers, 120 Mass. 135. It seems apparent that the testator intended to divide his property equally among the children of the brothers and sisters named—among his nephews and nieces irrespective of the number in each family—and that he made no provision for and drew no distinction between any of these brothers and sisters, or between any of his nephews and nieces, except the children of Henry and the three others who are expressly omitted from the will. If he had intended to favor the children of one brother or sister over those of another, it would have been a simple matter to have done so.

The case of Neil v. Stuart, supra, is closely analogous on the point under consideration. There the testatrix gave her entire estate to her husband during his lifetime "and at his death the property is to be sold, and divided as follows: Among my brothers' and sisters' children, and David R. Neil, and Andrew Neil, also Lulu Keith, equally." In interpreting the will, the court says:

"Does the will compel the construction adopted by the trial court that the sisters' children take per stirpes? * * * David and Andrew she knew and Lulu she knew, but the children of the brothers and sisters the testatrix apparently did not know and certainly did not name. * * * The only proper construction to be given to the language now under consideration is that each nephew and niece of the testatrix was intended to share equally with the three other devisees, all to take per capita. * * * It would not be deemed natural or reasonable from any language found in the instrument or from any circumstance shown to conclude that she wanted one of the nephews or nieces to have a greater or lesser share than any other, all of whom she must have had in mind when she directed that the proceeds of the property were to be divided among them and the other devisees 'equally.' If one sister should have five children at the death of the testatrix, and another one, there is nothing to indicate that Jennet intended the one to have as much as the five. The language and circumstances indicate that she regarded her nephews and nieces, the one step-niece and the two nephews by marriage, as the equal objects of her benefaction."

For the reasons given we are satisfied that that portion of the decree holding that the division should be per capita, and on which the Hazzard appeal is based, should be affirmed.

The Wagner appeal is from that portion of the decree which held that the gifts did not vest until the death of testator's wife and that the gift to appellant's mother, a daughter of Jacob, a brother of the testator, lapsed because of her death prior to the death of testator's wife. In the consideration of this appeal the following dates are of interest: February, 1889, execution of the will; March, 1890, death of testator; November, 1896, death of brother Jacob; January, 1908, death of Irene Seaton, mother of appellant; January, 1918, death of testator's widow.

This appellant contends that as Irene Seaton was living at the time of testator's death and was one of the children of Jacob mentioned in the will, her title to her share of the proceeds of the estate vested in her on the death of the testator and passed to the appellant and her brother as the heirs of her mother who died intestate. This appellant points out that the trial court found that the bequest in the will was a bequest to "a class composed of all the children of the several persons designated." She disagrees with the conclusion of the trial court that the bequest was available to those children only who were "living at the time the bequest took effect," i. e., "at the time of the death of the testator's widow."

The appellant rests her case on the provisions of section 1337, Civil Code, which reads, "A testamentary disposition to a class includes every person answering the description at the testator's death; but when the possession is postponed to a future period, it includes also all persons coming within the description before the time to which possession is postponed," and on section 1341, Civil Code, which reads, "Testamentary dispositions, including devises and bequests to a person on attaining majority, are presumed to vest at the testator's death." Reference may also be made to section 1342, reading, "A testamentary disposition, when vested, cannot be divested unless upon the occurrence of the precise contingency prescribed by the testator for that purpose," and section 1343, reading, "If a devisee or legatee dies during the lifetime of the testator, the testamentary disposition to him fails, unless an intention appears to substitute some other in his place, except as provided in section thirteen hundred and ten." Section 1310, which is referred to in the section last quoted, provides that if the devisee dying during the life of the testator is a child or other relation of the testator his lineal descendants shall take the estate given by the will.

All these sections show the unmistakable intention of the statutory law to declare that a devise or bequest shall vest at the testator's death unless some other intention is expressed in the will. This policy has been recognized and approved by the California decisions. Williams v. Williams, 73 Cal. 99, 102, 14 P. 394; In re De Vries, 17 Cal. App. 184, 190, 119 P. 109; Miller v. Oliver, 54 Cal. App. 495, 498, 202 P. 168; Estate of Campbell, 149 Cal. 712, 717, 87 P. 573. The same rule is approved in 23 R. C. L. pp. 530, 535; Doe, etc., v. Considine, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 458, 475, 18 L. Ed. 869; and McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 340, 378, 5 S. Ct. 652, 28 L. Ed. 1015; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 382; and numerous other authorities which we deem it unnecessary to cite. It is accepted as a settled principle by such text-writers as 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 841; 2 Williams on Executors (7th Ed.) p. 1344; Alexander on Wills, § 996; Minor on Real Property, § 749; and Tiedeman on Real Property, § 302. It has thus become a fixed policy in the interpretation of clauses of this nature found in a will that a disposition to a class includes every person answering the description at the testator's death, and that the estate vests in them as they come in esse though the possession is postponed to a future period.

A brief has been filed in behalf of some of the respondents in opposition to the Wagner appeal. None of the California cases cited therein are opposed to this view. Estate of Rogers, 94 Cal. 526, 29 P. 962, Estate of Winter, 114 Cal. 186, 45 P. 1063, and Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 108 P. 287, all construed wills which made dispositions contingent upon the survival of the beneficiary at the date possession was to be transferred. The other authorities cited are of similar import or arise in jurisdictions not having statutory law such as we find in our Civil Code.

[3] After all, cited cases are of little help when the point to be determined is the intention of the testator. An examination of the entire will convinces us that the testator intended to group all his nephews and nieces on both his own and his wife's side, except those expressly excluded, into one class to be the equal objects of his benefaction. He gave his wife a life estate but declared that after her death the property should be sold and the proceeds divided between the children "benefited by this will" and repeated that after her death the proceeds should be divided "between the heirs as above specified." This language indicates a present intention to devise the remainder to the nephews and nieces specified in the will, and the will must, therefore, be held to be "a testamentary disposition to a class" within the meaning of section 1337, Civil Code. As such the interest of the devisees would vest at the testator's death, and the appellant herein would be entitled to take by right of representation of the estate of her deceased mother.

There is no dispute as to the facts involved in the proceeding, and the findings of the trial court are sufficient to support a decree as prayed by this appellant.

The portion of the decree embraced in the Hazzard appeal is affirmed; the portion embraced in the Wagner appeal is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a decree in accordance with the views expressed herein.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

EHLERS v. BIHN et al. (Civ. 2889.)

(District Court of Appeals, Third District, California. March 2, 1925.)

1. Principal and agent ⇨173(3)—Finding that defendant approved contracts sued on and accepted assignments from agent executing them held warranted by evidence.

Evidence held to warrant finding that company, sued for purchase price of grapes, approved contracts signed by alleged agent and accepted assignments thereof in accordance with agreement with agent.

2. Sales ⇨176(5)—Buyer, not rejecting nor objecting to grapes not conforming to contract until long after delivery, precluded from objecting after they decayed.

Buyer not rejecting nor objecting to different variety of grapes from those purchased until long after their delivery on railroad platform, where it left them until they decayed, could not object thereafter.

3. Sales ⇨195—Buyer held not relieved from liability by inability to get refrigerator cars because of railroad strike.

Buyer not canceling contract nor extending time for delivery of grapes, as authorized in case of inability to get refrigerator cars because of railroad strike in progress at time of purchase, but allowing seller to deliver grapes on railroad platform, held not relieved from liability for purchase price because of inability to get such cars.

4. Sales ⇨176(5)—Seller of grapes entitled to judgment for purchase price, in absence of proof or objection to receipt of grapes as not conforming to statutory standards.

In absence of proof contradicting evidence that grapes sold were in good condition, suitable for eastern market, or objection to receiving them as not conforming to standards required by Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act, seller was entitled to judgment for purchase price.

5. Evidence ⇨60—Presumption that law was obeyed.

In absence of evidence to contrary, presumption is that law was obeyed.

6. Evidence ⇨219(1)—Buyer's shipment of part of grapes purchased admission of conformity to statutory standards.

Buyer's shipment of part of grapes purchased is in nature of admission that they conformed to requirements of Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act.

7. Sales ⇨181(11)—Findings that buyer failed to use due diligence in marketing grapes, and that loss resulted therefrom, held supported by evidence.

Evidence that buyers notified seller on October 5th to pick grapes, which were ripe early in September, and delivered boxes on October 7th, held sufficient to support findings that they did not use due diligence in marketing grapes and that loss thereof resulted from such failure.

8. Evidence ⇨317(4)—Question to seller as to conversation with buyer's agent before execution of contracts held not objectionable as calling for hearsay.

In action for purchase price of grapes, question to plaintiff, as to conversation with defendant's agent before execution of contracts, held not objectionable as calling for hearsay.

9. Appeal and error ☞237(2)—Objection to testimony as attempt to vary terms of written contract not available in absence of motion to strike out answer.

Objection that seller's testimony, as to statement by buyer's agent before execution of contracts, that buyer would sell grapes locally in case of car shortage, was attempt to vary terms of written contract by parol evidence, held not available, in absence of motion to strike out answer.

10. Appeal and error ☞1051(1)—Admission of testimony as to statement of buyer's agent that person signing contract was buyer's manager held not prejudicial error.

Admission of seller's testimony as to statement of buyer's agent that person signing contract was buyer's manager held not prejudicial, if error, in view of conclusive evidence that contracts were made in buyer's behalf and approved by it and that it accepted assignment thereof by agent.

11. Principal and agent ☞120(1)—Testimony that buyer instructed agent to take contracts for grapes at guaranteed price held properly admitted.

Testimony that buyer instructed agent to take contracts for grapes at guaranteed price held properly admitted in seller's action for price, in view of agreement between buyer and agent that latter was to handle business in manner prescribed by buyer.

12. Trial ☞333—Verdict held not contradictory in respect to amount awarded.

Verdict "in the sum of $762.50 dollars. Seven hundred sixty-two & fifty cents," held not defective as contradictory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Anna Ehlers against C. L. Bihn and the Associated Fruit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Glenn West, of Lodi, and D. L. Beard, of Napa, for appellants.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants filed separate notices of appeal from the judgment herein in favor of plaintiff. The parties have stipulated that the appeals be consolidated and that the same may be heard and determined on a single record.

The defendant Associated Fruit Company is a corporation which maintains offices in several cities. In so far as concerns the transactions involved in this case, its principal office is in the city of Fresno. At the time of those transactions and for several years prior thereto, the defendant Bihn was engaged in the business of buying and shipping fruit at the city of Napa. In the year 1922 the company and Bihn agreed to cooperate in buying and shipping fruit produced in Napa county and certain adjacent territory. They reduced their agreement to writing in the form of a letter signed by the company, dated July 7, 1922, addressed to Bihn and accepted by him in writing, as follows:

"This confirms our understanding with you whereby you are to work with us exclusively for the balance of the season 1922 in the soliciting, buying and shipping of fruits and vegetables, except as herein otherwise provided. It is agreed that you will not operate in any other territory except Napa county and to and including Cordelia, Solano county. You are to solicit in our name, but you are to buy in your name subject to our approval and immediately assign such contracts to us. You are to demand and receive written acknowledgment of every contract assigned to us immediately after you have closed such contract with growers or others with our approval. * * * We are to have the sale of any fruit that you may secure or buy as stipulated herein. The profits or losses are to be divided 30% credited or charged to your account—70% credited or charged to our account. You are to pay all of your own expenses including the expense of any agents that you may employ, * * * we are to pay all of our over-head expense, including the expense of Mr. Lacey and any office assistance that he may require. * * * It is agreed that we furnish shook and loading material at cost, your account to be charged with 30% of the cost of any carry-over. * * * It is distinctly understood that you are not to act as our agent in the purchase of fruits and vegetables under this agreement and that we shall not be held responsible for any of your acts unless approved by us in writing. It is understood that you agree to handle business covered by this agreement in a manner as may be prescribed by us from time to time, excepting as herein otherwise stipulated. * * *

Mr. Lacey, whose name is mentioned in the contract, appears to have had at least general supervision over the company's office at Napa, and he signed checks in behalf of the company in payment for fruit purchased by Bihn under the latter's contract with the company. The company and Bihn "jointly" established an office in the city of Napa with an office sign containing the names of both the company and Bihn. In carrying out his part of the agreement Bihn employed several men to go out among the grape growers and solicit contracts for the purchase of their grapes, among them being G. E. Tobin and Walter Rossman. Under his direction they distributed among the growers attractive blotters, on which the company's name was printed in large letters between beautifully colored clusters of grapes, and proceeded, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, to "solicit" in the company's name, and, after leading the grower up to the selling point, to "buy" in Bihn's name. In this manner Bihn entered into contracts with approximately 100 growers. Standard forms of contracts were used and they were executed in triplicate, the name of the company not appearing therein. One copy was left with the grower, one with Bihn, and the third was sent to the company for approval. The company mailed its copy back to Bihn with a "characteristic" hieroglyphic crayon mark in the lower left-hand corner, which was probably intended to be the initial of some person's name, carelessly written. Bihn treated these marks as approvals of the contracts on which they appeared. He testified:

"The papers would come back from the Associated Fruit Company. They would have that on them. * * * I would go right ahead shipping grapes. * * * I received likely every contract approved and a list of them in a letter, which was also received, something like that."

He did not preserve the letters. The growers were given company checks in payment for their grapes. The company furnished the growers boxes in which to pick their grapes. Some of the boxes were stamped with the company's name, others were not.

Rossman called on plaintiff at her residence and said, according to plaintiff's testimony, "that he was soliciting or buying, as you would say, grapes for the Associated Fruit Company," and gave her and her son some of the company's blotters. He said that the Associated Fruit Company would buy the black grapes and ship the white grapes on consignment. Thereafter, about the first of September, Tobin called on plaintiff, gave her a company blotter, and said that he was representing the company. He made three or four calls before plaintiff agreed to sell her grapes. Finally on the 8th day of September, Tobin presented two contracts for plaintiff's signature in which Bihn's name appeared as buyer. To plaintiff's inquiry as to the use of Bihn's name in the contracts instead of that of the company, Tobin replied, "That is all right, that is just the manager." Plaintiff then signed the contracts which follow. Printed forms were used, the italicized parts being written in pencil. The black-grape contract reads as follows:

"This certifies that Ana Ehlers * * * has sold all wine grapes all the fruit crops hereinafter specified that buyer shall find suitable for eastern markets during the year 192— on the following described premises: 15 acres Delivered at St. Helena Variety Petit Syra Price per ton 85.00 Quantity—Tons 25 The seller agrees to pick and deliver all of said fruit at his own expense, in good condition, entirely free from mildew, or smut, or rain, or sand damage, and free from any damage whatsoever, and at the times directed by the buyer. The buyer agrees to pay for said fruit upon completion of delivery thereof and presentation of weigh-tags therefor, at the office of the buyer at Napa, California. In the event of a strike, quarantine, boycott, embargo, fire, or failure of transportation companies to provide refrigerator cars, directly or indirectly affecting buyer's ability to perform this contract, buyer may cancel this contract, or extend time of delivery for a period equal to that so lost. * * * This said contract shall be subject to any state or federal law or laws, rule or rules, regulating food products and the distribution thereof, and the crops herein purchased shall comply with any and all such laws, rules and regulations. This contract is understood by the parties hereto to constitute an immediate sale, transferring title to buyer, but until delivery has been completed, seller agrees to, and does, assume all risks of loss, depreciation or damage, of whatever kind or nature, to any undelivered part of said crops. * * * Time is of the essence of this agreement, and no understanding other than herein expressed shall vary or modify this transaction."

The white-grape contract contained the following covenants:

"Anna Ehlers, hereinafter called the grower, hereby places the entire crop of white grapes grown on the property known as the Mount View being the property of Anna Ehlers grower has privilege of disposing of white grapes if she can get higher price for the season of 1922, good quality, suitable for eastern market, in the hands of C. L. Bihn to pack and market for the grower's account on the following terms and conditions: buyer to guarantee shook and freight charges and $30.00 per ton. Said fruit to be picked and delivered at grower's expense to the packing house provided by shipper at St. Helena, California. C. L. Bihn to receive for furnishing all material and labor in packing and loading said crop of fruit the general rates in force during the current season. C. L. Bihn shall have the right to sell said fruit to the best possible advantage, and shall receive for its services in marketing said crop 10 cents per package, plus selling expense at destination, together with all transportation, refrigeration, revenue tax, collection and other charges advanced by it. C. L. Bihn agrees to use due diligence in marketing said fruit for all the parties hereto. * * * This contract shall not be revocable during its term."

[1] It was admitted at the trial that the company received one of the triplicates of each contract "about the time they bear date." They were returned to Bihn with the characteristic crayon mark in the lower left-hand corner. The original exhibits have been transmitted to this court. Nothing appears upon the grape contracts to show that Bihn assigned them to the company. Relative to the assignment of the black-grape contract, he testified as follows:

"Q. Did you make any written form of assignment of that contract to the Associated Fruit Company? A. Yes, it is indorsed, signed on the back in my name. * * * It was on the original."

There was properly admitted in evidence, over the company's objection, a paper, marked "copy" on the face thereof, in which the plaintiff is "called the seller" and the "Associated Fruit Company" the buyer, bearing the same date and containing substantially all the terms and descriptions of the black-grape contract, and signed "Anna Ehler" and "Associated Fruit Co., by C. L. Bihn." In the lower left-hand corner are the words, "Approved by —, Officer of A. F. Co." In the blank space appears the aforesaid crayon mark. Bihn testified that he received this paper from the company. Neither he nor plaintiff affixed their respective names thereto. He testified that he mailed copies of all grape contracts to the company and received in reply documents in approximately the form of the foregoing paper. The company made no effort to explain the significance of such documents or of the crayon marks thereon and on the copies of the grape contracts which were signed by plaintiff and Bihn. Neither was there any denial of Bihn's testimony to the effect that he assigned the grape contracts to the company. These were all matters peculiarly within the power of the company to prove or disprove, and, in view thereof, a fair inference from all of the foregoing evidence is that the company approved the contracts and accepted the assignments thereof in accordance with the terms of its original agreement with Bihn. Under the circumstances shown by the evidence, it is immaterial in whose name the grape contracts were executed. Both defendants were interested therein and entitled to the benefits thereof and they both assumed and must bear its burdens. Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 P. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63; Robinson v. Rispin, 33 Cal. App. 536, 165 P. 979.

[2] Plaintiff delivered four truckloads of black grapes, which were shipped by defendants and for which the company paid her. It appears that the defendants did not have a packing house at St. Helena but received the grapes purchased by them on the north end of the Southern Pacific platform. Thereafter she delivered two more truckloads of black grapes, of which the defendants shipped 45 boxes and made no objections to the remainder on any ground, but left them on the platform until they were unfit for shipment. While on the platform these grapes were kept covered, presumably by defendants, to protect them from the weather. In this lot, packed in separate boxes, there were about 600 pounds of a different variety of black wine grapes from those purchased but of a higher market value. They were not rejected and no objection was made to them until long after their delivery. Some of the same variety were included in the first shipment. After they had decayed while in defendants' possession, it was too late to object.

[3] Appellants contend that, on account of a railroad strike, they were unable to get refrigerator cars in which to ship this lot of grapes, and that therefore they are not liable. Under their contract with plaintiff they were given the right in such a case to "cancel this contract, or extend time of delivery for a period equal to that so lost." They did neither, but allowed plaintiff to deliver the grapes to them, and, of course, it was then too late either to cancel the contract or extend the time of delivery. The strike was in progress at the time the grapes were purchased and continued through the grape-picking season. The defendants therefore had ample opportunity to cancel the contract or postpone delivery until they could secure cars.

[4-6] It is contended that plaintiff was not entitled to judgment because there was no proof that the grapes were of the quality required by the California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act (Stats. 1921, p. 1234). The testimony shows that the grapes were in "good condition," "excellent condition," and "suitable for eastern market." There was no proof to the contrary, nor was any objection made by defendants to receiving them on the ground that they did not conform to such standards. The facts are unlike those in MacRae v. Heath, 60 Cal. App. 64, 212 P. 228, where the evidence showed positively that the fruit there in question did not conform to the required standards. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is that the law has been obeyed. The fact that defendants shipped a part of the grapes is in the nature of an admission that they conformed to the requirements of the act.

[7] Plaintiff testified that the white grapes were ripe early in September, and that during that month she frequently asked Tobin for boxes in which to pick them and requested that they be shipped immediately. Bihn testified that the company finally sold the white grapes, and that on the 1st day of October he gave Tobin orders to deliver boxes to plaintiff in which to pick the grapes and to instruct her to pick them. Arrangements had then been made for a car in which to ship them. Tobin did not communicate this information to the plaintiff until October 5th. A load of boxes was delivered to her October 1st and another October 7th. On the 2d of October .20 of an inch of rain fell; .81 on the 3d; and .03 on the 4th. The 5th, 6th, and 7th were clear. On the 8th .04 of an inch of rain fell; .04 on the 9th; .62 on the 10th; and .06 on the 11th. Plaintiff testified that she picked eight or nine tons of the white grapes before the rain which commenced on the 8th of October, and that the white grapes were not damaged by the rains which had theretofore fallen. She picked the remainder after the later rains and delivered all of them on the Southern Pacific platform, the last load being delivered October 14th. The defendants refused to accept them and they became a total loss. The testimony shows that the white grapes were in good condition prior to the rain commencing on the 8th. Bihn testified that normally the season for shipment of grapes of the variety described in the white-grape contract ended about October 20th. The white-grape contract contains no clause excusing performance by the buyer in the event of a strike or inability to obtain cars, but the buyer therein "agrees to use due diligence in marketing said fruit." If it be conceded that the defendants used due diligence up to the 1st of October, when they had succeeded in getting a car, their notice to plaintiff on the 4th to pick her grapes and the delivery of the boxes on the 7th did not constitute due diligence, in view of the lateness of the season and the length of time which had elapsed after the grapes were ripe and ready for shipment. It cannot be said that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the defendants did not use due diligence in marketing the grapes and that the loss thereof resulted from such failure on their part.

[8-10] Plaintiff was asked, in direct examination, to relate a conversation she had with Rossman before she signed the contracts. Counsel for the company objected on the ground that such conversation was hearsay and not binding upon the company. The objection was overruled and the witness testified that Rossman said that in the event of a shortage of cars the buyer would sell them locally. Counsel for the company then objected on the further ground "that it is an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract by parol evidence." Counsel for plaintiff thereupon withdrew the question. The question was not subject to the first objection and no motion was made to strike out the answer. Plaintiff was asked if Tobin made any statement "about the name of Bihn" when the contracts were presented to her for signature. Counsel for the company objected "on the ground that it is an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract." The objection was overruled and the witness answered that she asked Tobin concerning the use of Bihn's name in the contract and that Tobin replied: "Oh, that is all right; that is just the manager." The pleadings raised no issue of fraud or mistake, but if it be conceded that the objection should have been sustained, the evidence shows so conclusively that the contracts were made in behalf of the company and that it approved them and accepted an assignment thereof that no prejudice could have resulted from the admission of the testimony.

[11] It is urged that the court erred in admitting testimony to the effect that the company instructed Bihn to take contracts for white grapes at a guaranteed price. The agreement between the company and Bihn provided that he was "to handle business covered by this agreement in a manner as may be prescribed" by the company. The evidence therefore was properly admitted.

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find for the plaintiff and against both defendants above named, in the sum of $762.50 dollars. Seven hundred sixty-two & fifty cents."

Appellants contend that—

"The verdict is contradictory. In one place it says it is for over seven hundred dollars and, in another place, that it is for like number of cents."

The criticism is hypercritical.

The contention that the court erred in giving and refusing instructions is sufficiently disposed of by what has already been said in considering the defendants' liability under the facts stated. Other contentions made are without merit, and it is unnecessary to further extend this opinion by a discussion of them.

The judgment is affirmed as against both defendants.

PEOPLE v. CRAIG. (Cr. 2742.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 13, 1925.
Rehearing Denied May 11, 1925.)

1. Jury ⚡85—Court is vested with discretion in determining competency of juror.

A court is vested with a wide discretion, in determining whether juror has shown himself competent or disqualified to serve in trial of case.

2. Jury ⚡103(11)—Where juror could disregard opinion formed, it is not abuse of discretion to disallow challenges for bias.

It is not an abuse of discretion to disallow challenges on ground of bias, where juror, who entertained strong opinion wholly founded on rumors and newspaper statements, stated that he could set aside opinions formed.

3. Criminal law ⚡1158(3)—Court's decision as to competency of jurors is conclusive, where jurors' answers are contradictory.

Trial court's decision as to competency of juror is conclusive, where juror makes inconsistent statements on voir dire.

4. Criminal law ⚡1166½(8)—Erroneous disallowance of challenges for cause is not prejudicial, unless defendant desired to use additional peremptory challenges.

An erroneous disallowance of a challenge for cause is not prejudicial, even though defendant finally exhausted his peremptory challenges, if it does not appear that he had occasion to, or desired to, use an additional peremptory challenge, or that the jurors finally accepted were not entirely satisfactory to him.

5. Criminal law ⚡730(8)—District attorney's argument held cured by instructions.

Where district attorney in argument challenged the genuineness of a birth certificate introduced to show accused to be under 22 years, and called upon jury to observe defendant's appearance in determining whether he was not over 22, held that instructions given immediately, and again in main charge, that statements made by counsel were not evidence and, unless sustained by evidence, should be disregarded, cured any possible prejudice.

6. Witnesses ⚡359—Manner of proving prior conviction stated.

The usual manner of proving a prior conviction is to ask witness if he has not been convicted of a felony, and, if he denies that he has been so convicted, to produce a copy of the judgment of conviction, and, if he answers in the affirmative, he may then be asked of what specific crime he was convicted.

7. Witnesses ⚡359—Certified copy of judgment of former conviction of felony is admissible to show specific felony of which conviction was had.

Where witness admitted on cross-examination that he had been convicted of a felony, it was proper, at the close of cross-examination, to admit a certified copy of judgment of conviction rather than to elicit from witness specific felony of which he had been convicted.

8. Homicide ⚡311—Instruction that jury's discretion in fixing punishment for first degree murder is not arbitrary is proper.

Instruction that jury's discretion in fixing punishment for first degree murder, under Pen. Code, § 190, is not an arbitrary discretion, but is limited to a determination of which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter punishment should be imposed, is proper.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Charles Craig was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Johnson, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., Fred C. Pugh, Dist. Atty., of Red Bluff, and Curtiss E. Wetter, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Corning, for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The defendant and one Baker were jointly charged by an information filed against them with the crime of murder, which consisted of having killed and murdered with malice aforethought, on July 10, 1924, in the county of Tehama, this state, one Samuel Hermanson. On the morning of the trial, and before the jury was impaneled, defendant Baker withdrew his former plea of not guilty and entered a plea of guilty of murder of the first degree, and was subsequently sentenced upon said plea to life imprisonment in the state penitentiary. Upon the trial of this defendant, Charles Craig, the jury returned a verdict of murder of the first degree against him without recommendation, which verdict carried with it, under the law of the state, the imposition of the death penalty. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, and the judgment of the court imposing the death penalty, this appeal is taken. The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment is not questioned, and it will not be necessary to state with minute detail the facts and circumstances which conclusively establish the guilt of this defendant, and the guilt of his associates in crime as well.

On the morning of July 10, 1924, shortly after the Bank of Tehama, located at Red Bluff, Tehama county, had opened its doors for business, the defendants Charles Craig and Jack Baker entered said bank and by the use of fear compelled its teller, Frank C. Joy, to place within a satchel, which Craig carried, currency and coin, the property of said bank, aggregating the sum of $1,906.31. Baker exhibited no deadly weapon, and it is claimed that he had none at this time, but Craig displayed a pistol to the teller, which he held in such a way as to be partially concealed from the view of the few persons who chanced to be in the bank at the time, and, in whispering tones, and in a threatening manner, gave the teller to understand what his mission was at the bank. Craig took the satchel and its contents and with his associate left the bank, and both leaped into a blue painted Hudson automobile, badly weather-stained, which they had parked near the bank building, and began their flight from the scene of the crime.

The news of the robbery was immediately broadcasted by telephone service, messengers, and word of mouth, to farm and ranch houses and public places such as could be reached along the highways leading out of the county, describing the defendants and the automobile in which they were traveling with instructions to apprehend all such persons as might be reasonably suspected of the commission of the crime. The route taken by the bandits, a short way out of Red Bluff, became very rough in spots, and, after they had traveled about 26 miles easterly from Red Bluff, the rear right wheel of their automobile was entirely wrecked, and they were forced to abandon it by the roadside. They then continued their flight easterly on foot, and, after traveling about 2 miles further, they met the deceased, Samuel Hermanson, who was driving his Ford runabout, and was traveling westerly towards Red Bluff, in response to a message descriptive of the persons and the automobile, which he had received from the sheriff's office informing him of the bank robbery, and requesting him to apprehend such strangers as might answer to the description sent out. Hermanson resided at the Lyman ranch, which was situate a few miles east of the point on the road at which he accosted the defendant and Baker. Before leaving the Lyman ranch to join in the search, Hermanson placed a loaded automatic rifle in his Ford runabout, and buckled a holster containing his revolver and also an ammunition belt containing cartridges about his person.

Defendant Craig had changed his clothing from dark to light colored apparel near the place where the Hudson machine had been abandoned. The Hudson machine was not within sight of the locality where Hermanson met Craig and Baker. Craig observed Hermanson slowing down his car as he approached them, and anticipated that he would interrogate them in connection with the crime. They halted; Craig taking a position on the north side of the road, and Baker stepped to the south side of the road. Craig was the first to speak, and he asked Hermanson where they could obtain water and what the distance was to the nearest garage. Hermanson then told them of the bank robbery and expressed doubt as to Craig and Baker being the persons wanted, as they did not seem to fit the description sent out, but he decided, nevertheless, to take them into Red Bluff. Both expressed a willingness to go. He made an incomplete search of both, holding his revolver in his hand while doing so. Craig carried his coat on his arm and his revolver, which was in the inner pocket of his coat, was overlooked by Hermanson. His engine had stopped, and as he got into the car he asked them to crank it, but each responded that he did not know how to crank a car. Hermanson then got out and cranked the car, got back into it, placed the rifle at his right side and the revolver between his limbs, handle up, with the barrel resting on the cushion of the seat. He directed Craig and Baker to take positions on the running board. Craig stepped on the right running board and Baker on the left. As Hermanson threw the car into gear, Baker, so he claims, upon signal from Craig, grabbed the revolver, and Hermanson attempted to grab the rifle at his right, but Craig had also grabbed it, and a struggle ensued for the possession of the arm. Hermanson was shot five times in a brief space of time, any one of the wounds, except possibly one, would probably have proved fatal. His lungs, liver, and the abdominal cavity were pierced by bullets as the struggle for the rifle ensued, and as a finale of the assault he was deliberately shot 2 inches above the right eye by Craig; the weapon having been held near to his head, the bullet entering the brain and lodging against the rear wall of the skull. The physicians testified that in their opinion death instantly followed. Some of the wounds upon his body were inflicted by shots aimed by Baker. During the struggle the automobile, which had been set in motion and which was unguided, left the road and traveled over rough, rocky ground, and plowed its way through chaparral, and landed against a barbed-wire fence, after breaking down a fence post, and then stopped. The engine had ceased running. Hermanson's body, stripped of the pistol, holster, ammunition belt, and cartridges, was ruthlessly thrown from the car and the machine was appropriated by the bandits. They again set out on their way, but the car was without water, and the gasoline was low. The personal effects of Hermanson of a tell-tale character were disposed of along the roadside as they traveled. All were afterwards recovered. Two neighbors of Hermanson had been informed by him but a short time before his death of the robbery, and they also went in the direction that Hermanson had gone in pursuit of the robbers, and to give assistance to Hermanson if need be. The neighbors, who were driving a Ford automobile, were overtaken by Craig and Baker on their return trip home. Upon being questioned, the bandits said to them that they were on their way to Reno. The robbery was casually referred to by them. Their car was steaming badly, and they inquired as to where they could get water. They were directed to the Lyman ranch, which was a few miles ahead of them, and, following directions, drew up at the Lyman ranch, the domicile of Hermanson. The two neighbors referred to became suspicious that these men were the bandits, and they followed closely behind them. They also drew up at the Lyman ranch house. Hermanson's automobile had been damaged and was not at once recognized by the workmen who were at the ranch when it was driven into the house yard. Craig asked for water, and was directed to a place where it was obtainable. His hands appeared to be unusually dark, and he washed them. The automobile seat was bloodstained and the cushion and top were bullet pierced. It bore other unmistakable evidence of the deadly struggle. It was soon discovered that Hermanson's name was upon the license plate inside the car. Craig and Baker were placed under guard and held until the arrival of the sheriff, which was shortly thereafter, and he took appellant and his associate into custody. The evidence against the bandits unfolded at once. They made several confessions of guilt and gave detailed statements of the manner in which the murder was executed. Further details of the deadly assault would serve no purpose except, possibly, to show that both Craig and Baker were guilty of a deliberate murder, committed in a vicious and merciless manner. The circumstances of its execution further shows that its perpetrators possessed wicked and malignant hearts.

[1-4] Appellant insists that the court committed reversible error by the denial of challenges made for actual bias at the trial of the cause to four certain jurors, which ruling compelled the defendant to exercise peremptory challenges upon said jurors, thereby reducing his peremptory challenges to that extent. Four other jurors were accepted after appellant's peremptory challenges had been exhausted, all of whom, it is now contended, would have been peremptorily challenged had appellant not been required to exhaust his challenges upon said jurors whom he claimed should have been dismissed from the jury upon his challenges for actual bias. There are two answers to this claim of error: First, the court is vested with a wide discretion in the exercise of its judgment as to whether a juror has shown himself or herself to be competent or disqualified to serve in the trial of a cause. We have examined the record as to the grounds upon which bias was predicated as to the four jurors upon whom peremptory challenges were used. While it is true that one of the jurors, at least, seemed to entertain a strong opinion, wholly founded, however, upon public rumor or statements in public journals or common notoriety, nevertheless said juror and the other three, upon crucial tests being applied by the court as to whether or not they could and would entirely set aside and disregard the opinions thus formed, answered in the affirmative. Even if we concede, upon an inspection of the record merely, that, had we been in the trial court's place, we would have allowed the challenges, yet we cannot say, under the decisions of this state, that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to have disallowed the challenges. The answers of these jurors to questions propounded both tended to show disqualifications—provided they fully understood the questions propounded—and also indicated competency to sit as jurors. The trial judge whose position for a proper determination of the question was superior to our own, which must be limited to a mere examination of the record, ruled that said persons were competent to act as jurors, and we are not convinced that his ruling constituted an abuse of discretion. Where there are inconsistent statements made by prospective jurors on voir dire, the decision of the trial court is conclusive. People v. Edwards, 163 Cal. 752, 127 P. 58; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 P. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; People v. Riggins, 159 Cal. 113, 112 P. 862; People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 371, 92 P. 853. Second, we have carefully examined the testimony given by the four jurors on voir dire who were accepted, and find that no objection was made or could have been made to their qualifications to serve as jurors in the case. The only information they had was clearly such as was founded upon public rumor, or statements made in public journals or common notoriety. Each of them was so clearly within the rule of qualification that no objection was made by counsel for the defendant to their competency to serve as jurors. By all of the authorities of this state touching like situations the rule is that an erroneous disallowance of a challenge for cause is not prejudicial, even though the defendant finally exhaust his peremptory challenges, if it does not appear that he had occasion to or desired to use an additional peremptory challenge, or that the jurors finally accepted were not entirely satisfactory to him. People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 P. 599; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 P. 920; People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 288, 123 P. 200, 8 Cal. Jur. 610. The above cases state the precise situation of the defendant in the instant case. In the case of People v. Kromphold, quoting approvingly from People v. Schafer, it is said:

"It is entirely consistent with the record that the twelve jurors who actually tried the case were absolutely satisfactory to defendant, and that he desired all of them to serve and would not have excused any one of them if he had been given the opportunity. After judgment, the contrary should not be presumed."

[5] The second point that appellant urges rises out of the alleged misconduct of the district attorney concerning his treatment, during his argument to the jury, of a birth certificate offered in evidence, by which it was claimed that defendant Craig was proved to be of an age not beyond 22 years. The certified copy of the birth record of defendant Craig, attested by the county clerk's record of the county of Calhoun, state of Illinois, was received in evidence as being the birth certificate of the defendant. It contained no certificate, however, by any presiding judge or justice of that county or state, that the attestation was in due form. The district attorney objected to it upon the ground that it was not properly certified to, but his objection was overruled. In his argument to the jury the genuineness of the certificate was challenged, and some caustic remarks were indulged in as to how it must have been obtained. In support of his position that it did not correctly state the age of the defendant, he called upon the jury to make their own observations of the defendant, and apply their human experiences in determining whether or not the defendant's age was not greatly in excess of 22 years. No objection was made at the time the alleged misconduct of the district attorney was committed. At the close of the district attorney's argument, the attorney for the defendant assigned, as misconduct on the part of the district attorney, the statements impugning the faith and credit that should be given to the certificate of birth. The court immediately instructed the jury that any statements made by either the district attorney or counsel for the defendant was not evidence in the case, and, unless such statements were sustained by evidence admitted by the court, it was the duty of the jury to disregard any such statements. This admonition was repeated again in the general instructions. We think the court's admonition cured any possible prejudice that may have accrued to the defendant. Whether or not the defendant was precisely 22, or had passed that age, was not a question of any great moment. The evidence shows him to have been the directing mind in the commission of both crimes. Admittedly he was 4 years beyond the age of 18, an age which subjected him to the full consequences of a willful murder. Again, the defendant was in the presence of the jury, and, if he had the appearance of having attained an age beyond that which the birth certificate indicated, the jury had a right to consider such a circumstance. If the challenge of the district attorney was without reasonable foundation the statements would have reacted upon the prosecution. We are of the opinion that the statement of the district attorney in this respect could not have influenced the jury to return a verdict different from the one which it found.

[6, 7] It is next urged that the court committed error in the admission of a certified copy of a judgment showing the conviction of the defendant of murder committed in the state of Iowa on March 30, 1917. The district attorney asked the defendant if it were not true that he was convicted at Spencer, Iowa, of murder in the first degree, in 1917 or 1918. The attorney for the defendant objected to the question and assigned it as misconduct. The court then informed the district attorney that he would permit him to ask if he had been convicted of a felony. The district attorney reframed his question, and asked the defendant if it was not a fact that on or about the 30th day of March, 1917, in Clay county, Iowa, he was convicted of a felony, and the defendant replied in the affirmative. The district attorney, at the close of the examination of the witness, offered a judgment of conviction, had against the defendant in the district court of Clay county, Iowa, on March 30, 1917, of murder of the first degree. This was objected to, but the objection was overruled. The usual manner of making proof of a prior conviction is to ask the witness who has suffered such a conviction if he had been theretofore convicted of a felony, and, if he denies that he has been so convicted, to produce a copy of the judgment of conviction, or, if he answers in the affirmative, he may then be asked of what specific crime he was convicted. People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 P. 697; People v. Eldridge, 147 Cal. 782, 786, 82 P. 442; People v. Fouts, 61 Cal. App. 242, 245, 214 P. 657. In this case the judgment of conviction was offered, rather than eliciting the same information from the defendant who had suffered a former conviction. We are not able to see that defendant could have possibly suffered injury by this ruling.

[8] Lastly, it is claimed that the court erred in giving an instruction which has been held by a long line of authorities not to be error. The instruction complained of is an amplification of section 190, Penal Code, which provides that the jury may, within their discretion, in case they find a defendant guilty of murder of the first degree, pronounce a sentence that will relieve him of the extreme penalty of the law—to which has been added with judicial sanction—that such discretion is not an arbitrary discretion, but is limited to a determination of which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed. The precise instruction, without repeating it, has been so often passed upon by this court within the past 2 years that it is only necessary to cite the authorities which hold that the giving of the instruction does not necessitate a reversal of the judgment. People v. Casade (Cal. Sup.) 230 P. 9; People v. Wolfgang, 192 Cal. 754, 221 P. 907; People v. Connelly (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 374; People v. Perry (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 890.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

SPONABLE v. DARE

(L. A. 7892.)

1. Executors and administrators §296—Executor not required by will to pay over to beneficiary of trust any portion of estate prior to decree of distribution.

Under will providing for certain bequests which executor was bound to pay under Civ. Code, §§ 1363-1368, and devising residue of estate in trust for named beneficiary, executor, who was also trustee, held not required to pay over to such beneficiary any portion of estate or income thereof prior to decree of distribution.

2. Executors and administrators §296—Immaterial that trustee named in will was also executor, in determining whether he was required to pay over to beneficiary any portion of estate or income prior to decree of distribution.

That trustee named in will was also executor was immaterial in determining whether, as executor, he was required to pay over to beneficiary any portion of estate or income thereof prior to decree of distribution, where in his capacity as executor he was not invested with title to property nor powers and duties devolving on him as trustee.

3. Executors and administrators §315(6)—Decree of distribution held not conclusive as between trustee and beneficiary.

Under will devising residue of testatrix's property on payment of certain bequests in trust for adopted daughter, decree of distribution held not conclusive on question whether any part of amount distributed to trustee belonged to beneficiary as income.

4. Wills §435—Will interpreted as though adopted daughter of testatrix was her natural offspring.

Will devising testatrix's property in trust for her adopted daughter, who appeared to stand in such relation to testatrix, would be interpreted as though such daughter was natural offspring of testatrix.

5. Wills §620—Will devising property in trust for testatrix's adopted daughter held a bequest for maintenance.

Will devising property in trust for testatrix's adopted daughter until she reached specified age constituted a bequest for maintenance of such daughter until such time as she should come into ownership and possession of entire residue of estate, where she had been supported by testatrix and her husband and had no means for her own support.

6. Wills §684(7) — Devise of property in trust for testatrix's adopted daughter held to take effect at testatrix's death.

Under devise of property in trust for testatrix's adopted daughter, constituting a bequest for maintenance beneficiary, held entitled to income from testatrix's death, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1368, 1369.

7. Trusts §274(3)—Commissions of executor and fees of his counsel held not chargeable against beneficiary's income from trust estate.

Under will devising property in trust for testatrix's adopted daughter, income therefrom was not chargeable with commissions of executor and fees of his counsel during administration of estate, in absence of a showing that substance of estate in hands of administrator was not ample for payment of such expenditures.

8. Trusts §274(3) — Unusual expense, enhancing value of capital of trust created by will, payable out of capital rather than income.

While regular annual and ordinarily recurring expenses incidental to administration of a trust created by will are payable out of income derived from its properties, unusual and extraordinary expenses, going to enhancement of value of capital itself, should be payable out of capital.

9. Trusts §274(3)—Unusual expenditures of trustee under will, in caring for corpus of estate, not chargeable against "income" payable to beneficiary.

Unusual expenditures by testamentary trustee, in caring for and preserving corpus of trust estate, and which benefited corpus of estate, held chargeable against corpus of estate and not income paid beneficiary, in view of Civ. Code, § 840, where her position was analogous to that of a life tenant; "income" being something produced by capital without impairing it, and which leaves property intact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Emma E. Dare, deceased, in which report and account of Frank W. Sponable, as trustee, was opposed by Doreene Dare. From an order disapproving report and account, trustee appeals. Affirmed, with directions.

Harry W. T. Ross, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

E. W. Squier and Schauer & Ryon, all of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order of the superior court in and for the county of Santa Barbara, disapproving in certain respects the report and account of one Frank W. Sponable as trustee under and by virtue of the will of Emma E. Dare, deceased, which said order was made and entered on July 18, 1923, pursuant to certain findings of fact and conclusions of law on that date made and filed in said court. The appeal is by said trustee, and presents to this court for its determination certain questions respecting the correctness of the conclusions of law of said court, which formed the basis of said order, and of the order itself. The facts are undisputed and are briefly these: Emma E. Dare died in the city of Santa Barbara on or about the 21st day of July, 1920, leaving estate therein and also in the state of Kansas, of which latter state she had been a resident prior to her becoming a resident of California shortly before her death. On June 3, 1920, she had made her last will, which was offered and admitted to probate in the county of Santa Barbara upon her decease therein. By the terms of her said will, after making certain specific bequests, she devised all the rest and residue of her estate to Frank W. Sponable of Paola, Kan., as trustee; or, in the event of his death prior to the death of the testatrix or of his failure or refusal to accept the trust, then to John L. Hunt of Topeka, Kan., upon certain trusts as set forth in said will, among which were the following:

"(a) To pay to my adopted daughter Doreene Dare, formerly Doreene Steer, all of the income thereof in equal monthly payments as nearly as may be until she, the said Doreene Dare shall reach the age of thirty-five years, and then on her thirty-fifth birthday to pay, assign, convey and turn over to her one-half of all of the property so held in trust, together with all of the income thereof, if any, which shall not theretofore have been paid to her as hereinbefore provided; and thereafter and after the thirty-fifth birthday of her, the said Doreene Dare, to pay to her in like equal monthly payments all of the income of the remainder of said trust property until she, the said Doreene Dare, shall reach the age of forty-five years, and on her forty-fifth birthday to pay, assign, convey and turn over to her, the said Doreene Dare, all of the remainder of said trust property, together with all of the income thereof which shall then have accumulated and which shall not have been theretofore paid over to her."

The will then proceeds to attempt to provide against any assignment of the income or principal of the devised property by Doreene Dare and against any attachment or garnishment being recognized or satisfied out of said property. The will then provides as follows:

"(c) In case the said Doreene Dare shall not survive the age of forty-five years, then I direct that the income from one-half of the property which shall have come into the hands of said trustee and shall still remain in his hands shall be paid to my great nephew Thomas Dare Ball of Darlow, Kansas, in equal quarterly payments until the said Thomas Dare Ball shall reach the age of twenty-five years."

The will then provides for the payment over to said Thomas Dare Ball of one-half of the substance of said property under certain contingencies, and further provides that, in the event said Thomas Dare Ball should not survive said Doreene Dare, and that the latter died before attaining the age of 45 years, the one-half of the property should go to two other relatives named, or the survivor of them. As to the remaining one-half of said property, it was, in the event of Doreene Dare not surviving the testatrix or not attaining the age of 45 years, to be turned over to a certain cemetery association for certain specified purposes; and in the event such association was not in existence, to her relatives to whom the other half of the property was to come, for like purposes. The will of the decedent was duly presented for and admitted to probate in said court by Frank W. Sponable, the executor named therein, and administration was thereafter had thereon and upon said estate; and thereafter in due course the said executor presented and filed his first and final account, together with a petition for the distribution of the residue of the estate to himself as the trustee named in said will and upon the trusts set forth therein. This account of the executor contained a detailed statement of the money and property of the estate which had come into his hands as such executor and of the expenditures made by him therefrom, of the claims which had been presented, filed, and paid, and of the balance of cash on hand and subject to distribution. A hearing was had upon said account and petition for distribution after due and legal notice thereof, and, there being no objection offered at said hearing to said account or to the decree of distribution of said estate as prayed for, the court proceeded to settle said executor's account and to make distribution of the residue of said estate. In so doing the court found that the said executor was entitled to an allowance of the sum of $1,058.56 for his commissions as such executor, and that his attorney of record in the probate of said estate was also entitled to an allowance of the sum of $1,058.56 for his fees as such attorney. The court directed the payment of these respective sums out of the estate in the hands of the executor, and further ordered and decreed that the whole of the residue of said estate subject to the payment of the above allowances be distributed to Frank W. Sponable as trustee and upon the trusts set forth in said will, and which were also set forth in hæc verba in said decree. The decree contained a specific description of the residue of said estate thus distributed, which showed as cash on hand and subject to such distribution the sum of $6,218.55, and which sum embraced and included whatever amounts of money had been received by the executor during his administration of said estate as the income thereof accruing between the date of the death of said testatrix and the date of such decree of distribution. This decree of distribution was filed and entered on January 30, 1922, and thereupon the said Frank W. Sponable received the whole of the residue of said estate as trustee in conformity with the terms of said decree of distribution. Thereafter, and on April 19, 1923, in response to a citation issued out of said court and in the matter of said estate, the said trustee appeared and filed his first account and report as such trustee. Notice was duly given of a hearing upon said account and report, and upon the date fixed for such hearing said Doreene Dare appeared and filed her exceptions and objections to the account and report of said trustee, wherein she set forth some sixteen separate and specific objections thereto and to the settlement and approval thereof. Thereupon, and on May 26, 1923, the said trustee filed a supplemental and more detailed statement of his receipts as such trustee. Thereupon the said Doreene Dare, on May 28, 1923, presented and filed her amended exceptions and objections to the account and report of said trustee. A hearing was had upon the issues as thus presented before the court, and, the matter being submitted the court, on July 18, 1923, filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law upon the said issues, and thereupon, and as a part thereof, entered its order and decree in the following terms, viz.:

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that said account and report as amended be and is hereby disapproved and disallowed by the court, and that said trustee be and he is required and directed to file forthwith a full and true account in accordance with the findings of fact and conclusions of law herein, showing the corpus of said estate and the income therefrom separately from the date of death of testatrix until the receipt of said trust fund by the said trustee, and that such further account show a full and true account in accordance with the findings of fact and conclusions of law herein from the time of said trustee's receipt of said trust fund to the date of the filing of said account and report as amended; and that said trustee pay over to the beneficiary and contestant, Doreene Dare, just as soon as it can be done without loss to the investments of the trust, the income received from said trust property from the date of testatrix's death to the date of distribution to Frank W. Sponable as trustee herein, without deduction therefrom of either the attorneys' or the executor's fees therein allowed for handling said estate or other expenses of administration of said estate; that said trustee pay over to the beneficiary and contestant, Doreene Dare, just as soon as it can be done without loss to the investments of the trust, the income received on said trust funds from date of distribution to Frank W. Sponable, as trustee, without deduction of the expenses found to be extraordinary and unusual expenses under paragraph 15 above, and including therein the part of said income which has been reinvested by said trustee; that said trustee pay over to the beneficiary and contestant, Doreene Dare, any other amounts found to be due her under his account, submitted in accordance with this decree, and in conclusions herein."

[1-3] From the foregoing terms of said order and decree, and from the whole thereof, the said trustee has taken and prosecutes this appeal. The appellant presents three points for our consideration upon this appeal: First, whether, after the decree settling the final account and distribution in the estate of Emma E. Dare has become final it can be modified by an order of the court making it in a collateral proceeding; second, whether the income to be paid to the said Doreene Dare commenced at the death of the testatrix or upon and after the date when the property passed into the hands of the trustee upon the distribution of said estate; third, an interpretation as to what is meant by "income" to be paid by the trustee to the said beneficiary—whether it is "net income" and subject to deductions for the expenses necessary to preserve and care for the substance of the trust estate, or whether the gross income shall be paid the present beneficiary without such deductions being first made by the trustee. The answer to the first of these questions leads to the primary inquiry as to whether the executor of said decedent's estate was bound by the terms of her said will to pay over to said Doreene Dare any portion of said estate or of the income thereof prior to or at the time of the decree of distribution of the residue of said estate. We look in vain for any provision of the will or of law which imposes such a duty upon him in his capacity as such executor. The will directs the executor thereof to pay the expenses of the decedent's last illness and funeral and to erect a suitable marker over her resting place. It then proceeds to make certain bequests of specific sums of money to be paid to the persons named as the recipients thereof. The executor was bound as a matter of law to provide for the proper administration of said estate and the payment of these bequests during the course thereof. Civ. Code, §§ 1363-1368. All the rest and residue of said estate was by the decedent devised to Frank W. Sponable as trustee under the trusts created by the terms of the decedent's said will. That said Frank W. Sponable was also the executor of the decedent's said will and of her estate is an immaterial incident, since in his capacity as executor he was invested with the title to none of the property nor with none of the powers and duties which were to devolve upon him upon the distribution to him of the entire residue of said estate in the capacity of such trustee. This being so, no issue was presented or presentable as to what portion of the income derived from the property of said estate the primary beneficiary of said trust would be entitled to receive from the trustee thereof, nor as to what date the right to such income or any portion thereof was to take its beginning, for the reason that no such trust had been cast upon Frank W. Sponable until the making and the entry of the decree of distribution of said estate to him in the capacity of such trustee. Had the executor failed or neglected to make a proper accounting of the property of said estate, or of the income thereof, or of the conservation of such income, he could doubtless have been compelled to do so at the instance of the beneficiary of the trust provided for in the decedent's said will, but beyond that she would not have been entitled to go in demanding the payment over to her of any portion of such income prior to the distribution of said estate, for the twofold reason that the entire residue of said estate, after the payment of the expenses of administration and of the specific legacies, was devised and hence to be distributed to said trustee, and that her right to be paid over any portion of such income could not arise until the legal relation of trustee and beneficiary had been established by the decree of distribution. It follows necessarily that nothing material to the questions here under consideration was concluded by the terms of the decree of distribution except the correctness of the executor's approved account and the amount of the residue of the estate to be distributed to said trustee. The correctness of the said decree of distribution is not challenged by this proceeding in either of the above respects, nor did the trial court, in making the order complained of upon this appeal, attempt in any particular to alter or vary the terms of said decree. No authority would seem to be required to reinforce these irresistible conclusions, but if any were needed it might be found in the very cogent language of the Supreme Court of Connecticut in passing upon a precisely similar question. Bancroft v. Security Co., 74 Conn. 218, 50 A. 735, 737. It follows that there is no merit in the appellant's first contention.

[4, 5] The second question presented by the appellant is as to whether the income, to be paid to said Doorene Dare as the primary beneficiary under the terms of the trust provided for in the decedent's said will, commenced as to the time of its allocation from the date of the decedent's death, or from the time of the coming of the property of said estate into the hands of the trustee, upon its distribution to him as such. This question involves an interpretation of the terms of the decedent's said will with respect to such income. It is to be noted that the said testatrix in her said will refers to Doreene Dare as her "adopted daughter," and the record otherwise shows that the latter stood in this relation to the testatrix. This being so, she is to be regarded, in attempting to interpret the terms of this will, precisely as though she was the natural offspring of the testatrix.

So regarding her, and looking to the other provisions of said will by the terms of which she is made the sole beneficiary and recipient of the income of the residue of the property of said estate coming into the hands of said trustee, we are constrained to the conclusion that the testatrix intended that the said provision in her will should constitute in effect a bequest for the maintenance of her adopted daughter until such time as she should come into the ownership and possession of the entire residue of her said estate under the other terms of her said will. In Estate of Mackay, 107 Cal. 303, 40 P. 558, wherein the testator bequeathed to his executors in trust the sum of $15,000, directing them to invest the same in such securities as they should deem advisable, and pay over the income thereof to one Hattie Schenck, housekeeper, during her life, the court held that the said provision in the testator's will amounted, in substance, to a bequest for maintenance. It was aided to this conclusion by proof that for several years prior to such provision the beneficiary thereof had been dependent for support and maintenance and had been supported and maintained by him. A similar showing was made in the instant case, the proof and the findings of the court being that the respondent herein was the adopted daughter of the decedent and of her deceased husband, and had been supported and maintained by her adopting parents prior to their death, and that she had no means of her own nor any other source of support or income than that provided by her said parents aside from her own earnings. The trial court expressly found that the trust provisions of the decedent's will were intended for the maintenance of respondent. We are of the opinion that this finding is fully justified by the terms of the decedent's said will and by the proofs before the court. The appellant herein strongly relies upon Estate of Brown, 143 Cal. 450, 77 P. 160, as in point in opposition to this conclusion. There are some points of similarity between the two cases, but the dissimilarity between that case and the case of Estate of Mackay, supra, and also of this case, furnish the essential points of differentiation between them. In the Brown Case the element of past dependence and support was lacking, but was present in both the Mackay Case and the case at bar. In the Brown Case also the element of relationship was wanting which is present in the instant case. In the Brown Case also the trial court found upon the evidence before it that the bequest was not one for maintenance, and this court on appeal sustained said finding upon the express ground that the evidence in the case was not before it on appeal. We therefore hold that the Estate of Brown is not in point upon this appeal.

[6] This brings us to the next inquiry, which is, conceding these provisions in the decedent's will to amount to a bequest for maintenance, to what date did its intended inception relate—that of the testatrix's death, or that of the investment of the trust in the hands of the trustee? By both reason and authority we are compelled to the conclusion that the respondent's right to the income to be derived from the trust properties must be held to have relation to the death of the testatrix. As to the reason of the situation, it would seem to follow that if, as we hold, the provision in said will and in the trust clauses thereof were intended by the testatrix to be in the nature of a bequest for the maintenance of her adopted daughter who, as has been shown, had no other means of support except that of her own exertions, and, also, as has been shown, such adopted daughter had heretofore been supported and maintained by her adopting parents during their lifetime, such intention ought to have relation to a time from and after the death of the testatrix, since by that means only could continuity of such maintenance be assured. This conclusion would derive additional and very cogent support from the fact that the adopted daughter of the testatrix is made primarily the sole beneficiary of the entire substance of the residue of the said estate under the terms of said trust. The foregoing reasoning and conclusion are fully supported by the authorities dealing with similar or analogous situations. In 40 Cyc., under the caption of "Income from Residuary Fund," it is stated as—

"settled by the great weight of authority that in the case of a life estate in a residuary fund or in some aliquot portion thereof, if no time is prescribed in the will for the commencement of the interest or the enjoyment of the use or income of such residue, the legatee for life is entitled to the interest or income of the clear residue as afterwards ascertained, to be computed from the death of the testator."

The cases cited in support of this statement fully sustain it. Bancroft v. Hartford Security Co., 74 Conn. 218, 50 A. 735; Lawrence v. Security Co., 56 Conn. 423, 15 A. 406, 1 L. R. A. 342; In re Stanfield's Estate, 135 N. Y. 292, 31 N. E. 1013; Cooke v. Meeker, 36 N. Y. 15; Davison v. Rake, 44 N. J. Eq. 506, 16 A. 227; Jesseph v. Westenberg, 92 Wash. 602, 162 P. 1004; Davis v. Brown, 112 Wash. 121, 191 P. 1098. The rule is similarly stated and supported in Ruling Case Law, vol. 28, p. 355. The Civil Code, in sections 1368 and 1369, provides:

Sec. 1368. "Legacies are due and deliverable at the expiration of one year after the testator's decease. Annuities commence at the testator's decease."

Sec. 1369. "Legacies bear interest from the time they are due and payable, except that legacies for maintenance, or to the testator's widow, bear interest from the testator's decease."

In the case of Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 131, 51 P. 44, this court said, with reference to an annuity to be paid by his trustees to the widow of a testator "for her maintenance," and "as soon after my decease sufficient funds shall come into their possession," that, in the absence of an expressed intention to the contrary in the will, the annuities should commence at the date of the death of the testator, and that the clause in the will relating "to the time of payment (viz. as soon as they have sufficient funds, etc.) does not relate to the date when the annuity should begin," citing section 1368 of the Civil Code. We are therefore satisfied that the trial court, upon its finding that the bequest of the income of said estate was "a bequest for maintenance," was not in error in holding that the beneficiary thereof was entitled to receive such income accruing from and after the date of the testatrix's death.

[7-9] The final question presented for our consideration is as to whether the "income" thus to be paid the beneficiary is to be the net income and subject to deductions for the expenses necessary for the care and preservation of the trust estate, or whether the gross income is to be paid over to the beneficiary, leaving said expenses to be provided for out of the substance of the trust estate. Incidental to this inquiry, the first question discussed is as to the property or fund out of which the commissions of the executor and the fees of his counsel during the administration of the estate, as allowed by the court in the settlement of the executor's final account and in the decree of distribution, are to be paid. Upon the allowance of these items of necessary expense, they become a part of the expenses of administration, and, as such, were payable by the administrator prior to the distribution of the estate to the trustee under the terms of the will. They were not, therefore, any part of "the residue" of the estate which was distributable to such trustee. Like the other expenses of administration, they were chargeable against and payable from the corpus of the estate as distinguished from the income thereof; and, if we are correct in holding that the income of the estate from the death of the testatrix was to be paid to the beneficiary, it follows that the income was not to be chargeable with these expenditures, at least in the absence of a showing that the substance of the estate in the hands of the administrator was not ample for the payment of these expenditures. A different question is, however, presented with reference to the expenditures of the trustee in caring for and preserving the corpus of the trust estate after the same has come into his hands as such trustee. If the primary beneficiary of this trust, Doreene Dare, was to be the ultimate and only recipient of the corpus of this estate, as well as of the income thereof, the question would be somewhat simplified. But she is not. Under the terms of the will she is given one-half of the trust estate when and if she shall reach the age of 35 years, and she is to receive the other half thereof only when and if she shall reach the age of 45 years. Until she attains these respective ages she has nothing other than a life interest in the properties of the estate and in the income thereof, and is thus in a position analogous to that of a life tenant in the whole corpus of said estate until she attains the age of 35 years and in the remaining one-half thereof until she attains the age of 45 years. In case of her death before she is 35 the entire estate goes to others, subject to the trust; and, if she lives so long, but dies between that age and 45, the one-half thereof goes elsewhere. Being thus in a position analogous to that of a life tenant, the principles of law applicable to the duty of a life tenant to pay out of her income from the body of the estate the taxes and other annual charges which are necessary to be paid in order to the preservation of the property thereof would be applicable to her. Section 840 of the Civil Code provides that—

"The owner of a life estate must keep the buildings and fences in repair from ordinary waste, and must pay the taxes and other annual charges, and a just proportion of extraordinary assessments benefiting the whole inheritance."

In the case of Huddleston v. Washington, 136 Cal. 514, 69 P. 146, it was held that a remainderman might invoke the aid of equity to compel a life tenant to apply the rents of the property to the payment of delinquent taxes which, being unpaid, were endangering the remainderman's estate. In Estate of Gartenlaub, 185 Cal. 648, 197 P. 90, 24 A. L. R. 1, which was the case of an estate devised in trust, wherein the trustee was to convert the estate into money and invest the same in certain described bonds, and was by the terms of the will directed to pay to the testator's widow monthly during her lifetime three-fourths of the entire net income, revenue and profit of every kind arising from said estate, this court held that a premium which the trustee was to pay upon the purchase of certain bonds was to be paid out of the income and not out of the corpus of the estate, and in so holding this court pertinently said:

"A testator who creates a trust such as that in the instant case has two objects in view: First, the payment of the income arising from a fund to certain persons during lifetime; second, the transfer of that fund to certain individuals upon the death of the life tenants. The existence of a corpus, principal, or fund is an essential element of the trust and the preservation of this principal until the termination of the life estates is indispensable to the fulfillment of the testator's plans. Therefore, any depletion of the principal tends to frustrate the fundamental purpose of the trust and should be avoided, and, where the price paid for a bond consists of more than the par value thereof, that method of accounting should be adopted which will prevent the impairment of the principal unless the testator has clearly directed to the contrary. Otherwise the life tenant, who is entitled to receive only income, will, in effect, have received a part of the principal."

In the case of Berry v. Stigall, 125 Mo. App. 264, 102 S. W. 585, it was decided that, where a will directed that the testator's minor children should be maintained out of the rents of the real estate until the youngest child should become of legal age and a trust was created to take full charge and control of such real estate during such period, it was proper for the trustee to use so much of such rents as should be necessary for the making of repairs, for taxes, for legal expenses, and for the reasonable compensation of the trustee, and to the same effect is the decision in the cases of N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Sands, 24 Misc. Rep. 102, 53 N. Y. S. 320; Denver v. Park, 169 Mo. App. 335, 152 S. W. 604; Cogswell v. Weston, 228 Mass. 219, 117 N. E. 37. The principle underlying these applications of the rule is that it is essential, in order to carry out the ultimate purposes of the testator that the corpus of the trust estate should as far as possible remain intact. In 22 Cyc. p. 67, it is stated that:

"The usual and ordinary meaning of the word 'income' when used alone is 'net income.'"

And in the case of Sargent Land Co. v. Von Baumbach, 207 F. 423, 430, it was held that the ordinary meaning attached to "income" is that it is something produced by capital without impairing that capital and which leaves the property intact, and the same thing is held, in substance, in the cases of Stanton v. Zercher, 101 Wash. 383, 172 P. 559, and Niland v. Niland, 154 Wis. 514, 143 N. W. 170, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1127. While it is thus well settled that the regular annual and ordinarily recurring expenses incident to the administration of a trust of this character are payable out of the income derived from its properties, it is an equally well-settled rule that unusual and extraordinary expenses, particularly where these go to the enhancement of the value of the capital itself, should be payable out of that capital rather than out of the income thereof. Estate of Gartenlaub, supra, and cases cited. When we look to the specific expenditures of said trustee, which the trial court in this case directed to be chargeable to the corpus of said estate, we find that they were of such an unusual and extraordinary character as to be properly so charged. When the said trustee took over the residue of said estate, a portion of its assets consisted of a second mortgage upon a tract of land in Kansas then owned by one Myers, which was subject to a first mortgage upon which certain overdue interest and taxes were unpaid. The trustee entered into an arrangement with Myers by which the latter deeded the premises to said trustee, subject to said prior mortgage and to said overdue charges. The trustee paid the war stamps on said Myers' deed for the reason, as stated in the evidence, that the latter was "broke" and unable to supply the same. He also paid the cost of the recordation of said deeds, the overdue interest on the first mortgage, and the delinquent taxes on the land. The evidence shows that this transaction was for the benefit of the corpus of the estate, and that its result was probably that of an enhancement of the value of the second mortgage upon the land thus acquired, and to that extent at least an increase in the amount and value of the corpus of the estate itself. The incidental expenditures thus made were unusual, and for that reason, as well as for the reason that the corpus of the estate received the main benefit of the transaction, it should in our opinion bear the burden of these expenditures.

The order of the trial court is hereby affirmed, with directions to the trial court to require said trustee to present a trustee's account in such form as will permit a settlement thereof in conformity with the views expressed in this opinion.

W. P. FULLER & CO. et al. v. McCLURE
et al. (L. A. 7365.)

1925.)

1. Mortgages ⚡151(3)—Payments applied upon sum fixed as amount which had priority to deed of trust reduced amount of priorities.

Where mortgagee's claim and mechanics' liens were by decree to be taken care of out of a fund fixed by trial court as gross sum which had priority to a deed of trust, whatever payments were to be applied upon such gross preference, whether derived from sale of the premises or from moneys collected by receiver, reduced the priorities to the lien of the deed of trust.

2. Mortgages ⚡567(1)—Where mortgagee's preferred claim paid, beneficiary of trust deed entitled to sums thereafter received by receiver.

In a suit to foreclose mechanics' liens against property subject to a mortgage and a deed of trust, where a payment of funds collected by receiver to holder of mortgage reduced the mortgagee's preferred claim, to an amount which was fully taken care of by proceeds of foreclosure sale, the beneficiary of the trust deed, as against the mortgagee, held entitled to whatever further sums were thereafter collected by the receiver.

3. Appeal and error ⚡837(2)—Judgment not before trial court held not before Supreme Court in its determination of correctness of order appealed from.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Consolidated actions by W. P. Fuller & Co. and others against John Q. McClure, A. T. Storch, and others. From an order requiring receiver to pay over money to defendant Mary C. Young, McClure appeals. Affirmed. See, also, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191 P. 1027.

Charles Robert McCarty, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Culver & Nourse, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order after final judgment, whereby the trial court directed the treasurer of the county of Los Angeles to pay over to the respondent Mary C. Young the sum of $598.30, being the balance of a fund in the hands of said official and derived from the transactions attending the pending litigation. The facts of this somewhat complicated case leading up to the making of said order are undisputed and are these: One Lillian Young was the owner of certain unimproved property in the city of Los Angeles, and she sold the same to one A. T. Storch, a contractor, who contemplated the erection of a building upon the property, taking as a portion of the purchase price the promissory note of said Storch for the sum of $2,500, secured by a trust deed upon the property to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, of which she was the beneficiary, which recited that it was subsequent and subject to a first mortgage securing the sum of $6,500, and which was executed by said Storch to one Richman, a money lender, for the purpose of procuring funds for the erection of the building upon the property. Both the mortgage and the trust deed were recorded on May 9, 1916, and the work of construction was immediately begun. By the terms of Richman's mortgage he was to advance, and did advance, the sum of $1,600, and was to pay further sums at the mortgagee's option to the amount of said loan as the work proceeded. Certain mechanics and materialmen from time to time performed labor and furnished materials for which they became and continued to be lien claimants. The oral understanding between Storch and Richman at the time of the giving of said first mortgage was that Storch was to endeavor to find a purchaser of said note and mortgage, and that Richman was to transfer the same to such purchaser thereupon repayment to him of such sums as he had advanced in the meantime. About June 20, 1916, Storch found a purchaser for said note and mortgage, in the person of one J. Q. McClure, who was willing to pay and did then pay the sum of $5,000 therefor, out of which the sum of $2,900 was paid to reimburse Richman for the sums to that extent he had theretofore advanced to Storch. The agreement between Storch and McClure was that, though the latter had paid and was to pay no more than $5,000 for said note and mortgage, it should stand as an obligation of Storch to the extent of $6,000 and interest, the result of which understanding being that McClure would thus make a profit of $1,000 on the transaction. When McClure thus took the note and mortgage, he did so with knowledge of the agreement between Storch and Richman as to the optional nature of all the advances to be made by Richman other than that of the first $1,600, and also of those advances which had thus been made. He had also actual notice that the work of construction had begun and was going on at the time of his purchase of said note and mortgage, and that mechanics and materialmen were performing labor and furnishing materials at various times between the date of the first payment of $1,600, made by the original mortgagee, and the date when he had made his last advancement upon the mortgage loan. In the course of time W. P. Fuller Company, one of said lien claimants, commenced an action for the foreclosure of its mechanic's lien. Other lien claimants brought like actions, in which Storch, McClure, and Title Guarantee & Trust Company were made defendants, and each of these, with the exception of Storch, appeared, setting up their respective claims and alleged priorities with respect to the premises subjected to such liens. The several causes were consolidated and tried as one action, and as such were decided by the trial court and a general decree of foreclosure entered, wherein the trial court undertook to set forth and determine the respective rights and priorities of all of the parties.

The defendant and cross-complainant, McClure, appealed from such decree of foreclosure, and by his said appeal presented as the sole question for determination by the appellate tribunal that of priority and the extent of such priority as between himself as the transferee and holder of the Richman mortgage, Mary C. Young, as the successor of Lillian Young, the beneficiary of the trust deed, and the several mechanics' lien claimants. That appeal was decided by the District Court of Appeal on June 15, 1920. The appellate court, after reviewing quite exhaustively the facts of the case, concluded that the foreclosure decree of the trial court should be modified so as to adjudge that the trust deed is subordinate to the mortgage to an amount equal in the aggregate to the sum of $6,000, together with unpaid and accrued interest thereon at the rate provided for in the mortgage, and a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the trial court. In all other respects the judgment of the trial court was upheld. The trial court was accordingly ordered to modify the judgment in the above particular, and that as so modified the judgment should stand affirmed. This decision becoming final, the trial court proceeded to recast its former decree in accordance therewith, and, having done so, entered its thus modified decree of foreclosure. Shortly after the inception of the action a receiver had been appointed to collect the rents and profits of the property, and such receiver having rendered a current account, the trial court after the entry of its modified decree of foreclosure, but before the foreclosure sale thereunder, settled such account of the receiver; and finding in his hands the sum of $1,941.28, made an order directing the receiver to pay that amount to the transferee of the mortgage, McClure, to be applied pro tanto on the first amount coming to him under the decree, the sum of $2,275.64. This credit was received by McClure, who thereafter procured a sale of the property by the sheriff without notifying him of the receipt of such credit, but giving him instructions to apply the proceeds of the sale in accordance with the terms of the decree. The property sold for $7,951.70 net, and in distributing this fund in accordance with the decree the sheriff, after paying the mechanic's lien claimants in the order and to the extent of their respective preferences as fully set forth in the modified decree, paid to McClure the balance thereof which, taken with the sum already paid him by the receiver, considerably overpaid the amount he was entitled preferentially to receive under the terms of the modified decree. By this distribution the lien claimants were paid in full all that they were respectively entitled to under said decree to be paid prior to any payment to be made upon the indebtedness due Young as secured by said deed of trust. Pending the foreclosure sale the receiver collected other sums on account of the rents, issues, and profits of the property, and upon an accounting for the same the trial court found that he had in his hands the sum of $6,598.30 net, which the court ordered paid over to the clerk of the court pending the further order of the court as to the disposition of the additional fund. The clerk deposited the same with the treasurer. Thereafter Mary C. Young moved the court on notice to have this sum paid over to her to be applied upon the amount found to be due on account of the indebtedness secured by her said trust deed, upon the ground that the amounts which were found to be due upon the mortgage and the mechanics' and materialmen's liens, and which had been given priority over her deed of trust, had been fully paid. The court granted this motion, and from its order in so doing this appeal was taken by McClure.

The appellant herein contends that, whereas by the original decree of foreclosure he and the lien claimants were given priority over the beneficiary of the trust deed to the extent of $5,000, the amount which McClure had paid for the said mortgage; and whereas the appellate court had modified said decree to the extent only of holding that McClure and the said lien claimants were entitled to precedence over the lien of said trust deed to the extent of $6,000; and whereas the trial court upon the going down of that decision had modified its said original decree accordingly, and in recasting its said decree so to do had determined that said amounts by the accretion of interest and costs had been increased to the aggregate sum of $8,617.37, which said McClure and said lien claimants were entitled by said modified decree to receive and be paid out of the amount received from said property upon the foreclosure sale thereof before the beneficiary of the trust deed was to become entitled to receive anything on account thereof or of the lien secured thereby; and whereas the said property had only sold for the sum of $7,951.70 net, which, when applied to the payment in their specified order as declared in said foreclosure decree, would pay said lien claimants to the extent of the amount of their claims for which they were entitled to preference over both McClure and the beneficiary under the trust deed, but would, after doing so, leave a sum in excess of $600 still due to McClure under the terms of said decree, he was entitled to have the further sum collected by the receiver and deposited with the treasurer applied to the said balance of his mortgage debt then remaining unpaid. The respondent made in the trial court, and here makes, the contention that the modified decree of the trial court exactly conformed with the direction of the appellate court upon the former appeal as to the amount, calculated up to the date of said decree, which should be paid to McClure and the lien claimants before the beneficiary under the trust deed would be entitled to be paid anything, whether derived from the sale of the property under said decree or collected by the receiver from the rents and issues of the property pending or succeeding such foreclosure sale; that when the trial court, after making its said modified decree and ordering said sale thereunder, received and settled the first account of said receiver, and finding the sum of $1,941.28 net in his hands ordered said sum paid over to McClure, such order and the compliance therewith by the receiver automatically reduced the amount which he and the lienholders were entitled to be paid upon their preferred claims as fixed by said modified decree from the sum of $8,617.37 to $6,676.09, or at least to the latter sum augmented by the accruing interest thereon amounting approximately to $275, thus leaving the total amount which these preferred creditors were entitled to have distributed among them from the proceeds of the foreclosure sale, approximately $7,000; and that since the total sum received as the result of such sale amounted to the net sum of $7,951.70, which sum was wholly paid over to said McClure and the lien claimants to the exclusion of the trust deed creditor, the former were thus fully paid all that they were preferentially entitled to according to the provisions of the said modified decree, and that in consequence thereof, when the additional sum of $598.30 came into the hands of the court through the subsequent receipts and accounts of the receiver the respondent was entitled to have such sum and the whole thereof paid over to her.

[1] We are satisfied that the respondent is correct in her foregoing contention, and that the trial court was not in error in adopting the same and in making the order appealed from accordingly. By its original decision the trial court established a certain fund out of which the advances made upon the appellant's mortgage and the preferred amounts of certain mechanics' lien claims were to be paid before the beneficiary under the trust deed was entitled to receive any sum accruing from the sale of said property or from its usufruct pending proceedings under the receivership. The appellate court upon the first appeal directed the amount thus established as such fund to be increased to the extent of $1,000, but otherwise confirmed the findings and decree of the trial court. The lien claimants were entitled to the preferences which they were given by these two decrees over the lien of the trust deed, only because of the fact and finding that the first mortgage was to be preferred over the beneficiary of the trust deed to the extent directed by the first decision of the appellate court and provided for in the modified decree, and that as such mechanics' lien claimants, they were entitled to certain preferences over the first mortgagee, which were to be taken care of out of the fund which the trial court had fixed as the gross sum which had priority to the deed of trust. Whatever payments were to be applied upon this gross preference as thus established, whether derived from the sale of the premises or from the usufruct thereof under the receivership must be held to have reduced that gross sum accordingly, and have brought the beneficiary of the trust deed to the extent thereof nearer to the point where there would be no priorities to the lien of her deed of trust.

[2, 3] In ordering the receiver to turn over the sum of $1,941.28 accounted for by him to

McClure, the court expressly directed that said payment be applied upon the first advances made by the original mortgagee, viz., the sum of $2,275.64, which formed a part of the preferred fund established by the modified decree. When that sum was thus diminished by the making of such payment, the gross amount of the mortgagee's preferred claim was ipso facto reduced to an amount which was fully taken care of by the sum received upon the foreclosure sale. This being so, the respondent became entitled to whatever further sums were thereafter collected by the receiver and paid into court. A suggestion is made in the briefs of counsel that in a suit brought by Mary C. Young against McClure to recover the amount of the overpayment received by him as a result of the payment from the receiver and of his receipts from the proceeds of the foreclosure sale, the respondent had recovered a judgment for $774.90, which judgment had become final. It is sufficient to say that no such matter was before the trial court at the time it made the order herein appealed from, and hence that no such matter is before this court in its determination as to the correctness of said order.

The order is affirmed.

STARKWEATHER v. EDDY. (L. A. 8201.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error 429—New trial 139 —Adverse party may waive signing of notice of appeal or intention to move for new trial by attorney of record.

Rule requiring notice of appeal, or of intention to move for new trial, to be signed by the attorney of record for the moving party is subject to the qualification that the failure to so do is a defect which may be waived by the adverse party by failure seasonably to object, and slight circumstances of acquiescence are sufficient to show such waiver.

2. Appeal and error 429—Respondent held to have waived signing of notice of appeal by attorney of record.

Respondent held to have waived signing of notice of appeal by attorney of record, where the trial was conducted by other counsel, findings of fact prepared by respondent's counsel named counsel not of record, and recited a stipulation between such counsel and respondent's attorney, and respondent's counsel admitted service of a brief signed by attorneys not of record, and procured stipulation extending time for filing reply brief from such attorneys.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by J. W. Starkweather against F. J. Eddy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

L. E. Dadmun, F. E. Davis, and Davis & Dadmun, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gertrude M. Caldwell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss the appeal herein "on the grounds and for the reasons that the attorneys making such appeal and signing the notice of appeal and the appellant's brief on appeal, are not the attorneys of record of said defendant and appellant herein."

[1] The motion is supported by an affidavit of counsel for respondent and a certificate of the clerk of the trial court, from which it appears that George P. Cook is the attorney of record in said case for the defendant and appellant; that there has been no substitution of any other attorney or attorneys in his place made or filed as provided by law, and that the notice of appeal and appellant's brief herein are signed by F. E. Davis, L. E. Dadmun, and Davis & Dadmun, and are not signed by said George P. Cook. Respondent cites Abrahms v. Stokes, 39 Cal. 150; Prescott v. Salthouse, 53 Cal. 221; Whittle v. Renner, 55 Cal. 395; Harrigan v. Bolte, 67 Cal. xix, 8 P. 184,¹ and Anglo-California Trust, etc., Co. v. Oakland Rys., 191 Cal. 387, 216 P. 578, holding that a notice of appeal or a notice of intention to move for a new trial, to be effective, must be signed by the attorney of record for the moving party, and that in default thereof such appeal or such proceeding for new trial may be dismissed upon motion. Respondent insists that we must follow the rule of the cited cases and dismiss the appeal. Appellant urges with much earnestness that we should overrule those cases. The circumstances of the present case do not call upon us to do either. The rule which requires a notice of appeal or of intention to move for a new trial to be signed by the attorney of record for the moving party has always been subject to the qualification that the failure so to do is a defect which may be waived by the adverse party by failure seasonably to object thereto, and that slight circumstances of acquiescence are sufficient to show such waiver. This qualification is indicated by the statement in Prescott v. Salthouse, supra, that:

"The regularity of the service of the notice and presentation of the bill of exceptions were duly objected to by the attorney of the defendant, on the ground that Mr. Lee was not the attorney of record of the plaintiff, and was therefore not competent to give a notice or present a bill of exceptions in the cause."

In Whittle v. Renner, supra, the court took pains to point out that, "We find nothing in the record which shows a waiver of the service on the attorney of record." In Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Oakland Rys., supra, while the fact does not appear in the memorandum opinion filed, it does appear of record in that case that counsel for respondent therein scrupulously refrained from doing anything which might be construed as a waiver of their objection that the notice of appeal was signed by a stranger to the record. They not only reserved that objection but they urged it upon this court at the earliest possible moment by a motion to dismiss the appeal, which was heard and determined before the time for appeal had elapsed, so that the appellant was enabled to and did thereafter procure a proper substitution of attorneys and effectively prosecute its appeal. Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Oakland Rys., 193 Cal. 451, 225 P. 452. As noted above, slight circumstances of acquiescence are sufficient to show such waiver. In McDonald v. McConkey, 54 Cal. 143, where the appeal was taken by an attorney not the attorney of record in the court below, the circumstance that respondent's attorney joined with him in certifying to the transcript was held sufficient to show such waiver. In Withers v. Little, 56 Cal. 370, and in Livermore v. Webb, 56 Cal. 489, respondent's acceptance of service of notice of appeal without objection was held sufficient to show such waiver. See, also, Woodmen of the World v. Rutledge, 133 Cal. 640, 65 P. 1105; Smith v. Smith, 145 Cal. 615, 622, 79 P. 275, and Bashore v. Lambersen, 36 Cal. App. 233, 171 P. 968.

[2] There is ample evidence of such waiver in the records of the present case. The original answer filed in behalf of the defendant in the court below, the appellant herein, was signed by George P. Cook as attorney for defendant. An amendment to this answer which, through obvious oversight, was not signed by any one as attorney for defendant, but which was written upon the stationery of F. E. Davis, was thereafter filed in the action, bearing an indorsement acknowledging receipt of a copy thereof which was signed by counsel for plaintiff. The reporter's transcript shows that the trial of the action in the court below was conducted throughout by Mr. Dadmun as attorney for defendant. The findings of fact, presumably prepared by counsel for plaintiff and respondent, recite that the defendant was present at the trial with Mr. Dadmun, his attorney, and that stipulation was entered into in open court by and between the attorneys of the respective parties. Appellant's opening brief upon this appeal, which is signed, "F. E.

Davis, Davis & Dadmun, Attorneys for Defendant and Appellant," bears an admission of service signed by counsel for respondent. Shortly prior to the making of the present motion to dismiss this appeal the respondent applied for and obtained from the last named attorneys a stipulation extending respondent's time to file his reply brief herein, and thereupon respondent caused to be filed in this court a stipulation for such extension of time signed "F. E. Davis, Davis & Dadmun, Attorneys for Defendant and Appellant," and upon such stipulation procured an order of this court extending the time for the filing of respondent's reply brief herein.

Giving full effect to the rule invoked by respondent upon this motion, there is no room for doubt that he has waived his right to have it applied to the present case.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

Application by A. Berto for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

I. F. Chapman and F. A. Berry, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

B. D. Marx Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. The petitioner was charged by a complaint filed against him in the justice's court of the third township of the county of San Mateo, this state, on September 17, 1924, with the violation of subdivision 6 of section 636, Penal Code. In material allegations the complaint is as follows:

"That on or about the 14th day of August, A. D. 1924, in the county of San Mateo, state of California, the crime of misdemeanor was committed by A. Berto, who did then and there use within said county and in fish and game district No. 13, a certain beach seine, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California. And this complainant, upon oath, accused the said A. Berto of having committed the said offense, and prays that the said accused may be brought before a magistrate and dealt with according to law," etc.

By section 636, Penal Code, it is made a misdemeanor for any person to use or operate any net, trap, line, etc., for the purpose of taking fish in the state of California at any time, or in any manner, except as otherwise provided by part 1, tit. 15, c. 1, Penal Code.

The subdivisions of section 636, Penal Code, essential to an understanding of the case are as follows:

"Sec. 6. Beach Nets. It shall be lawful to use beach nets (also known as beach seines or haul seines) in fish and game districts five, eight, nine, ten, eleven, eighteen, nineteen and twenty-two; provided, that in fish and game district five the meshes of any such beach nets shall measure not less than five and one-half inches in length and that in fish and game districts ten, eighteen and nineteen the meshes of the beach nets shall measure not less than one and one-half inches in length; and beach nets shall only be used in fish and game district nineteen between the first day of September and the thirty-first day of January of the year following, both dates inclusive, and for the purpose of taking smelt only.

"Sec. 7. For the purpose of this act, any net hauled from the water to the beach or shore for the purpose of taking fish, shall be known as a beach net."

Petitioner was tried and convicted in said justice's court upon said complaint, and took an appeal to the superior court of the county of San Mateo. The judgment of conviction was affirmed, and he makes application to this court for the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus.

[1] It is petitioner's contention that the complaint failed to state a public offense, in that it omits to charge that the beach net or seine was used in any waters of the state, or that it was used for any particular purpose. It is argued that, for aught that appears upon the face of the complaint, the beach net alleged to have been used may have been used for some purpose of ornamentation or for any one of the many purposes to which it may be made adaptable. There might be some force in this suggestion were it not for the fact that said subdivision 7, § 636, Penal Code, which defines a beach net, makes its identity dependent upon the particular use made of it, to wit, catching fish in a certain manner in inhibited districts. The offense is purely statutory. A net becomes a beach net only when it is being hauled from the water to the beach or shore for the purpose of catching fish. When not thus used, a net is not a beach net, and it loses its character as such instantly upon a cessation of the use interdicted by statute. The cases cited by petitioner have to do with complaints or informations which failed in a substantive sense to state any offense. Those cases are not in point for the reason that there was no word or clause in the statute under which they were drawn which by the employment of definitive language rendered it unnecessary to set out descriptively the particular acts constituting the offense. The petitioner in Ex parte Peterson, 119 Cal. 578, 51 P. 859, was charged with having used a shotgun of a larger caliber than a No. 8 gauge. A shotgun of such a gauge could be used in many ways that would be harmless, and it was not the intention of the Legislature to prohibit the use of shotguns in such a manner as had no connection with the evident purpose sought to be attained. The Legislature only intended, the court there said, to prohibit the use of shotguns of No. 8 or larger caliber, in killing game or animals. While the complaint in that case followed the language of the statute, it did not sufficiently charge an offense, for the reason, as therein pointed out, the statute contained a qualification which it did not express. The use of a net is unlawful only when the use made of it offends against the inhibitions of the statute.

[2, 3] The complaint in the instant case is in the language of the statute. This is sufficient except in those cases in which fraud forms an essential element in the crime, such as obtaining property by false pretenses, forgery, etc. The defect pointed out in Ex parte Peterson, supra, does not exist in the statute before us. The complaint upon its face is a sufficient pleading. Petitioner could not have been misled as to the nature of the charge placed against him. Of course, upon trial it must be shown that the person charged with a violation of subdivision 6, § 636, Penal Code, did use a net in the manner forbidden by law. No claim is made that the offense was not fully proved in the court below.

[4] An appeal having been taken to the superior court, and the judgment affirmed by said court we must presume that the evidence justified the judgment of conviction.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

Code, §§ 197 and 198.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 829(5) — Modification and rejection of requested instructions on self-defense not error where fully covered by instructions given by court.

In homicide prosecution, defended on ground of self-defense, modification and rejection of defendant's requested instructions on law of self-defense held not error, where instructions given by court fully stated law of self-defense and conformed with Pen. Code, §§ 197 and 198, and presented defendant's theory, only in different language from that submitted by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

B. T. Vernon was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. T. Chapman and A. S. Brown, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen. for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was charged with the crime of murder in the first degree, and upon the trial pleaded self-defense. He was convicted of murder in the second degree, and, having moved the trial court for a new trial, which was denied, he appeals from the judgment and the ruling on said motion.

It was testified by appellant and by witnesses called in his behalf that the deceased had previously to the killing threatened his life, and that about a month before the commission of the alleged offense decedent drew his gun when so threatening appellant.

The ground upon which a reversal is sought is that the court below so modified a requested instruction to the jury that they were not given the law as to circumstances and appearances under which a homicide may be said to have been justified. The instruction requested read as follows:

"You are further instructed that a person may lawfully take the life of another when the circumstances are sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and the party killing acted under the influence of such fear; that, to justify such killing, it is not necessary that the danger be actual, but that it is enough, if it be apparent, that a party may lawfully act upon appearances which would put a reasonable man in fear of danger and that he will not, when acting upon such appearances, be held liable, although it should afterwards appear that the indications upon which he acted were entirely false, and that he was in no actual peril."

The first clause above quoted was modified by adding one word, and the balance was eliminated, so that when given the instruction read as follows:

"You are further instructed that a person may lawfully take the life of another when the circumstances are sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man and the party killing acted under the influence of such fear alone."

[1] Appellant also takes exception to the use of the word "alone" as it appears in the instruction just quoted, apparently upon the ground that it limits the right to take the life of another in self-defense to cases where the act is done under the influence of fear of the danger designated. If it be conceded that he is correct in his interpretation of the instruction, it is equally certain that the instruction given contains a correct statement of the law, and conforms to the provisions of sections 197 and 198 of the Penal Code.

[2] Respondent contends that the portion omitted was covered by other instructions, three of which are called to our attention, wherein the jury were told that a bare fear that a man's life or limb is in danger is not sufficient to justify homicide, but, in order to justify a man in taking the life of another in self-defense, the circumstances must be sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man; that the danger must be present, apparent, and imminent, or must appear so at the time to the slayer, as a reasonable man. And they were further instructed that:

"A person may have a lively apprehension that he is in imminent danger, and believe that his apprehension is based on sufficient cause and supported by reasonable grounds; that such apprehension is reasonable and warranted from appearances as they present themselves to him. If, however, he acts on these appearances, he does so at his peril, because the law leaves it to no man to be the exclusive judge of the reasonableness of the appearances upon which he acts, but prescribes a standard of its own, which is, not only did the person acting on the appearances himself believe that he was in deadly peril of his life or of receiving great bodily harm, but would a reasonable man, situated as the defendant was, seeing what he saw, and knowing what he knew, be justified in believing himself in danger?"

Although the trial court did not state in the terms requested by the defendant that actual danger was unnecessary in order that a party might lawfully act upon appearances which would put a reasonable man in fear of peril, the true rule to determine legal liability for a homicide committed under the circumstances involved in this case was stated in the language last quoted. If the principle thus stated were applied, it must necessarily follow that a killing would be justified where the appearances were such as to put a reasonable man in fear of imminent danger of his life or of great bodily injury, and that actual danger is unnecessary. The jury were instructed also that the acts which a defendant may do and justify under a plea of self-defense depend primarily upon his own conduct and secondarily upon the conduct of the deceased; and that homicide is justifiable when resisting any attempt to murder any person or to commit a felony, or to do some great bodily injury upon any person, or, when committed in the lawful defense of such person when there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design to commit a felony or to do some great bodily injury and imminent danger of such design being accomplished. It was further said in an instruction given upon request of appellant that the jury must acquit him unless every fact necessary to establish his guilt had been proven to them beyond a reasonable doubt.

Appellant cites People v. Dallen, 21 Cal. App. 770, 778, 132 P. 1064, as having approved the omitted portion of the requested instruction first above quoted. What was there held was that other instructions of a similar character, requested by the defendant, were properly rejected, since that which was given fully stated the law of self-defense. We think the same is true in this case. As we have seen, the instructions given in the instant case were in conformity with sections 197 and 198 of the Penal Code.

In People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 670, 174 P. 892, the Supreme Court, in discussing the instructions there given under section 197 of the Penal Code, said:

"But the Legislature has the power to declare what the law shall be on this subject. It has done so by this section. If our decisions have laid down a different rule, it is the decisions which must give way and not the statute. However this may be, it cannot be disputed that error cannot be predicated upon an instruction which states the law as the Legislature has fixed it by statute and which is applicable to the case."

We think the instructions which we have summarized properly stated the law, as well as presented to the jury appellant's theory of the case, only in different language from that submitted to the trial court by his counsel.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

GOLDEN WEST CREDIT & ADJUSTMENT CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 5156.)

Justices of the peace § 159(6) — Superior court held without jurisdiction of appeal from justice court.

Superior court was without jurisdiction of appeal from justice court, where plaintiff excepted to sufficiency of sureties on defendant's undertaking on appeal, who failed to justify within 5 days after service of notice, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, and defendant thereafter presented a new undertaking without giving notice to plaintiff, which undertaking was approved also without notice.

Application for writ of mandate by the Golden West Credit & Adjustment Company against the Superior Court of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Writ issued.

Jesse A. Mueller, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

TYLER, P. J. Application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, superior court, to dismiss an appeal.

The petitioner, a corporation, on the 5th day of November, 1924, commenced an action in the justice's court against one Antonio Pina, and recovered a judgment in the sum of $60 and costs. Thereafter, on the 11th day of December, 1924, defendant filed a notice of appeal on both questions of law and fact, together with an undertaking in the sum of $100, and a further undertaking to stay the execution of the judgment. On the 13th day of December petitioner filed and served upon defendant a notice of exception to said undertaking on appeal, wherein defendant was notified that the sufficiency of the sureties was excepted to by petitioner, and that he further excepted to the form and sufficiency of the undertaking. The sureties on said undertaking, or other sureties, failed to justify within the five days after the service of the notice, as provided for by statute, but on the 16th day of December defendant presented a new undertaking on appeal, without giving any notice to petitioner. This undertaking was approved by the justice, but also without notice to the petitioner. Thereafter, on the 19th day of December, all papers in the action were certified to by the clerk of the justice's court and filed in the superior court. Petitioner thereupon served upon defendant a notice to dismiss said appeal. The motion was premised upon failure of the sureties to justify under the original undertaking. The motion was denied, and this proceeding was thereafter instituted.

The case comes squarely within the ruling in Wood v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. 115, 7 P. 200. In that case appellant in perfecting his appeal gave an undertaking. The adverse party excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties. Neither the sureties in the undertaking nor other sureties justified; but, instead thereof, the appellant, as here, filed a new undertaking with other sureties. In so doing, he gave no notice as required in the last clause of section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was there held that such being the case, the appeal must be regarded as though no undertaking had been given; that the statute is peremptory. Without the justification of the sureties named in the undertaking, or other sureties in their stead, upon notice to the adverse party, the appeal was not perfected, and the superior court had no jurisdiction of the case. That part of section 978a relating to the justification of the sureties is but a reenactment of the same matter which theretofore was part of section 978, and hence the early cases construing that section are unaffected by the amendment. Washington Council, etc., v. Superior Court, 29 Cal. App. 45, 154 P. 298.

Respondent seeks to avoid the effect of these decisions because of the fact that the notice of justification also excepted to the form and sufficiency of the undertaking. The bond is not before us. The question of its sufficiency was a matter that the court could have inquired into at the time of the justification of the sureties. Defendant's failure to justify in accordance with the notice rendered his appeal ineffectual. McCracken v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 74, 24 P. 845. The motion to dismiss the appeal should therefore have been granted. This being so, it is hereby ordered that a writ of mandate issue, as prayed, directing the respondent to enter an order dismissing the appeal in the action above referred to.

HOOPES et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4939.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 6, 1925.)

1. Stipulations §9—Stipulation not filed or entered in minutes of court below not recognized by appellate court.

Stipulation which does not appear to have been filed or entered in minutes of court below, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 283, cannot be recognized by appellate court.

2. Justices of the peace §166(2) — Case which is set and then dropped is not "brought to trial."

A case which is merely brought to point of having been set and then dropped is not "brought to trial," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 981a.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Brought.]

3. Justices of the peace §166(2) — Appeal from justice's court dismissed, where not brought to trial within one year from time filed in superior court on appeal.

Appeal from justice's court would be dismissed, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, where it had been appealed before enactment of statute and had not been brought to trial within one year from time it was filed in superior court, though appellant had set same for trial and was entitled to try it when statute took effect, where he did not do so and no stipulation showing that parties agreed upon a continuance or an extension of time appeared in record.

Application for writ of mandate by Emma Hoopes and another against the Superior Court of California in and for the county of Los Angeles and Hon. Merle J. Rogers, a Judge thereof. Writ granted.

Thos. H. Cornett, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

E. F. Gerech and C. W. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The petitioners were defendants in an action filed by one Joe Firman in the justice's court of Los Angeles township; judgment having gone in their favor, Firman appealed to the superior court on May 19, 1921. On July 29, 1921, the plaintiff caused his appeal to be set for trial de novo on December 8, 1921, at which time it was continued to the 9th day of February, 1922, and on this latter date the case was dropped from the calendar. No further proceedings were had therein until January 19, 1923, when the plaintiff had said case restored to the calendar, and it was then set for trial on October 2, 1923, at which time it was again dropped from the calendar. On November 13, 1923, plaintiff caused the same to be placed upon the calendar and reset for trial November 10, 1924.

On the 29th day of September, 1924, pursuant to notice, the petitioners moved the superior court to dismiss said appeal upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to bring the same to trial within one year from the date on which it was filed, or at any other time prior to January 1, 1924, and that the time for trial had not been extended by stipulation in writing filed with the clerk.

The motion to dismiss was opposed by affidavit of plaintiff's counsel, wherein he averred that "the above-entitled action has been set for trial in department 13 for the 2d day of October, 1923, within a year of the date of appeal from the justice court and prior to the 1st day of January, 1924." It was further alleged therein that the case was called for trial on the 2d day of October, 1923, and that the plaintiff was present in court with his counsel and witnesses, and answered ready for trial, but that with permission of the court the parties retired from the room for the purpose of attempting to arrive at a compromise; that the defendants' petitioners herein then and there orally agreed to pay to the plaintiff $100 in full settlement of his claim, including costs, whereupon the parties returned to the courtroom and verbally stipulated to that effect; that the said defendants did not pay said or any amount, as agreed, and that said appeal should not be dismissed for the reason that the same was brought to trial, and would have been tried, but for the stipulation mentioned.

Petitioners filed an affidavit denying that said appeal was brought to trial within one year from the date the same was filed, or that they ever stipulated or agreed to compromise the case, or to pay the plaintiff any amount, and alleging that no extension of time had ever been stipulated in writing.

The trial court denied the motion to dismiss the appeal, whereupon the defendants petitioned this court for a writ of mandate directing the court below to dismiss the same, and an alternative writ was issued.

The motion here under consideration was based upon section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was approved June 14, 1923, and provides as follows:

"No action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior court, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore, or hereafter appealed must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken; provided, however, that in any appeal pending when this section takes effect, a judgment or dismissal shall not be entered under the direction hereof sooner than January first, 1924: and provided, further, that any superior court may, by existing rule or by rule hereafter to be enacted, provide for dismissal of such appeal within a time less than one year."

It is obvious that, since the appeal was perfected in 1921, the setting for October 2, 1923, was not "within a year of the date of the appeal," as stated in the plaintiff's affidavit. It had, however, previously been set for trial December 8, 1921, and was then continued to February 9, 1922, when it went off the calendar. Prior to the enactment of the statute above quoted the action was reset for October 2, 1923, and had it not been dropped we would not hesitate to hold under the authority of Grafton v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 226 P. 9, that section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, did not apply, since the case was there already set and awaiting trial when said section became effective.

Neither the minutes of the superior court nor any stipulation in writing appears to show that the parties at any time agreed upon a continuance or an extension of time. It is provided by section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure that an attorney or counselor is vested with authority "to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court, and not otherwise." And, as was said in Swim v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 226 P. 2:

"The facts alleged in defendant's affidavit above quoted amount to nothing more than an assertion that a verbal stipulation was entered into by and between the parties to the effect that further proceedings in the action should be indefinitely postponed. * * * In the face of the plain and unambiguous language used in the code section above quoted, clearly evidencing the legislative intent to require a written stipulation filed with the clerk of the superior court for the purpose of extending the time for bringing the case to trial, we cannot say that a verbal stipulation should be permitted to answer the same purpose. * * * He must be assumed to have entered into the agreement with the plaintiff with the knowledge of the statutory provision which required nothing less than a written stipulation to protect him from the liability to a dismissal."

[1, 2] We cannot therefore recognize, or be influenced by, any stipulation which does not appear to have been filed or entered in the minutes of the court below. The fact is vital to a decision of this matter that, although the case at bar was set for trial prior to the enactment of section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, it was not tried pursuant to such setting, but was dropped from the calendar. That section requires that, unless an action theretofore or thereafter appealed shall have been brought to trial within the period of time specified, it must be dismissed. A case which is merely brought to the point of having been set, and is then dropped, cannot be said to have been brought to trial. In Boyd v. Southern Pacific Co., 185 Cal. 344, 197 P. 58, it was said:

"The mandatory character of these provisions of the statute is evident, and our decisions have held that such is in fact their character. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670, 154 P. 841. In the present case, the action was once set for trial at a time something over a year after issue joined by answer, but the trial date was continued indefinitely by stipulation. Some years later, and a few months before the expiration of the five-year period, the plaintiff moved that the cause be set again for trial, and this was done but for a date after the expiration of the period. Upon the expiration of the period and before the trial date, the defendant moved that the action be dismissed, and the order of dismissal was made.

"The contentions of the plaintiff are two. The first is that the cause was 'brought to trial' within the meaning of the statute when it was set for trial, although the date set as the actual trial date was later. Counsel's argument is that when the plaintiff applied to have the cause set he had done all that he could do, that the fixing of the date at which it would be tried was wholly in the power of the court and beyond the plaintiff's control, and that the expression 'brought to trial' should be taken to mean only that which the plaintiff could control and for which alone, therefore, he should be held responsible. But the meaning of the expression 'brought to trial' seems to us too plain to be in doubt. The trial of an action and the setting of it for trial are quite distinct things, and an action is certainly not brought to trial until the trial is commenced."

It is manifest that, while the plaintiff herein had set his case, and was entitled to try it when the section in question took effect, he did not see fit to avail himself of the opportunity to do so, but permitted it to be removed from the court's calendar and hence to lapse into the category of the actions specifically barred thereby. It then occupied the same status as though it had never been set. On the 13th day of November, 1923, therefore, Firman's counsel undertook to set for November 10, 1924, a case which had been appealed before the enactment of said statute, and which had not been brought to trial within one year from the time that the same was filed in the superior court on appeal.

Ravn v. Planz, 37 Cal. App. 735, 174 P. 690, involved the question of continuances by a trial court, upon motion of the defendant, without fault of the plaintiff, and it was there said:

"This action was not brought to trial within the designated time, and it is not claimed that the parties entered into a stipulation in writing extending the time within which it might be tried. To save this case from the operation of the statute the plaintiff shows that on several occasions the trial of the action was postponed upon the motion of defendant, and that upon a date within about six months prior to the expiration of the five years after the case was at issue, it being then upon the calendar for trial, he appeared in court with his counsel and witnesses ready to proceed; but upon motion of the defendant, and over his objection, a further postponement of the trial was granted. Later the case was again called for trial, when a motion to dismiss was made by the defendant and granted.

"The provision of section 583 above set forth is mandatory. Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 Pac. 1002; Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670, 154 P. 841. The circumstance, therefore, that the trial of the cause was postponed several times without plaintiff's consent, one of those occasions being a relatively short time before the date when the defendant would be entitled to require the court to dismiss the action, is a matter of no significance. Courts are, of course, loth to deny to a litigant a trial upon the merits; but the section of the Code of Civil Procedure above recited directs in plain terms that it shall be done when a case falls within the conditions stated; and the present is such a case. The trial court had no discretion. The motion being made, its duty was to dismiss. To relax the rule to cover hard cases would be to set at naught the express will of the Legislature."

[3] Section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure is no less mandatory than section 583 of the same Code, and a motion made two and one-half years after date of appeal, which resulted in setting the same for trial three and one-half years from such date, is clearly within the express inhibition of the statute.

The peremptory writ of mandate is therefore granted, and the superior court is directed to dismiss the appeal.

Thos. H. Cornett, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

E. F. Gerecht and C. W. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Petitioners herein were defendants in an action commenced in the justice's court of Los Angeles township by one Jay Smith. Otherwise the record before us in this proceeding is the same in all respects as that presented in Hoopes v. Superior Court (No. 4939) 235 P. 739.

The questions involved herein have been discussed and decided in the opinion filed in case numbered 4939, supra.

The peremptory writ of mandate is therefore granted, and the superior court is directed to dismiss the appeal.

EULESS v. WESTPHAL. (Civ. 5082.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 931(1)—Allegations of count presumed not proved, in support of judgment for defendant.

Where court made no finding expressly referring to allegations in one count of complaint, but made general finding that no facts "other than the facts hereinabove found" were proven in support of allegations of either count in complaint, appellate court, in absence of anything in other findings to support judgment for plaintiff, must presume, in support of judgment for defendant, that allegations of former count were not proved.

2. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 169—Interpreted, in view of surrounding circumstances.

Contract must be interpreted, in view of surrounding circumstances, to arrive at parties' intention.

3. Brokers $\hookrightarrow$ 40—Owner's letter to agent held not contract of employment to sell property.

Friendly letter, informing confidential agent in charge of writer's property that there was party wanting option thereon, but that writer would rather not give it to him if there were any prospect of agent selling any of property, and stating that writer would give $5,000 to "any one" making sale at price quoted to such party, held not employment contract; latter statement being mere expression of readiness to contract with any broker giving promise of making sale on such terms.

4. Brokers $\hookrightarrow$ 45—Agent's delay in offering prospect held sufficient to support judgment for defendant in action for commission.

That agent did not offer prospect until two years after date of letter from owner stating, "Wish you would see if you could get an offer for the 12 lots," held sufficient to support judgment for owner, in action for commission on sale, if such letter constituted contract of employment.

5. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 704(2)—Meaning and effect of contract for trial court, and cannot be reviewed in absence of evidence.

Meaning and effect of contract is for trial court to determine in light of all facts and surrounding circumstances, and appellate court, when meaning is doubtful and none of evidence is before it, cannot say that lower court was wrong.

6. Brokers $\hookrightarrow$ 88(14)—Findings held not to require judgment for appellant broker.

Findings, in action for commission on sale of realty, that defendant caused letter, stating that he would give $5,000 to any one making sale at stated price, to be sent to plaintiff, and that latter acted in reliance on that and other letters in seeking purchaser, held not to require judgment for plaintiff, in view of finding that defendant never employed plaintiff to sell property.

7. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 394(3)—That finding of fact appears under heading conclusions of law no ground for reversal.

Fact that holding of trial court appears under heading conclusions of law rather than in findings of fact is no ground for reversal.

8. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 907(4), 1170(10)—No reversal, in absence of showing that trial court did not have evidence, not brought up by appellant.

In absence of evidence in record, requiring interpretation of letter from defendant to plaintiff as binding contract of employment to sell realty within statute of frauds, appellate court may assume that such evidence was adverse to plaintiff and should not reverse judgment for defendant, in absence of showing that trial court did not have such evidence; no prejudice, within Const. art. 6, § 4½, being shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by J. M. Eules against F. D. Vanderlip, on whose death Ella M. Westphal, as executrix, etc., was substituted as party respondent. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, and George A. Clough, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Humphrey, Grant, Zimdars & Warren, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued F. D. Vanderlip to recover a commission for the sale of real property situated in Fresno county and owned by said Vanderlip. Judgment went for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone. Since the appeal was taken the defendant died and E. M. Westphal, as executrix of his estate, has been duly substituted in his stead.

The action was tried on plaintiff's amended complaint and the answer thereto. The amended complaint was framed in two causes of action. The first was in the form of a common count and alleged that within one year last past the defendant became indebted to plaintiff for services rendered in the sum of $8,250. The second alleged that the defendant was the owner of certain real property in the county of Fresno; that on the 3d day of January, 1919, he employed plaintiff to sell the same under a written memorandum which is attached to the amended complaint and marked Exhibit A; that pursuant to said memorandum the plaintiff procured a purchaser, willing, ready, and able to purchase and who did purchase the property for $165,000 on terms satisfactory to the defendant; that said memorandum provided that defendant would pay to any one making a sale a commission in the sum of $8,250; that the sale was consummated on April 22, 1920; and that plaintiff has demanded payment of the sum of $8,250, which demand has been refused. The writing of January 3, 1919, on which the plaintiff sued, reads as follows:

"Mr. J. Euless—Dear Friend: Want to tell you there is a party here that wants an option on all of my Fresno property, but, if there is any prospect of your selling any of it, would rather not give it to him. Have priced it to him at $125,000. Will give $5,000 to any one making a sale at that price. If I give this man an option, will give him a letter to you and you can show him the property and do all you can to help the thing along. Wishing you all a Happy New Year, am as ever, sincerely yours, F. D. Vanderlip."

[1] Directing our attention to the first cause of action, it appears that the trial court made no finding expressly referring to the allegations made therein; but it did make the general finding that—

"Other than the facts hereinabove found, no facts were proven in support of the allegations set forth in either count set forth in the complaint on file herein."

We do not see anything in the other findings which would support a judgment in favor of plaintiff on his first cause of action and we much therefore, in support of the judgment rendered, presume that the allegations of that cause were not proved.

The second cause of action was based on the letter of January 3, 1919, quoted above. The findings are full of matters covering other letters and oral conversations, none of which is within the issues framed by the pleadings. As to the letter upon which the cause of action is based, the court found that the defendant "caused [it] to be written and forwarded to plaintiff"; that "there is no evidence to show whether said letter was written in the room of defendant, or in the room of his daughter, or that defendant had seen the letter prior to the trial hereof"; that it was written by defendant's daughter, Ella Westphal, who had written all his letters for eight or nine years prior to the trial; that, though these letters were written by the daughter at defendant's request and instruction, she "had no written authority of any kind" to sign his name. The trial court also found that, "pursuant to the request contained in said letters and in each of them," plaintiff promised the defendant to endeavor to sell said property; that, "subsequent to the writing of said letters, and prior to the appearance of" the purchaser, defendant orally informed plaintiff that he had raised the price of said property to $130,000; that, pursuant to the provisions contained in said letters, the plaintiff did, on the 16th of October, 1919, procure a purchaser in the name of one Droge who was ready, willing, and able to purchase said property for $130,000 and who paid the plaintiff $1,000 as a deposit on account of the purchase price thereof; that defendant refused to sell to Droge on the terms offered, and that an action was thereupon commenced by Droge against this defendant to compel the specific performance of "his contract" to sell said property; that on November 17, 1919, defendant served on plaintiff a notice of revocation of his authority to sell the property; that in April, 1920, after negotiations conducted by the defendant alone, part of the property was sold by defendant to an association of persons, of which Droge was one, for the sum of $165,000; and that the balance of defendant's property in Fresno and included in Droge's offer of $130,000 was of the value of $18,000. From these facts, the trial court concluded that the defendant did not employ plaintiff to sell the property mentioned.

[2] On the appeal, we are referred to Curran v. Hubbard, 14 Cal. App. 733, 736, 114 P. 81, 82, where the owner wired to the broker to "Get me an offer"; to Kennedy v. Merickel, 8 Cal. App. 378, 383, 97 P. 81, 83, where the language used was, "Hoping to hear from you again with a proposition"; and to Toomy v. Dunphy, 86 Cal. 639, 642, 25 P. 130, where the owner wrote, "Henry Toomy can arrange for the sale of my ranch." In each of the cases cited, the appellate court held that the writing was sufficient to constitute a contract of employment. But any contract is to be interpreted in view of the surrounding circumstances with the aim to arrive at the intention of the parties, and cited cases are of little aid, unless they arise out of similar circumstances.

years past the plaintiff had been the confidential agent of the defendant in charge of all the latter's property in the county of Fresno. The letters which appear in the record are all of a friendly confidential nature, such as might pass between persons occupying positions of trust and confidence. No one of them is of the character which would be expected when one of the parties standing in that relation would seek to change the relation to an employment for an entirely different purpose. The letter of January, 1919, upon which plaintiff's cause of action is based, is merely a friendly letter of information telling the agent of defendant's own efforts regarding the sale of the property—a matter wholly foreign to the subject of the agency then existing between the parties. The statement therein that the owner "will give $5,000 to any one making a sale at that price" ($125,000) is not in itself an agreement to pay that sum to the plaintiff if he made a sale. It is merely the expression of the readiness of the owner to enter into a contract with any broker who gives promise of making a sale on those terms.

[4] We do not know why the plaintiff picked on the letter of January, 1919, as the basis of his suit, unless it was because that letter was one of the last in point of time written. If any one of the letters in the record shows a contract of employment within the holding of the cases above cited, it is the letter of October 31, 1917, where the defendant wrote, "Wish you would see if you can get an offer for the 12 lots." The other letters plainly indicate the defendant's anxiety regarding the sale. Some of them plead with the plaintiff to do something looking toward the sale of a part or all of the lots. If the letter of October, 1917, is to be treated as a contract of employment, the fact that, so far as this record is concerned, the plaintiff did nothing—did not even offer a prospect—until two years later, is sufficient to support the judgment; the offer not having been made within a reasonable time.

[5-7] Our own interpretation of the letter of January, 1919, based solely on the record before us, is that it was nothing more than a part of a friendly correspondence of information and inquiry between a principal and his agent. If it had been the intention of the owner to employ the plaintiff to sell the property, he would not have used the expression, "will give $5,000 to any one making a sale."

This is particularly true when we recall that in the same letter the owner told the plaintiff that he was then contemplating giving an option to purchase all the property to another party. But we are not required to speculate as to what was before the trial court when it reached its interpretation of the letter. It is the function of the trial court to determine the meaning and effect of an alleged contract in suit in the light of all the facts and surrounding circumstances. When the meaning is doubtful we are not able to say on appeal that the trial court was wrong when we have none of the evidence before us. The findings of fact do not necessarily require a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. It is true that the court found that the defendant caused the letter of January, 1919, to be sent to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff, in seeking a purchaser, acted pursuant to and in reliance upon all the letters mentioned in the findings. But it also found that the defendant did not on January 3, 1919, or at any other time, employ plaintiff to sell the property described. Of course, the fact that this latter holding appears under the heading of conclusions of law rather than in the findings of fact is no ground for the reversal of the judgment. Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 495, 21 P. 847.

[8] If there was any evidence which would compel the court to interpret the letter as a binding contract of employment within the terms of the statute of frauds, it was the duty of the appellant to place that evidence before us on this appeal. From the fact that he has not done so, we may fairly assume that this evidence was adverse to him, because if it had been favorable he would have placed the facts before this court so that we would have been in a position to determine whether prejudice resulted from the error complained of. Putting it in another way, when the record before us discloses a case where the judgment of the trial court would be correct if certain evidence had been before it, we should not reverse the judgment in the absence of a showing that the trial court did not have that evidence, because, in such a case, we cannot say that prejudice has resulted within the meaning of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

GARRATT et ux. v. AUTOMOTIVE FINANCE CORPORATION et al.
(Civ. 5092.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 4, 1925.)

Vendor and purchaser ⇨244—Evidence held to sustain finding that defendants were not good-faith purchasers of vendor's equities in land by reason of unpaid purchase price.

In action to establish and foreclose vendor's lien, on ground that no part of purchase price had been paid, and that defendants were successive grantees of property, without consideration and with knowledge of plaintiff's equities, by reason of unpaid purchase price, inconsistent and contradictory evidence of defendants held to sustain finding in favor of plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by M. W. Garratt and wife against the Automotive Finance Corporation and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, and P. A. Vincillione, of San Francisco (A. W. Hollingsworth, of Santa Rosa, of counsel), for appellants.

Marcel E. Cerf, C. H. Sooy, and Martin P. Brunton, all of San Francisco, and Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. Plaintiffs brought an action to establish and foreclose a vendor's lien upon certain real property situated in Sonoma county, Cal. In substance, it was alleged that this property had been conveyed to the defendant Automotive Finance Corporation upon the agreement of said corporation to pay $4,000 for the same to the plaintiffs; that no part of said purchase price had ever been paid; that the other defendants were successive grantees of this property, without consideration and with knowledge of the facts relating to the unpaid purchase price of the same.

The trial court found the facts to be substantially as alleged and gave judgment for the plaintiffs establishing and foreclosing their vendors' lien. The defendant R. H. Jones has appealed from this judgment. The only question presented by the record is whether the court was justified by the evidence in finding, in effect, that Jones was not a purchaser in good faith, for value without notice of the equities of the plaintiffs.

Ordinarily, when an attack is made upon the correctness of findings, it is customary for this court to review in its opinion the specific evidence justifying the trial court's action; but in the instant case it is impossible to give an adequate idea of the general effect and the pronounced atmosphere of this record without copying into this opinion each and every portion of it. It is because isolated portions of the record in and of themselves, perhaps, do not sustain the findings that the appellant is able to make a plausible argument by considering numerous statements appearing in the record, taken out of their general setting. But there is something more vital and more trustworthy in arriving at truth than a literal acceptance of segregated portions of a record upon appeal. This is demonstrated by the record before us here. The testimony of the appellant with its positive assertions about a few matters calculated to constitute him an innocent purchaser for value, and its uncertainties, its vagaries, its indirectness and incoherence in other particulars, and, above all, its direct opposition in innumerable particulars to the testimony of Kemp with relation to the same matters, creates an impression, an atmosphere, as it were, which is unescapable. It doubtless so impressed the trial judge and influenced his conclusions. He was not obliged to accept literally the statements of any witness when other matters in connection with the testimony of that witness created a grave doubt as to the entire testimony.

Simply, the story of this action is about as follows: The plaintiffs are husband and wife. They owned a mountain ranch in Sonoma county. The husband had an acquaintance with the defendant Kemp, who was an automobile salesman and employed by the Automotive Finance Corporation, of which one Herrick was the president. Kemp undertook to sell Garratt's ranch for a commission. He wrote to Garratt that he would bring a prospective purchaser to examine it. He brought Herrick. The two spoke largely of their profitable business and their huge earnings and displayed a check for "thousands of dollars"; spoke of a "Cadillac" automobile owned by Herrick's wife which was too splendid a conveyance for mountain use; of Herrick's wealth and his purchase of other real property. In short, they used all the cheap, gaudy means of impressing the unsophisticated. The result of their efforts was that Garratt deeded his ranch to Herrick's company and accepted in payment therefor merely the unsecured notes of this company. If this company was not then in financial distress, it became so shortly thereafter, and at the time of the trial of this action its affairs were being administered by a trustee for its creditors. This "successful deal" was manipulated with as much speed as skill, and Herrick and Kemp returned to San Francisco the same night, after having stopped upon their way home at Santa Rosa to have the deed recorded. But the details of their acquisition of the property are not of great importance here. They have not appealed from the judgment, and no one before this court has attempted the impossible task of covering their part in this transaction with any veneer of fair dealing.

Garratt discovered his mistake in a day or so, after discussing the matter with his bank, and he came to San Francisco and attempted to get some security for the notes which had been given him, but this was refused by Herrick. About a month later Kemp and Herrick were about to sever their business relations. Herrick claimed that about $300 was due Kemp for commissions earned. Kemp's account of the matter is so varied in the record that we are unable to state what it is. At one place he claimed about $2,900, although this is almost twice what he stated at other portions of the record was due him. At any rate, there was no money available to pay him anything, and Herrick, as president of the Automotive Finance Corporation, signed a deed of the Garratt ranch, conveying the same to Kemp. Herrick claimed this was done to enable Kemp to borrow $500 upon the property and retain $300 due him, and pay over the balance to the company; Kemp insisted that the property was given him, absolutely, in payment of this elastic amount of his commissions, which even at its highest estimate was about $600 less than the amount which Herrick had promised to pay Garratt for the property. Later Herrick attempted to have Kemp arrested for his alleged breach of trust in mortgaging the property for $1,500, but that phase of the matter does not concern us here. We shall follow Kemp: He took this deed, which was defective in being signed only by the president of the corporation when it recited upon its face that the corporation had authorized the president and secretary to sign the same, and called at the office of his uncle, an attorney at law. He did not find that gentleman at his office, but he found another attorney who has been called his "partner" in the record. Kemp explained to this attorney his pressing need for money and his desire to mortgage this property, and the attorney offered to take him to a client of his. He did so, and in this client we meet the defendant Jones. True, Mr. Jones is not bound by all we have heretofore stated, but we can better understand his activities when we have a picture of the scene upon which he enters. Mr. Jones has never seen the real property in question; he does not know Mr. Kemp. He is a different type of man from the former actor, Mr. Garratt. Mr. Jones is an attorney at law, practicing in Chinese exclusion cases at Angel island; he loaned money at 1 per cent. a month, secured by first mortgage upon real estate; he stated that he sometimes held property for people in trust. For 30 years he has been engaged in such activities, so we must credit him with considerable wordly wisdom and experience. But for a moment or so, at least, he is naively trusting. Mr. Kemp tells him that he has been offered a loan of $2,500 upon the property, but that he did not like the amount nor the term for which the loan was to run, and so he is seeking a $1,500 loan from Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones, although he has never before seen Mr. Kemp, and had never seen the land, deduced from this assertion that the property was easily good security for a $1,500 loan. He asked Kemp if he had borrowed any other money on the property, and, upon Kemp's statement that he had not, Jones also accepted that as a fact, and without further investigation concluded to loan the money at 1 per cent. a month interest. Kemp bought a blank form of mortgage, submitted it to Mr. Jones' attorney after it had been filled out, and Jones states he advanced $1,500. But by this time his caution and business experience had returned to his aid, and he did not do the obvious and simple thing. He drew this money out of the safe deposit box, according to his statement, and, although Kemp desired the cash immediately (not exactly a "rush act," Jones says, but a decidedly hurried proceeding), Jones purchased a cashier's check with the money and then introduced Kemp and had the check cashed immediately. The check was available as evidence in this case, and seems to settle the matter according to the appellant's view. Jones says Kemp received the proceeds of that check, and Kemp agrees in this statement. Kemp did not deposit this money anywhere, and it left no trace so far as this record is concerned. It was simply carried around in his pocket and spent, according to his statement. He states also that he gave Mr. Jones' attorney, who advised Jones about the loan and the papers evidencing it, a commission of $50 for arranging for the same.

A little later Jones decided to purchase this property from Kemp. The plaintiffs had the foresight to take the depositions of these two men before the trial of the action and to exclude one from the room while the other was testifying. It is exceedingly interesting, in a search for the truth in this case, to read these two depositions together. And it is because of the interest and illumination that lies in this exercise that this opinion can give no adequate idea of the content of this record taken as a whole and fitted together. True, their statements are in agreement as to the payment of the consideration by Jones, his lack of any notice of Garratt's equities, etc., but, upon events and details upon which questions could not have been anticipated, they are radically different. Take, for instance, the matter of the prospective purchase by Mr. Jones. He tells us that Mr. Kemp came into his office and said he wished to sell the property, and his wife had suggested that perhaps Mr. Jones, being a sportsman, would purchase it for deer hunting; that Kemp was a "born salesman" and gave a graphic account of the hunting and fishing upon the place; that Jones said he would look at the place, and, if it was as described, he would buy it. Mr. Kemp, however, did not recall this incident. He narrated that he and Mr. Jones started down to the property to hunt; that on the way to Santa Rosa he stated he would probably sell the property; that Jones, thereupon, said he might buy it if it suited him; that at this time Kemp had with him a deed to the property conveying the same to Jones and signed by himself and wife before a notary public, which had been prepared upon the possibility that, somehow, he might sell the property to Jones. Although this idea came to Mr. Jones as they were riding along the highway, it had taken form sufficiently when they reached Santa Rosa to cause Jones to go to an abstract company and deposit his check for $1,900, which was to be the balance of the purchase price over and above the amount previously advanced on the mortgage. Kemp also deposited his deed, and the abstract company was instructed to hold these papers until further notice from Jones. They then proceeded to the property and spent an hour or so there. Jones did not know the exact boundaries, but he was satisfied, and the two returned to San Francisco. We must not forget that before this "hurry up" transaction, Jones had been told of the attempted criminal prosecution of Kemp by Herrick over this property, and he also had the preliminary statement of the abstract company pointing out the defect in the deed from the corporation to Kemp and suggesting the execution of another deed, but Jones was not concerned about either of these important matters; his naive simplicity had returned.

It is impossible to ascertain from the conflicting statements—conflicts not only as between the parties, but in the statements of either standing alone—what was actually paid for this property, but, including the amount asserted to have been advanced previously, it is claimed to be something between $3,200 and $3,500.

Respondent collects in his brief various portions of the record upon which he seeks to charge Jones with constructive notice of Garratt's equities from his continued possession of the property, based upon the fact that, when Jones visited the property before completing the alleged purchase, Garratt had some sheep pastured there and some personal property in the cabin upon the land. It is sought by means of this evidence to bring the case within the rule of Pell v. McElroy, 36 Cal. 268. On the other hand, appellant considers this evidence, piece by piece, and demonstrates, to his satisfaction, that it is not sufficient to charge Jones with constructive notice. But the judgment need not rest upon that phase of the case alone. It may rest upon the bad faith of appellant in acquiring the record title of the property. Now, it is obvious that Jones' bad faith, if any, is a matter which is most difficult for the plaintiffs to demonstrate. The situation is akin to the cases where fraud is established by indirect evidence, because of the inherent impossibility of proving it directly. We hesitate to discredit the testimony of any witness, and we should not do so in this case if the trial court, in watching the witnesses upon the stand, had not reached a conclusion which even the cold printed pages seem to justify. It is our duty to uphold the findings of the trial court wherever possible. The trial court is better able to judge of truth, from its personal contact with the witnesses, than are we, and, when our impression from the printed record is so exactly in harmony with the conclusion drawn by the trial court from its point of vantage, neither our inclination nor our duty permit us to reverse a judgment.

It is interesting to observe that at the time of the trial the testimony of Mr. Kemp and Mr. Jones was rather carefully harmonized, in marked distinction to the divergence in their depositions taken earlier, when the transactions were fresher in their minds. It is also significant to observe how directly and intelligently Mr. Jones and Mr. Kemp were able to answer questions which might have been anticipated in an action of this character, and how incoherent and rambling and "out of character" are their answers in the record upon other matters. The respondents have printed examples of this in their brief, and they would be pertinent here along with the numerous other matters we have mentioned and a great many additional circumstances appearing in the record, if time and space permitted of their inclusion.

However, we think we have said enough with reference to the record before us. No specific thing or things warrants the conclusion of the trial court, we concede that to the appellant; but the entire record, each part taken in connection with each other part, compels such conclusion.

The judgment is affirmed.

HART v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 2936.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 5, 1925.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 74(1), 76(1), 85(4)—Workmen's Compensation Act, $\S$ 19, subd. 3, permitting Industrial Commission to receive the report of attending or examining physician as evidence, is constitutional; "court."

Workmen's Compensation Act, $\S$ 19, subd. c. as amended by act May 23, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 849), providing that Commission may receive reports of physicians as evidence, does not violate Const. art. 1, $\S$ 11, providing for uniform operation of general laws, or Const. art. 4, $\S$ 25, subd. 3, prohibiting local or special laws regulating practice in courts, or Const. art. 4, $\S$ 25, subd. 33, directing that, where general law can be made applicable, it is duty of Legislature to so provide, since Industrial Accident Commission is not a "court" within Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Court (Of Justice).]

2. Master and servant $\S$ 417(7)—Weight of examining physician's report is for Commission.

The weight and credibility to be given reports of an examining physician is for the Industrial Commission, and not for the court.

3. Master and servant $\S$ 405(4)—Commission may act on report of examining physician rather than on medical books.

Industrial Accident Commission is justified in acting on report of an examining physician relating to the cause of injury rather than on theories and statements contained in medical books.

4. Master and servant $\S$ 417(7)—Commission's denial of rehearing for newly discovered evidence conclusive.

Unless alleged newly discovered cumulative evidence was such as to lead to a different conclusion as to proximate cause of injury than that arrived at by Commission, it was duty of Commission to deny a rehearing, and its determination is final and conclusive, under Workmen's Compensation Act $\S$ 67, subd. c.

5. Master and servant $\S$ 405(4)—Evidence held to sustain denial of compensation for hernia.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain findings by Industrial Accident Commission that hernia did not arise out of or was proximately caused by the employment.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by J. E. Hart, opposed by E. G. Engman and the Aetna Life Insurance Company, insurer. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission of California, denying compensation, claimant applied for certiorari. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This matter is based upon the petition of J. E. Hart to review the proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California, denying compensation in the case of J. E. Hart v. E. G. Engman and the Aetna Life Insurance Company.

The return of the Commission sets forth by questions and answers the testimony of petitioner taken upon the hearing, which we summarize as follows:

"I am an automobile mechanic, and have been with this firm four and one-half years. On September 26th, I was adjusting brakes and grabbed hold of a tire with the brakes set, and they let loose, and I slipped and fell. I was under quite a strain. I went down and hurt myself, and a little while afterwards, I felt a peculiar sensation in my right side, and that evening I went to see the doctor. It was not a great pain, but I could feel it when I straightened up after I got through. Very shortly after—10 or 15 minutes—I felt it just a few minutes after it happened, nothing before that. It bothers me now enough to prevent me working, and it pains me at times in certain positions that I get in doing nothing. When I am sitting down or laying down, I do not feel it, but when I am even walking around doing nothing I can feel it, a sort of a thorn in there, it doesn't seem right at all. I went home and changed my clothes, and I found a little swelling about half the size of a walnut. I did not stop work at the time and went right on and finished adjusting the brakes. I went up Thursday night (to the doctor's office on the evening of the accident) and I have not done anything since. I have never had any swelling or any sensation of pain in my right side before. That is the first time I ever had any pain there. If there was any swelling there, it didn't hurt me at all, and I never paid any attention to it. I didn't realize it was serious until I went home and saw the lump."

Included in the return, as a part of the testimony taken before the Commission, is a letter written by Dr. Bartlett, an examining physician in this case, under date of October 1, 1924, as follows:

"Attention Dr. R. N. Gray:

"Mr. J. E. Hart, of 521 8th street, Santa Rosa, Cal., reporting at my office October 1st for examination and report, regarding hernia.

"History—White, male, married, 36, employed as mechanic, claims injury on Friday, September 26th, 1924, at 4 p. m.

"Patient was testing out the brakes on a car by attempting to turn the rear wheel with the brake set. To accomplish this he grasped the tire with his hands and placed his right foot on a lug nut. Simultaneously he pressed down with his right foot and pulled with his hands. His foot slipped off of the lug nut and he pitched forward on to the ground. About 10 or 15 minutes later patient became conscious of a pain in his right groin. He does not describe this pain very accurately but says that it was a sort of swelling sensation. He finished his day's work under some handicap from pain but without great distress. That evening, from one to two hours later, when changing his clothes he discovered a swelling in this groin at the site of pain. The pain has been quite constant ever since the accident, though not so severe as on the first day and only barely noticeable when he is lying down. The swelling is present excepting when he lies down. Patient has not worked since the day of the accident because he was afraid he might further damage himself.

"Patient claims that he has never had any troubles in his groins before such as pain, swelling or rupture. He has always done very heavy work.

"Examination—The right external inguinal ring is very large. The inguinal canal is enormously dilated. A huge mass descends by way of the cord and protrudes about 5 cm. beyond the edges of the external ring whenever the patient strains, or when he stands up. The mass goes back very easily. There is gurgling on pressure. The conjoined tendon is quite relaxed, the internal ring is enormously dilated. There is no tenderness in the ring.

"On the opposite side the structures seem to be normal. Patient complains more of the examination on the left side than on the right side. The scrotal contents are normal except for a markedly atrophic testicle on the right, the result of an orchitis about 12 years ago.

"Conclusion—Patient has a right indirect advanced inguinal hernia. This is an old hernia inasmuch as it is too large to have developed in 5 days and tenderness is lacking.

"Edwin I. Bartlett."

Upon the foregoing testimony, the Commission made the following findings of fact:

"That J. E. Hart, on the 26th day of September, 1924, at Santa Rosa, Cal., while in the employ of defendant, E. G. Engman, at which time the employer was insured against liability under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917 by defendant Aetna Life Insurance Company, was found to be suffering from a right inguinal hernia which condition constitutes the basis of the claim herein asserted," and "that the evidence herein is insufficient to establish as a fact that said hernia arose out of or was proximately caused by the aforesaid employment."

In accordance with these findings, it was ordered that the claimant take nothing by reason of his application for compensation. Within the time provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act, the applicant filed with the Commission his petition for a rehearing, based upon two grounds: 1. That the evidence does not justify the findings of fact; 2. Newly discovered evidence.

Thereafter the Commission passed upon the applicant's petition for a rehearing, as follows:

"Findings and award having been approved herein on the 9th day of October, 1924, and the applicant having on October 14, 1924, filed his petition herein asking for a rehearing, and no good cause appearing why said petition should be granted, now therefore, it is hereby ordered that said petition for rehearing be, and it is hereby, denied. Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 31st day of October, 1924. * * *"

[1] The first error on the part of the Commission assigned by the applicant herein as a reason why the findings should be annulled and a rehearing granted is based upon the action of the Commission in receiving, and, therefore, acting upon, hearsay testimony which consisted in the report of an examination upon the applicant made by Dr. Bartlett. The existence of legislative sanction for the admission of such testimony is recognized but the constitutionality thereof is questioned.

Subdivision c of section 19 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as amended May 23, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 849) in relation to the receipt of evidence by the Commission, provides as follows:

"The Commission may receive as evidence, either at or subsequent to a hearing, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, the following matters, in addition to sworn testimony presented in open hearing: (1) Reports of attending or examining physicians. * * *"

The remainder of the subdivision is not pertinent to this inquiry. The petitioner contends that this subdivision of section 19 of the Workmen's Compensation Act is violative of section 11 of article 1, and of subdivisions 3 and 33 of section 25 of article 4 of the state Constitution. Section 11 of article 1, supra, reads: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Subdivision 3 of section 25 of article 4, supra, specifies that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws regulating the practice of courts of justice, and subdivision 33 of said section 25 directs that in all cases where a general law can be made applicable, it is the duty of the Legislature so to provide.

A complete answer to the foregoing objections is found in the fact that the act in question does not, either in purport, or in effect, regulate in any particular the practice of any court of justice, and the act in question, in relation to the admission of testimony, is general in all cases coming before the Commission. It is true that the Supreme Court of the state has held that, under the provisions of the state Constitution, as now amended, the Industrial Accident Commission is invested with certain judicial powers, but this does not, in and of itself, constitute the Commission a court in any sense of the word as that term is used in the state Constitution. It has been frequently decided that such bodies, as boards of supervisors, exercise judicial functions, but it has never been contended that therefore a board of supervisors, when exercising such functions, becomes a court, as that term is used and defined in our state Constitution.

As to the general proposition concerning the admission of hearsay testimony, the Supreme Court of this state, in P. G. & E. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788, has held:

"In view of section 60 (a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 871), a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission of the existence of the relationship of employer and employee based upon hearsay evidence is binding upon the reviewing court."

See, also, McFeely v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. App.) 223 P. 413, where the authorities supporting the admission of such testimony are fully set forth.

[2] As to whether reports of examining physicians are reliable and whether credence may be given thereto and action based thereupon are not matters for this court to determine. The Legislature has amended the law so as to admit the receipt of such testimony by the Commission, and the weight and credibility to be given thereto is for the Commission, and not for the court.

[3] A considerable portion of the petitioner's brief is given over to a consideration of the causes of hernia, its origin, its symptoms and results, based upon quotations from De Quervain on Clinical Diagnosis and Buckman's Operative Surgery. These writers differ somewhat from the conclusions reached by Dr. Bartlett, but we have no means of determining whether these writers are more accurate in their statement, or better informed, or more likely to give correct information, than Dr. Bartlett. The argument of counsel reduced to a simple statement is the placing of hearsay testimony against hearsay testimony, the writing found in a book against the writing constituting the report of an examining physician. We think the Commission justified in acting upon the report of the examining physician, rather than upon theories, or suppositions or statements found in books, because the writer of the report undoubtedly knew at the time of making the same that he was subject to the call of the Commission and could be specifically and thoroughly interrogated as to any matters or statements contained therein. In any event, these are matters for the Commission, and are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commission.

A number of cases have been cited where findings of the Commission have been set aside and the causes remanded for rehearing, but an examination of such cases shows they are based upon nonconflicting testimony, and the questions presented were simply whether the testimony was legally sufficient or insufficient to support the findings of the Commission. Our attention is also called to the case of Clapps Parking Station v. Industrial Accident Commission, 51 Cal. App. 624, 197 P. 369, where the award of the Industrial Accident Commission was annulled on certiorari for insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a material finding of the Commission, and the case remanded for further proceedings before the Commission, as per the request of the Commission for the taking of additional testimony. The question involved was whether the injury was occasioned at a time when the deceased was actually in the service as well as in the employ of his employer, and it was held by the court that the undisputed testimony failed to show such service. That case does not present an instance where the Industrial Accident Commission is passing upon conflicting testimony. In the case at bar, we have the testimony of the applicant, the statement of the examining physician, and also the fact that the Commission had before it an application for a rehearing based upon a petition setting forth the nature and character of the additional testimony possible to be presented for consideration by the Commission, just as presented to this court, and, with these facts before it, the Commission reaffirmed its conclusion that the petitioner was not entitled to compensation.

[4] The foregoing statement brings us to the situation presented by subdivision c of section 67 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, wherein it is set forth that:

"The findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact shall be conclusive and final and shall not be subject to review; such questions of fact shall include ultimate fact and the findings and conclusions of the Commission. * * *"

The additional testimony sought to be introduced is only cumulative, and its character is sufficiently foreshadowed by the affidavits presented to enable the Commission to determine whether it would have any weight or bearing upon the vital issue involved in this case, to wit, the proximate cause of the hernia, and, unless the alleged newly discovered evidence was such as to lead to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the Commission as to the proximate cause, it was the duty of the Commission to deny a rehearing. We think the jurisdiction of the Commission to pass upon these questions and the finality of their decision are embraced within said subdivision c of section 67, supra.

[5] The record discloses sufficient evidence to support the findings and award of the Commission. It therefore follows that the award of the Commission must be, and the same is, hereby affirmed.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨44—Statement of vendor's agent that vicinity was practically frostless not shown to be true.

In action to recover back purchase price of orange grove because of fraudulent misrepresentations by vendor's agent, evidence held not to show truth of representation that district was practically frostless.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4)—Representations to purchaser of orange grove as to value of crop on trees, and that district was practically frostless, held representations of fact.

In action to recover purchase price of orange grove, representations of vendor's agent as to value of crops on trees, and that district was practically frostless, held positive representations of fact, and not mere expression of opinion.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(2)—Statement to purchaser of orange grove that there were 10 acres of 12 year old trees instead of nine substantial misrepresentation.

In action to recover purchase price of orange grove on grounds of misrepresentations of vendor's agent, statement that there were 10 acres of 12 year old trees instead of nine held substantial misrepresentation.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4)—Statement to purchaser of orange grove that there were three bare acres, which in fact were planted with pomegranates, substantial misrepresentation.

In action to recover purchase price of orange grove on ground of fraudulent misrepresentations of vendor's agent, statement that there were three acres of bare land, which in fact were planted to pomegranates, held substantial misrepresentation.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(6)—Misrepresentation of single material fact on which purchaser relied will support recovery of purchase price.

Misrepresentation of a single material fact on which purchaser had a right to and did rely will support an action to recover back purchase price.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(5)—Intent to make misrepresentations immaterial.

In action to recover purchase price on grounds of misrepresentations, that agent of vendor did not intend to deceive purchasers by his representations is immaterial; the essential element being intent to induce the other party to enter the contract, under Civ. Code, § 1572.

10. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4)—Purchaser need not show property was worth less than he paid to recover for misrepresentations.

In action to recover purchase price on grounds of fraudulent misrepresentations of vendor's agent, purchaser need not show property was worth less than price to be paid; fact that it was represented at a greater value than it had being sufficient.

HARRIS et al. v. MILLER. (Sac. 3531.)

1. Fraud ⇨11(1)—Expression of opinion relied on treated as statement of fact.

When representation concerning subject-matter of transaction, which ordinarily might be only expression of opinion as to existence of fact, has reasonable tendency to induce other party to consider and rely upon such representation as a fact, it will be treated as an assertion of an existing fact within meaning of rule as to fraudulent representations.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨44—Finding that representation of vendor's agent that there was $4,000 crop of oranges on trees was merely an opinion, not supported by evidence.

In action to recover back purchase price of orange grove, on grounds of fraudulent representations by vendor's agent, who was experienced in cultivation of oranges and sale of orange crops and groves, to purchasers who had no experience therein, finding that statement that there was $4,000 crop of oranges on trees was but expression of opinion rather than statement of fact held not supported by evidence.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(1)—Responsibility for inducing purchase, by opinion as to facts known to be nonexistent, cannot be avoided.

One who induces a purchase, by estimates or opinions, professedly based on alleged facts and known to be nonexistent, will not be allowed to escape responsibility on plea that he was merely declaring an opinion.

11. Vendor and purchaser ⇐339—Failure of purchaser of orange grove to tender proceeds from orange crop held not to defeat right to recover purchase price.

Where purchaser of orange grove rescinded contract on grounds of fraudulent misrepresentations of vendor's agent, and vendor had taken possession, failure to offer return of proceeds from sale of crop of oranges on trees at time of purchase held not to defeat right to recover purchase price already paid, where proceeds of crop had been spent in caring for orchard.

12. Vendor and purchaser ⇐214(2)—Contract for purchase of orange grove assignable.

Contract for purchase of orange grove to be paid for in installments, together with rights incidental thereto, held assignable.

13. Vendor and purchaser ⇐214(5)—Assignment of interest in contract for purchase of orange grove carried with it right to rescind for fraud.

Assignment of purchaser's interest in contract for sale of orange grove held to carry with it right to rescind on ground of fraud.

14. Evidence ⇐219(3)—Proof that vendor had accepted compromise of purchaser's claim for fraudulent representations would be admissible.

In action to recover purchase price of land on grounds of fraudulent misrepresentations of vendor's agent, proof that vendor had accepted a compromise of purchaser's claim through its agent would be admissible as an admission against interest, though a mere offer of compromise would not be admissible.

15. Evidence ⇐258(1)—Evidence that vendor's agent had accepted compromise properly excluded, where authority of agent to accept it was not shown.

In action to recover purchase price of orange grove on grounds of misrepresentations of vendor's agent, evidence that agent had accepted compromise of purchaser's claim was properly rejected, in absence of any showing of authority and acceptance as agent of vendor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Samuel P. Harris and another against Lottie Tate Miller. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Theodore L. Breslauer, of San Francisco, and Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for appellants.

Power & McFadzean and W. W. Middlecoff, all of Visalia, for respondent.

LENNON, J. In this action the plaintiffs' complaint pleaded a cause of action against the defendant in the form of a common count, for moneys had and received in the sum of $8,500. Defendant, answering, denied all of the material allegations of the complaint. The evidence, adduced in response to the issues made by the pleadings, discloses that the gravamen of the plaintiffs' cause of action is for fraud and deceit, and consists of claimed false and fraudulent representations alleged to have been made to the plaintiffs, by an agent of the defendant, whereby Samuel P. Harris, one of the plaintiffs, was induced to enter into a written agreement with the defendant for the purchase at the agreed price of $26,000, of a 20-acre tract of land planted to oranges and situated in the county of Tulare.

By the terms of the agreement the plaintiff, Samuel P. Harris, was to pay the sum of $1,000 cash upon the execution of the contract; the remainder was to be paid in certain specified installments at certain designated intervals of time following the initial payment. The contract in controversy contained, among other covenants, the provisions that "in the event the present orange crop upon said property is ready for marketing before the first $12,000 is paid upon the said purchase price, the said crop shall be marketed through the Strathmore Orange Grove Company and the proceeds or returns derived therefrom to be paid to the said party of the first part (the defendant) and be by her credited upon the said $12,000 payment."

The plaintiffs paid the installments contracted for until the sum of $8,500 had been paid to the defendant. It was the plaintiffs' claim, and the proof offered and received in support of their case tends to show, that they were persuaded to purchase the property in question by false representations made by the defendant's agent as to the number of orange trees growing upon the land, the value of the crop upon the trees; and the character of the climatic conditions relative to the production of oranges in the locality in which the land is situated. More precisely stated, the material misrepresentations claimed and relied upon by the plaintiffs as an inducement to enter into the contract were these: The defendant's agent said to them that there was a $4,000 crop of oranges growing upon the trees at the time that the contract was entered into; that the locality in which the orchard was situated was free from frosts; that 10 acres (one-half of the tract) was planted in twelve-year old navel orange trees, and that the other half of the tract, with the exception of one acre, which was devoted to a family orchard, was planted in six year old orange trees; that all of the trees were in good condition save those in the family orchard; and that there never was a frost in the locality of the tract.

Some time in September, 1920, so the evidence shows, the plaintiffs went to Porterville and came in contact with Mr. Farmer, the agent of the defendant. He showed the plaintiffs generally around the district, and finally took them to the Miller property.

They inspected the house partially, but made no detailed inspection of the orange grove. The agent gave to the plaintiffs a typewritten prospectus which reads in part as follows:

"Miller Twenty Acres." "This property consists of 10 acres Washington Navel orange trees, 12 years old; nine acres Washington Navel orange trees, 6 years old; one acre family orchard. * * * There is a $4,000 crop now hanging on the trees marketable in November."

It is an admitted fact in the case that the defendant's agent was aware, during all of the time the agreement in controversy was being negotiated, of the undisputed fact that the plaintiffs had no experience in or knowledge of orange growing; were utterly ignorant of the value of orange lands and orange crops, and had no knowledge whatever of climatic conditions in the locality in which the tract of land is situate, and had not inspected the grove in question prior to its purchase by them from the defendant.

The evidence shows that the defendant's agent who negotiated the agreement had resided in the vicinity of the land in question for 12 years; that he was an experienced fruit man; that he had particular experience in growing and cultivating oranges; that he owned and operated the "Strathmore Orange Grove Company," the company named in the contract to which the money received from the sale of the crop was to be paid on account of the purchase price of the land; that he frequently bought and sold orange groves on his own account in the vicinity of the tract of land in controversy. It is not disputed that, when the agent of the defendant told the plaintiffs that there was a $4,000 crop of oranges on the trees at the time the contract was negotiated, he meant $4,000 net; nor is it disputed that the defendant's agent told them that there were in fact 10 acres of land planted to twelve-year old-trees and that the district in which the grove in question is located was practically frostless.

The findings of the trial court are to the effect that the defendant's agent did not represent or guarantee that there was a $4,000 crop of oranges then growing on the trees in the orchard, but did express an opinion that there was a $4,000 crop of oranges then growing on the orchard; that the orchard was in good condition; that there were nine acres of six-year-old trees in which there was a tract consisting of about three acres of pomegranate trees; that the defendant's agent, prior to the time of entering into the contract, stated to the plaintiffs that said three acres would have to be replanted and should be replanted to deciduous trees; that in said locality the frost had never injured navel orange fruit, and that said orchard was all of the navel orange variety; that the frost had never been known to injure trees over six years old; that no representations made by the agent of defendant to plaintiffs, or either of them, were made with intent to deceive or defraud the plaintiffs or either of them; and neither of the plaintiffs was defrauded or damaged in any sum by reason of any of the representations or acts of the defendant or her agent. It will be noted that the trial court did not find that the defendant did not say to the plaintiffs that the district in which the grove in question is located "was practically free from frost." Nor did the trial court find one way or the other concerning the alleged representations of the agent relative to the number of acres planted to twelve year old trees.

From the judgment in favor of the defendant based upon the foregoing findings plaintiffs appealed.

[1, 2] The finding of the trial court to the effect that the statement of Farmer, the agent of the defendant, that there was a $4,000 crop of oranges on the trees, was but the statement of an opinion rather than the asseveration of an existing fact is not, we think, supported by the evidence. It is the general and well-settled rule that, when a representation concerning the subject-matter of a transaction which might, ordinarily, be only the expression of an opinion is asserted as an existing fact, material to the transaction, and which has a reasonable tendency to induce one of the parties to the transaction to consider and rely upon such representation as a fact, the statement then becomes an assertion of an existing fact within the meaning of the general rule as to fraudulent representations. 2 Pomeroy [3d Ed.] § 878; Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 538, 189 P. 440; Sheer v. Hoyt, 13 Cal. App. 622, 110 P. 477; Winkler v. Jerrue, 20 Cal. App. 555, 129 P. 804; Myers v. Lowery, 46 Cal. App. 682, 189 P. 793; Edge v. Bryan, 47 Cal. App. 312, 190 P. 476; Stockton v. Hind, 51 Cal. App. 131, 196 P. 122; Tracy v. Smith, 175 Cal. 161, 165 P. 535; Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 P. 1018; Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 77 P. 954.

Every element necessary to the invocation and application of the rule stated is to be found in the undisputed facts of the instant case. The plaintiffs had no knowledge of orange growing. The defendant's agent was an experienced man in the cultivation of oranges and the sale of orange crops and orange groves. The defendant's agent knew that the plaintiffs were relying upon him absolutely. That the value of the crop was a material representation cannot be doubted, for, by the very terms of the contract, the crop was to go to the defendant in payment of the $3,500 installment provided for in the contract. That it was instrumental in procuring plaintiff's signature to the contract is evidenced by the fact that the defendant's agent insisted that, if the plaintiffs did not enter into the contract at once, the crop would be withdrawn from the terms of the agreement.

Although the agent of the defendant testified that his assertion to the plaintiffs that there was a $4,000 crop on the trees was only his "estimate" of the value of the crop, he did not testify that he did not say to the plaintiffs that there was a $4,000 net crop of oranges on the trees. In short, he did not inform the plaintiffs that his statement concerning the value of the crop was only an opinion rather than the statement of a known fact.

[3] The agent of the defendant admitted that he had visited the grove in question some three months prior to the sale for the purpose of estimating the value of the crop, and that in doing so he walked two or three times diagonally between the trees. The agent also admitted that he observed the crop on the trees within a month of the sale, and that he then estimated the number of boxes of oranges on the trees to be 1,500 loose or 1,000 packed, which he figured at the time he made the estimate would bring $4 a box packed. The first pool of the oranges sold at $4.15 a box, which price, if maintained, would have brought $4,150 gross. The total crop, however, ultimately brought approximately only the sum of $2,200, or an average of $2 a box. On cross-examination the defendant's agent admitted that, in order to approximate his estimate of the value of the crop as $4,000 net, the oranges should have sold for $6 a box. It is at once apparent that the agent's own estimate of 1,000 boxes, selling at $4 a box, would not approximate his representation that the value of the crop was $4,000 net, and therefore the agent must have known at the time he made the representations concerning the value of the crop that there was not and could not be a $4,000 net crop on the trees. "A party inducing another to contract in reliance upon estimates or opinions professedly based upon alleged facts known to the party stating them to be nonexistent will not be permitted to escape responsibility by the plea that he was merely declaring his opinion." Henry v. Continental, etc., 156 Cal. 667, 680, 105 P. 900, 965.

[4] It is not disputed that the defendant's own agent represented to the plaintiffs that the tract of land within which the Miller property is located was situated in a vicinity which was "practically frostless." He stated that this was one of the reasons the value of the land in the vicinity was so high. The uncontradicted evidence shows, however, that as a matter of fact there had been two frosts in the vicinity during the time the agent resided there, and that one of these frosts was an exceptionally heavy frost, which destroyed the three acres of young orange trees

(one-third of the new orchard planted in 1912) subsequently planted to pomegranate trees. Although the agent testified that he was not aware of the destruction of these three acres of orange trees by the frost of 1913, it is scarcely possible that he could have resided in the district at the time and remained ignorant of the fact that there had been a frost. The frost of 1916 did not injure the trees then on the property, for the reason that at that time they were old enough not to be injured. The defendant's agent testified that he said that there was no danger of frost for the reason that the orange trees on the property were navel oranges and these were usually harvested in December before the frosts came. According to the testimony of defendant's own witness, the crop of navel oranges in the low ground were frozen in 1916. While it may be true that the frost ordinarily falling in the vicinity of the grove in question may not have been sufficiently severe to injure full-grown trees, nevertheless, it is an uncontradicted fact in the case that such frosts were sufficiently severe to injure any new orange trees which might be set out on the three-acre tract of land which the agent said was bare land and should be replanted. Consequently it cannot be said, as is contended, that the evidence shows the truth of the agent's statement that the district "was practically frostless."

[5] Considered alone and standing by themselves, the representation as to the value of the crop and the statement as to the climatic condition obtaining in the district where the land in controversy was located might be held to be mere expressions of opinion and therefore could not be made the basis of an action for deceit and misrepresentation. But, when taken together and then coupled with all of the admitted and undisputed facts and circumstances of this case, the conclusion is inescapable, it seems to us, that they were, as a matter of law, positive representations rather than a mere expression of an opinion of existing facts made by one assuming to have knowledge of the subject and which were undoubtedly and admittedly material inducements to the making of the contract in controversy. Muller v. Palmer, supra; Tracy v. Smith, supra; Myers v. Lowery, supra.

[6] Clearly, the number of orange trees planted to the grove in question was a material factor in the making of the contract in controversy. And the record shows without contradiction that the plaintiffs were told prior to the consummation of the contract that there were ten acres of twelve-year-old orange trees, whereas, in truth and in fact, there were but nine acres of such trees. The trial court failed to find upon this phase of the case. This discrepancy in the representation as to the number of acres planted to twelve-year-old orange trees makes a difference of $1,000 in the actual value of the land and a substantial depreciation in the producing power of the grove as a whole. The plaintiffs undoubtedly were entitled to have delivered to them the grove which they contracted for in substantial accord with the inducing representations of the agent of the defendant. The difference between nine and ten acres of twelve-year-old trees is a substantial difference.

[7] While it is true there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the agent of the defendant prior to the consummation of the contract informed the plaintiffs with reference to the other half of the tract that there were six acres of six-year-old trees and three acres of bare land instead of nine acres of six-year-old trees as represented in the prospectus, still the fact remains undisputed that there were not three acres of vacant orange land, for the reason that three of the nine acres referred to were planted to pomegranates. The plaintiffs were not required to take nine acres of twelve-year-old orange trees in lieu of the ten acres contracted for. Nor were they required to take three acres of land planted to pomegranate trees for three acres of unplanted land.

[8] It will thus be seen that several misrepresentations of material matters of fact entered into the procurement and consummation of the contract in controversy. And it is well settled that the misrepresentation of even a single material fact upon which the plaintiffs had a right to and did rely will suffice to support plaintiffs' cause of action. Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047; Thomas v. Hacker, 179 Cal. 731, 178 P. 855; Scott v. Delta L. & N. Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 P. 389.

[9, 10] The fact that the agent of the defendant, as the court found, had no intent in making the representations in question to deceive the plaintiffs will not militate against the plaintiffs' cause of action. The party making misrepresentations which operate as an inducement for the making of a contract, which he knows to be untrue or having no ground for believing them to be true, will not be held immune from the consequences resulting therefrom by an absence of an intent to deceive. The essential element in causes of action of the character of the instant case is the "intent to induce another party to enter into the contract." Civ. Code, § 1572. Nor is it essential that it be shown that the property contracted for was worth less than the price agreed to be paid for it. It will suffice if it appears that, if the property purchased had been as represented, it would have been of greater value than it actually was. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011.

scission, there is no merit in the contention that the right to rescind was lost because, with the demand for the return of the $8,500 in suit, no offer was made to return to the defendant the sum of $2,200 which was derived from the sale of the crop of oranges. This money was applied by the Strathmore Orange Grove Company, who handled the sale of the crop, to the expenses of caring for the orchard, such as spraying, fertilizing, etc. The defendant, before the filing of the suit, had retaken possession of the property. The plaintiffs had not been given title to the property nor had they received any benefit or anything of value from the transaction. It cannot be said that the plaintiffs' failure to return or offer to return something which they did not have and which the defendant did have operated to defeat the cause of action.

[12, 13] The contract in controversy was signed only by Samuel P. Harris and the defendant, Lottie Tate Miller. And, while Samuel P. Harris is joined as plaintiff with M. Kate Harris, it appears that, prior to the institution of the action, said Samuel P. Harris assigned by written instrument all of his right, title, and interest in said contract and to the land to which it related to the plaintiff M. Kate Harris. The contract and the rights incidental thereto were assignable (More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 590; Rued v. Cooper, 109 Cal. 682, 34 P. 98; Kemp v. Enemark [Cal. Sup.] 230 P. 441; Henderson v. Henshall, 54 F. 320, 4 C. C. A. 357), and, under all of the particular circumstances of the instant case, the assignment, we think, carried with it the right to rescind on the ground of fraud.

[14, 15] The plaintiffs complain of a ruling of the trial court which precluded proof in their behalf of the fact that the defendant had accepted a compromise of plaintiffs' claim effected by Farmer as agent of the defendant. The proffered proof was objected to upon the ground that no foundation for such evidence was laid in this, that it was not shown that Farmer, at that particular time was authorized to act as the agent of the defendant in effecting such compromise and rescission. The objection was sustained by the trial court upon the ground stated and upon the further ground, volunteered by the trial court, that to admit the evidence "would be * * * destructive of the objection against admitting offers of compromise."

The plaintiffs offered in evidence several letters and telegrams which tended to show that the defendant, through Farmer, had entered into negotiations for the purpose of effecting a compromise of the plaintiffs' claim and that these negotiations had proceeded to a point where the compromise had been accepted by Farmer, the agent of the defendant. Upon this phase of the case the evidence showing, as we think it did, the acceptance of an offer to compromise plaintiffs' claim of fraud and misrepresentation, was admissible as evidence from which an admission of the defendant against interest might be inferred. 2 Jones on Evidence, § 291. Of course, it is the general rule that a mere offer of compromise, for familiar reasons, is not admissible in evidence. But, when it is shown that the offer of compromise has been accepted, it becomes a completed agreement, and the offer and its acceptance were admissible in evidence. 2 Jones on Evidence, § 291; 22 Corp. Jur. § 352; Dugger v. Kelly, 168 Iowa, 129, 140, 150 N. W. 27. Nevertheless, the ruling of the trial court must be sustained upon the ground that it was not shown nor attempted to be shown that Farmer was authorized to and did accept as the agent of the defendant the offer of compromise.

The judgment appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WILLIAMS v. CITY OF STOCKTON et al.
(Sac. 3648.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚡342—Mayor required to sign contract for construction of city hall.

Under Stockton City Charter (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 289), § 95, providing that all contracts should be drawn under supervision of city attorney in writing and executed by officer authorized to sign same, and resolution awarding contract for construction of a new city hall to plaintiff, and authorizing mayor to execute contract which had been approved by city attorney, mayor was required to sign contract and could not refuse to do so without legal justification.

2. Mandamus ⚡92—Would lie to compel mayor to execute contract for construction of new city hall; "ministerial act."

Mandamus would lie to compel mayor to sign contract for construction of new city hall, though such duty did not arise under any charter provision, where he was authorized and directed by resolution of council to sign same, his duty then being ministerial only and involving exercise of no discretion, and plaintiff having no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of the law; "ministerial act" being one which a public officer is required to perform, on a given state of facts in a prescribed manner in obedience to mandate of legal authority, without regard to his own judgment or opinion concerning propriety of act to be performed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ministerial Act.]

3. Mandamus ⚡71 — Proper to compel performance of ministerial duty.

Mandamus is proper remedy to compel performance of a ministerial duty.

4. Mandamus ⚡7—Writ granted as matter of right, where substantial right cannot be otherwise enforced.

While mandamus is a discretionary writ and will not issue where its enforcement would work an injustice or accomplish a legal wrong, yet where one has a substantial right which cannot otherwise be enforced and a failure of justice would result in refusing it, writ issues as a matter of right.

5. Mandamus ⚡3(4)—Would lie to compel mayor to execute contract for construction of new city hall.

Mandamus would lie to compel mayor to execute contract for construction of new city hall, though charter provided that all contracts should be in writing and contract sought to be enforced was not signed by both parties, where plaintiff was seeking to compel signing of contract so that when it was properly executed he might proceed with proper performance of work, and had no adequate remedy for damages against city, as contemplated by Code Civ. Proc. § 1086.

6. Constitutional law ⚡121(2)—Contractor's rights to enforce contract for construction of new city hall not impaired by new charter.

Assuming that New Stockton City Charter (St. 1923, p. 1321) lodges in mayor a discretion to refuse to sign contracts, rights of contractor awarded contract for construction of new city hall under old charter (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 254) to enforce same would not be thereby impaired.

7. Constitutional law ⚡121(2)—Government of municipal corporations may be changed at any time, but existing contract relations may not be thereby impaired.

Organization or government of municipal corporations may be changed at any time, but when so changed existing contract obligations may not be thereby impaired.

8. Municipal corporations ⚡244(2)—Contract for construction of new city hall calling for expenditure within funds provided by bond issue held not void.

Contract for construction of new city hall, calling for expenditure within funds provided by bond issue, under St. 1901, p. 27, held not void, though with other expenditures it would require city to exceed amount provided thereby, where amount provided for city hall purposes was merely an estimate and authorities in submitting proposition to electors had not confined themselves to an absolutely definite plan of construction and expenditure, and had proceeded in good faith in accordance with program based on estimated cost.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck.

Application for writ of mandate by Howard S. Williams, directed against the city of Stockton, a municipal corporation, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William P. Hubbard, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. Le Roy Johnson, and Clarence A. Grant, both of Stockton, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying a writ of mandate following an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition without leave to amend. The facts are therefore undisputed.

On October 5, 1920, the electors of the city of Stockton authorized a bond issue of $600,000 as the estimated cost of the acquisition, construction, and completion of a new city hall, including the land, equipment, furnishings, appliances, and necessary appurtenances, for the housing of the several departments of the city and for general municipal uses. The bonds were duly issued and sold at par and a premium of $50,556. The sum of $4,146.25 was realized from the sale of buildings on the land purchased for the site and the rental thereof for one month. A total of $654,702.25 was therefore available for the new city hall as proposed. Notwithstanding the exercise of all practicable diligence in procuring a site and making other arrangements for the project it was more than 2½ years before the city council was in position to advertise for bids for the construction work. Pursuant to notice inviting proposals the appellant submitted his bid on the general construction contract. By resolution of the council, No. 6070, adopted on June 22, 1923, and approved in writing by the mayor on the same day, the bid of the appellant in the net sum of $360,897 was accepted, the contract was awarded to him, and the mayor was thereby "authorized and directed to execute and enter into a contract on behalf of the city" with the appellant. Within 10 days after the adoption of said resolution a contract in due form was prepared, approved by the city attorney, signed by the appellant, filed with the city clerk, and presented to and left with the mayor for his signature.

The appellant also in due time executed and filed the required faithful performance bond. The mayor retained possession of the contract, assuring the appellant from time to time that he would sign it, until the expiration of his term of office, on July 2, 1923, but did not attach his signature thereto, although due demand was made upon him so to do. In the meantime, the appellant incurred an indebtedness of $5,400 as the premium on his faithful performance bond, and, in reliance upon the award of the contract to him, made and entered into contracts with subcontractors and materialmen for work, labor, and materials necessary to carry out the contract and refrained from soliciting other contracts which could have been obtained, all to his detriment in the estimated sum of from $35,000 to $40,000.

Upon the incoming of the new city administration at 8 o'clock p. m. on July 2, 1923, the new city council, as one of its first acts, adopted a resolution wherein it recited the expenditure from the fund available for new city hall purposes of the sum of $184,347.77 for the site, architects' fees, and other items, the awarding of the general contract to the appellant in the sum of $360,897, the receipt of a bid from Edward L. Gnekow for plumbing, electrical work, heating, and ventilation, in the sum of $60,869, and the receipt of a bid from the Pauley Jail Building Company for jail equipment in the sum of $36,463. The resolution further recited that no arrangement had been made for inviting proposals for furnishing the new city hall; that the reasonable estimate for such equipment was approximately $92,000; that certain architects' fees remained unpaid in the sum of $10,800, all of which would leave for the account of furnishings the sum of $1,200 only; that there were no other moneys in said bond fund, or in any other fund then available for furnishings, except the said sum of approximately $1,200; that the estimate for the acquisition, construction, and completion of said city hall according to the plans and specifications theretofore adopted would exceed the amount on hand for such purposes by approximately $90,000; that it was believed to have been the intention of the electors who authorized the bond issue that the sum realized therefrom should result in a city hall ready for use and that the bids theretofore received should be rejected. It was accordingly resolved that the bid of the appellant for the general construction work, the bid of Edward L. Gnekow for plumbing, electrical work, heating, and ventilation and the bid of the Pauley Jail Building Company be rejected, and that all acts and proceedings taken relative to said bids and subsequent thereto be rescinded. Upon the refusal of the new mayor on demand to sign the contract awarded to the appellant this proceeding was brought in the superior court to compel him to do so.

It is the contention of the appellant that it was the duty of the mayor to sign the contract pursuant to the authorization and direction of the resolution adopted June 22, 1923, and that he had no discretion to do otherwise. Further, that upon the award of the contract to him and compliance with all requirements on his part he obtained a right to whatever benefits might accrue to him under the contract when signed, and that he could not be divested of such right by the adoption of the second resolution.

[1-4] At the time the contract was awarded to the appellant the charter of the city of Stockton provided that the council should be the governing body of the city; that the mayor should be the president of the council and should preside at its meetings (Stats. Extra Session 1911, p. 269, §§ 55, 56). In section 95 of the Charter it was provided that all contracts should be drawn under the supervision of the city attorney and that they "must be in writing, executed in the name of the city of Stockton by an officer or officers authorized to sign the same." The contract in question was approved by the city attorney. The mayor was a member of the deliberative body which accepted the bid and awarded the contract. He was also the officer of the city authorized and directed by that body to sign the contract. Under the charter provision and the terms of the resolution it is clear that it was the duty of the mayor to sign the contract as he was authorized and directed to do, and that he could not refuse to do so without legal justification. An examination of the charter as then in effect discloses that the signing of contracts was no part of the charter duties of the mayor. It may be deemed no more than a coincidence that the mayor was designated to execute this particular contract. The council could have authorized and directed any other officer of the city to sign the same on behalf of the city, as, for instance, the city clerk, or the street superintendent, or any of the other officers mentioned in section 43 of the Charter. But although the duty of the mayor to sign the contract in question did not arise under any specific provision of the charter, when he, as an officer of the city, was authorized and directed by the duly adopted resolution of the council to sign the same, it became his duty to do so as a duty resulting from his office. The mayor's duty to sign the contract was ministerial only, and involved the exercise of no discretionary power (see Earl v. Bowen, 146 Cal. 754, 81 P. 133).

"A ministerial act is one which a public officer is required to perform upon a given state of facts in a prescribed manner in obedience to the mandate of legal authority and without regard to his own judgment or opinion concerning the propriety or impropriety of the act to be performed." McQuillin on Mun. Corps. vol. 5, p. 5275, and cases cited.

And mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the performance of the ministerial duty. Mechem on Public Officers, § 947, and cases cited. The facts which rendered it the ministerial duty of the mayor to sign the contract were here present. The discretion of the city's governmental body, which alone could determine whether or not the contract should be awarded, had been exercised. We find no provision of the charter which gave the mayor a veto power over the award of contracts. The contract was awarded in all respects as required by law. It was prepared and approved by the city attorney. The mayor, as an officer of the city, was authorized to sign the same by resolution of the council duly adopted and approved by the mayor. By reason of his office and such authorization and direction, it became his duty to do so unless he was lawfully justified in his refusal. We find no legal justification for his refusal to sign. Under such circumstances the appellant became vested with a right to have the contract signed as directed by the council. McConoughey v. Jackson, 101 Cal. 265, 35 P. 863, 40 Am. St. Rep. 53. While the writ of mandamus is, in a measure, a discretionary writ, and will not issue where its enforcement would work an injustice or accomplish a legal wrong (Cal. Highway Comm. v. Riley, 192 Cal. 97, 218 P. 579; Fawkes v. Burbank, 188 Cal. 399, 205 P. 675), yet, where one has a substantial right enforceable by mandamus, and which cannot otherwise be enforced, and a failure of justice would result in refusing it, he is entitled to the writ as a matter of right, or, in other words, it would be an abuse of discretion to refuse it (Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 48 P. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153; Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 P. 540; Potomac Oil Co. v. Dye, 10 Cal. App. 534, 102 P. 677; 16 Cal. Jur. 768, and cases cited). It appears that appellant has no other means of enforcing his rights than by the issuance of the writ herein applied for. It is conceded that he has no cause of action in damages in the premises against the city or any officer thereof. It is therefore clear that he has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

The situation here disclosed is almost identical with that presented in Neal Publishing Co. v. Rolph, 169 Cal. 190, 146 P. 659. In that case the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco had awarded a contract for the furnishing of certain printing supplies and the mayor had approved the award. Subsequently the mayor refused to sign the contract for reasons which he stated at the time. The petitioner, to whom the contract had been awarded, applied for a writ of mandate to compel the mayor to sign the same. The peremptory writ was granted for the reason that the proceedings had so far progressed that the signing of the contract by the mayor was the performance of a ministerial duty—did not involve the exercise of any discretion whatever, and the reasons assigned for the refusal did not constitute legal justification. See, also, City of Los Angeles v. Hance, 137 Cal. 490, 70 P. 475; City of Oxnard v. Bellah, 21 Cal. App. 33, 130 P. 701.

[5] The respondents take the position that because the charter of the city of Stockton provided that all contracts be in writing, and that as this contract was not signed by both parties, therefore the appellant had no rights which may be enforced in this proceeding. They rely on the cases of Los Angeles Gas

Co. v. Toberman, 61 Cal. 201; Frick v. Los Angeles, 115 Cal. 512, 47 P. 250; and Times Publishing Co. v. Weatherby, 139 Cal. 618, 73 P. 465. The Los Angeles Gas Company Case was a mandamus proceeding to compel the approval of a claim for gas for street lighting furnished by the petitioner under a contract which was held not to have been executed in accordance with section 1 of article 12 of the City Charter, which provided:

"The city of Los Angeles shall not be, and is not bound by, any contract, or in any way liable thereon, unless the same be made in writing by order of the council, the draft thereof be approved by the council, and the same ordered to be, and be signed, by the mayor or some other person in behalf of the city."

The council awarded the contract to the petitioner and ordered the mayor to sign the same. Upon his refusal to do so the clerk of the council, upon order of the council, signed it in behalf of the city. It was held that the contract was not binding on the city and the claim could not be paid for the reason that the order directing the clerk to sign the contract was not adopted by the number of votes required by another section of the charter. The Frick Case was an action for damages for alleged prevention of performance of an alleged contract for the construction of a public sewer. The council awarded the contract to the plaintiff and directed the mayor to sign the same on behalf of the city, which he did not do. It was held that there was no liability on the part of the city under the alleged contract, because it was not executed with the formality required by section 207 of the Charter (Stats. 1889, p. 506), which was a re-enactment of section 1 of article 12 of the former charter. In the Times Publishing Company Case the plaintiff sought by mandamus to compel the treasurer of the city of Eureka to pay a warrant allowed by the city council for city printing. After advertisement for bids the council awarded the contract for city printing to the plaintiff, who thereupon entered upon the performance of the work. The charter of the city of Eureka contained a provision (section 167) which was the same in effect as section 207 of the Los Angeles Charter. No written contract was executed, and as there was no compliance with the sweeping provisions of said section 167, it was held that no right to payment for printing done could be predicated upon a contract not executed in the manner specifically prescribed.

It will readily be seen that those cases do not apply to the situation in the case at bar. There the plaintiffs were asserting rights under alleged contracts which were found to be not binding on the cities because the provisions of their respective charters had not been followed. Here the appellant concedes that the contract, to which he claims to be entitled, is not in writing. He is not asserting rights as under a contract duly executed, but is seeking to compel the signing of a contract so that when it is properly executed he may proceed with the performance of the work with full confidence in its due execution and with assurance that payments thereunder will be made as the work progresses. In those cases rights were asserted by the plaintiffs on the theory that contracts were in existence. In this proceeding the right to the execution of a contract is asserted. When there is no discretion to refuse to do that which will cause the contract to comply with the formalities of the charter, the right to its execution would seem to be clear. The charter of the city of Stockton contained no such provisions as section 207 of the Los Angeles charter and section 167 of the Eureka charter. Under the law as it stood at the time of the award, the right of the appellant to have the contract signed became fixed and the rule as stated in Donnelly on the Law of Public Contracts would apply. It is said in section 143 thereof that:

"When an award has once been made the public body has no discretion but to execute the contract. The rights of the parties then become fixed, and the power to cancel the award or reject the bids does not exist. The obligation of the contract made cannot thus be impaired at the option of one of the contracting parties."

The rule is also stated in McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, § 1226, as follows:

"While it is true that a municipal corporation has a discretion as to the time and manner of making of corporate improvements and the purchase of supplies, still when this discretion has been exercised and a contract made relative thereto, the legislative function has been exhausted, and the duty has become purely ministerial, and a contract so made cannot be impaired at the option of the municipality. Hence, when a bid has been accepted by the proper authorities, such acceptance cannot be revoked."

In their supplemental brief the respondents also rely on and quote from Mr. Donnelly wherein it is said in section 148:

"Even if the proceedings are all regular and conducted according to law, and the bidder has in all respects conformed to the provisions and requirements of the advertisement and the charter, he may not have a writ of mandate to compel the execution of a contract to him."

But immediately following that statement the author says:

"The reason for this rule is that he has a right of action against the public body for damages which he has sustained by reason of the refusal to execute and carry out the contract."

The rule under which the writ in such cases is denied is therefore based on the fact that a right of action for damages would lie which, as contemplated by our code section (1086, Code Civ. Proc.) would constitute a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law and which it is conceded is not available to the appellant in this case.

[6, 7] On January 29, 1923, the new charter of the city of Stockton was approved by the Legislature (Stats. 1923, p. 1321). Section 3 of article 23 thereof provides that:

"All contracts shall be signed on behalf of the city by the mayor and attested by the city clerk."

This provision became effective on July 2, 1923, the day on which the resolution of the new council purporting to reject all bids and to rescind all proceedings thereunder was adopted. The respondents therefore contend that at the time of the application for the writ in the superior court there was no resolution of the council in existence directing the mayor to sign the contract on behalf of the city, and that the new charter provision vested in the mayor a discretion to refuse to sign the contract. It may be assumed as respondents contend that the adoption of the resolution of June 22, 1923, awarding the contract to the appellant was in the exercise of a legislative function (see Hopping v. Council of City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 150 P. 977), and that under general rules a legislative act may thereafter be amended or repealed. It will be noted, however, that the new charter provision also imposes upon the mayor of the city the duty to sign contracts. It went into effect prior to the adoption of the resolution purporting to withdraw the authorization and direction. So that as to this particular contract, the duty of the mayor to sign the same has been continuous from the time of the award, first under the resolution of June 22, and then under the charter. If it be assumed, as respondents contend, that the new charter provision lodges in the mayor a discretion to refuse to sign contracts, it would not follow that the rights of the appellant arising out of the award of this contract would thereby be extinguished or impaired. It is competent to provide by law that the organization or government of municipal corporations may be changed at any time, but when so changed existing contractual obligations may not thereby be impaired (Bates v. Gregory, 89 Cal. 387, 26 P. 891; 12 C. J., p. 1016, and cases cited). In the Bates Case, at page 392 (26 P. 892) it is said:

"In Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 535, the Supreme Court of the United States, discussing this subject, says: 'It is also settled that the laws which subsisted at the time and place of the making of a contract, and where it is to be performed, enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. This principle embraces alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement.' And in the same case the court further says: 'Nothing can be more material to the obligation than the means of enforcement. Without the remedy the contract may, indeed, in the sense of the law, be said not to exist, and its obligation to fall within the class of those moral and social duties which depend for their fulfillment wholly upon the will of the individual. The ideas of validity and remedy are inseparable, and both are parts of the obligation which is guaranteed by the Constitution against invasion. The obligation of a contract "is the law which binds the parties to perform their agreement." The prohibition has no reference to the degree of impairment; the largest and the least are alike forbidden.'"

[8] Respondents further contend that the contract which the appellant is seeking to have signed would be void if executed. The basis of this contention is the fact that if the city became obligated under the contracts awarded to the appellant and to Gnekow and pays other obligations properly chargeable to this particular bond fund approximately $1,200 only will remain for the purchase of furnishings, which amount is alleged to be insufficient to properly furnish the building, and it is insisted that the rules laid down in Jenkins v. Williams, 14 Cal. App. 89, 111 P. 116, and O'Farrell v. County of Sonoma, 189 Cal. 343, 208 P. 117, would render the contracts void. We do not so conclude. In Jenkins v. Williams, supra, it appeared that the county of Sacramento had voted bonds for numerous public improvements, including the construction of new bridges and the repairing of old bridges. By appropriate order the board of supervisors specified each improvement to be made and the amount of money proposed to be expended for each improvement, not as an estimate, but as a definite amount to be devoted to each improvement. Thirty bridges to be constructed or repaired were described in the order and proclamation calling the election with the exact amount of money required for each. In the list was "Twelfth street American river bridge, repairs—$5,000," and the proposition appeared on the ballot also in that form. The board entered into a contract with the plaintiffs to perform the repair work on the bridge for the sum of $5,388. After the plaintiffs had completed their work they were paid $5,000 from the bond fund created for that purpose and no more. They then presented their claim to the board of supervisors for $503.16 and it was allowed. The county auditor refused to draw his warrant for the same and it was sought by writ of mandate to compel him to do so. The evidence showed that there was a surplus in other bridge bond funds sufficient to pay the demand, but it was held that by reason of the form of the order of the board definitely allotting to the Twelfth street bridge the particular fund provided and the mandatory provisions of section 4088 of the Political Code under which the bond proceedings were taken, the auditor was justified in refusing to issue the warrant. Among the provisions of said section 4088 is the following:

"The revenue derived from the sale of said bonds shall be applied to the purpose specified in the order of the board, and no other. Should there be any surplus, it shall be applied toward the payment of said bonds."

In the case of O'Farrell v. County of Sonoma, supra, the provisions of section 4088 of the Political Code were again under consideration. A proposed bond issue for county road improvements was submitted to the electors of the county. In its order and resolution calling the election the board of supervisors recited the necessity of improving the highways of the county and specified among others the proposed construction of a road from "Sebastopol to Freestone (definitely describing the route)—Distance 4.0 miles—$85,000." After the bonds were sold the board proceeded to let a contract for 1.93 miles of highway for the sum of $72,840.60, making no provision for the improvement of the remaining 2.07 miles, an estimated cost of which would exceed the cost of improving the 1.93 miles. The plaintiff contended that because of the form of the proposition submitted to the voters the board had jurisdiction only to ask for bids for the construction of the road, Sebastopol to Freestone, as an entirety, and that if the bids were too high the board was not entitled to proceed further without authority from the electors. This court held that "when the defendant board was contemplating a bond issue * * * it had the statutory right to make its order just as broad, and just as narrow, and just as specific as it was willing to be bound by, so long as the provisions of the statute were complied with"; that it could have asked generally for the consent of the electors to issue bonds in a specific sum for the construction of roads in the county but it did not do so; on the contrary it specified road by road, name by name, length by length, with a definite and specific sum for each piece of road to be constructed. It was held that the plaintiff as a taxpayer was entitled to an injunction restraining the board from proceeding with the execution of the contract; that by the order calling the election in the manner and form there disclosed and the ratification of the order by the electors, a contractual status was created which could not be altered at the will of but one of the parties. On this subject it was further said:

"When by its order, duly accepted by a vote of the electors, the length of the road had been specifically defined, its terminals specifically located, and the cost of the whole established—these elements became a part of the contract. * * * If the defendant board has the statutory right to let contracts to build said roads in sections, then, * * * all of the funds may be spent on one mile in the discretion of the board. But the board may not let the contracts piecemeal. It has waived its right to do so."

In the present case the proceedings were not taken under section 4088 of the Political Code for that section applies to counties only. They were taken under the city charter and the municipality bond act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 27). Under that statute the council is not bound to specify in the ordinance calling the election the exact amount which will be required to acquire, construct, and complete the public improvement contemplated. On the contrary, the statute requires that the estimated cost shall be set forth. This requirement was strictly complied with. In the ordinance calling the election it was recited that the estimated cost of the acquisition, construction, and completion of the proposed municipal improvements, and of each and every one thereof, would be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the city; that it was proposed in proposition 1 to incur an indebtedness in the sum of $600,000 for the acquisition, construction, and completion of a city hall. In section four of the ordinance it was provided:

"The estimated cost of the municipal improvement referred to under the designation of proposition 1 in the preceding section of this ordinance is the sum of $600,000."

The amount provided for city hall purposes was therefore merely an estimate. In spite of due diligence on the part of the city officials in furthering the project to the point of letting the contracts over 2½ years elapsed, and in the meantime the cost of building construction had increased from 20 to 25 per cent. It quite often inevitably happens that the ultimate cost of a proposed public improvement exceeds the preliminary estimate. If the city authorities having the power and responsibility of proposing the bond issue have not, by the form employed in submitting the proposition to the electors, confined themselves to an absolutely definite and inflexible plan of construction and expenditure, and have proceeded in good faith in accordance with the program based upon estimated costs, no good reason appears why they should not be permitted to continue with the improvement to the extent of the funds available. The good faith of the respondent city is here unquestioned. The contract, which appellant seeks to have signed, calls for an expenditure within the funds available for the purpose intended. Under the facts alleged in the petition, the appellant was entitled to the issuance of the writ, and the demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

Edward L. GNEKOW, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. CITY OF STOCKTON (a Municipal Corporation) and Raymond J. Wheeler, as Mayor of Said City of Stockton, Defendants and Respondents. (Sac. 3647.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1925.)

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for appellant.
J. Le Roy Johnson, of Stockton, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying a writ of mandate and dismissing the petition therefor following an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition without leave to amend.

The appellant was the successful bidder for a contract to install the plumbing, electrical work, heating, and ventilating system for the proposed new city hall for the city of Stockton. After advertising for bids, the city council by resolution, duly adopted and approved by the mayor on June 22, 1923, awarded the contract to the appellant and authorized and directed the mayor to sign the same. Within 10 days after the passage of the resolution, the contract was duly prepared, approved by the city attorney, signed by the appellant, and presented to the mayor for his signature. The mayor failed, neglected, and refused to sign the contract. His term of office expired on July 2, 1923, when a new city charter went into effect and a new set of city officers assumed their duties. One of the first acts of the new administration was to adopt a resolution purporting to reject all bids for contracts in connection with the new city hall project and to rescind and set aside all awards of contracts and proceedings taken thereunder. This resolution was adopted on the evening of July 2, 1923, and is the same resolution which purported to reject the bid and set aside the award of contract to Howard S. Williams. The resolution is referred to more at length in the case of Williams v. City of Stockton (Sac. No. 3648) 235 P. 986, this day decided. In this case the appellant alleges generally the facts set forth in the Williams Case and in addition that in order to enable him to fulfill his contract with the city and relying on its execution in due time he filed the required faithful performance bond, became obligated to pay the sum of $915 as the premium thereon, entered into contracts for the purchase of and ordered large quantities of materials from various manufacturing distributors in the eastern part of the United States and will be compelled to accept and pay for large quantities of said materials which are unsaleable for the reason that there is no demand therefor except for structures of the kind and character of the proposed city hall, all to his loss in excess of $10,000.

After the adoption of said resolution on July 2, 1923, the appellant made a written demand on the new mayor to sign said contract, but the mayor refused to do so for the reasons set forth in said resolution. This proceeding was then brought to compel him to do so. Further facts applicable to this case and in common with the facts in the case of Williams v. City of Stockton, supra, are set forth in the decision in that case. From the facts here presented the same legal conclusions must be drawn as were arrived at in that case. On the authority of that case the judgment herein is reversed.

FINN et al. v. BUTLER et al. (S. F. 11418.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1925.)

1. Execution ☞402—Order directing bank not party to pay to judgment creditor money alleged to belong to judgment debtor held void.

In supplementary proceedings, order directing bank to pay over money in its hands, alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor, held void, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 714-721, where bank was not a party to proceedings or to action to which supplementary proceedings had been instituted.

2. Execution ☞387—Bank indebted to judgment debtor not made party to supplementary proceedings by order directing its employé to appear as witness.

That in supplementary proceedings referee in examination of judgment debtor subpoenaed an employé but not an official of bank alleged to be indebted to judgment debtor as a witness did not make bank a party to proceeding nor subject to jurisdiction of referee, so that it could be ordered to pay indebtedness over to judgment creditor.

3. Execution ☞387—Referee held without jurisdiction to determine whether money in hands of bank was property of judgment debtor.

In supplementary proceedings in which bank alleged to be indebted to judgment debtor was not made a party to proceedings nor to action to which proceedings had been instituted, referee was without jurisdiction, under Code Civ. Proc. § 719, to determine whether any money or property lawfully in keeping of bank was property of judgment debtor.

4. Execution ☞402—Order directing bank to pay over money in its hands, alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor held void.

In supplementary proceedings, order directing bank to pay over money in its hands, alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor, held void, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717-719, irrespective of whether it was made a party to proceeding, where, on hearing before referee, it was shown that money was claimed by two claimants who had made and filed with sheriff their verified claims and demands in conformity with section 689, setting forth an interest therein adverse to judgment debtor.

5. Prohibition ☞28—Writ would lie to restrain referee in supplementary proceedings from ordering bank to pay over funds to judgment creditor, though referee's order had issued.

Writ of prohibition to restrain referee, in supplementary proceedings, from directing bank to pay over money in its hands, alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor, would lie, though referee had made such order, where court was satisfied that petitioners were entitled to whatever relief would be appropriate to facts and law of case as developed on hearing on return to alternative writ of prohibition.

Application by Thomas F. Finn and others for a writ of prohibition, to be directed to Frank I. Butler and others, to restrain defendant Butler as referee from proceeding with certain matters pending before him. Order of referee annulled.

Reisner & Deming, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

H. L. Sacks, of Los Angeles, Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and Mortimer O. Kline, Deputy County Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioners herein on December 9, 1924, filed in this court their application for a writ of prohibition wherein they sought to have the respondents herein, and particularly the respondent Frank I. Butler, as referee, etc., prohibited and restrained from proceeding with, passing upon, or deciding certain motions and proceedings pending before him as referee in a certain action then pending in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, and from making, signing, or issuing a certain order which he was threatening to make, sign, and issue in connection with certain supplementary proceedings pending before him as such referee under the appointment of said court. On December 11, 1924, the said petitioners filed and presented a supplementary petition, setting forth that the said referee had, on December 9, 1924, and after the filing of their said original petition, above referred to, but before any action by this court thereon, proceeded to make, sign, and issue said order in said proceeding pending before him, and that, unless restrained by this court, he and his correspondents would further proceed to enforce the same. The respondents in due course appeared and presented their demurrer and answer to said application; but, before hearing had upon the issues thus presented, the parties to this proceeding presented and filed their stipulation as to the facts upon the basis of which it was respectively claimed these petitioners should as a matter of law be granted or denied, the relief sought. The facts as thus agreed upon may be summarized as follows:

In the year 1916 one L. Paggi obtained a judgment in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles against Karl Elliott for the sum of $3,344.58 and costs, which judgment became final on December 28, 1916, and which has never been satisfied. On November 26, 1924, said L. Paggi caused to be issued in said cause and out of said court and pursuant to an order thereof an execution directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, one of the petitioners herein, and which execution was by said sheriff levied upon a Packard automobile then in said city and also upon certain moneys in the Liberty Bank therein standing in the name of "Karl Elliott, Agent." Upon such levy and upon receiving notice thereof, John Schuster and Kathryn Elliott, two of the petitioners herein, filed with said sheriff duly verified third party claims as provided in section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, setting forth their ownership of said property and money so levied upon and the whole thereof. Thereupon the said sheriff notified said Paggi that he would not hold said property under said levy, unless he were indemnified as provided in section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said Paggi refused to so indemnify the said sheriff, but, on the contrary commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against said sheriff and Karl and Kathryn Elliott, seeking an injunction to restrain the said sheriff from releasing said property, and in said action obtained a temporary restraining order, restraining the defendants therein and each of them from removing or incumbering said property, and from withdrawing, alienating, or otherwise disposing of said or any moneys in said Liberty Bank, save and except to turn said money over to said Paggi, or his counsel, to be applied toward the satisfaction of said judgment. On December 2, 1924, upon the application of said Paggi, the superior court of the county of Los Angeles made and filed an order in said action pending before it, requiring said Karl Elliott to appear before the respondent herein, Frank I. Butler, who was appointed a referee by said order, to testify concerning his property. Said Karl Elliott appeared before said referee pursuant to said order and at a hearing thereon had in the city and county of San Francisco on December 8, 1924, and being then sworn testified that all of said property and money belonged to the third party claimants. Kathryn Elliott, one of the third party claimants, was also called and sworn as a witness for the plaintiff before said referee, and testified that the entire property levied upon was owned by herself and said John Schuster. Charles F. Partridge, assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank, was also subpoenaed and called as a witness for said plaintiff, and testified that said bank was carrying an account in the name of "Karl Elliott, Agent," to the amount of $6,327.93 when said execution was levied, and that Karl Elliott was the only one authorized to draw upon said account. Said Partridge, who was merely an employee of said Liberty Bank, did not claim any interest in said moneys nor deny the indebtedness. The affidavits and claim of third party ownership above referred to were produced before said referee at said hearing, and were examined by him, though not formally introduced in evidence. There was certain other evidence produced before said referee at said hearing bearing upon the ownership of said property and money by said Karl Elliott. On the 9th day of December, 1924, the day following the conclusion of said hearing, the said referee made and signed an order in which he directed the Liberty Bank, one of the petitioners herein, to pay to said L. Paggi or his counsel forthwith the sum of $5,238.42 in satisfaction of his said judgment. Said order of said referee was later filed for record in the original action pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county.

[1-5] It is the contention of the petitioners herein and each of them that the said Frank I. Butler, acting in his capacity of referee pursuant to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to proceedings supplementary to execution (§§ 714 to 721, Code Civ. Proc.), acted without and beyond his jurisdiction as conferred by said sections of the Code, and particularly by sections 719 and 720 thereof, in assuming to make the orders above referred to, or in attempting to direct the execution of the same. With respect to the said order, in so far as the referee therein undertook to decree the Liberty Bank to forthwith pay over to L. Paggi or his attorney the moneys in its hands, in whatever capacity the same was held by it, it should suffice to say that such order was utterly void, for the all-sufficient reason that said Liberty Bank was not a party to said proceeding nor to the action in the course of which said supplementary proceeding had been ordered and instituted, and hence could not be made the subject of such an order without being made such a party, and without an opportunity to be heard. The order appointing said Butler as a referee in said action directed the examination by him of Karl Elliott, the judgment debtor, upon supplementary proceedings, and of no other person. True, the said referee in the course of such examination of the judgment debtor caused a subpoena to be issued and served requiring one Charles F. Partridge, an employee, but not an official, of the Liberty Bank, to appear and be examined as a witness, and he did so appear. But that fact did not make the Liberty Bank a party to said proceeding nor subject it to the jurisdiction of the referee to make the order complained of. Deering v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 109 Cal. 73, 83, 41 P. 801; Schino v. Cinquini, 7 Cal. App. 244, 247, 94 P. 83. The respondents, however, contend that the referee had power to make such an order under the terms of section 719 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that upon supplementary proceedings "the judge or referee may order any property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, in the hands of such debtor, or any other person, or due to the judgment debtor, to be applied toward the satisfaction of the judgment." The difficulty with the application of this provision of the Code to the matter before us is that the power of the referee to make the order referred to is, by the express terms of said provision of said section, confined in its application to the property of the judgment debtor, and that, as to the Liberty Bank, not a party to such proceeding, the referee had no jurisdiction to determine that any money or property lawfully in its keeping was "the property of the judgment debtor." There is another reason, however, why we think this order of the referee is void as beyond his power. The record herein discloses that upon the hearing before him it was shown by the testimony of a third party claimant to the ownership of the property and money which had been levied upon that the whole thereof was claimed by two such claimants, and that these claimants had made and filed with the sheriff their verified claims and demands in conformity with the requirements of section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure setting forth an interest in the said property and money adverse to the judgment debtor. This being so, the Liberty Bank, even if it had been a party to the proceeding before the referee, would have been shown to be merely the garnishee under the writ of execution of a fund as to which third party claims, admittedly in due form, had been filed with the sheriff levying said writ. As such garnishee its holding of said moneys was subject to such claims, and to that extent amounted to an interest therein adverse to that of the judgment debtor, which would have justified the bank in refusing to pay over said moneys, either to the judgment debtor or to the judgment creditor, while such outstanding claims existed and were being urged in the manner provided by section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Deering v. Richardson-Kimball Co., supra. The record disclosing these undisputed facts, it would follow that the Liberty Bank, even had it been a party to this proceeding, could not have been subjected to an order obedience to which would be a violation of its rights and duties respecting said money thus subject to such garnishment and to such third party claims. This being so, the referee was not only not empowered but was not permitted under the provisions of sections 717 to 719 of the Code of Civil Procedure to make any order directing said property, or any portion thereof, thus adversely claimed, to be turned over to the judgment creditor or applied to the satisfaction of his judgment. Under such conditions the proper and only procedure is that provided for in section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which permits the judgment creditor to maintain an action against any person or persons claiming an interest in the property adverse to him, in which event the court or judge may by order forbid a transfer or other disposition of the interest or debt until such action can be commenced and prosecuted to judgment. It may be that the action which was commenced by the judgment creditor against the petitioners herein in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, seeking an injunction to prevent the said sheriff from releasing said property and money from the lien of said execution upon the presentation of said third party claims and upon failure of the judgment creditor to furnish an indemnifying bond, is such a proceeding, but whether it is so or not cannot affect the right of these petitioners in this proceeding to such a writ as will afford relief from the effect of the said void order of the referee. It is, however, contended by the respondents herein that the petitioners are not entitled to have a writ of prohibition issued herein, for the reason that the said referee had already made his order, the validity of which is assailed herein before the issuance of the alternative writ herein, and that, having done so, there is no longer any act or order of said referee upon which said final writ can operate. The petitioners' application for a writ of prohibition was filed in this court on December 9, 1924, from which it appeared that the said referee was threatening to sign and issue the order in question. Subsequent thereto, but prior to the issuance of the alternative writ herein, the referee did make and sign said order. Thereafter, and on December 11, 1924, the petitioners filed their supplementary petition herein, setting forth the foregoing facts and the form of said order, and further alleging that the said referee and the said superior court were about to enforce the said order affecting the Liberty Bank and take other proceedings based upon said order which would deprive petitioners of their property without due process of law. Having before us the original and supplemental petitions showing the foregoing facts, this court issued the alternative writ herein upon the theory that upon a hearing thereon this court could make and issue whatever form of writ would afford such relief as the petitioners might be shown to be entitled to under the facts alleged and shown upon the hearing thereon. We are satisfied that, upon the facts of the case, as stipulated by the parties hereto and upon the law of the case as above declared, the petitioners herein are entitled to whatever relief would be appropriate to the facts and the law of the case as developed upon the hearing. In similar cases where writs of prohibition have been sought in the first instance this court has afforded the relief given upon writs of review when the record as presented upon the hearing warranted such relief. Van Hoosear v. Railroad Comm., 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; Traffic Truck Sales Co. v. Justices' Court, 192 Cal. 377, 220 P. 306. We are satisfied that this record presents a situation where such relief should be afforded.

It is ordered that the said order of the referee be and the same is hereby annulled.

LIBERTY BANK et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (S. F. 11478.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1925.)

1. Execution $\S$ 402—Recitals in order in supplementary proceedings held not to show that assistant cashier was an "officer or member" of bank.

Recitals in order in supplementary proceedings directing assistant cashier of bank to show cause why he should not turn over money in bank, alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor, held not to show that he was an "officer or member" of bank, within Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 717 and 719.

2. Execution $\S$ 387—Order in supplementary proceedings directing assistant cashier of bank to turn over money in custody of bank to judgment creditor held void.

Order in supplementary proceedings directing assistant cashier of bank to show cause why he should not turn over money, in bank alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor held void, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 717, where neither order nor affidavit on which it was founded showed that any other debtor of judgment debtor than bank was sought to be brought before court, or that assistant cashier was "officer or member" of bank, within sections 717 and 719.

3. Execution $\S$ 395—Order in supplementary proceedings, if regarded as directing assistant cashier to appear and be examined as witness, would be void.

Order in supplementary proceedings directing assistant cashier of bank to show cause why he should not turn over money in bank alleged to belong to judgment debtor, to judgment creditor, if regarded as an order requiring such person to appear and be examined as a witness regarding judgment debtor's property, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 718, would be void, in view of section 1989, where it required him to appear and testify as a witness in a county other than that in which he was shown to reside, and which was several hundred miles from place of his residence.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by the Liberty Bank and others against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles. Writ issued.

Cullinan & Hickey and Reisner & Deming, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

H. L. Sacks, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This application is by the petitioners herein for a writ of prohibition preventing the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles from taking any further proceedings upon or in connection with a certain order set forth in said application. The facts which form the basis of the present application and for the order of said superior court affected by this proceeding are in the main set forth in the decision of this court in the cause entitled Finn et al. v. Butler et al. (S. F. 11418), 235 P. 992, this day filed. In addition thereto the following facts appear: On or about the 11th day of December Frank I. Butler, the referee of said court referred to in our former decision, filed in said court, and in the case of L. Paggi v. Karl Elliott pending therein, his report, and the order made by him thereon, and which was the subject of said former decision. Thereafter, and on January 10, 1925, one H. L. Sacks presented and filed in said superior court and in said action the following affidavit:

"H. L. Sacks, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That he is the attorney in the above-entitled action; that an execution was issued out of the superior court in the above-entitled action for the sum of $3,344.58, on the 2d day of December, 1924, and that the sheriff of the county of San Francisco did, by virtue of said execution, levy and garnisheed all moneys of the defendant in the Liberty Bank, San Francisco, standing in the name of Karl Elliott. That there was at the time of said garnishment $6,317.56 money in the said bank, which belongs to said defendant Karl Elliott. That the said bank refuses to turn over said moneys. That the money is the property of said judgment debtor, and that it should therefore be applied to the satisfaction of said judgment. That a demand has been made upon the said Liberty Bank to turn the said money over in pursuance to the writ of execution, a copy of which was served on the said bank, but that the said Liberty Bank declines and refuses to turn said funds over.

"Wherefore, deponent prays that this court make an order that the said Liberty Bank turn over the said moneys towards the satisfaction of said judgment in pursuance to the writ of execution heretofore served upon it, and issued in the above entitled action." (Signed H. L. Sacks and duly verified.)

Thereupon, and on said January 10, 1925, the said court made the following order:

"Upon reading the affidavit of H. L. Sacks, verified the 10th day of January, 1925, and good cause appearing therefor it is hereby ordered:

"That Charles F. Partridge, assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank of San Francisco, Cal., be and personally appear in Department 25 of the above entitled court, in the county court house, Los Angeles, California, on the 23d day of January, 1925, at 10 o'clock a. m. thereof, then and there to show cause if any he has why an order should not be made directing him as assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank, to turn over to the plaintiff in the above entitled action all sums of money owing to and deposited to the credit of Karl Elliott or sufficient to satisfy said judgment pursuant to an execution issued and served upon said bank in the above entitled action.

"Dated this 10th day of January, 1925.

"John M. York, Judge."

(Seal of the Superior Court.)

Thereafter, and on January 12, 1925, a copy of said order was served upon Charles F. Partridge, one of the petitioners herein, in the city and county of San Francisco. Said Charles F. Partridge is an assistant cashier of the said Liberty Bank, which is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California and having its principal and only place of business in the city and county of San Francisco. Said Partridge, while an assistant cashier of said corporation, is not the president or other managing head thereof, nor is he vice president or secretary, or assistant secretary or cashier thereof. The residence of said Partridge is at Menlo Park, in the county of San Mateo, state of California. The petitioners herein allege that the plaintiff in said action is by said affidavit and order seeking to enforce the order of the said referee which was the subject of the said former proceeding in this court and of our decision therein this day filed. This averment the respondent herein denies, but in connection with said denial avers that the order above set forth in full was predicated upon the affidavit of Sacks, also above set forth, and that said order was made and is based upon the provisions of section 717 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to an examination of the debtor of a judgment debtor, and that said respondent intends after the examination of said Partridge to make an order in conformity with the facts as will appear at said examination, in compliance with the law, as made and provided in sections 717 to 720, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The respondent, also in its answer herein, basing its denial upon its want of information and belief, denies practically all of the averments of the petition herein relating to the proceedings before the referee, with the exception of the referee's order; but, since these matters appear in the report of said referee filed in said action and in said court, these denials must be held to be insufficient to present an issue as to said averments in the petition. It is also alleged in the answer of the respondent that the service of said order to show cause upon Charles F. Partridge, assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank, was made at the special instance and request and for the accommodation of said bank, and that said Charles F. Partridge was authorized by said bank to accept service of any and all papers in the action of Paggi v. Elliott. It is further alleged in the same connection that a stipulation was entered into between counsel for said Paggi and the petitioners herein to the effect that said Partridge need not appear in person in response to said order, but might present an affidavit on behalf of the petitioners to the court upon the hearing thereon, and that his personal appearance would be waived by the plaintiff in said action. The foregoing averments in the respondent's answer were in the nature of affirmative defenses, the burden of supporting which was upon the respondent at said hearing, but no attempt was made at said hearing to sustain them by any sort of evidence or showing as to their truth, and for that reason these averments must be disregarded in our consideration of this cause.

If the order of the superior court which is assailed in this proceeding is to be taken to be an order issued by it in furtherance and in execution of the order of the referee, it must fall with our decision this day filed holding that the said order of the referee was void as beyond his statutory power. However, the respondent, in its answer herein and also at the hearing, has denied that its said order was made or was intended as an order in furtherance or in execution of the said referee's order and report, and the respondent asserts, both in its answer and at said hearing, that its said order was solely predicated upon the affidavit of said Sacks, above set forth, and was issued by said court under the provisions of section 717 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the examination of a judgment debtor. It will therefore be considered as to its validity from that aspect. Section 717 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows:

"After the issuing or return of an execution against property of the judgment debtor, or of any one of the several debtors in the same judgment, and upon proof by affidavit or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the judge, that any person or corporation has property of such judgment debtor, or is indebted to him in an amount exceeding fifty dollars, the judge may, by an order, require such person or corporation, or any officer or member thereof, to appear at a specified time and place before him, or a referee appointed by him, and answer concerning the same."

[1, 2] It will be seen from a reading of this section that the power of the court to order the examination of a debtor of a judgment debtor, or of those having property belonging to him, is predicated upon proof by affidavit or otherwise being made to the satisfaction of the judge of said court that such person or corporation has property or money of such judgment debtor or is indebted to him. It is in the nature of a special proceeding initiated by the filing of the affidavit or the making of such other proof as will justify the making of the order. Carter v. Los Angeles Nat. Bank, 116 Cal. 370, 374, 48 P. 332. In the instant case the order in question is predicated upon the affidavit of Sacks and has admittedly no other foundation. The affidavit of Sacks, liberally interpreted, would seem to have been sufficient to support an order of the court requiring the Liberty Bank, a corporation, or any officer or member thereof, to appear and answer respecting the matters set forth in said affidavit. Had the Liberty Bank, a California corporation, having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco and not elsewhere, been made the direct subject of said order, the interesting question would be presented as to whether the superior court of the county of Los Angeles had jurisdiction to order the attendance of said corporation or any officer or member thereof in a county other than the place of business of said corporation or than the residence of its officers or members affected by said order, in view of the provision in section 714 of said chapter of the Code forbidding the making of such an order requiring the judgment debtor himself to attend before a judge or referee outside of the county in which he resides or in which his place of business is, and in view, also, of section 1989 of said Code, providing that:

"A witness is not obliged to attend as a witness before any court, judge, justice, or any other officer, out of the county in which he resides, unless the distance be less than fifty miles from his place of residence to the place of trial."

But, however this may be, the affidavit filed herein as the foundation for said order, and upon which the order itself recites that it is predicated, nowhere shows that any other debtor of the judgment debtor than the Liberty Bank is sought to be brought before said court by virtue of the order prayed for; and, if it be claimed that under the wording of section 717 of said Code the court or the judge thereof had power to order any "officer or member" of said corporation to appear at the designated time and place, it must still have been made to appear that the person who is thus ordered to appear is an "officer or member" of such corporation within the intent and meaning of sections 717 and 719 of said Code. The order in question is not directed in terms against the Liberty Bank, a corporation nor in terms against an "officer or member thereof." It is directed against one Charles F. Partridge, who is designated in said order as

"assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank of San Francisco, Cal.," and it orders him to appear personally "in the county court house, Los Angeles, Cal., in department 25 of the above-entitled court * * * then and there to show cause, if any he has, why an order should not be made directed to him, as assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank, to turn over to the plaintiff in the above-entitled action all sums of money owing to and deposited to the credit of Karl Elliott * * * pursuant to an execution issued and served upon said bank in the above entitled action." The recital in said order, that said Charles F. Partridge is the assistant cashier of said corporation, cannot be held to be a sufficient recital that he is either an "officer or member" of said corporation. Ordinarily, as was said by this court in the case of Golden Gate, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 187, 191, 3 P. 628, an order to show cause which may be made the basis of a contempt proceeding when directed against a corporation must be served in the same manner as a summons which must be upon "the president or other head of the corporation, vice president, secretary, assistant secretary, cashier, or managing agent thereof." Ordinarily an assistant cashier of a corporation is neither an officer nor a member thereof in the sense that he exercises any such control over the disposition of the property or money in the custody of such corporation as would render him the proper subject of an order requiring him in that capacity to turn over the said money or property in the custody or keeping of such corporation to a stranger to it and in an action to which it is a stranger. The order in question herein, so far as it undertakes to direct said Partridge, as assistant cashier of the Liberty Bank, to appear and show cause in said court why he should not in that capacity turn over the money or property in the custody of said bank to the plaintiff in said action is entirely lacking in any basis for its issuance, either in the affidavit upon which it is predicated or in the recitals of the order itself.

[3] It may be contended, however, that the order in question is sufficient in form to require the said Charles F. Partridge, in either his personal or representative capacity, to appear in said court and be examined as a witness regarding the money or property of the judgment debtor of which the Liberty Bank is alleged to be the custodian, under the provisions of section 718 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But, if this is to be the interpretation and effect of said order, it must be held to be nothing more than a citation or subpoena requiring the person named therein to appear and testify as a witness in a county other than that in which he is shown to reside and which is several hundred miles from the place of his said residence. This is not permitted under section 1989 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and any such citation, subpoena, or order compelling such attendance would be void, and any such witness who might be subjected to the perils and penalties of an attachment or contempt proceedings as a result of his disobedience of such order would have the right to invoke the aid of a writ of prohibition to stay the threatened enforcement thereof in a judicial proceeding, when the power to make or enforce such order was beyond the statutory power of the court undertaking to make or threatening to enforce the same. Viewed from either aspect, therefore, whether said order is to be considered as an order directing the Liberty Bank, a corporation, directly or through an officer or member thereof, to appear in said court and show cause as required in said order; or whether said order is to be regarded as an order directed to said Charles F. Partridge requiring him to appear and be examined as a witness in said action and proceeding, it is lacking in any proper foundation, either in the affidavit upon which it is predicated or in the statute upon the terms of which it is sought to be justified. The petitioners herein are therefore entitled to a writ prohibiting the enforcement of said order.

Let a writ be issued accordingly.

LA MESA, LEMON GROVE & SPRING VALLEY IRR. DIST. v. HALLEY et al.
(S. F. 11502.)

1. Parties ⇨40(2)—Intervener must have interest in matter in litigation or in success of either party or interest against both; "intervention."

Intervention takes place when third person is permitted to become party to action or proceeding between other persons, which third person under Code Civ. Proc. § 387, must have an interest in matter in litigation or in success of either of parties or interest against both.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Intervene—Intervention.]

2. Parties ⇨40(2)—Intervener must have direct interest such that he will either gain or lose by direct effect of judgment.

Interest in matter in litigation to warrant intervention, under Code Civ. Proc. § 387, must be of such direct and immediate character that intervener will either gain or lose by direct legal operation and effect of judgment.

3. Mandamus ⇨153—Owners and mortgagors of land within irrigation district held not entitled to intervene in suit against district officers to compel signing and attestation bonds.

Landowners and mortgagors of land within irrigation district held not so directly affected or interested in suit for mandamus to compel president and secretary of board of directors to sign and attest bonds, claimed to have been duly authorized by district, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, as to entitle them under section 387 to intervene therein.

4. Mandamus ⇨153 — Interveners may not urge claims and contentions having proper forum elsewhere.

Persons permitted to intervene in mandamus proceedings cannot be heard to broaden scope or function of such proceeding by urging claims or contentions, which have their proper forum elsewhere.

5. Mandamus ⇨153 — Pleading ⇨8(15) — Facts constituting fraud must be specifically pleaded; allegations of fraud by intervener in mandamus proceeding held mere conclusions.

Facts constituting fraud charged must be specifically pleaded and allegations in petition for leave to intervene in mandamus proceeding that application was "collusive, unnecessary, and not defended in good faith" were mere conclusions.

In Bank.

Application by La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District for writ of mandate to be directed to J. H. Halley and J. C. Scott, President and Secretary, respectively, of petitioner. On application of third parties for leave to file complaint in intervention. Application denied.

Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for interveners.

PER CURIAM. The La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley irrigation district has filed an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents to sign and attest certain bonds claimed to have been duly authorized by the irrigation district of which the respondents are respectively the president and secretary. That application is pending and undetermined. The alleged purpose of the bond issue is the acquisition of an additional water supply and the purchase of a distributing system from the Cuyamaca Water Company. Elsie W. Sullivan and Jerry Sullivan have requested leave to file a complaint in intervention alleging, in substance, that they have an interest as owners and mortgagors of lands within the district; that the said bonds will be invalid because the indebtedness to be evidenced thereby is beyond the power of the district to assume; that the pending proceeding for a writ of mandate is collusive, unnecessary, and not defended in good faith; that no exigency or necessity exists for the issuance of said bonds; that there is and has been no shortage of water within the district; that a large part of the water supply and system proposed to be acquired by the district is now applied to and located in territory outside of the limits of the district; that the purchase of the Cuyamaca Water Company system by the district has not been approved by the railroad commission; that the title to the water distributed by the Cuyamaca Water Company is the subject of litigation with the city of San Diego; that the railroad commission has submitted to the district, the city of San Diego, and the Cuyamaca Water Company a proposal for the settlement and compromise of conflicting claims to such waters, which proposed settlement, it is anticipated, will be approved by the votes of the city and of the district; that when the proposed settlement is effected the district will be relieved of the necessity of expending the proceeds of the said bond issue; that no public exigency exists requiring the action of this court in the proceeding; that there are outstanding bonds of the district of a prior issue sufficient for all necessary indebtedness contemplated by the district, and for that reason the proposed bonds are unnecessary and without authority; that the directors of the district have never estimated the amount of money necessary to be raised for the purposes of the district or for any of the purposes specified in the Irrigation District Act.

[1] An intervention takes place when a third person is permitted by leave of court to become a party to an action or proceeding between other persons, either by joining with the plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with the defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff, or by demanding something adversely to both the plaintiff and the defendant. An intervenor must have an interest in the matter in litigation or in the success of either of the parties or an interest against both. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc.

[2, 3] The interest in the matter in litigation, as contemplated by the Code section, must be of such a direct and immediate character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment. Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 734, 145 P. 101. The interest must be direct, and not consequential, and must be such an interest as is proper to be determined in the proceeding in which the intervention is sought. Isaacs v. Jones, 121 Cal. 257, 53 P. 793, 1101. The matter in litigation in the pending proceeding is whether or not the respondents have refused, without legal justification, to do that which the law specifically requires them to do, as duties resulting from their respective offices. Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc. The court in said proceeding is not concerned with the necessity or the propriety of authorizing or issuing said bonds. Those questions are for the determination of the officers and electors of the district. Assuming that mandamus is the proper remedy, we are then only concerned with the propriety of the refusal of the president and secretary to sign and attest the bonds as required by law. It is difficult to see how the petitioning interveners can gain or lose by any judgment which may be entered in that proceeding. If the writ be granted, the enforcement of the judgment would not directly affect their property interests. The bonds, when signed and attested, would not be a lien on their property, although, if thereafter sold, they may lead to the creation of a lien. Drumhiller v. Wright, 64 Cal. App. 498, 222 P. 166. Nor would compliance with the writ, if issued, create a cloud upon their title. If the respondents sign and attest the bonds they must be sold before the lands of the proposed interveners may be taxed to pay the principal and interest thereof. The sale will be contingent on obtaining a proper price after advertising for bids. The bonds may never be sold. The present plans for the acquisition of an additional water supply and a distributing system may be abandoned. It is clear that the interest of the petitioning interveners is remote and contingent and not of the direct and immediate character required by law. Elliott v. Superior Court, supra.

[4] It may be assumed, as counsel for the proposed interveners contends, that the rules as to intervention apply to mandamus proceedings the same as to ordinary actions. Such intervention was permitted in Wright v. Jordan, 192 Cal. 704, 221 P. 915, which was a mandamus proceeding. But concerning the propriety of their presence in that proceeding this court said:

"As to the interveners herein it will suffice to say that, while they were permitted to intervene to the extent and for the purpose of sustaining or opposing the respective contentions of the petitioners and respondents herein, their rights as interveners herein go no further, since they cannot be heard to broaden the scope or function of this special proceeding by urging claims or contentions which have their proper forum elsewhere, and in which forum they are already embattled. McNeil v. Morgan, 157 Cal. 373-377, 108 P. 69."

[5] The proposed complaint in intervention attempts to enlarge the issues raised by the petition for a writ of mandate and the return thereto by charging that the pending "application is collusive, unnecessary, and not defended in good faith." These allegations are mere conclusions. They do not state a cause of action in fraud. Facts constituting the charge must be alleged. See Kent v. Snyder, 30 Cal. 674; Campbell v. Genshlea, 180 Cal. 213, 180 P. 336; 12 Cal. Jur. 801, and cases cited.

There is not the slightest indication in the record herein that the mandamus proceeding is not prosecuted and defended in good faith. Indeed, all of the questions which may properly be raised in said proceeding, and which are sufficiently alleged in the proposed complaint in intervention appear to be incorporated in the return of the respondents herein. If the proposed interveners desire to file a brief as amici curiæ in the pending proceeding, application to that end would no doubt receive favorable consideration.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the application to file the complaint in intervention is denied.

FRANCHISE MOTOR FREIGHT ASS'N et al. v. SEAVEY et al., Members of State Railroad Commission. (S. F. 11456.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1925.
Modified May 26, 1925.)

1. Constitutional law §70(2)—Legislative determination as to justification of classified legislation not disturbed by courts unless palpably arbitrary.

The authority and duty to ascertain facts which will justify classified legislation rests in first instance with Legislature, and its decision as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant classification will not be disturbed by courts unless palpably arbitrary.

2. Statutes §72—When statute "discriminatory," stated.

A statute is discriminatory if it confers particular privileges on a class arbitrarily selected from a large number of persons, all of whom stand in same relation to privileges granted and between whom and those not favored no reasonable distinction can be found.

3. Constitutional law ~~§~~205(2), 241—Statutes ~~§~~72—Act exempting those engaged in transportation of products and implements of husbandry from regulation held unconstitutional and discriminatory.

There being no constitutional distinction as between those transporting farm products and implements by motor truck and common carriers hauling various kinds of freight, including farm products and implements, and the exemption of former from regulation being detrimental rather than beneficial to farmers as well as public generally, held that Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, § 5, as amended by St. 1923, p. 644, exempting those engaged in transporting products or implements of husbandry from regulation of such act, is an arbitrary classification, and violative of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 11, 21.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by the Franchise Motor Freight Association and others against Clyde L. Seavey and others, as members of the State Railroad Commission. Writ granted.

H. J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for petitioners.

Carl I. Wheat and Woodward M. Taylor, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent Commission to assume and exercise jurisdiction over certain persons engaged in the business of transportation of property as common carriers for compensation over the public highways in this state, between fixed termini or over regular routes, and to require such persons to cease operating until they shall have applied for and obtained from the respondent Commission certificates of public convenience and necessity therefor. The truck operators referred to are engaged exclusively in the movement of products or implements of husbandry and other farm necessities from farm to farm or between farms and loading points. There is no dispute as to the facts herein, and the matter is submitted upon a general demurrer to the petition. The refusal of the respondent Commission to assume and exercise jurisdiction herein is predicated upon chapter 310, Statutes of 1923, purporting to amend section 5 of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act of 1917 so as to exclude such persons from the regulations of said act. Prior to 1917, the Railroad Commission exercised no jurisdiction over transportation companies operating as common carriers of freight or passengers over the public highways by motor stage or motor truck. In December, 1916, this court held that under section 22 of article 12 of the Constitution, as amended in 1911, the Railroad Commission was vested with the jurisdiction and the duty to regulate rates and charges of such carriers of freight and passengers by motor truck; that this provision of the Constitution could not be rendered nugatory by the omission of the Legislature to prescribe procedural provisions for the carrying out thereof; and a peremptory writ of mandate was issued requiring the railroad commission to assume and exercise its jurisdiction over such carriers. Western Association of Short Line Railroads v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 802, 162 P. 391, 1 A. L. R. 1455. Thereupon the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act was enacted by the Legislature to provide the procedural rules for the exercise of such jurisdiction. Stats. 1917, p. 330. The title of this act and certain sections thereof were amended in 1919. Stats. 1919, p. 457. The term "transportation company," as used in the act, is defined in section 1 thereof to include—

"every corporation or person * * * owning, controlling, operating or managing, any automobile, jitney bus, auto truck, stage or auto stage used in the business of transportation of persons or property, or as a common carrier, for compensation, over any public highway in this state between fixed termini or over a regular route, and not operating exclusively within the limits of an incorporated city or town or of a city and county." (With certain exceptions not pertinent herein.)

The validity of this definition of the term "transportation company," as used in the Constitution, is not challenged or questioned by either of the parties hereto. The truck operators who are referred to in the petition herein are transportation companies within the meaning and purview of this definition, and it is not questioned that under the provisions of this act as it existed from 1917 to 1923, they were subject to all of the regulatory provisions thereof. In 1923, section 5 of the act, which provided for the issuance of certificates of public convenience and necessity, and forbade the operation by transportation companies upon the public highway without such certificates, was amended by adding thereto the following provisions:

"Each application for a certificate of public convenience and necessity, * * * must be accompanied by a fee of fifty dollars; provided, however, the movement of products or implements of husbandry and other farm necessities from farm to farm or from and to farm to and from loading point, warehouse or other initial point shall not be subject to the regulations of this act." Stats. 1923, p. 644.

Since the passage of this amendment the Railroad Commission in obedience thereto has refrained from exercising jurisdiction over the transportation companies referred to therein, and has declined to issue certificates of public convenience and necessity to such transportation companies, or to require them to apply for and obtain such certificates. In re Application of Geyer, 23 Opinions and Orders of Railroad Commission, p. 865. The interest of the petitioners in this proceeding consists in the fact that they are themselves engaged in the business of transportation of property as common carriers for compensation, operating over the same routes which are followed by the truck operators referred to in the petition. Petitioners are operating under certificates of public convenience and necessity obtained from the Railroad Commission, are subject to all of the regulations of the Commission, and by reason of the failure of the Commission to act in the premises, petitioners are subjected to the unrestricted and unregulated competition of those other truck operators. Petitioners contend that the amendment of 1923 is violative of sections 11 and 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, and of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, in that it makes an arbitrary classification and distinction not based upon any natural, intrinsic, or constitutional ground of classification. In short, their contention is that the amendment which purports to exempt from the regulations of the act those transportation companies which are engaged in hauling the products and implements of husbandry constitutes an unreasonable, unjust, and unlawful discrimination in favor of those transportation companies and against these petitioners. The respondents concede that the jurisdiction and power which is constitutionally vested in the Railroad Commission to regulate the rates of, to examine the books, records, and papers of, and to hear and determine complaints against such transportation companies cannot be taken away or abridged by the Legislature. They suggest, however, that the additional powers commonly exercised by the Commission, such as the power to issue certificates of public convenience and necessity, to regulate the accounts, service and safety of operations of transportation companies, to fix their classifications, rules and regulations, to require them to file reports, to regulate the issue by them of stocks, bonds, etc., and the sale or transfer of certificates of convenience, etc., were conferred upon the Commission, not by the Constitution, but by the Legislature, and are therefore subject to withdrawal by the Legislature which conferred them.

[1, 2] The question, therefore, is whether or not the exemption created by the proviso of 1923 constitutes a lawful classification. Concededly, the classification here made does not rest upon a constitutional distinction, and some natural or intrinsic distinction must therefore be found as a basis for it.

It is well settled that the authority and duty to ascertain the facts which will justify classified legislation rests in the first instance with the Legislature. Every presumption is in favor of the validity of the legislative determination, and its decision as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant the classification will not be overthrown by the courts unless it is palpably arbitrary. Anastasion v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 227 P. 762; People v. Monterey Fish Products Co. (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 398. It is equally well settled that a statute makes an improper and unlawful discrimination if it confers particular privileges upon a class arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the privileges granted, and between whom and the persons not so favored no reasonable distinction or substantial difference can be found justifying the inclusion of the one and the exclusion of the other. 5 Cal. Jur. 825, and cases cited.

[3] What reasonable ground of distinction is there between a common carrier engaged in the business of hauling various kinds of freight, including products and implements of husbandry, by motor truck over a regular route upon the public highway, and another common carrier engaged in the business of hauling freight, which consists solely of the products and implements of husbandry, by motor truck over the same route, which justifies the subjection of the one to the regulations imposed by the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, and the exemption of the other from the burden of those regulations? The only basis for such a distinction which has been suggested to us is that a continuance of the development of the state demands that the cultivation and marketing of farm products be encouraged and assisted, and that the intent of the Legislature in making this provision was the encouragement of the farmers to larger production, and the assurance of accessibility of markets for that production, to the end that the products of the soil might be placed within the ready reach of all, and their production fostered and assisted. This suggestion, as it seems to us, overlooks the main purpose of the regulation of rates and charges provided for in the Constitution, and of the regulation of service, competition, safety provisions, issuance of securities, etc., provided for in the act here in question. It seems plain to us that the primary purpose of such regulation is to insure the adequacy, regularity, and reliability of service and the reasonableness of rates and charges therefor. Such regulation is for the benefit of the producing and consuming public. It follows that the exemption from regulation of those transportation companies engaged in hauling farm products and implements would be a detriment, rather than a benefit, to the farmers, as well as to the public generally, and would be of benefit solely to the particular class of transportation companies so exempted. Assuming, however, that the provision here in question was designed for the benefit of the farmers, and that it may conceivably so operate, the weight of authority is to the effect that it is an unwarranted discrimination. A closely similar question came before the Supreme Court of the United States involving the validity of the Illinois Anti-Trust Law of 1893 (Laws 1893, p. 182), which prohibited a combination of capital, skill, or acts of two or more persons, etc., to create or carry out restrictions in trade, to limit production, or increase or reduce prices or prevent competition, and which contained a proviso that, "The provisions of this act shall not apply to agricultural products or live stock while in the hands of the producer or raiser." Section 9. That court, after an exhaustive consideration of the case, held the statute invalid solely upon the ground that the exception in favor of the farmers was an unreasonable and unwarranted discrimination, violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the course of its opinion the court observed:

"That if combinations of capital, skill or acts, in respect of the sale or purchase of goods, merchandise or commodities, whereby such combinations may, for their benefit exclusively, control or establish prices, are hurtful to the public interests and should be suppressed, it is impossible to perceive why like combinations in respect of agricultural products and live stock are not also hurtful." Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 540, 22 S. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679.

And so here it may be observed that if the regulation of transportation companies engaged in the business of hauling miscellaneous freight and commodities is helpful to the public welfare, it is impossible to perceive why like regulation in respect of transportation companies engaged in hauling products and implements of husbandry is not also helpful. The precise question here under consideration came before the federal courts under the so-called Lever Food Control Act, which was enacted by Congress in 1917 (40 Stat. 276 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1918, U. S. Comp. Stat. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 3115½ et seq.]) "to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel." That act, which was enacted as a war measure, made unlawful the destruction, waste or hoarding of necessities for the purpose of restricting the supply or increasing the price thereof. By its terms it was made applicable to all persons, but subject to the following provisos:

"Provided, that any storing or holding by any farmer, gardener, or other person of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act: Provided further, that farmers and fruit growers, co-operative and other exchanges, or societies of a similar character shall not be included within the provisions of this section." Section 26 (section 3115½qq).

In the district court for the district of Indiana, the contention was made that the exemptions created by the provisos constituted an arbitrary and unlawful classification, violative of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, and that if enacted by a state Legislature it would be equally violative of the like clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In support of the act the contention was made there, as here, that the exemption of the farmers was justified upon the ground that it would promote the general welfare by stimulating them to greater production. That contention applied with much greater force to the situation then obtaining, with the nation involved in a great war, than it possibly could to the present situation. It was argued that Congress might well have determined that the safety of the nation depended upon the increased production and conservation of food supplies, and that the national welfare would be promoted by exempting the farmers from the drastic provisions of the act, and thus stimulating them to increase their production. But the court held that the exemption was unreasonable, unjust, and wholly arbitrary and could not constitute a valid classification. Judge Anderson said:

"The indulgence to the excepted class is in respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by the members of it. But this does not differentiate the instant case from the Connolly Case [184 U. S. 540], for there the exception was to apply to 'agricultural products or live stock while in the hands of the producer or raiser.' My conclusion is that the classification in amended section 4 is arbitrary and not natural or reasonable; that such section is repugnant to the 'due process' clause of the Fifth Amendment, and is therefore void."

He also held that the words "due process of law" must have the same meaning in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments (Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 S. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232), from which it would follow that if the exception in the Lever Act is violative of the Fifth Amendment, the exemption in the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act would be equally violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. U. S. v. Armstrong (D. C.) 265 F. 683. The same question came before the federal district court for the Western district of Pennsylvania, and was decided in the same way, Judge Thomson saying: "Surely such classification is unjust and arbitrary in the extreme, violating both the letter and the spirit of the Fifth Amendment." U. S. v. Yount (D. C.) 267 F. 861. The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Second Circuit held the Lever Act constitutional as a war measure. Judge Manton, in his opinion, concluded that the exemption in favor of the farmers was not, under the circumstances then existing, so palpably arbitrary as to authorize a judicial review of the legislative judgment. It is to be noted, however, that Judge Manton's opinion cannot be regarded as the opinion of the court in that case. His associates concurred specially in separate opinions. Judge Ward based his concurrence upon the extraordinary powers vested in Congress for the maintenance of the national security in time of war. Judge Hough emphasized this by saying:

"If we were in a state of 'official' peace, this statute would * * * be constitutionally obnoxious because it is a gross piece of class legislation; incapable of distinction from that condemned in Connolly v. Union, etc., Co., 184 U. S. 540, 22 S. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679. But the statute is begotten by war, and is constitutionally excused (i. e., justified) by the war power, which is superior to, and not to be measured by, the police powers of the several states." C. A. Weed & Co. v. Lockwood (C. C. A.) 266 F. 785.

It may be noted in passing that this decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals was in effect reversed by the Supreme Court, but upon other grounds, without passing upon the validity of the exemption in favor of the farmers. C. A. Weed & Co. v. Lockwood, 255 U. S. 104, 41 S. Ct. 305, 65 L. Ed. 532. We do not mean to infer that every classification, based upon a distinction between farmers on the one hand and all other persons on the other, is unconstitutional, but we are impelled to conclude that no natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction is to be found as a basis for the exemption of the transportation companies described in the 1923 amendment, supra, from the regulations prescribed in the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, and that such attempted exemption is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, and of like provisions in our state Constitution. It is not claimed, and, in view of the legislative history of the act, could not be claimed, that the provisions of this exception are so intimately and inherently related to and connected with the general provisions to which it relates as to invalidate the latter.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed herein.

In re BONDS OF OROSI PUBLIC UTILITY DIST.

OROSI PUBLIC UTILITY DIST. v. McCUAIG.

(Sac. 3682.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 15, 1925.)

1. Constitutional law ☞290(3)—Legislature may create public utility district without hearing on question of benefits to land within district.

Legislature may create public utility district to be assessed for benefit of a public improvement and determine its boundaries, without giving property owners hearing on question of benefits to land included within district, as they are conclusively presumed to have been heard through representatives in Legislature.

2. Municipal corporations ☞450(4)—Owners of property included in assessment district entitled to be heard on question of benefits.

In formation of assessment district under general law, delegating determination of what lands to include to some commission, property owners are entitled to hearing, or opportunity to be heard, on question of benefits, before their lands are included, and also upon amount of tax to be assessed against property.

3. Municipal corporations ☞2—Act providing for formation of assessment district distinguished from one providing for quasi municipal corporation.

An act providing for formation of assessment district, practically authorizing property owners without notice to place burdens on property of others for purpose of improving their own property, is clearly distinguishable from an act providing for formation of quasi municipal corporation or municipality which does not directly affect private property.

4. Municipal corporations ☞2—Districts benefiting lands not formed for "municipal purposes."

Districts formed for purpose of draining, irrigating, reclaiming, or otherwise directly benefiting lands affected cannot be considered formed for municipal purposes, being merely special organizations created for some special local improvement, which may exercise only powers conferred to affect object of creation, and may carry out purposes only through assessments or local taxes upon property benefited.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Purposes.]

5. Municipal corporations ☞405—Exactions of public utility district are assessments for local benefits.

Exactions, which public utility districts created for specific purpose of directly benefiting lands affected, are entitled to enforce to carry out purposes, are merely special assessments, but, even if in form of a tax, are really assessments for local benefits.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨2—Districts formed for benefiting lands not "municipal corporations" within Constitution.

Public utility districts formed for purpose of draining, irrigating, reclaiming, or otherwise directly benefiting the lands affected thereby are not municipal corporations in contemplation of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Corporations.]

7. Statutes ⇨90(1)—All municipal corporations need not be organized and prescribed under one general law.

All municipal corporations need not be organized under one general law prescribing mode of organization and powers they can exercise, notwithstanding Const. art. 11, § 6, requiring that corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws, as they may be organized under any number of general laws.

8. Municipal corporations ⇨56—Cities may operate public utilities under Constitution.

Since adoption of 1911 amendment to Constitution of 1879 (Const. art. 11, § 19), cities have been entitled without question to own and operate public works for supplying light, water, heat, transportation, telephone service, and other means of communication.

9. Municipal corporations ⇨2—Public utility district quasi municipal corporation to provide utilities for inhabitants.

Intention of Legislature in enacting St. 1921, p. 906, under which Orosi public utility district was created, was to furnish inhabitants of unincorporated territory with same kind of utilities as cities were authorized to operate under Const. art. 11, § 19, and therefore to provide for creation of public corporations of a quasi municipal character with power to carry on particular functions committed to them.

10. Municipal corporations ⇨2—Public utility district need not exercise all powers of local self-government.

A district like the Orosi public utility district, organized under St. 1921, p. 906, need not exercise all the powers of local self-government, usually pertaining to municipal corporations, in order to be classed as a municipal corporation, but need only have such governmental powers as necessary to carry out purposes of organization.

11. Municipal corporations ⇨1—"Municipal corporations" not mere political subdivisions for governmental purposes.

Object of municipal corporations is not merely formation of political subdivisions of state for governmental purposes, but is also the association of members of community for administration of local affairs in matters largely outside the sphere of government as such.

12. Municipal corporations ⇨3—Legislature may create public utility districts in unincorporated territory.

Legislature had power to create public utility districts in unincorporated territory for the purpose of association of people therein to obtain advantages in use and benefit of certain utilities.

13. Municipal corporations ⇨57—Public service activities are "municipal" affairs.

Public service activities, such as supplying water to inhabitants, construction of reservoir for their benefit, sale and distribution of electrical energy, and establishment and operation of transportation service, which were once regarded as being of strictly private nature, are now considered municipal affairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal.]

14. Municipal corporations ⇨57—Municipality operating public utility is engaging in business upon municipal capital for municipal purposes.

A municipality operating public utility, though not performing governmental function, is engaging in business upon municipal capital and for municipal purposes, and tax for supplying such capital is general tax like any tax imposed for carrying on governmental functions of cities, and not tax for local improvements on property benefited.

15. Municipal corporations ⇨2—Utility district held quasi municipal corporation, without primary purpose of assessing benefits.

The Orosi public utility district, organized under St. 1921, p. 906, providing for operation of public utilities in unincorporated territory, held a quasi municipal corporation without primary purpose of assessing benefits upon private lands, especially in view of section 38, providing that only revenue producing utilities be acquired, and since levy for payments due on bonded debt, provided under section 39, is authorized only where the revenues are inadequate.

16. Municipal corporations ⇨3—No constitutional limitation on power of Legislature to form municipal territory.

There is no constitutional limitation on power of Legislature in determination of what shall constitute municipal territory.

17. Constitutional law ⇨278(2) — Municipal corporations ⇨10—Public utility district, organized without hearing to property owners as to whether they should be included within boundaries, held not unconstitutional.

Public utility district, organized under St. Cal. 1921, p. 906, without giving property owners hearing as to whether their property should be included within district, although act has since been amended to do so (St. 1923, p. 299), held not violative of federal Const. Amend. 14 and the state Constitution, as taking property without due process, notwithstanding power of district to levy tax to discharge sums due on bonded indebtedness, since tax was general tax for purpose for which district was formed; a construction analogous to that placed upon St. 1889, p. 358.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Proceeding by the Orosi Public Utility District to determine the validity of bonds of the district, opposed by J. F. McCuaig. From a decree sustaining validity of bonds, opponent appeals. Affirmed.

Walter C. Haight, of Visalia, for appellant.

Fred C. Scott and Leroy McCormick, both of Visalia, for respondent.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

WASTE, J. The Orosi public utility district was organized under the provisions of an act providing for the incorporation of public utility districts in unincorporated territory. Stats. 1921, p. 906. The board of directors of the district brought an action in the superior court of the county of Tulare to determine the validity of an $18,000 bond issue voted by the people of the district for the purpose of raising money for developing, pumping, storing, and distributing water. John F. McCuaig, a resident freeholder and taxpayer, answered the petition, alleging that all proceedings in relation to the issuance of the bonds were null and void for the reason that the utility district was not duly organized and incorporated, because the act of the Legislature under which it was formed was unconstitutional. The trial court determined all issues in favor of the due organization and incorporation of the district, and the legality of the bonds, and entered its decree, affirming their validity. The taxpayer has appealed on the judgment roll alone.

The act providing for the incorporation of public utility districts in unincorporated territory states that, whenever electors equal in number to 15 per cent. of all the votes cast for all candidates for governor within such unincorporated territory at the last preceding general election, at which a governor was elected, desire to organize such a district, they shall sign a petition setting forth the boundaries of the proposed district, and present same to the board of supervisors of the county in which the unincorporated territory is situated. The board of supervisors shall, within 15 days after the presentation of the petition, publish a copy thereof, together with a statement that the proposition involved therein, which shall be briefly specified, will be submitted by it to the qualified electors of the unincorporated territory at a special election, after publication of the required notice. Within 5 days after the result of the election is ascertained, if it appears that a majority of the votes cast is in favor of the incorporation of the district, the board of supervisors shall so declare, and shall in a proper order state the name and boundaries of the district, and that such utility district is formed under the provisions of the act (supra). After the date of the filing of certain certificates with the secretary of state, the territory described in the petition shall be deemed incorporated as a public utility district, under the provisions of the statute, with all the rights, privileges, and powers set forth therein.

Under the provisions of the act, any public utility district so formed shall have power to have perpetual succession, to sue and be sued, to adopt and alter a seal, to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property necessary to the full and continued exercise of its power, to acquire, construct, own, operate, control, or use works for supplying the inhabitants of the district with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service, or other means of communication, or means for the disposition of garbage, sewage or refuse matter, and to do all things necessary or convenient to the full exercise of the powers granted by the act. Whenever there is a surplus of water, light, heat, or power above that which may be required by the inhabitants or municipalities within the district, the district may sell or otherwise dispose of the surplus outside of the district. It also may exercise the right of eminent domain for the condemnation of private property for public use, and may construct its works across or along any street or highway, or over the lands and property of the state, and in that connection is given the same rights and privileges as are granted to municipalities. It may borrow money and issue bonds or other evidence of indebtedness within certain limitations, levy and collect, or cause to be levied or collected, taxes for the purpose of carrying on its operations and paying its obligations, and may make contracts, employ labor, and do all acts necessary or convenient for the full exercise of the powers granted to it, which are to be exercised by a board of directors elected by the voters in the district, which board may act by ordinance or resolution signed by its president and attested by the secretary. The act further provides (section 39) that if from any cause the revenues of the district shall be inadequate to pay the principal or interest on any bonded debt as it becomes due, or if funds are needed to carry out the objects and purposes of the district, which cannot be provided for out of the revenues of the district, the board of directors may levy a tax for that purpose on the taxable property situated in the district. It may by ordinance, the provisions of which shall be conformable to the general law, provide the mode and manner of assessing, correcting or equalizing assessments, and the levying and collecting of taxes which may be by actions or legal proceedings; or it may elect to avail itself of the assessment made by the county assessor of the county in which the district is situated. All taxes levied under the provisions of the act are a lien on the property on which they are levied, and the enforcement of the collection of the taxes may be had in the same manner and by the same means as provided by law for the enforcement of liens for state and county taxes.

[1] The act of 1921, as originally enacted, and as it stood when the respondent district was formed, did not provide for any notice of the hearing of the petition for the formation of the district. The property owners within the proposed district were not given an opportunity to protest against having their property included within its boundaries, nor were they accorded an opportunity to be heard as to whether their property was or could be benefited by being included within such boundaries. For that reason, the appellant takes the position that the act is unconstitutional and in contravention of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution, and contrary to similar provisions in the Constitution of the state, in that it provides for a taking of his property without due process of law. It follows, he argues, that all proceedings taken for the organization of the district, and the subsequent proceedings relating to the issue of the bonds, which are dependent upon the validity of the organization of the district, are null and void, and, as a necessary consequence, the bonds sought to be validated by this proceeding are invalid. After the proceedings involved in this case were had, the act was amended (Stats. 1923, p. 299) to provide for a notice and a hearing by the board of supervisors of the petition for the formation of a utility district. It is now provided that the board must hear all competent and relevant testimony offered in support of, or in opposition to, the petition. It shall make such changes as it may deem advisable in, and shall define and establish the proposed boundaries. At the time the proceedings for the formation of the Orosi district were taken no discretionary power whatever was vested in any legislative body. Upon presentation of the petition therefor, the board of supervisors was compelled to immediately submit the question of the formation of the district to the voters residing within the described limits. The question whether or not the exact territory described in the petition should be included in and constitute the utility district, was made to depend solely upon an affirmative vote of the body of the electorate residing therein. Appellant contends that to permit a district, formed under such a statute, to levy a tax on property for nonpayment of which the property may be sold is to subject the property owner to deprivation of his property without due process of law.

It is not contended that any of the steps leading to the formal declaration by the board of supervisors of Tulare county that the respondent district was in fact created were omitted, or that they were not properly taken. The sole question to be determined on appeal relates to the constitutionality of the act under which the district was created.

Our first consideration is therefore directed to the nature of the district which may be formed under its provisions. If it be one formed for the primary purpose of assessing upon the lands within its boundaries benefits to be derived by the lands from some public improvement for which purpose the district is created, we must hold with appellant, and declare the act unconstitutional as violating the "due process clause" of the federal Constitution. Such districts can be legally created in but one of two ways, neither of which was followed in this case. The Legislature itself may create a district to be assessed for the benefit of a public improvement, and determine its boundaries, either by describing them or by laying down a fixed rule by which they may be determined. If it does so, the property owners are not entitled to a hearing on the question of benefits to the land included within the district, for they are conclusively presumed to have been heard through their representatives in the Legislature. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 604, 213 P. 983; Miller v. Lux, Inc., v. Drainage Dist., 182 Cal. 252, 265, 187 P. 1041; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 174, 17 S. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369.

[2] Instead of creating the district by special act, the Legislature may, by a general law, provide for its formation, and may delegate to some board, commission, or tribunal the determination of what lands shall be included within its boundaries. In the event that the district be formed under such an act, the inquiry becomes judicial in its nature to such an extent that property owners are entitled to a hearing, or an opportunity to be heard, on the question of benefits before their lands are included. If the district be formed under this method of delegated power, it is essential that the property owners whose property is to be included shall be given a hearing upon the question whether their lands should be assessed at all, that is to say, whether or not such lands would be benefited by the proposed improvement, and also a hearing upon the amount of the tax to be assessed against the property. Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 356, 8 S. Ct. 921, 31 L. Ed. 763; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra, p. 174; Brookes v. City of Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 431, 117 P. 433; Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, 189 Cal. 254, 261, 208 P. 304. Somewhere during the process of arriving at the amount of any special assessments which may be levied on property the taxpayer must have an opportunity to be heard as to the validity and extent of the tax, and that notice and opportunity must be provided as an essential part of the statutory provision. Security Trust Co. v. Lexington, 203 U. S. 323, 333, 27 S. Ct. 87, 51 L. Ed. 204; Central of Georgia Ry. v. Wright, 207 U. S. 127, 138, 28 S. Ct. 47, 52 L. Ed. 134, 12 Ann. Cas. 463.

The respondent district was not created by the Legislature itself, and the act providing for its formation makes no provision for the submission of the question as to what lands should be included within its boundaries to any tribunal before which the property owners, whose lands were included in the petition might have a hearing.

[3] The rule laid down in Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, supra, which has been so constantly adhered to by this court in its application to assessment districts, formed for the purpose of assessing upon private lands the benefits to accrue from the particular public improvement for the construction of which the district was formed (Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, 189 Cal. 254, 267, 208 P. 304), does not apply to every kind of public or quasi public corporation. There is an obvious distinction to be drawn between an act providing for the formation of an assessment district, and which practically authorizes property owners, without notice, to place burdens on the property of others for the sole purpose of improving their own property, and an act providing for the formation of a quasi municipal corporation or a municipality. People v. Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 632, 84 P. 205; Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288, 293, 116 P. 750. That distinction, it was pointed out in the latter case, is to be made between the proceedings of a board, acting in pursuance of some delegated legislative authority in creating a political subdivision of the state, as a county or a city, a proceeding which does not directly affect private property, and proceedings which do directly charge or effect such property. The respondent takes the position that it is a public corporation, and that any burden, by way of taxation, to be laid on the inhabitants residing within its boundaries is but a tax for municipal purposes. In view of the distinction, pointed out by this court (supra), between the acts providing for the formation, on the one hand, of public or quasi public corporations, in the nature of taxing districts, and of municipal corporations, on the other, and in view of the contention of the respondent, the problem which confronts us lies in determining whether or not the act under which the respondent district was created provides for the organization of a district which is in its nature a public corporation, the inhabitants and property owners of which are subject to taxation for municipal purposes without any hearing as to the benefits to be derived from the creation and conduct of such a corporation, or is an assessment district created for the primary purpose of assessing upon private lands the benefits to be derived thereby from the public improvements for which purpose the district is formed. Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, supra, p. 267 (208 P. 304).

[4, 5] The purposes for which the Orosi District was formed, the appellant contends, are not municipal, and a district formed for such purposes does not possess the essential characteristics of a municipal corporation. If the authorities cited by him were strictly in point, there would be an end to the controversy; but they are not. They deal with questions arising in connection with districts formed for the purpose of draining, irrigating, reclaiming, or otherwise directly benefiting the lands affected thereby. People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 114, 121, 48 P. 1016; People v. Levee Dist. No. 6, 131 Cal. 30, 34, 63 P. 676; People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. 373, 382, 103 P. 207; Pixley v. Saunders, 168 Cal. 152, 160, 141 P. 815; In re Werner, 129 Cal. 567, 572, 62 P. 97. When related to that class of districts, the cases cited are clearly in point. The improvements contemplated by the acts under which they were formed cannot be considered "municipal purposes." In re Madera Irrigation Dist., 92 Cal. 344, 28 P. 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106 (on rehearing). One of the distinguishing features of such districts is that they are created for the purpose, generally, of some special local improvement, and may exercise only such powers as may be conferred by the Legislature in the line of the object of their creation. They are merely special state organizations for state purposes, created to perform certain work which the policy of the state requires or permits to be done, and to which the state has given a certain degree of discretion in making the improvements contemplated. The other distinguishing feature is that the exactions which such districts may enforce in order to carry out their purposes are in the nature of assessments or taxes for local benefits, to be spread on the property in the districts in proportion to the peculiar advantage accruing to each parcel from the improvement. Pasadena Park Imp. Co. v. Leland, 175 Cal. 511, 512, 166 P. 341. Such an exaction is generally in the form of a special assessment, but, even if it is in the form of a tax, it is nevertheless an assessment for local benefits. City of San Diego v. Linda Vista Irr. Dist., 108 Cal. 189, 193, 41 P. 291.

[6, 7] Districts of the nature just discussed are not municipal corporations in the contemplation of the Constitution. People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., supra, p. 382 (103 P. 207); Reclamation Dist. No. 551 v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 478, 66 P. 668. But the provision in article 11, § 6, that "corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws," does not imply that the Legislature must, by any general law, provide a plan in which shall be prescribed the mode under which all municipal corporations must be organized and the powers they can exercise. Of interest in this connection is the language of the court in Re Madera Irrigation Dist., 92 Cal. 296, where, at page 317, 28 P. 272, 276 (14 L. R. A. [N. S.] 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106), the court says:

"Such corporations are but the agents or representatives of the state in the particular locality in which they exist. They are organized for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the Legislature in its desire to provide for the general welfare of the state, and in the accomplishment of which legislative convenience or constitutional requirements have made them essential. Although in this state the Legislature is required to provide such agencies under general laws, it is authorized, under its general power of legislation, to invest such corporations, when created, with the same powers which, without such restriction, it could itself have exercised; and in providing for such organizations it need confer upon them only such powers as, in its judgment, are proper to be exercised by them in the discharge of the particular functions of government which may be conferred upon them. Being the representatives of the Legislature in the various localities of the state, the requirements for organization, as well as the powers to be exercised, vary with the character of the purpose for which they may be created. Hence the general laws which the Legislature may enact for the organization of public corporations may be as numerous as the objects for which such corporations may be created. For each of these objects the law is the same, but there would be a manifest impropriety in requiring that the organization of a levee district or an irrigation district should be conducted in the same manner as the organization of a corporation for the management of a public park or the control of the school department. Whether the districts to which such general laws are applicable, or in which the people thereof may avail themselves of the privilege conferred, be many or few, is immaterial. Even if there be but a single district to which the law is applicable, at the time of its enactment, the Legislature would be justified, under its legislative power, to pass general laws in making such provision for that district. Whenever a special district of the state requires special legislation therefor, it is competent for the Legislature, by general law, to authorize the organization of such district into a public corporation, with such powers of government as it may choose to confer upon it. It is not necessary that such public corporation should be vested with all governmental powers, but the Legislature may clothe it with such as, in its judgment, are proper to be exercised within and for the benefit of such district. Being created for the purpose of discharging only one public purpose, it is not requisite that it have power not necessary therefor, or which would be appropriate to a corporation organized for some other purpose. Neither is it requisite that such corporation should have legislative or judicial powers conferred upon it. It may be organized for the mere purpose of exercising executive and administrative functions, with the added power of making such prudential rules and regulations as may be necessary for the exercise of the particular functions intrusted to its charge."

[3, 9] With this power of the Legislature understood, the nature of the districts contemplated by the act under which the Orosi public utility district was created is more clearly discerned. In 1911 the Constitution of California was amended to provide that:

"Any municipal corporation may establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service or other means of communication. Such works may be acquired by original construction or by the purchase of existing works, including their franchises, or both." Const. art. 11, § 19.

The amended section is radically different from the one it replaced. In the statement of legislative reasons for the adoption of the amendment, printed and transmitted to the voters by the secretary of state, it is stated that the conditions which prevailed in this state with regard to the operation of public utilities in cities at the time of the adoption of the new Constitution in 1879 had materially changed, and an entirely new situation existed regarding the subject to which the section related. "The proposed amendment," the statement continues, "is designed to provide for conditions as they now are, and as they will doubtless continue to be in the future." After a discussion of the situation arising during the period following 1879, and a declaration that the result "has been a distinct disappointment, like many other attempts to remedy economic conditions by force of statutes, * * * the true remedy, so far as any substantial benefit to the people is concerned," the statement declares, "is to encourage the furnishing of these public necessities by municipal corporations themselves." The adoption of the amendment definitely settled and removed all doubt from the question of the right of cities and towns to own and operate the kind of public utilities designated by the Constitution. In enacting the statute here in question, the Legislature has made provision whereby the inhabitants of the state living outside the limits of cities and towns may serve their own purposes through the operation of the same kind of utilities, when organized for that purpose.

That such was the intention of the Legislature may be gleaned from a reading of the provisions declaring the purposes for which public utility districts may be created in unincorporated territory. They are the acquisition, construction, and use of works for supplying the inhabitants of the district with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service, or other means of communication or means for the disposition of garbage, sewage, or refuse matter. It has the power to do all things necessary or convenient to the full exercise of the powers granted by the act. It is significant that, when the Legislature came to pass the act extending to the inhabitants outside of incorporated cities and towns, the privileges in regard to the acquisition and use of their own public utilities that are granted by the state Constitution to municipalities, it should have followed so closely the language of the constitutional amendment of 1911 in the statement of the purposes for which the districts may be created. We are convinced that it was its intention to provide for the creation of public corporations of a quasi municipal character, with power to carry on the particular functions committed to them.

[10] "A city or purely municipal corporation is perhaps the highest type of corporation created for municipal purposes, because it is a miniature government, having legislative, executive, and judicial powers, but there is another class of corporation, such as counties, school districts, road districts, etc., which, though varying in application and peculiar features, are but so many agencies or instrumentalities of the state to promote the convenience of the public at large, and are, in the broadest use of the term, for municipal purposes." Cook v. Port of Portland, 20 Or. 580, 583, 27 P. 263, 264 (13 L. R. A. 533). It is not necessary, therefore, that a district like the Orosi Public Utility District shall exercise all the powers of local self-government which usually pertain to municipal corporations. All that was required was that the Legislature should vest them, when properly organized, with such governmental powers as in its judgment were necessary to be exercised and appropriate to carry out the purposes for which the districts may have been organized. In re Madera Irrigation Dist., supra. It may enlarge or restrict their powers, direct the mode and manner of their exercise, and define what acts they may or may not perform. San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 541, 552.

[11, 12] The creation of municipal corporations does not have for its sole object the formation of political subdivisions of the state for governmental purposes, but there is also the association of the members of the particular community for the administration of their local business and affairs in matters largely outside of the sphere of government as such. Union Stone Co. v. Bd. of Freeholders of Hudson Co., 71 N. J. Eq. 657, 664, 65 A. 466, 469; see, also, Wilson v. Bd. of Trustees, 133 Ill. 443, 464, 27 N. E. 203. It is quite apparent to us that the Legislature had in view such association of the people living in the outlying districts, when it enacted the statute providing for the formation of public utility districts in the unincorporated territory of the state. It thereby provided for the creation of public agencies or quasi municipal corporations, the declared purpose of the act being to extend to the inhabitants of such districts, when properly organized, advantages in the use and benefit of certain utilities which they might not be able to obtain in any other way, and which, from common experience, we know tend to promote the general welfare of the people of the state. That it had the power to do so cannot be denied. While the proposed constitutional amendment was pending in 1911, this court held that there was no provision in the state Constitution which either expressly or by implication forbade the acquisition, ownership, or operation of public utilities by a municipality, or which prohibited the Legislature from granting a municipality the power to acquire, own, and operate them. Clark v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 30, 46, 116 P. 722.

[13] Activities, once regarded as being of a strictly private nature, are now considered municipal affairs, e. g., the sale and distribution of electrical energy manufactured by a city, the supplying of water to its own inhabitants or to outside territory, the construction of a reservoir by a city on its own land and to be used for the benefit of its inhabitants, and the establishment and operation of transportation service. Los Angeles G. & E. Corp. v. Los Angeles, 188 Cal. 307, 317, 205 P. 125; Heilbron v. Sumner, 186 Cal. 648, 651, 200 P. 409; South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 579, 594, 93 P. 490; Williams v. City of Vallejo, 36 Cal. App. 133, 139, 171 P. 834; United Railroads v. San Francisco, 249 U. S. 517, 520, 39 S. Ct. 361, 63 L. Ed. 739. The people of the state, by the amendment to the Constitution, placed other public utilities in the same category.

[14] We take it to be now a generally accepted proposition that, while a municipality, which undertakes to supply those of its inhabitants who will pay therefor with utilities and facilities of urban life, is performing a function not governmental, but more often committed to private corporations or persons with whom it may come into competition, it is, in fact, engaging in business upon municipal capital, and for municipal purposes. 28 Cyc. 125. Any tax, therefore, levied and collected for the purpose of supplying such municipal capital is not a tax or assessment on property directly benefited by the construction of some local improvement, but is a general tax levied just as, and for the same purpose that, any general municipal tax is imposed for carrying on the governmental functions and utilitarian objects of duly incorporated cities or towns.

[15] The conclusion we have reached, on the general consideration of the act under which the respondent district was formed, is confirmed by an examination of the provisions of the statute relating to the necessary revenue for conducting the affairs of such public corporations. It is provided (section 38) that only revenue-producing utilities shall be acquired, owned, or operated, the intention being " * * * that each public utility owned and operated by the district shall be self-sustaining." To that end, it is provided that, so far as possible, the board of directors shall fix such charges for commodities or service furnished by its revenue-producing utilities as will pay the administrative expenses of the government of the district, the operating cost of the utilities, the interest on any bonded indebtedness, and, in addition, provide a sinking fund for the retirement of the principal of the debt, and an appropriate fund for repairs, replacements, and betterments. These provisions clearly establish the contention that the essential purpose of the act is to form a quasi municipal corporation which may acquire and operate public utilities and pay for their operation from rates to be paid by those enjoying the service. When the cost of any public utility to be acquired, completed, or constructed can be paid out of the revenues of the district derived from the operation of its public utilities, in addition to the other necessary expenses of the district, the board of directors must determine the cost of such utility, the method and manner of payment therefor, and submit the question of its acquisition upon such terms to the electors. If the cost cannot be met in that way, a district bonded indebtedness may be incurred in the manner provided by the act. It is only when the revenues of the district shall be inadequate to pay the principal or interest of any bonded debt, as it becomes due, that the board of directors must, or, when funds are needed to carry out the objects and purposes of the district which cannot be provided for out of its revenues, that the board of directors may levy a tax for such purposes. Section 39. These provisions make it clear that the "primary purpose" of the act (Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, supra) was not that of assessing upon private lands the benefits to be derived from the acquisition of public utilities.

[16, 17] From our conclusion that the act, under which the respondent district was created, provides for the formation of a public or quasi municipal corporation, the inhabitants and property owners of which are subject to tax by the district for municipal purposes only, it follows that the attack here made on the constitutionality of the act must fail. The public utility districts provided for by its terms have as their sole purpose the welfare and prosperity of the people of the state—matters which rest within the will of the people themselves. In People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 P. 205, this court considered the constitutionality of the act providing for the annexation of territory to incorporated towns and cities. Stats. 1889, p. 358. By the terms of the act, upon receipt of a proper petition, signed by the requisite number of electors of the municipality and exactly describing the territory desired to be annexed, the legislative body of the municipality is compelled to submit the question of annexation to the electors of the town, and also to those of the outside territory. No notice, or opportunity to be heard on the question, is afforded residents or property owners of either the town or the territory which it is proposed to annex, and the legislative body has no power to change or fix the boundaries. The sole question whether or not the exact territory described in the petition shall be annexed and thereby subjected to the burden of taxation for municipal purposes is made to depend entirely upon an affirmative vote of the electors at the election called for the purpose. That is the exact situation as to the boundaries of public utility districts in unincorporated territory, created under the act as it was when the respondent district was formed. The court pointed out the "obvious distinction" between those acts practically authorizing property owners, without notice, to place burdens upon the property of others for the sole purpose of improving their own property, and one providing for the formation of municipalities. It held that, as the Legislature cannot itself declare the precise boundaries of a municipality, for it can act in such matter only by general laws, it might, in the absence of any constitutional inhibition, confer that power on the electors of the district to be affected, such declaration to be made at an election held after due notice.

See, also, People ex rel. Rhodes v. Fleming, 10 Colo. 553, 16 P. 298; Ford v. North Des Moines, 80 Iowa, 626, 45 N. W. 1031. The Constitution does not attempt to limit the power of the Legislature in providing for the determination of the question as to what shall constitute municipal territory. Consequently, in the matter of forming cities or towns, questions as to population, extent, and character of territory to be included are matters left entirely with the legislative department. People ex rel. Russell v. Town of Loy-alton, 147 Cal. 774, 778, 82 P. 620.

In the instant case the district has been formed within the strict letter of the law, and in the manner provided by the legislative enactment. We have been cited to no authorities which hold that the requirement as to due process of law gives a property owner an absolute right to notice and hearing before his property may be included within the limits of a municipality or a quasi municipal corporation, by reason of the creation of which his property will be subjected only to the burden of a general tax for the purposes for which the district was formed, in contradistinction to a tax or assessment for some local benefit. Appellant was not therefore entitled to notice and opportunity to be heard on the question of benefits to his land before it could be included within the boundaries of the respondent district. The act under which it was formed directs that, in the event it becomes necessary to levy a tax for carrying out the objects and purposes of the district, the board of directors may, by ordinance, provide the manner and mode of assessing and of correcting and equalizing assessments upon the taxable property situated within the district, and may provide for the collection of delinquent taxes by actions or legal proceedings, provided that the provisions of such ordinance shall be conformable to general law, or it may accept the assessment for district purposes made by the county assessor. Section 39. Whatever may be the method of assessment that shall be adopted, if provision be made for the correction of errors committed by the assessor, through a board of revision or equalization, with power to hear, after notice, complaints respecting the justice of the assessment, the proceeding by which the valuation is determined, though it may be followed, if the tax is not paid, by a sale of the delinquent's property, is due process of law. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 710, 4 S. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra, at p. 175 (17 S. Ct. 56); People v. Town of Ontario, supra, at p. 633 (84 P. 205).

We deem it unnecessary to further discuss the decisions of this court and those of other jurisdictions so strongly relied on by appellant. Many of them have already been referred to and their distinguishing features pointed out. We have carefully examined every one of them, and many others, and have not found one that is exactly in point. The reason for the dearth of precise judicial decision on the important question we have been called on to decide in this case is that public utility districts are new to the law of California, and the furnishing of what may be called public utility service is an extension of municipal functions of comparatively recent times. After a critical study of the authorities, we have found nothing that destroys our confidence in the conclusion we have reached in this case. The case cited by appellant, and which, on first reading, seems nearest in point to the question here involved (People ex rel. Amestoy Estate Co. v. Van Nuys Lighting Dist., 173 Cal. 792, 162 P. 97, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 255) is readily distinguishable on the facts given by the court as the foundation for its decision.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1925.)

1. Wills ⚡384—Evidence interpreted in light of presumptions in favor of lower court's action.

On appeal from judgment denying petition to revoke probate of will, evidence will be interpreted in light of rule that all presumptions and intendments are in favor of lower court's action.

2. Wills ⚡111(3, 4)—Signature at testator's request, or guiding of his hand, by another, complies with statute.

Signing of testator's name at his request, or guiding of his hand, by another, because he was physically weak, is compliance with Civ. Code, § 1276, and raises no presumption against due execution of will.

3. Wills ⚡302(1)—Evidence held to show due execution and attestation of will as matter of law.

In will contest, uncontradicted evidence held to show, that testator signed will in presence of attesting witnesses, as required by Civ. Code, § 1276, subs. 1, 2, and that they signed it in his presence.

4. Wills ⚡55(1)—That testator did not formulate words of request that others witness execution of will not evidence of testamentary incapacity.

That testator himself did not formulate words of request that others witness execution of will does not tend to prove testamentary incapacity.

5. Wills ⚡163(1)—Activity in preparation and participation in execution of will by beneficiary, necessary to raise presumption of undue influence.

Presumption of undue influence by beneficiary is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity or confidential relation alone, but arises only when beneficiary has been active in preparation or participated in execution of will.

6. Wills ⚡159—Undue influence must destroy testator's free agency.

Undue influence, to invalidate will, must have destroyed testator's free agency and overpowered his volition at time of making will, and general influence, not brought to bear directly on testamentary act, however strong or controlling, will not warrant setting aside will of person of sound mind.

7. Wills ⚡155(1)—Mere opportunity to exercise undue influence insufficient to invalidate will.

Mere opportunity to exercise undue influence is insufficient to invalidate will.

8. Wills ⚡324(3)—Undue influence by beneficiary and others held not shown.

Evidence held insufficient as matter of law to show such undue influence by beneficiary, nurse, attorney, and Christian Science practitioner as would invalidate will.

9. Wills ⚡166(1)—That new attorney drew will does not warrant inference of undue influence.

That new attorney was called in to prepare will, in absence of other circumstances, will not sustain inference of undue influence.

10. Wills ⚡166(11)—Testator's declarations before making will evidence that will probated coincided with intentions.

Testator's declarations before making will held evidence that will probated coincided with intentions concerning wife, who was sole bene-fiary, though not evidence of his testamentary act.

11. Wills ⚡55(1)—Will probated held not invalidated by dissimilarity to former will.

That deceased had gone to his attorney's office to make prior will, which provided for contestants of as well as sole beneficiary under will probated, and did not name latter as executrix, as did later will, which was executed while he was too ill to leave home, did not invalidate later will.

12. Wills ⚡55(1)—Form of will immaterial, where it sufficiently expressed intent and no undue influence was shown.

Where testator's intent was sufficiently indicated by his last will, and there was no evidence of undue influence, fact that it was not formally prepared by him, as was his habit in respect to other documents, including former will, was immaterial.

13. Wills ⚡386—Verdict of mental capacity not disturbed, where evidence is not insufficient as matter of law to support finding either way.

Where testimony is not insufficient, as matter of law, to support finding either way, verdict that testator had mental capacity to make will cannot be disturbed.

14. Wills ⚡31—Testator need not be able to transact business generally or make contracts to make valid will.

Testator may have capacity to make valid will, though not able to make contracts, manage his estate, or transact business generally.

15. Evidence ⚡568(2)—Subscribing witness' opinion as to testator's mental capacity entitled to more weight than that of merely passive witness.

Presumption being that subscribing witness had attention directed to and noted testator's mental capacity, his opinion is entitled to more weight than that of one who was merely passive, but weight thereof is for jury.

16. Wills ⚡55(5)—Evidence held not to show physical or mental incapacity to make will.

Evidence held not to show incompetency to make will because of physical condition or mental irresponsibility.

17. Wills ⚡324(2)—Directed verdict for proponents on issue of due execution held not error as precluding consideration of certain evidence.

In will contest, where there was no substantial evidence that will was not duly executed, nor any indication that evidence as to whether testator declared will to be his, and whether it was signed by him or at his request, and in his presence by two subscribing witnesses, was not considered on issue of unsound mind, direction of verdict for proponents on issue of due execution was not error as precluding consideration of handwriting expert's testimony as to discrepancies in writing, erasures, alteration of signatures, etc., and evidence as to day on which will was drawn.

18. Wills ⚡384—Contention that prior will was not revoked by subsequent will held unnecessary to consider.

Where evidence showed, as matter of law, that will was duly executed, and that no undue influence was exercised, and jury found that testator was mentally competent, contention that prior will, containing inconsistent provisions, was not revoked need not be considered, in view of Civ. Code, § 1296, especially where last will expressly revoked all former wills.

19. Wills ⚡329(3)—Instruction held not error as declaring that admission of will to probate creates presumption of validity.

Instruction that admission of document to probate prima facie established it as testator's will and his competency to make it, and that "on this contest the law presumes" that testator was competent to make will, and that burden of proving otherwise was on contestants, held not error as declaring that mere fact that will had been admitted to probate created presumption of validity, thereby increasing burden of proof on contestants.

20. Wills ⚡427—Recognized as valid while probate stands uncontested.

As long as probate stands without contest will must be recognized and admitted in all courts as valid, unrevoked decree, being absolute conclusive proof of its genuineness.

21. Wills ⚡52(1)—Burden of proving testator's incompetency on contestants.

Burden of proving testator's incompetency is contestants' whether law presumes his competency, or because party having affirmative of issue must prove it under Code Civ. Proc. § 1981.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Petition by Frances Ellen Parker and another to revoke the probate of the will of Andrew Holloway, deceased. From a judgment denying petition, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Davis, Rush & MacDonald and Wm. B. Beirne, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Waldo & Hinds, of Pasadena, and Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. On November 20, 1917, Andrew Holloway died at his home in Pasadena at the age of 45 years, leaving a last will and testament as follows:

"I, Andrew Holloway, of the city of Pasadena, county of Los Angeles, state of California, being of sound and disposing mind and memory do make, publish and declare this my last will and testament. I direct that after my business is settled and my debts paid that all my property, both real and personal, of which I may be possessed shall go to my wife, Annie. I hereby revoke all former wills by me made, and appoint my said wife to be the executrix of this my last will and testament without bond.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 4th day of November, 1917. Andrew Holloway. Subscribed, sealed, published and declared by the above-named Andrew Holloway as and for his last will and testament in our presence and in the presence of each other have subscribed our names as witnesses thereto at the request of the said testator this 4th day of November, 1917. Nita J. Wright, address, 276 North Lake avenue, Pasadena. Mineita E. Binkley, address, 350 North Pasadena avenue, Pasadena, Cal."

Indorsed on the back:

"No. 37,223, will of Andrew Holloway, filed November 27, 1917. H. J. Leland, Clerk, by H. H. Doyle, Deputy."

On December 11, 1917, this will was admitted to probate and letters testamentary were issued to Annie M. Holloway, the executrix therein named, who duly qualified as such executrix. On April 18, 1918, Frances Ellen Parker and Emma Jane Holloway, as contestants, filed a petition wherein the validity of the will is contested on several grounds and praying the revocation of the probate thereof. The petition is based first, on the ground that the "said instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of the said Andrew Holloway deceased was not executed in the manner or form required by law in this: That the said purported will was not signed by the said Andrew Holloway in the presence of the purported subscribing witnesses thereto; that the names of said purported subscribing witnesses to said last will were not signed; nor were either of them signed thereto by the said witnesses respectively at the request of the said Andrew Holloway, or in his presence; that the said Andrew Holloway did not declare the same to be his will in the presence of said witnesses, or either of them, or at all;" and, second, that the testator was not at the time and long prior thereto of sound and disposing mind; and, third, that he was not acting of his own free will or volition, but was unduly influenced at the time by his wife, Annie M. Holloway, and Nita J. Wright.

Six questions were submitted to the jury with instructions to answer the first four in the affirmative and the fifth in the negative. The questions are as follows:

"(1) Did Andrew Holloway, by words or conduct, indicate to Mineita Binkley his desire that the latter sign his name to the will which has been admitted to probate? (2) Were Nita J. Wright and Mineita Binkley present at the time Andrew Holloway's name was subscribed to said will? (3) Did Andrew Holloway, by words or conduct, indicate to Nita J. Wright and Mineita Binkley that said instrument was his will, and that he wished them to sign the same as witnesses? (4) Did Nita J. Wright and Mineita Binkley sign said will in the presence of said Andrew Holloway, and in the presence of each other? (5) Was Andrew Holloway procured to make said will by undue influence of Annie M. Holloway and Nita J.

Wright or either of them? (6) Was Andrew Holloway, at the time said will was made, of sound mind (as the same is defined in the instructions of the court)?"

Upon the last question the jury also found in the affirmative, and judgment against the contestants and plaintiffs for costs of the suit was ordered to be entered. A motion for a new trial was denied.

[1] The contestants in taking this appeal specify eight grounds as error, which we will discuss in the order of their presentation, and in reviewing the evidence under each of the eight specifications we will interpret it in the light of the rule that all presumptions and intendments are in favor of the action of the court below.

1. The first assignment of error is that the purported will was not signed by the deceased and that the subscribing witnesses were not present at the time the deceased's name was subscribed to the will. The evidence on this question is uncontradicted. Testimony was given by Annie M. Holloway, the widow, by Mineita E. Binkley, the nurse, by Mrs. Nita J. Wright, the Christian Science practitioner, and by the attorney, Samuel S. Hinds.

It was testified by the nurse that on the morning of November 4 the deceased appeared to want some one, and his wife finally decided it was Mrs. Wright, who was called on the telephone, and came between 11 and 12 o'clock that morning; that Mrs. Wright told the nurse to get a piece of paper and take down what the deceased had to say; that the nurse got the paper and pencil and knelt beside the bed and asked him if he had something he wanted her to write down, and he said, "Yes"; that he said, "After the business is settled, all that is left is to go to my little Annie"; that after she wrote it down she read it to him and asked if that was all, and he answered "Yes"; that his hands were not capable of holding the pen, and she put the pencil in his hand and helped him write his name; that Samuel S. Hinds, the attorney, was called; he came shortly afterwards, and read the words she had written; that he asked about the reference to "my little Annie," and suggested that the word "little" be erased and the word "wife" inserted instead; that she did as he suggested, and later changed the word back to "little"; that Mr. Hinds took the "pencil will" and went to his office; that he returned; in the presence of the witness and Mrs. Wright he read it to deceased and asked him if that was what he wanted, and deceased answered, "Most assuredly"; and that "Mr. Hinds asked Mr. Holloway if he would like to sign this, and he said he would, and I remember we raised him up in the bed and he was held up with pillows; I don't know whether Mrs. Holloway held the pillow at his back, while I took the pen that Mr.

Hinds took from his pocket, his fountain pen, I think, and put it in Mr. Holloway's hand and helped him the same as I had at the former signing. I think I explained to Mr. Hinds that Mr. Holloway could not hold anything in his hands, and that I would have to help him. We put this paper on a book or magazine or something and put it in front of him, and I held his hand with the pen in it while the name was signed." She also testified that while the attorney read the will to deceased she stood on one side of him and Mrs. Wright on the other.

Mrs. Nita J. Wright testified that—

"When Mr. Hinds returned he came into the room and he again spoke to Mr. Holloway; Mr. Holloway recognized him, and he said, 'Now, Andy, I am going to read this paper to you. You understand that this is your will?' and he asked Miss Binkley and I to look over, each one of us, over each shoulder, and to read with him as he read this aloud. After he read this paper he said to Mr. Holloway, 'Now, Andy, you understand this is your last will, and is this what you want done?' Mr. Holloway said, 'Most assuredly, it is what I have always wanted,' or, 'What I have wanted.' * * * Mr. Hinds, after the reading of the paper at that time, asked Mr. Holloway again if he wished Miss Binkley and I to witness, which we did. We had to raise him slightly somewhat in the bed; then, instead of putting the pillow back, we raised him up, and then Miss Binkley, as I remember, Mr. Hinds offered him a pen or pencil, and Miss Binkley said, 'He can't hold it in his hand, I will have to guide his hand,' and then * * * she put her fingers around his hand and guided his hand while he wrote his name. To my recollection the name 'Andrew Holloway' as it appears in the instrument was written at that time. * * * Mr. Hinds asked if he wished Miss Binkley and I to witness, which we did; we went over to this same table and again signed. * * * We then signed it in the room."

Samuel S. Hinds testified that on November 3, 1917, he received a telephone call from Mrs. Holloway, and in response thereto went to her home; that he received another call the next day at about noon, and went to the house and into the room of deceased; that Mrs. Nita J. Wright and Miss Binkley and Mrs. Holloway were also present; that the deceased was sitting on the side of the bed; that Miss Binkley handed him "the so-called pencil will," and said, "Mr. Holloway has just dictated these words"; that he took the paper and asked who is "Little Annie" and Miss Binkley said "Mrs. Holloway"; that he advised the nurse to erase the word "little" and write in the word "wife," and immediately afterwards changed his mind and told her to rewrite the word "little"; that he wrote in the date, "November 4, 1917," at the top; and "I said 'Andy, this will that you have just made you understand what it is?' and he nodded his head, and I said 'This will leaves all your property to your wife; is that what you want to do?' And he nodded his head and spoke the word 'Yes,' he answered in the affirmative, in either one of those ways—I don't know which it was—and I said, 'It will be necessary to have two witnesses on this will. Do you want Mrs. Wright and Miss Binkley to act as witnesses?' and he answered in the affirmative. I then wrote out the attestation clause, pen and ink, and Mrs. Wright and Miss Binkley signed as witnesses in the presence of Mr. Holloway and in the presence of each other"; that he took the paper and went to his office and wrote it out on the typewriter after asking an attorney whose offices adjoined his own the exact wording of the witness clause; that he returned to the Holloway residence immediately and greeted the deceased and said:

"'Now, Andy, I have rewritten this will.' I said, 'I am going to read it to you and see if it expresses your wishes'—words to that effect. I explained to him that I had named his wife as executrix of the will; I told him I was going to read it to him, and for him to listen; I asked Mrs. Wright and Miss Binkley to watch as I read; I then read it over slowly, clearly, looking up occasionally, and Mr. Holloway nodded his head several times. After doing that I asked Mr. Holloway if he wanted to sign the will, and he said, 'Yes.' To the best of my recollection, I took my fountain pen out of my pocket, held it toward him, his hand was lying on the covers; he moved it slightly; Miss Binkley then said 'Mr. Holloway is unable to use his hands; I will have to help him in signing.' That circumstance is very clearly impressed on my mind, because it was the first intimation I had that Mr. Holloway hadn't signed the other instrument. * * * Miss Binkley took the pen, placed it between his fingers—I think a book was brought or something to afford a flat writing surface—and the name of Andrew Holloway was written. After that had been done—I neglected to mention one thing, after reading this over I said, 'Now Andy, you understand this is—you understand what this is, this is a will in which you leave all your property to your wife?' and he spoke these words, 'Most assuredly I do; that is what I have always wanted to do.' He spoke them slowly, but distinctly. I didn't have to ask him to repeat them, they were unmistakable. After the signature had been affixed, I said to him, 'It will be necessary to have witnesses to this will.' I said, 'Is it your desire that Mrs. Wright and Miss Binkley should sign as witnesses?' and he answered in the affirmative. * * * The witnesses, Mrs. Wright and Miss Binkley, then signed in the presence of Mr. Holloway, * * * and in the presence of each other."

This evidence is corroborated even as to minor details by the widow of deceased and the Christian Science practitioner.

The contestants argue that "at its best the so-called signature was an attempt to have the writing appear to be the signature of the deceased. * * * There is no evidence that he requested any one to sign the purported will for him,"

Section 1276, Civil Code, subd. 1, concerning the execution of a will, declares that—

"It must be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator himself, or some person in his presence and by his direction must subscribe his name thereto."

Subdivision 2 is as follows:

"The subscription must be made in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or be acknowledged by the testator to them to have been made by him or by his authority."

[2] It is clearly shown by the testimony above recited that the will was properly subscribed in the presence of the attesting witnesses and at the request of the testator. The fact that another person did the writing or guided the testator's hand because he was physically weak comes within the provisions of section 1276, Civil Code, and raises no presumption against the due execution of the will. Estate of Guilfoyle, 96 Cal. 598, 31 P. 553, 22 L. R. A. 370. In the case of Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441, the testator was so enfeebled by sickness at the time of the execution of the will that he was unable to communicate except by signs in answer to questions, and the court held that this fact was not sufficient to shift to the proponent of the will the burden of proof as to the mental capacity of the testator. The question is not whether the testator himself, or another person at his request, signed the will at the end thereof, but whether the testator has sufficient understanding to direct the disposition of his property. This question, we assume, has particular reference to the physical capacity of the testator, and under another head we will discuss his mental capacity.

[3] Evidence was introduced bearing on all the elements of a due execution of the will, and was sufficient to squarely present that issue of fact to the jury, and, the contestants offering no affirmative evidence, there was no conflict; and, the evidence being sufficient as matter of law, it cannot be said the court erred in directing the jury to find for the proponent on the issue we are considering.

[4] 2. The second assignment of error is that there is not sufficient evidence that the subscribing witnesses signed the purported will in the presence of the deceased. Contestants did not offer any testimony that at the time the deceased's name was subscribed to the will the subscribing witnesses were not present. As shown under the first assignment of error, the evidence was uncontradicted that both subscribing witnesses were present at the time the testator's name was subscribed to the will; that his conduct indicated he desired them to witness the execution; and that they then officiated accordingly. The question whether the testator at the time of the execution of the will had testamentary capacity, whether his physical condition so affected his mind that he was not aware of anything that passed between himself, the attorney and the witnesses, and did not comprehend what was being done, will be discussed under the fourth assignment of error.

From the authorities cited under the first assignment of error, and others, the mere circumstance that the testator himself did not formulate the words of request does not tend to prove that he was so lacking in testamentary capacity that he could not execute a will. It was held in Estate of Mullin, 110 Cal. 252, 42 P. 645, that, if the attorney asks a question as to whether the testator wishes certain persons, in whose presence he has signed his will, to witness the execution, and the testator in response thereto answers, "Yes," this is a sufficient request for such persons to witness the will. See, also, Estate of Johnson, 152 Cal. 778, 93 P. 1015.

3. This assignment of error is that, even if it be concluded that the will admitted to probate was duly executed, nevertheless the deceased was procured to make the will by the undue influence of his wife, the nurse, the Christian Scientist, and the attorney, Samuel S. Hinds.

The contestants urge that the evidence shows that undue influence was brought to bear upon the testator on November 4, 1917, at the time the will was executed; that in February, 1913, the deceased made a will without suggestion from any one, and in June, 1916, after his attitude changed toward his brother Arthur, he went to the office of his attorney, Victor L. Ward, and told him he wanted to change his will; that in both the prior wills he did not name his wife as executrix, but named his attorney, Victor L. Ward; that the will of 1916 is a "formidable document," containing many clauses and worded in a formal and business-like manner as contrasted with the purported will admitted to probate; that he at no time mentioned the other attorney, Samuel S. Hinds; that in 1917 he told his sister, Mrs. Ethel Parker, that he had remembered her in his will; that she had befriended him when he arrived here from England; that he had an aged mother and a sister who cared for her in England for whom he had made provision in the prior wills; that the wife, Nita J. Wright, and Samuel S. Hinds were affiliated with the Christian Science Church, "and no doubt each shared in the teaching of the church as described by Mrs. Wright in her cross-examination, and therefore could not admit that the deceased was unconscious from the standpoint of their faith"; that "it can be fairly inferred from the evidence that the defendant and Mrs. Wright planned this will some time before the deceased's last illness; that the wife called Samuel S. Hinds before the will was made and talked with him, and that he did not see the deceased before the will was made."

It is true that the deceased had previously made a will in which the contestants were mentioned, but the evidence is ample to sustain an inference that between the time that will was made and his last illness he had suffered financial reverses and was planning some change in the disposition of his estate.

William C. Baker, who knew the deceased for a number of years, testified that he met him at a club to which they both belonged; that he had a brief conversation with him during the month of August, 1917, two or three months before he died; that he spoke of his illness; and that he worried about his contracts and losses, and then told him he had made enough money to take care of his wife, "and that is sufficient. * * * It is a great comfort to me."

Miss Floy Burdick, the stenographer and bookkeeper in the office of deceased, testified that he had suffered heavy losses and worried a great deal; that she talked to him in October or November, 1916, when he said he must change his will and have everything go to his wife; that about six weeks before his death he told her if he should die suddenly she was to take certain books to the office of Victor L. Ward, who had drawn his previous wills, and say to him: "I know that these papers are in your hands because I want Annie well provided for."

Mrs. Rose Bryant, whose husband was associated with deceased in business, testified that deceased, who was worried about his business, asked her how her husband, before his death, had arranged his affairs. She told him that everything was left in her name, and the deceased "expressed himself as desiring to do something of that kind. * * * He repeated it a good many times. Just a few days after that he went back to Pasadena just before his death."

A. E. Austin, a general contractor, who did business with deceased, testified that deceased, in his presence, asked Mrs. Rose Bryant how Mr. Bryant had left his affairs, and remarked that he wished he could do the same.

This evidence is sufficient, as we have indicated, to support an inference that the deceased had formed an intention to make a change in the disposition of his estate.

With respect to the contention that the change of attorneys tended to support the claim of undue influence, Victor L. Ward, who was his general attorney, testified that he had drawn a will for him on June 2, 1916; that he did not know that Mrs. Holloway had tried to get in touch with him during deceased's last illness; that he had a telephone at his office in Pasadena and one at his residence; that the only time he was away was when he went to Bakersfield and returned November 14, after having been away a little over 24 hours; that he was in and about his office during office hours on business days from October 20 to November 13, except that he may have been in Los Angeles at court.

The wife of the deceased testified that before Samuel S. Hinds came she "several times endeavored to communicate with Mr. Ward. * * * I saw Mr. Ward on Monday following October 25. * * * I told Mr. Ward I had been trying to get him for some time and was unable, and he said, 'I just returned from Bakersfield, and I heard Mr. Holloway was ill and came out.' I said I had tried several times to get him, and he said, 'I can't be in a dozen places at once.'"

T. H. Parker, the husband of Ellen Parker, a sister of deceased, testified that after the death of deceased he went to visit Mrs. Holloway and asked her why Victor L. Ward as attorney did not draw up the will, and Mrs. Holloway said she tried to get him but could not, so she got Samuel S. Hinds.

It also appeared that Samuel S. Hinds was a friend of the deceased and belonged to the same club and church. Mrs. Holloway further testified that she "called him because I felt I would like to have some one to speak to that I could trust"; that Mrs. Wright did not suggest that she call him, but that they went over the list of attorneys, and finally decided upon him, and that at the meeting with him prior to November 4 she did not discuss the subject of the will of deceased.

Concerning the question of undue influence claimed to have been exercised by the Christian Science practitioner the testimony is that she had known deceased about four years and treated both him and his wife; also that she had treated him at his request during the last six months of his life; that on November 4 there had been some conversation with the nurse about the deceased wanting to see a Mr. "Rice," but as the sequel showed he meant Mrs. "Wright," who was called by Mrs. Holloway and asked to come and she came in half an hour, the deceased greeting her; she sat by the side of the bed and finally asked him what was troubling him; that he answered it was not his business or the work in Ventura, but that he was worrying about "little Annie," and that he wanted to make a will—Mrs. Wright called the nurse, the pencil will above mentioned was written; that she advised Mrs. Holloway to call a lawyer, and Samuel S. Hinds was summoned; he came shortly afterwards. Mrs. Holloway testified that she never had any conversation with Mrs. Wright in reference to enlisting the services of Samuel S. Hinds to make a will, and that no word was spoken to Mrs. Wright either before she arrived or before the nurse spoke about the deceased wanting to see some one about a will.

any way in the preparation of the will. Mrs. Wright was the first to ascertain that the deceased desired to make his will. She thereupon advised the widow to call an attorney, and the nurse got paper and wrote the pencil will. It is only when the beneficiary has been active in the preparation or participated in the execution of a will that a presumption of undue influence arises. The presumption of such influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity or a confidential relation alone. Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 221 P. 361.

There is no evidence to show that the nurse influenced the deceased in the making of the will. Miss Binkley arrived on October 30, and prior to that time had never seen deceased, nor did she have any acquaintance with Mrs. Holloway before the last illness of deceased. The only attempt made by contestants to impeach the testimony of proponent's witnesses is found in the testimony of N. P. Moerdyke that Miss Binkley had told him after the death of deceased he was in a state of torpor prior to November 4; that he tried to make her understand he wanted to make a will; that she was alone with him when he dictated the notes from which Samuel S. Hinds drafted the will and that but one document was signed on that date. Miss Binkley denied this conversation.

There is nothing in the record to show undue influence on the part of any of the persons named by the contestants as would destroy the validity of the will.

[6] The kind of undue influence that will invalidate a will must be such as in effect destroyed the testator's free agency and overpowered his volition at the time of the making of the will. Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 69 P. 294; Estate of De Laveaga, 165 Cal. 607, 133 P. 307; Estate of Ingram, 1 Cof. Prob. Dec. 222.

General influence not brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act, however strong or controlling, is not undue influence such as will afford ground for the setting aside of a will of a person of sound mind. There must be evidence, either direct or circumstantial, that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act. Estate of McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 P. 101.

[7] In order to invalidate a will on the ground of undue influence, mere evidence that the persons alleged to have exercised such influence had the opportunity to do so and might have done so if they had been so disposed and had possessed such influence, is insufficient. "The undue influence must actually exist, it must be actually exerted, and it must be so exerted as to affect the terms of the will." Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932.

In Estate of Bryson, 191 Cal. 521, at p. 541, 217 P. 525, 533, it was said:

"In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires.' Estate of Calkins, 112 Cal. 296 (44 P. 577). 'The presumption of undue influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity alone. In order to set aside a will for undue influence, there must be substantial proof of a pressure which overpowered the volition of the testator at the time the will was made.' Estate of Langford, 108 Cal. 608 (41 P. 701). It may be stated that so far as opportunity is concerned, any one of the heirs of the testatrix had equal opportunity to visit with, consult, and advise with testatrix. We entertain no doubt that Isaac H. Bryson advised with his mother fully on both business and personal matters and on subjects affecting the present and future welfare of the family. This was not only his privilege but his duty. Unpleasant as well as pleasant matters were no doubt the subject of consideration. Proof to establish undue influence must be had of a pressure which overpowered the mind and bore down the volition of the testator at the very time the will was made. Estate of Carithers, 156 Cal. 422 (105 P. 127). It consists in the exercise of acts or conduct by which the mind of the testator is subjugated to the will of the person operating upon it, some means taken or employed which have the effect of overcoming the free agency of the testator and constraining him to make a disposition of his property contrary to and different from what he would have done had he been permitted to follow his own inclination or judgment. Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 11 (120 P. 762)."

[8-12] We do not think that the evidence we have summarized is sufficient to justify an inference of undue influence which would invalidate the will. The fact that a new attorney was called in to prepare the will, in the absence of other circumstances, would not sustain an inference of undue influence; the presumption that the widow, who occupied a confidential relation with deceased, exercised undue influence upon him to induce a will in her favor does not arise because she is not shown to have been active in the actual preparation of the will other than by summoning Mrs. Wright and Samuel S. Hinds; the evidence further shows that the deceased's sister and her daughters were at his home during his last illness and had an equal opportunity to visit with, consult and advise with, the testator; the two subscribing witnesses, the nurse and the Christian Science practitioner, are not beneficiaries under the will, and no reason is suggested as to why they would aid the wife in obtaining a will in her favor; the nurse was a stranger to both the deceased and his wife, and the practitioner, while an old acquaintance of the family and a member of the same church, was engaged in professional services for which she received compensation; the testimony that deceased had suffered financial reverses and upon several occasions indicated his desire to make a will in favor of his wife without any other showing precludes an inference that the testamentary act did not comport with his intentions and the exercise of his free will. By this we do not mean that his declarations prior to making the will are evidence of his testamentary act, but such declarations do tend to show that the will which was admitted to probate coincided with his declared intentions concerning his wife. The deceased and his wife were shown to have been unusually attentive to and considerate of each other, and, while it is not shown that deceased was on unfriendly terms with his sisters, the contestants, there is evidence that the deceased, in discussing with Mrs. Edna Simons the circumstance that he did not want it known he was going to build a home, said: "I don't want my sister to know * * * because she is jealous of what Annie has." In view of his financial losses it was natural that he should have desired to make provision for his wife in preference to his relatives. The circumstances that the deceased had gone to the office of his attorney in order to make his will in 1916, that the document then drawn up provided for the contestants as well as his wife, and that the wife was not named executrix therein, do not, in face of all the evidence, tend to support an inference that the dissimilarity in the two wills rendered the will admitted to probate invalid. With reference to the point that the deceased went to his office to execute his former will, it is sufficient to suggest that when the last will was executed he was unable to leave his home, for at that time he was very ill and was under the care of physicians and a nurse; every effort was made to keep business affairs from engaging his attention because of the effect of worry upon his physical condition. We perceive no warrant for the inference sought be drawn by contestants from the circumstance that the last will failed to reflect the deceased's habitual method of formally preparing a document as shown, for instance, by his former will. The intent of the testator being sufficiently indicated by his last will, and there being no evidence of undue influence, the form it assumed is without significance. We therefore conclude that the will admitted to probate represented the testamentary act of the deceased.

The jury, therefore, was properly instructed to answer the fifth question in the negative. Even if the jury believed all the evidence of the witnesses for the contestants, they must have found for the proponent on this question, for it was insufficient as matter of law to establish undue influence.

4. This specification of error is that the deceased was not of sound and disposing mind at the time the will was executed.

It appears that Andrew Holloway was engaged in the street contracting business, and for a year prior to his death he spent one-third of his time at Oxnard, where he was engaged on a road contract. During the summer of 1917 he was ill much of the time, and for ten days prior to October 24 he and his wife had been at Oxnard; he was ill about half the time. He suffered from stomach trouble and hiccoughs, and the doctors testified that the disease was cirrhosis of the liver, caused by overindulgence in alcoholic drink. On October 24, 1917, accompanied by his wife and Miss Floy Burdick, his secretary, the deceased drove from Oxnard to Pasadena, where he had his home. The automobile had a leaking radiator, and a part of the distance he drove in the dark, as the automobile was not equipped with lights. Before getting out of the automobile upon reaching Pasadena the deceased was exhausted and fatigued, and he cried. On the next day he had recovered sufficiently to go to town about 4 or 5 in the afternoon, and on the following day he stayed home all day on account of illness. This condition continued for several days, and finally, on October 29, a doctor was called, who diagnosed the case as acute indigestion. A prescription was given, and the deceased "went into a drowsy stupor" after an opiate was given him. On October 30 another doctor was called, and a nurse came to assist in caring for the deceased. On November 1 he signed a check for the payroll in his business, and on the next day his wife and Miss Floy Burdick went to Oxnard to pay the help. Various persons came in to see him, and several doctors were in attendance. The first physician called was Dr. Holcomb, who came before daylight on October 29 and gave the patient opiates. On October 29 Dr. E. S. Rosenberger, a friend of the family and a druggist, brought some medicine; Dr. Holcomb called again. Something was said about calling in another doctor and a nurse, and on October 30 Dr. G. E. Campbell came, and the nurse, Miss Binkley, appeared the same evening. Dr. Campbell called at least once a day and sometimes twice a day, and the nurse remained until the death of deceased. The deceased's wife testified that on October 31 she thought he was still under the influence of the opiate that Dr. Holcomb gave him; that he was not unconscious on the day Dr. Campbell came; that he spoke to the nurse; that he was so ill he was disinclined to talk; that about two weeks later a consultation was held, and Dr. A. J. Crance was called in; that the patient drank water and liquids out of a glass tube because it was hard work for those present to lift him up every time he wanted a drink; that he never lost the use of his hands entirely, and could raise them; that he knew what was going on, although he did not give any sign; that there never was a time when he could not speak; that he was so ill he did not want to; that she did not notice that he had any difficulty in articulating because it was habitual for him to hesitate before speaking; that he only asked for what he needed; that he kept his eyes closed because of the strong light; that he sang hymns; that the phonograph was brought to his room, and that he occasionally sang hymns up to within a week before his death; that on November 3 he talked about the work in Ventura and asked the nurse when she thought he would be able to attend to things.

Mrs. Nita J. Wright testified that on the day the will was signed the deceased was rational; that when the nurse gave him a drink he thanked her, and that "it was a normal attitude"; that after the will was made she called again; he indicated some flowers that Mr. Hinds had sent; he said he had not seen anything more beautiful, and remarked that Mr. Hinds had sent them; that he was always of slow speech; that he was a reticent man; that physically he was abnormal, but mentally he was normal.

Mineita E. Binkley, the nurse who was called during the last illness of deceased, testified that he suffered from pain; that she had no special conversation with him, but asked him to take his medicine, and he complied; that he asked for a drink of water; that there were times when he was apparently sleeping, and then there were times each day when he was quite bright; the light troubled his eyes, and he kept them closed most of the time; that he asked her to telephone for some one on November 2, but she could not find the right one; that he called Margery Lisco by name and talked naturally to her and her mother, Mary Lisco; that he would ask her if he was getting better; that upon one occasion he said he did not want to see his brother, George Holloway; that he spoke to Mr. Hinds, and said "Hello, Sam!" That when Mr. Simons came to see him an evening paper was in the room, and the deceased said "Hello, Walter! What is the latest war news?"

H. F. Messer, a druggist and brother-in-law of deceased, testified that the deceased and his wife were very affectionate and pleasant with each other; that he called to see deceased and tried to cheer him up; that he would answer "No" by shaking his head; that he knew him and knew what he was doing, and when he did converse he was rational; that he did not talk much at any time—"He was always a quiet man and not given much to talk."

Mrs. H. F. Messer, the wife of the above witness, corroborated his testimony about the conversations with deceased; that he sang with his wife, and appeared to enjoy the phonograph music when it was played, and he accompanied the music; that he did not talk very much at any time, either when he was well or sick.

Walter Simons, who was intimately connected with deceased for a great number of years, testified that when he visited and greeted him he roused up and said, "Hello, boy!" and that he appeared to be in the exhausted condition that sick people usually are; that he saw deceased on the evening Dr. Campbell and Dr. Crance held the consultation; that he was propped up in bed, and that his eyes were fixed partly open; that he thought he heard the death rattle in his throat, and told Mrs. Holloway that he was dying.

Mrs. Mary Lisco testified that when she occasionally saw him he was very ill and nauseated, and suffered intensely; that several days after the nurse came she visited him, and when Mrs. Holloway asked deceased if he knew Mrs. Lisco he said, "Most assuredly I do"; that the deceased did not speak to any one, the nurse, the doctors, or to her, and that she thought he was resting because he was very ill; and that she did not try to talk to him, thinking it best not to talk in a sick room; and that deceased repeated the Ninety-First Psalm as his wife read it.

Samuel S. Hinds testified that at the time the will was made and executed he thought the deceased was a very sick man and probably very near the end; that he did not know from what disease he was suffering, and that he acted upon the assumption that the deceased was rational at all times. He stated:

"I did not ask him whether he remembered what property he owned. I made no inquiry as to whether he remembered his relatives, or friends, or whether he had any children or whether he had been married before. I made no investigation at all with express purpose to ascertain whether or not his illness had progressed to that point where it affected his mind. * * * I don't think his mind at that time was in such a condition to have comprehended all the intricacies of a contract for street improvements understandingly. The will, it seemed to me, was a very simple proposition, and I think he was able to comprehend that. There were no complications."

He also testified that on November 13 he prepared a power of attorney in favor of his wife and explained to the deceased the necessity of it; asked him if it was his desire to sign it, and he said, "Yes"; that Miss Binkley again guided his hand in signing it; that the deceased at the time repeatedly attempted to tell him about something, but was interrupted by a fit of hiccoughing, and that he told him he must keep quiet.

Contestants called the following witnesses:

Mrs. Ellen Parker, a sister of deceased, testified that on November 6, when she came to see deceased, Mrs. Holloway told her not to try to talk to him; that he would not know her; that he drank out of a straw and made bubbles in the glass; that his eyes were partly opened; that he did not answer and took no notice of her; that the nurse said his system was poisoned and it had affected his brain; that she went again on November 14 and the nurse was feeding him with a spoon; that he took no notice of her, and repeated just what she said to him; that on November 17 she came again, but he did not speak to her, and that Mrs. Holloway told her he was sleeping; that she saw him at various times up to his death and he did not recognize her; that he had no use of his arms or limbs and only moved one leg.

Ethel Parker and Christobel Parker, two nieces of the deceased, both testified that when they saw him they could not tell whether he was sleeping or resting.

Dr. E. S. Rosenberger, an intimate friend of the deceased, testified that he was ill about a year before he died, and that during the last two months of his life he was quite sick; that on October 29, when he saw him, he did not recognize him; that he was in a stupor, and, although he tried, he did not have any conversation with him; that on November 1, when William Rogers and he went to the room of deceased to get the check signed, the deceased was not of sound mind, could not take care of his business, was "practically unconscious," and could not write, and gave no sign that he understood the purpose of the check when it was explained to him.

William Rogers, an intimate friend of the deceased for 20 years, testified that Mrs. Holloway told him the deceased was ill; that he went to see him, and, upon greeting him, the deceased said he was a very sick man; that on November 1, when the check for the payroll was signed, the deceased was not in such a mental condition that he could take care of himself or of his property; "that he was in a sleepy condition and his eyes were closed, and he did not appear to be—he appeared to be asleep, showed no signs of intelligence, and I should say that he was not conscious of what was going on."

George Holloway, a senior brother, testified that he was always on friendly terms with deceased; that deceased drank alcoholic liquor to excess, and was very ill the last year of his life; that on November 2 he went to see deceased and was not allowed to see him because deceased would not recognize him; that he returned on the 6th or 7th of November and that the deceased did not recognize him; that he mumbled something and his eyes were closed; that he moved his head a little when Mrs. Holloway put her hands on his head; that he saw him again on November 19, and deceased did not at that time know anything, he was breathing hard and his eyes, partly open, were set on the ceiling; that he was not of sound mind because he did not talk.

Dr. H. C. Brainard, who qualified as an expert mental and nervous disease specialist, in an answer to a hypothetical question relating to the life history of deceased and the facts concerning his last illness as testified to by the witnesses, declared that in his opinion the deceased was not of sound mind during the period from November 1 to the date of his death, November 20; that "it was evidently a case of cirrhosis, a history of chronic liver disease in its terminal stage, in which stupor is a very common and usual accompaniment, and that stupor apparently began the 1st of November, or that by a few days, and continued to his death."

Dr. William M. Lewis, another expert, gave a similar opinion as to deceased's mental condition.

[13, 14] When all the testimony bearing on the issue of mental capacity is considered and weighed together it cannot be held it is not sufficient as matter of law to support a finding either way, and hence the verdict of the jury that decedent at the time of the execution of the will admitted to probate had mental capacity to make it cannot be disturbed. There is no pretense that the testator was delirious, irrational, or insane or under any delusions, but merely that he was in such a state of bodily weakness as to be peculiarly susceptible to suggestion, and that the nature of the disease from which he was suffering affected his mind to such a degree that he was incapable of an intelligent disposition of his property. It is not claimed that he was subject to mental aberrations. More particularly, the contestants contend that "the slowness of speech was due to the condition of his brain," but all the testimony shows that the deceased was a reticent man and habitually very quiet. It is true the expert physicians who answered hypothetical questions said the fact that deceased repeated the Lord's Prayer and sang songs and hymns was mere mechanical repetition, and the contestants contend from this that the deceased's brain was affected by the poison in his system. However, the attorney, Samuel S. Hinds, testified he thought the deceased was able to comprehend the will at the time it was executed, but that he did not think he could have comprehended all the intricacies of a contract for street improvement. The law does not require the same degree of capacity as is required to execute any other legal instrument. "A testator may have capacity to make a valid will, although not able to make contracts or manage his estate. He may not have sufficient mind and vigor of intellect to transact business generally, or to make and digest all the parts of a contract and yet be competent to direct the distribution of his property by will." Alexander, Commentaries on Wills, vol. 1, p. 444.

[15] There is no claim that the testimony of the various witnesses, subscribing, lay, or expert, was improperly admitted, or that it is not sufficient as matter of law to sustain the verdict on that issue. It is contended, however, that the opinion of lay witnesses as to the condition of mind of the deceased is a mere conclusion and not supported by their statements as to his condition. Estate of Russell, 189 Cal. 759, 210 P. 249. The testimony of the subscribing witnesses is unequivocal. "The law presumes that a subscribing witness had his attention directed to and noted the mental capacity of the testator, therefore his opinion should be entitled to more weight than that of one who was merely passive." Alexander, Id., p. 515. Of course, the weight of such testimony is for the jury to determine.

It was said in Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085:

"It must be borne in mind that it is not every weakness and impairment of the faculties of the testator that will invalidate a will. Even where a testator is feeble in health, suffering under disease and aged and infirm, yet if he was of sufficiently sound mind to be capable of understanding the nature and situation of his property, and of disposing thereof intelligently, without any delusions affecting his action, he had sufficient capacity to make a will. * * * [Citing authorities.] It was held that the fact of the testator being unable to speak articulately and was compelled to communicate by signs did not raise a legal presumption of incompetency to make a will. Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 415 (73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441)."

Here the issue of undue influence having been eliminated, there is no evidence of influence or suggestion of any kind tending to direct the deceased's testamentary acts. The evidence is wholly to the effect that he personally and voluntarily suggested the making of his will and the beneficiary thereunder, and his conduct previous to his last illness tends to show that the will as executed and admitted to probate accorded with his desires. Under the circumstances, for instance, that he had suffered serious financial reverses, that his sister was jealous of what his wife had, and that he had a pronounced feeling of affection for his wife, the failure to provide for his brothers and sisters does not seem unusual. In the Estate of Casarotti, supra, the disposition was made to strangers by blood with whom the testator was living, to the exclusion of several brothers and sisters, and it was held that it was not an unnatural disposition to make.

[16] In our opinion the state of the evidence does not tend to show incompetency to make a will either because of his physical condition or mental irresponsibility.

[17] 5. From the treatment of the foregoing points it is abundantly clear that the court did not err in instructing the jury to answer the first four questions in the affirmative and the fifth in the negative. In fact, it would have been error to refuse to direct a verdict, as there was no substantial evidence whatsoever tending to support any of the contentions made by the contestants.

The contestants contend, however, that the direction of the court precluded the jury from considering the following:

That the testimony of the handwriting expert shows that the signature of "Andrew Holloway" and the word "little" were written by the same pencil and different from the balance of the writing; that the paper upon which the will was written by the nurse was not a clean sheet of paper, and shows erasures and unrelated commas and periods; that the signature of deceased on the will and the power of attorney were not made with the same ink, and shows that the letter "d" in the Christian name "Andrew" was placed on the will after November 13, 1917; that the signatures of the subscribing witnesses were "doctored"; all of which should have been considered by the jury in determining whether the documents were authentic. That there is testimony corroborating that of Mrs. Ellen Parker to the effect that she was told the deceased made his will on November 16; that on November 18 the wife of deceased left about 9 o'clock without saying anything, returned about 1 in the afternoon with a legal document extending out of the ends of her pocketbook, and that the jury should have been allowed to consider whether or not the purported will was not fixed up on that day.

There is other testimony of a similar nature that the contestants contend was excluded from the consideration of the jury by the directed verdict; and that the question of whether or not the deceased was of sound and disposing mind could not have been considered by the jury without at the same time considering whether or not he declared the will to be his, or that it was signed by him, or at his request, or that said will was signed in his presence by two subscribing witnesses. "All these circumstances were necessary to determine whether or not he was of sound mind."

But, as we have shown, the evidence addressed to the execution of the will would not support findings that it was not duly executed, and that the court therefore properly directed the jury to find for proponent on those five issues. In respect to the claim "that all these circumstances were necessary to determine whether or not he was of sound mind," it is sufficient to say that there is no indication in the record that such evidence was not considered and weighed in determining the sixth issue—the mental unsoundness of deceased.

[18] Under this specification of error it is claimed that the will duly executed by deceased on June 2, 1916, has not been revoked. The disposition of the questions as to the due execution of the will, the lack of undue influence, and the mental soundness of the testator render it unnecessary to discuss this point, since section 1296 of the Civil Code provides that a prior will is revoked by a subsequent will if such subsequent will contains provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will, and, furthermore, the will executed and admitted to probate contains a provision expressly revoking all former wills.

7. By this specification of error the contestants contend that—

"This was the third trial in the superior court of this action. The jury, in the first trial, decided the man was of unsound mind; the second trial the jury disagreed, and we believe the jury rendered their verdict in this trial because of an error in instructing them, as before discussed. The jury rendered their verdict under the influence of passion and prejudice, and the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and contrary to law."

There was no error in refusing to grant a new trial for the same reason that it was not error to direct the verdict; and, further, the record does not in any way show that the verdict rendered by the jury is the result of passion and prejudice.

[19-21] 8. The final point is that the court erred in instructing the jury that the offering and admitting to probate of the purported will established prima facie that the document was valid. It is contended that the instruction erroneously states that the admission of the purported will to probate created a presumption in favor of the validity of the said will, thus erroneously placing upon the contestants a greater burden of proof to overcome the presumption that the deceased was competent to make a will.

The instruction follows:

"Prior to the commencement of this action defendant herein had offered for probate as the last will of Andrew Holloway the document as to which the present controversy arises. This document was admitted to probate at that time. This prima facie established such document as the will of Andrew Holloway and the competency of Andrew Holloway to make a will. On this contest the law presumes that Andrew Holloway was competent to make said will, and the burden of proving that at the time of the execution of said will Andrew Holloway was incompetent to execute a will, is upon the plaintiffs and unless plaintiffs sustain such burden by proving by a preponderance of evidence that said Andrew Holloway was not at the very time said will was made competent to make the same your verdict must be for the widow, Annie Holloway."

It is said in Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 459, 221 P. 361, 364:

"The contest of a will, on the other hand, while a proceeding in rem, is at the same time an adversary proceeding, the parties to which consist, on the one hand, of those persons interested in the estate who have appeared and filed written grounds of opposition to the probate of the will (commonly referred to as the contest), and, on the other hand, those persons interested in the will who have appeared and filed written answer thereto. The only issues of fact involved therein are those which are framed by the allegations of the contest and the denials of the answer. * * * As to those issues the burden of proof rests upon the contestants * * * and the proponents are not called upon to submit any evidence until the contestants shall have produced some evidence legally sufficient to support their allegations upon one or more of those issues. If the contestants fail to produce such evidence, the decision of the contest must be against them, even though the proponents produce no evidence therein whatsoever."

We do not think the instruction can be understood to declare that in a will contest the mere fact that the will had been previously admitted to probate would increase the burden of proof of the contestants. Reading the third sentence separately, it states the rule correctly as applied to the admission of a will to probate where there is no contest. "Under this rule, as long as the probate stands the will must be recognized and admitted in all courts to be valid, the unrevoked decree * * * standing as absolute and conclusive proof of its genuineness." Tracy v. Muir, 151 Cal. 363, 370, 90 P. 832, 834 (121 Am. St. Rep. 117). The conclusion that the third sentence is entirely independent of and not to be read into the succeeding or fourth sentence finds support in sentences 1 and 2, for they refer to a point of time anterior to the contest. "On this contest" is the opening phrase in sentence 4. This sentence is confined to a contest of a will, and is substantially correct, for it states the burden of proof is on the contestants, and, of course, this is so whether the law "presumes" the testator was competent to make a will as suggested by the instruction, or because of the rule that the party having the affirmative of an issue must prove it. Section 1981, Code Civ. Proc. The instruction does not purport to state any change in the rule of the burden of proof merely because the will had been admitted to probate.

The contestants cite Estate of Nelson, 191 Cal. 280, 286, 216 P. 368, in support of the asserted error in the instruction. In that case the olographic will was admitted to probate, and, on the ground the will was not entirely in the handwriting of the testator, it was sought to revoke the probate thereof. It was claimed that the dispositive clause of the will was written by the proponent, who was named the sole beneficiary. Judgment went for the contestant. The proponent appealed and based her claim for reversal upon certain asserted errors in the giving and refusing of instructions. She contended the court erred in refusing an instruction to the effect that under the presumption of innocence it is presumed the will was not written by her or by any one other than the testator. The court in disposing of the point stated that another instruction, given at the request of the proponent, was more favorable to her than the one refused; the court holding that the instruction given was erroneous in declaring that after the purported will was admitted to probate all presumptions are in favor of its validity. Assuming that this conclusion was necessary to the decision, we fail to perceive how, as contestants contend, it conflicts with the instruction given herein. The court merely states that "on this contest the law presumes that Andrew Holloway was competent to make said will. * * *". This does no more than state the disputable presumption of law. The language does not purport to imply that this presumption of competency arose from the fact of the admission of the will to probate, but rather to the disputable presumption referred to. Furthermore, the language above quoted is restricted to the competency of the testator, and does not involve the validity or invalidity of the will on the ground of its due execution; in no sense is it susceptible of the interpretation urged by contestants that the admission of a will to probate creates a presumption in favor of its validity.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; SHENK, J.; LENNON, J. MYERS, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing decision.

196 Cal. 100

CHAMBERS, Controller, v. LARRONDE et al.
(L. A. 7965.)

1. Taxation ⚡860—Phrase, "in contemplation of death," as used in Inheritance Tax Acts 1905 and 1911, held intended to cover identical cases.

Inheritance Tax Act 1911, § 27, defining the words, "in contemplation of death," is equivalent in meaning with that phrase under St. 1905, p. 341, and served the purpose of elucidating, without changing the law, by giving fuller expression to legislative intent and meaning, and such acts, in so far as the phrase, "in contemplation of death," is concerned, were intended by the Legislature to cover identical cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contemplation of Death.]

2. Taxation ⚡879(1)—"In contemplation of death" does not mean in fear of immediate death from existing malady.

For a transfer to be "in contemplation of death," it need not be in fear of immediate death from an existing malady, as in gift causa mortis, but, on the contrary, a person of comparative youth, enjoying perfect health and vigor, may nevertheless make a transfer of his property in contemplation of death within the meaning of Inheritance Tax Act 1905, which meaning was not changed by St. 1911, p. 713.

3. Taxation ⚡879(1)—Words, "in contemplation of death," held to include all transfers in lieu of testamentary disposition.

The words, "in contemplation of death," as used in Inheritance Tax Act 1905, cover all transfers of property, whether gifts causa mortis or inter vivos, from one person to another in anticipation of death or in lieu of testamentary disposition.

4. Taxation ⚡879(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that transfers were made "in contemplation of death" and in lieu of testamentary disposition.

Evidence that, when mother transferred property to children, she destroyed her will, that she retained no property and made no provisions for her own support, and that she distributed her property in identical manner as had been provided in her will, held to support finding that transfers were made "in contemplation of death" and in lieu of testamentary disposition, within meaning of Inheritance Tax Act 1905.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McClucas, Judge.

Suit by John S. Chambers (Ray L. Riley), as Controller of the State, against John M. Larronde and others, to determine inheritance tax on certain transfers. From a judgment sustaining the report of tax appraisers, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Erwin P. Werner, of Los Angeles, Adrian C. Stanton, of Sacramento, Ida V. Wells, of Los Angeles, Ralph W. Smith, Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento (Wesley E. Martin, of counsel), for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The State Controller brought this action to determine the inheritance tax on certain transfers alleged to have been made during her lifetime in contemplation of death by Juana Larronde, the decedent herein.

It appears that Juana Larronde died July 27, 1920, in her eighty-fifth year. She was survived by two sons, John M. Larronde and P. D. Larronde, and four daughters, Antoinette Larronde Watson, Madeleine Etchemendy, Marianne T. Etchemendy, and Carrie Etchemendy. For some time before her death she had been possessed of considerable property, both real and personal. Prior to the year 1909, the exact date of which is now unknown, she had executed a will, under the terms of which all her property was to be distributed equally amongst her said six children. On two different occasions during the months of August and September of the year 1909 the said decedent, accompanied by her six children, visited the offices of her attorney, at which times she, by a series of transfers and conveyances, disposed of her entire property to her several children, or by deed of trust for their benefit. At the times these dispositions were made the decedent was 74 years of age and apparently in good health. The devolution of the property was accomplished by the execution of the following deeds and declaration of trust: On August 13, 1909, she conveyed by deed to her four daughters, above named, an undivided two-thirds of several tracts of real property in Los Angeles county, share and share alike, and on the same day transferred to said four daughters certain corporate stock, share and share alike; on September 8, 1909, she conveyed to three of her daughters, omitting Antoinette Larronde Watson, and to John M. Larronde, one of her sons, the title to her home place in the Mott tract, in the city of Los Angeles, share and share alike. On September 8, 1909, she conveyed to Madeleine Etchemendy and Carrie Etchemendy her remaining undivided one-third interest in the real property as to which the two-thirds interest had been conveyed to her daughters as above indicated, together with certain corporate stock, in trust, however, for the benefit of her two sons, John M. Larronde and P. D. Larronde, share and share alike. Under said instruments the properties were divided in the same manner and in the same amounts as they were by the will above referred to. It was also upon the occasion of one of these visits to her attorney that the decedent destroyed the will theretofore executed by her. At a later date, to wit, July 2, 1914, decedent being then 79 years of age, the trust agreement of 1909 was revoked, presumably with the consent of all the parties thereto, and a new declaration of trust was executed by her. No change in the provisions thereof was made other than by the substitution of the Title Insurance & Trust Company as trustee in the place and stead of the two children Madeleine Etchemendy and Carrie Etchemendy, named as such under the former declaration of trust. The personal property covered by said former declaration of trust was not included, but transferred directly to Madeleine Etchemendy, one of the children. The recordation of the 1909 deed was deferred until July 2, 1914. All of the transfers took immediate effect in possession and enjoyment, the decedent neither reserving a life estate nor insuring to herself, in writing, support and maintenance. Notwithstanding this, however, Madeleine Etchemendy testified, and the testimony was not controverted, that it was understood by the entire family, including the decedent, that she was to be cared for by them during the remainder of her life.

The court referred the matter to an inheritance tax appraiser, before whom a hearing was had, at which the testimony of the grantees and beneficiaries was taken. At the conclusion of the hearing the inheritance tax appraiser reported the value of the property and computed the total tax to be $5,064.58. The appellants thereupon filed objections and exceptions to the report and, by stipulation of the parties, the issue was submitted to the superior court upon the stenographic report of the evidence taken at the hearing before the referee. The court, after an introductory statement, found from such evidence as follows:

"(1) That Juana Larronde died on or about the 27th day of July, 1920, and was at the time of her death a resident of the county of Los Angeles, state of California.

"(2) That on or about the 13th day of August, 1909, decedent above named, made, executed, and delivered to Antoinette Larronde Watson, Madeleine Etchemendy, Marianne T. Etchemendy, and Carrie Etchemendy, respondents herein, deeds to real property described as follows: [It will serve no purpose to set out said descriptions, which are given at great length in the transcript, folios 106-112.] Said transfer having been made to said respondents share and share alike; wherein and whereby said decedent transferred and conveyed all of her legal right, title, and interest in and to said property to said respondents. Said real property, as of August 13, 1909, was of the value of $137,628."

"That on or about the 13th day of August, 1909, said decedent transferred and assigned all of her legal title in and to the personal property described as follows, to said respondents last above named, share and share alike: [Enumeration omitted as not necessary.] Which said personal property, as of August 13, 1909, was of the value of $67,560.

"(3) That on or about the 8th day of September, 1909, decedent above named made, executed, and delivered to John M. Larronde, Madeleine Etchemendy, Marianne T. Etchemendy, and Carrie Etchemendy, respondents herein, deeds to certain real property, wherein and whereby said decedent transferred and conveyed all of her legal interest in and to said property to said respondents, share and share alike, and which said property is described as follows: [Description unnecessary.] Which said real property, as of September 8, 1909, was of the value of $6,000.

"(4) The court further finds that all of the transfers of the real and personal property hereinabove mentioned were made without valuable or adequate consideration and in contemplation of death and in lieu of a testamentary disposition.

"(5) That on or about the 2d day of July, 1914, decedent herein made, executed, and delivered to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, one of the respondents herein named, a deed wherein and whereby said decedent transferred and conveyed and assigned all of her legal title in and to that real and personal property, described as follows: [Description omitted.] Which said real property, as of July 2, 1914, was of the value of $77,460.01; subject, however, to the terms of a certain trust agreement known as declaration of trust No. 3215 of trusts of the said Title Insurance & Trust Company to the said Title Insurance & Trust Company to hold for the use and benefit of John M. Larronde and P. D. Larronde, respondents herein, share and share alike.

"(6) That each and all of the above-described transfers were made without valuable or adequate consideration and in contemplation of death and in lieu of a testamentary disposition."

As its conclusions of law from the foregoing facts the court stated:

"(1) That each and all of the transfers herein described were made without valuable or adequate consideration and in contemplation of death and in lieu of testamentary disposition.

"(2) That the clear market value of the transfers, made by this decedent, both real and personal, was $329,114.08.

"(3) That said property passed to the following named persons, whose relationship to decedent, the character and clear market value of whose respective interests at the time of the death of said decedent, and the inheritance or transfer tax due thereon are as hereinafter shown: [Then follows a table setting forth the figures enumerated.]

"(3) That the amount of inheritance tax due the state of California in this estate is the sum of $5,064.58.

"(4) That the objections and exceptions to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser as referee, on file herein, are overruled and the said report is hereby sustained and confirmed in each and every respect."

Respondents (appellants here) thereupon appealed to this court, basing the appeal "exclusively on the following points":

"(1) That the finding that said conveyances were made in 'contemplation of death' is in direct contradiction of the direct and unqualified evidence presented in the record, and not disputed or questioned in any manner.

"(2) That the finding that said transfers were made 'in lieu of testamentary disposition' is contrary to the uncontradicted evidence and not warranted by any reasonable inference that might be drawn from the uncontradicted testimony.

"(3) But, even if there were a justifiable inference from the testimony that the transfers were made 'in lieu of testamentary disposition,' yet such transfers were not made taxable until the enactment of the statute of 1911, and, as all the transfers in this case were made prior to that time, they were not subject to taxation.

"(4) The finding of the court that the properties transferred in trust to the Title Insurance & Trust Company for the benefit of the two sons was not made until July 2, 1914, is not supported by the evidence, for it is undisputed that the same properties had been transferred in 1909 to two of the daughters in trust for the sons, and the transfers to the Title Company in 1914 were but the substitution of a new trustee and a continuation of the trust previously created."

By way of answer to the foregoing contentions, the respondent controller advances the following:

"(1) The transfers are taxable because every presumption is in favor of the judgment.

"(2) The transfers are also taxable because the definition of 'contemplation of death' written into the 1911 'Inheritance Tax Act' by the Legislature clarified this phrase, indicating the ever and continuing intent of the Legislature to make it applicable to transactions of this character.

"(3) The transfers are also taxable because they were made in contemplation of the death of Juana Larronde.

"(4) The transfers are also taxable because the decedent in destroying her will, simultaneously with the execution of the gift deed and declaration of trust in 1909, substituted the said deed and declaration of trust as a means of testamentary disposition in lieu of her said will."

Madeleine Etchemendy testified in part as follows, which testimony was accepted by her brothers and sisters as a true statement of the facts contained therein, and upon which respondent relies to sustain the claim that the transfers were made "in contemplation of death":

"Q. Did she leave a will? A. No.

"Q. Had she made one that you know of, which had nothing to operate upon, or which she destroyed prior to her death? A. She destroyed her first will many years ago, probably at the time she made this trust, that would be.

"Q. In 1909? A. That was the first will she had made. She had made it a few years before.

"Q. Had she made any will after that? A. No. * * *

"Q. I believe you stated that she destroyed her only will about 1909? A. Yes.

"Q. At about the time these deeds were made? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you ever seen that will? A. I think I heard it read when she signed it.

"Q. Was the distribution under that will to six children equally? A. Yes; just the same.

"Q. Is the general effect of the trust and the outright deeds to convey all of Juana Larronde's property to the six children as nearly equally as in the nature of things could be done? A. I think so.

"Q. Probably not penny for penny, but that was the general intent? A. I believe it is penny for penny; it could not have been more equally.

"Q. And the will would also have conveyed it equally to the six children? A. Yes; to the six children. * * *

"Q. In her discussions with you or any of the children concerning the transfer of this property, did she ever make any remarks in regard to what would be done with it when she passed away? A. No; only at the time she made it.

"Miss Norton: She made a will, though? Had she had a will for many years? A. I don't remember that; I think she had; she must have made the will after Mr. Larronde died."

"Mr. Pennock: Were you present when she destroyed it? A. Yes.

"Q. Who else was present? A. I think my sister.

"Q. What did she say at that time? A. She said these papers took the place of the will and she did not need the will any more.

"Q. And she never made another? A. No.

"Q. Had nothing to operate on? A. No.

"Miss Norton: She always intended the children to have the property anyway? A. Yes.

* * *

"Q. At the time of her death did Juana Larronde own an interest in any property whatsoever? A. None whatever; she was disposed of everything.

"Q. Neither real nor personal? A. Neither.

* * *

"Q. After this property was transferred in 1914—I might ask, after the property was transferred in 1909, Juana Larronde had practically transferred all her property, both real and personal? A. Yes.

"Q. Did she have any property whatsoever left after that time? A. No. * * *

"Q. Then the same properties placed in trust in 1914 had been placed in trust prior to that, in 1909? A. Yes.

"Q. With what company? A. Naming myself and my sister Carrie as trustees.

"Q. Oh, individual trustees? A. Yes.

"Q. Then that trust was revoked? A. Yes.

"Q. By Juana Larronde? A. Yes; and with the consent of the two brothers.

"Q. Were they beneficiaries? A. Yes.

"Q. All the parties to the trust agreed to have it revoked? A. Yes.

"Q. When? A. 1914. * * *

"Mr. Pennock: The terms are practically the same as this other trust, you say? Now, the personal property mentioned, the stocks, did not go into this trust of 1914? A. No.

"Q. And when this trust was revoked, with the consent of all parties, what was done with regard to the stocks mentioned in there? A. [Madeleine Etchemendy] It was transferred to me; I hold the bank stock.

"Q. That is all the stock which was mentioned in there, and which I read off, was transferred to you by Juana Larronde? A. Yes.

"Q. About what year was that, 1914? A. 1914, I think.

"Q. At the time the change was made in the trustees? A. Yes.

"Q. And were those stocks transferred to you along with any instrument in writing? A. No; I am just holding them in my name as owner, and I divide the dividends. It is a family affair; I divide the dividends with my brothers. * * *

"Q. Had any one of you, the daughters and sons of Juana Larronde, ever entered into any agreement with Juana Larronde whereby you were to return to her, or account to her for, or render to her any part of, the income from any of these properties? A. No; we made no agreement with her at all; she gave it outright to us; she said she trusted us; had confidence she would be cared for by her children. * * *

"Q. Did she for some time prior to the transfers discuss her intentions with you and the children? A. Yes; she spoke of it.

"Q. What did she say? A. That it was to be ours; we were her children and it was to be our property.

"Q. But what did she say bearing upon her reasons, as near as you can remember? A. You mean deeding the property? As I said before, she wished to make us a gift of the property and free herself of the care and responsibility of keeping the property. She did not wish to have any cares whatever.

"Q. Did she say anything regarding what her expectations of support and maintenance would be after deeding the property? A. No; she always said she was to be taken care of by us; she knew we would take care of her. * * *

"Mr. Pennock: You were designated, were you not, Miss Etchemendy, in the trust of 1914, as the agent for your brothers and sisters? A. Yes.

"Q. Were you also acting in the capacity of agent for your mother? A. Yes.

"Q. And had been for a number of years, more or less her agent? A. Yes; and was with my stepfather, too.

"Q. Of the six children you were the one she looked to to take care of the details? A. Yes; and my brother John was also an agent with me; he used to collect the rents.

"Q. Did your mother ever have any other agent acting for her, in regard to any of these properties, than yourself and your brother John? A. No. * * *

"Mr. Pennock: Did she ever talk over business with you at all after 1909? A. Oh, she gave us a talk, but nothing she took part in.

"Q. She did not display any interest in it? A. No.

"Q. Just trusted you to take care of it? A. Yes.

"Q. You actually had looked after it for a good many years? A. Since I was 16 years old, I think.

"Q. Making the trust did not change the actual arrangement? A. No; not at all; the trust was created at the request of my two brothers.

"Q. Of your mother? A. Yes.

"Q. Who suggested making the trust in the first place? A. My mother, but it was with their consent; that is what I meant.

"Q. Miss Norton: The general consent of all concerned? A. Yes."

We are satisfied that the foregoing evidence is ample as a matter of law to support an inference that the transfers were made "in contemplation of death" and "in lieu of testamentary disposition," and hence that the findings of the court on those issues of fact cannot be disturbed.

[1] We have already quoted appellants' third contention, that these transfers were not taxable under the 1905 act, which in point in time should govern; it being conceded they would be taxable, if made subsequent to the enactment of the 1911 act. It is true as appellants assert, "it is the law in force at the time the transfers were made that determines the question of taxability." Estate of Brix, 181 Cal, 667, 186 P. 135. For the purpose of the decision it may be assumed that all the transfers come under the

"All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state, or any interest therein, or income therefrom, which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor or bargainor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, or by reason whereof any person or body politic or corporate shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any property, or to the income thereof, shall be and is subject to a tax hereinafter provided for, to be paid to the treasurer of the proper county, as hereinafter directed, for the use of the state.

Section 27 of the 1911 act (Stats. 1911, p. 726), referring to the phrase, "in contemplation of death," used in the taxing part of that act (Stats. 1911, § 1, p. 713), provides in part:

"* * * The words 'contemplation of death,' as used in this act, shall be taken to include that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and in nowise shall said words be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person in making a gift causa mortis; and it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

In our view of 1905 and 1911 acts, so far as the phrase, "in contemplation of death," is concerned, was intended by the Legislature to cover identical cases. In other words, the phrase, "in contemplation of death," as defined in the act of 1911, is merely the equivalent in meaning with that under the act of 1905, which does not purport to define the phrase, for the phrase must necessarily be construed as the language of the act of 1911 imports—a transfer of property; the transferor having in mind the general expectancy of death which ordinarily actuates one in the execution of his will. Appellants contend, however, that the amendment found in the 1911 act had in view a broadening of the scope of said phrase. The following authorities bear on this point:

In Conway's Estate v. State, 72 Ind. App. 303, 120 N. E. 717, the court, in discussing an inheritance tax statute similar to our 1905 act, and construing the undefined phrase, "in contemplation of death," found therein, said:

"The words, 'in contemplation of death,' as used in inheritance tax statutes, do not refer to that general expectation of death entertained by all persons, but they do refer to that expectation of death which arises from such bodily or mental conditions, irrespective of the cause in any particular case, which prompts persons to dispose of their property to those they deem entitled to their bounty.

"Those words, when employed in taxation statutes, are not restricted to the technical meaning of such phrases when applied to gifts causa mortis, but are given a reasonable and liberal interpretation, which tends to make effectual such taxation laws without destroying the right of the owner of the property to make an absolute gift of the same.

"Gifts, causa mortis, come within the provisions of the statute, and likewise gifts inter vivos made in contemplation of death. * * *

"Several states preceded Indiana in the enactment of inheritance tax laws, and our statute in its general provisions, is similar to most of such statutes, particularly those of the states of Illinois, New York, Wisconsin and California." (Italics added.)

Also, in the Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 147 P. 268, Mr. Justice Henshaw writing the opinion, said, in referring to the amendment of section 27 of the 1911 act:

"This amendment also served the purpose of elucidating without changing the law, by giving fuller expression to the legislative intent and meaning."

It was pointed out in the Estate of Pausion, 186 Cal. 358, 199 P. 331, that the above statement was obiter dictum, although not criticized; yet we are prepared to adopt it, for we are of opinion that the definition in the 1911 act did not change the meaning of the phrase.

It may be argued that, as the act of 1905 did not contain a definition of the phrase, the amendment of 1911 would be unnecessary and superfluous if our conclusion is correct. But this was a matter entirely resting in the discretion of the Legislature, for what an enactment shall contain presents a legislative and not a judicial question.

We will now consider the contentions of appellants touching the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. It is pointed out that the decedent lived 11 years after the transfers were made; that she was always in satisfactory health, and that "the only basis for an inference of contemplated death is the advanced age of the decedent; and yet, considering the well-preserved state of her health, her simple habits and clean mode of living, her 74 years still left the event of death far in the future."

[2] For a transfer to be "in contemplation of death" it is not, as stated, necessary that the transferor be in fear of immediate death from an existing malady, as in a gift causa mortis, but, on the contrary, it is conceivable that a person of comparative youth, enjoying perfect health and vigor, may, nevertheless, make a transfer of his property "in contemplation of death" within the meaning of the act. It was declared in Spreckels v. State of California, 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 P. 549, involving the 1905 act:

"* * * A reasonable and just view of the law in question is that it is only where the transfer of property by gift is immediately and directly prompted by the expectation of death that the property so transferred becomes amenable to the burden. Or, as counsel for respondents with singular aptness states the proposition: 'It is only when contemplation of death is the motive without which the conveyance would not be made that a transfer may be subjected to the tax.' That is, the expectation of death may be the direct, specific, and immediate animating cause of the transfer."

The evidence, stressed by the appellants, that the decedent had for many years before the transfers were made little to do with the management of her property, leaving this to her eldest daughter, is not necessarily opposed to the findings that the transfers were made in contemplation of death; this is also true of the evidence that she led a simple life and was inactive, socially and otherwise, and that she had little or no occasion for the use of money or property. Assuming that the evidence might be sufficient to support appellants' contentions in regard to the motive which actuated decedent in making these transfers, namely, that the decedent had no use for money or property because of her advanced age and mode of living; that her children were in dire need; that the family relations were not only cordial but affectionate, and that the transfers were therefore made for the sole purpose of assisting them, the trial court having reached a contrary conclusion, it cannot be maintained on appeal that the finding should have been that the transfers were not made in contemplation of death.

[3] Conceding, as contended by appellants, "there was no discussion or mention of death in connection with these transactions," this, however, would not necessarily be opposed to a conclusion that decedent acted under an undisclosed intent to secure to her children the entire, undiminished fruits of her life's work while, at the same time, attempting to avoid the imposition of an inheritance tax and the expenses of probate incident to a testamentary disposition of her property. Such considerations would tend to support the findings that the transfers were made "in contemplation of death" and "in lieu of testamentary disposition." Again, conceding, "that the deeds were delivered, the transfers vested a present title, and there were no reservations or retention of any control over the properties in any degree whatsoever," still this would not, of itself, preclude the conclusion that the conveyances had, in fact, been made "in contemplation of death." These words, "in contemplation of death," are not narrowed or restricted in any manner by other language in the 1905 act, but are, in fact, sufficiently broad to cover any and all transfers of property, whether gifts inter vivos or causa mortis, from one person to another in anticipation of death or in lieu of testamentary disposition.

[4] In our opinion the evidence in the case, from which the trial court evidently concluded that the transfers were inconsistent with any purpose save that of testamentary disposition, that the decedent retained no property and made no provision for her support, that she distributed all her property equally among her children, and that she died intestate having at the time the transfers were made destroyed her will, is sufficient to support the findings of the court below that the transfers were made in contemplation of death and in lieu of testamentary disposition. We also think it clear that the statutory definition of the phrase, "in contemplation of death" in the act of 1911 "served the purpose of elucidating without changing the law, by giving fuller expression to the legislative intent and meaning."

The judgment is affirmed.

71 Cal. App. 522

Ex parte SIMMONS. (Cr. 1163.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 4, 1925.)

1. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 11—Statute held to cover entire field of prohibitory legislation as applied to intoxicating liquors.

The Wright Act covers the entire field of prohibitory legislation in matters relating to liquor actually intoxicating, so as to leave no vacant field for municipal legislation on that subject.

2. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 11—Ordinance imposing a greater punishment for possessing intoxicating liquor than state law held unreasonable and void.

An ordinance, which imposes a fine of not less than $200 and not more than $500 or imprisonment for 180 days, or both fine and imprisonment, for possessing intoxicating liquor containing one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, is unreasonable and void, in view of the punishment prescribed by Wright Act.

3. Habeas corpus $\S$ 30(2)—Petitioner not discharged if complaint based on a void ordinance charges an offense under state laws.

A petitioner in habeas corpus will not be discharged, notwithstanding the invalidity of the ordinance under which conviction was had, if the complaint, purporting to charge an offense under the void ordinance, does in fact charge an offense under the state law.

4. Habeas corpus ⇨30(2)—Indictment and information ⇨120—Allegation as to alcoholic content of liquor held surplusage; complaint under void ordinance after omitting surplusage held to charge offense under state law.

An allegation, in a complaint based on a void ordinance, that liquor contained "more than one-third of 1 per cent of alcohol," is surplusage, and the complaint on collateral attack in a habeas corpus proceeding is sufficient to charge offense of possessing liquors containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. alcohol under Wright Act.

5. Habeas corpus ⇨4—Writ of habeas corpus may not be used as a writ of error.

A writ of habeas corpus may not serve the purpose of a writ of error.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by D. S. Simmons. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Dorsey & Campbell, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. A complaint was filed in the police court of Bakersfield charging petitioner with the possession of intoxicating liquor containing more than one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, contrary to the provisions of section 4 of Ordinance No. 165 of that city. Petitioner pleaded guilty to the charge and was sentenced to pay a fine of $250. The judgment provides that if the fine be not paid petitioner shall be imprisoned in the county jail of Kern county until it be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine. The fine not having been paid, petitioner was committed to jail pursuant to the terms of the judgment; whereupon he applied to this court for his discharge on habeas corpus. The principal points urged by petitioner are: (1) That the ordinance is unconstitutional; and (2) that the complaint does not state any offense known to the law.

Section 4 of the ordinance reads:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to have, keep or store any intoxicating liquor in any public place in said city except as provided herein."

Section 1 defines intoxicating liquor as including "any distilled, malt, spirituous, vinous, fermented or alcoholic liquor which contains more than one-third of one per cent. by volume of alcohol, and all alcoholic liquids and compounds whether proprietary, patented or not, which are potable or capable of being used as a beverage, and which contain more than one-third of one per cent. by volume of alcohol." It is provided in section

13 that any person who shall violate any of the provisions of the ordinance "shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than two hundred and fifty ($250.00) dollars, nor more than five hundred ($500.00) dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not to exceed one hundred and eighty (180) days, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The municipality derives its police powers from section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, which declares that any city may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations "as are not in conflict with general laws." Petitioner claims that the ordinance is in conflict with a general law of this state, namely, the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), within the rule announced in such cases as Ex parte Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 P. 405; Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 278, 46 P. 86; Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172; and In re Mingo, 190 Cal. 769, 214 P. 850—cases which hold that a local ordinance punishing exactly the same act denounced by a state law is in conflict therewith and to that extent void. It also is claimed that the ordinance is unreasonable and void under the doctrine of such cases as In re Ah You, 88 Cal. 99, 25 P. 974, 11 L. R. A. 408, 22 Am. St. Rep. 280, and Ex parte Solomon, 91 Cal. 440, 27 P. 757. It is contended by the sheriff, on the other hand, that the ordinance is not in conflict with the Wright Act, and that it is not unreasonable. That officer claims that because the ordinance makes one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume the test of an intoxicating liquor, it is not in conflict with the state law. In support of this contention he cites In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 99 P. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75, and Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 182 P. 281—cases which recognize the principle that there is no conflict between an ordinance and a general law where the former makes new and additional regulations for the sale of an article of commerce which are in keeping with the provisions of the general law and are at the same time appropriate to the necessities of the particular locality.

In Olivieri v. Police Court, 62 Cal. App. 91, 216 P. 44, the court, construing a similar ordinance of the city of Bakersfield, assumed, and we think correctly assumed, that the inhibition of the ordinance against having, keeping, or storing intoxicating liquor is substantially the same as the inhibition of the Wright Act against the possession of intoxicating liquor. The fact that the ordinance declares it to be unlawful to have, keep, or store the intoxicating liquor in "any public place" does not cause it to cover ground not covered by the state law. The prohibition of the state law is aimed against the illegal possession of intoxicating liquors in all places—public as well as private. The principal difference between the present ordinance and the one which was held to be unconstitutional in the Olivieri Case is that here the city, in its definition of intoxicating liquor, has made an alcoholic content of one-third of 1 per cent. by volume the test; whereas, the ordinance under consideration in the Olivieri Case, adopting the criterion furnished by the state law, made one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume the test of an intoxicating liquor. The city attorney naively informs us that it was for the purpose of avoiding the nullifying effect of the decision in the Olivieri Case that the city council, in passing the present ordinance, made the test of intoxicating liquor the presence of one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, instead of one-half of 1 per cent. as formerly.

[1] Does the part of the ordinance under which petitioner was charged conflict with the Wright Act? Broadly speaking, the question whether such conflict exists depends upon whether the state has occupied the whole field of prohibitory legislation with respect to the possession of intoxicating liquor for use as a beverage. There are two distinct domains of prohibitory legislation which the lawmakers, in their wisdom, may see fit to invade by appropriate legislation. One of these realms embraces all laws which seek directly to prohibit traffic in the evil sought to be suppressed. This realm includes those prohibitory laws which are aimed directly at the mischief intended to be eradicated. It is invaded by any enactment which is designed to prohibit an act that is intrinsically evil, such, for example, as an enactment which makes it unlawful to traffic in liquors which are in fact intoxicating. But there is another realm of prohibitory legislation which may be described as the zone of expediency. It includes those laws which prohibit acts that are not in themselves of an evil nature, but whose prohibition is deemed essential in order to facilitate the suppression of the actual evil. For example, experience has shown that it is well-nigh impossible effectively to enforce laws prohibiting traffic in intoxicants if liability or inclusion within the prohibition is made to depend upon the issuable fact whether or not a particular liquor is or is not intoxicating. Therefore, in order to make enforcement of the prohibition effective, the Legislature may prohibit traffic in beverages which are near to intoxicants, even though they are not in themselves intoxicating. Whether it will do so or not is a matter of legislative expediency. When this twilight zone of expediency is invaded by the Legislature, it does so only for the purpose of facilitating the enforcement of its prohibitory legislation. State v. Brothers, 144 Minn. 337, 175 N. W. 685; State v. Walder, 83 Ohio St. 68, 93 N. E. 531; Purity Ex-

An analysis of the Wright Act and of the Eighteenth Amendment, which the act is intended to enforce, will, we think, lead to the conclusion that the state law was intended to occupy the whole field of actual prohibitory legislation, i. e., that it was intended to occupy all of that domain of prohibitory legislation which embraces such laws as are intended to suppress the evil itself. That is to say, though we probably cannot take judicial notice that a beverage containing less than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume is not intoxicating, we think it can plainly be seen that it was the intention of the state lawmakers in passing the Wright Act to prohibit the possession of any alcoholic beverage which is in fact intoxicating. The Eighteenth Amendment declares that traffic in "intoxicating liquors * * * for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited." This language is unquestionably broad enough to embrace within its prohibition any liquor which, when used as a beverage, can and does actually produce intoxication if imbibed in such quantities as it is practically possible for a man to drink. The Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½ et seq.), the penal provisions whereof are adopted by our Wright Act, declares in its title that it is an act "to prohibit intoxicating beverages"; and in section 3 of title 2 (section 10138½aa), it declares that its provisions shall be liberally construed "to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented." Here is manifested an unmistakable intention on the part of Congress adequately to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment by completely prohibiting traffic in any and all beverages which, by reason of the presence of alcohol, are in fact intoxicating. This it does by defining intoxicating liquor as including certain specified liquors, such as brandy, whisky, gin, beer, ale, wine, etc., and in addition thereto "any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, or by whatever name called, containing one-half of one per cent. or more of alcohol by volume, which are fit for use for beverage purposes." Title 2, § 1 (section 10138½). In the enactment of the Wright Act the Legislature of this state has exhibited a similar intention to prohibit traffic in all alcoholic beverages which are in fact intoxicating. This it does by adopting all of the penal provisions of the Volstead Act and by expressly recognizing the requirement of the Eighteenth Amendment for its concurrent enforcement by Congress and by the several states.

Congress or the state Legislature could, of course, have defined an intoxicating liquor as a beverage containing any percentage of alcohol whatever. Both the national and the state lawmaking bodies have seen fit to declare that any beverage containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol shall be deemed to be an intoxicating liquor. In this legislation, designed as it is to enforce the absolute prohibition of the Eighteenth Amendment, we can plainly discern an unmistakable intention to prohibit traffic in any and all alcoholic beverages which are in fact intoxicating. We therefore feel warranted in concluding that the Legislature of this state has occupied the whole domain of actual prohibitory legislation, i. e., prohibitory legislation in the sense that it is sought thereby to prohibit traffic in all alcoholic beverages which are actually intoxicating.

It is, of course, conceded by us that if the Legislature had not manifested an intention to prohibit traffic in all alcoholic beverages which are in fact intoxicating, a partially vacant field of legislation would have been left for the city to fill by appropriate local legislation, as was the case in Ex parte Hoffman, supra. But where, as here, the state legislation discloses an unmistakable intention completely to prohibit the evil thing itself, we seriously doubt whether a municipality may adopt a prohibitory ordinance merely for the purpose of securing additional effectiveness for the plenary prohibition which is already in force under the state law. Where the language of the state enactment clearly evidences an intention to prohibit in toto the evil which is to be suppressed, the determination of how much of what we have referred to as the zone of expediency should be occupied by further legislation would seem to be a matter of state policy to be determined by the state Legislature, and that a city ordinance which is designed simply to invade a zone which can be occupied only for the purpose of facilitating the enforcement of the total actual prohibition already in existence is not in keeping with the spirit or policy of the state law, but is in conflict therewith.

[2] But if there be room to doubt whether a conflict exists between the ordinance and the state law within the meaning of section 11 of article II of the Constitution, there can be no room to doubt the unreasonableness of the ordinance, within the principle of such cases as In re Ah you and Ex parte Solomon, supra, both of which hold that the punishment prescribed by an ordinance for its violation must not only be reasonable in itself but must be in harmony with the state legislative enactments on kindred subjects.

"Municipal by-laws must harmonize with the general laws of the state, with the municipal charter, and with the principles of the common law. (14 Barb. 478; 4 Hill, 209.) They must also be reasonable, and whenever they appear not to be, the courts will, as matter of law, declare them void." Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 225.

See, also, South Pasadena v. Terminal Ry. Co., 109 Cal. 321, 41 P. 1093. In Ex parte Ah You, supra, it is said that "it was incumbent upon the city to frame the ordinance, so far as practicable, in harmony with the general laws of the state." In that case an ordinance was held unreasonable and invalid because it authorized a fine of $1,000 for an offense, when the statute of the state limited the punishment of a grosser offense in the same category to a fine of $500. In Ex parte Solomon, supra, it was held that an ordinance prescribing a minimum fine of $250 and a minimum imprisonment of three months for having lottery tickets in one's possession, when under the general law of the state such misdemeanors as conducting the drawing of a lottery, selling lottery tickets, etc., were punishable by fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, without any prescribed minimum, providing, as it did, a greater penalty than that provided by statute for kindred offenses, was not in harmony with the general laws of the state and was therefore unreasonable and void.

In the Wright Act the legislation has prohibited everything which is sought to be prohibited by section 4 of this ordinance, excepting only the possession of liquor of an alcoholic content between one-third of 1 per cent. and one-half of 1 per cent. by volume. The ordinance provides that for having, keeping, or storing in a public place in the city of Bakersfield any alcoholic beverage containing more than one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume the offender, even though it be his first offense, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $250 nor more than $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding 180 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; whereas, the state law, for the illegal possession of intoxicating liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent. or more of alcohol by volume, authorizes for the first offense a fine of not more than $500. It is possible that upon a conviction for a first offense under the state law the court, in the exercise of a wise discretion, may impose only a nominal fine, even though the accused may have had such possession in a public place; whereas, for the comparatively trifling offense of having in one's possession in the same place a beverage containing less than one-half of 1 per cent. but more than one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume the discretion to impose a fine of less than $250 is taken away from the court by this ordinance. Moreover, under the ordinance the court, even for a first offense, may impose imprisonment for a term which may be twice as long as that which the state law authorizes for second offenders. In other words, the state law, which is aimed at the prohibition of traffic in all alcoholic liquors which actually intoxicate, imposes a penalty far less than that imposed by the ordinance for the trifling offense of doing something which the city authorities may deem it necessary to prohibit in order to facilitate the effective prohibition of traffic in actual intoxicants. Such an ordinance is not in harmony with the general laws of the state, and is unreasonable and void within the rule announced in Ex parte Ah You and Ex parte Solomon, supra.

[3, 4] Notwithstanding the invalidity of the ordinance, petitioner will not be entitled to his discharge if the complaint, though purporting to state an offense under the ordinance, does in fact state an offense under the state law. Olivieri v. Police Court, supra; In re Murphy, 190 Cal. 286, 212 P. 30. The complaint charges petitioner with unlawfully having in his possession "intoxicating liquor containing more than one-third of 1 per cent. alcohol by volume." It is claimed that the pleading states no offense known to the law, because it fails to allege that the liquor contained one-half of 1 per cent. or more of alcohol by volume, or that it was fit for use for beverage purposes. There is nothing in the complaint which tends to negative the idea that the liquor in petitioner's possession contained at least as much as one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol. The allegation that it contained "more than one-third of 1 per cent. alcohol by volume" is entirely consistent with the fact that its alcoholic content was as much as or more than one-half of 1 per cent. In other words, the allegation that the liquor contained "more than one-third of 1 per cent. alcohol by volume" neither adds to nor detracts from the pleading as a complaint under the state law, and those words of the pleading may be ignored as surplusage.

With the elimination of these surplus words, the charge in the complaint is that petitioner unlawfully had in his possession "intoxicating liquor." We have recently held that a complaint in which the liquor is described simply as "intoxicating liquor" is not so fatally defective as to warrant a reversal of a judgment of conviction on an appeal therefrom. People v. Norcross (Cal. App.) 234 P. 438. A fortiori must it be held that a judgment of conviction upon such a complaint is not vulnerable to a collateral attack in a habeas corpus proceeding.

[5] The writ of habeas corpus may not be made to serve the purpose of a writ of error. It has been said that if the facts alleged "squit at a substantive statement of the offense," habeas corpus will not lie. Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 P. 706. See, also, In re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 P. 674. A complaint similar to the one here under consideration was before the court in the Matter of Hayward, 62 Cal. App. 177, 216 P. 414, and was held to be sufficient to withstand an attack in a habeas corpus proceeding. Shortly after the decision of the District Court of Appeal in that case, a similar petition for the writ of habeas corpus was presented to the Supreme Court by the same petitioners. In re Hayward (Crim. No. 2579). That court, on May 28, 1923, without filing an opinion, denied the petition. That decision would seem to conclude all question as to the ability of this complaint to withstand collateral attack in a habeas corpus proceeding.

The most that can be said in criticism of the complaint is that it is not sufficiently specific, and that its allegation that the liquor was intoxicating is the mere statement of a conclusion. But it certainly attempts to charge an offense; it at least "squints" at the statement of an offense—to employ the language of Ex parte Williams, supra. We have no hesitancy in saying that it does not wholly fail to state a public offense, and that any defect therein might have been remedied by demurrer or by motion in arrest of judgment.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner is remanded.

CRAIG, J. I concur, except in that part of the opinion having to do with petitioner's claim that the ordinance of the city of Bakersfield is in conflict with the general laws. Concerning that point I prefer to express no opinion.

Ex parte CARMIGNANI. (Cr. 1203.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 10, 1925.)

Habeas corpus  30(3)—Prisoner will be discharged where sentence to imprisonment for first offense against liquor laws is void.

Where ordinance, under which petitioner was sentenced for possession of liquor as a first offense, is void because the penalties therein prescribed are unreasonable, there being no authority under the state law for imprisonment for a first offense, sentence to imprisonment is void, and prisoner, having paid maximum fine prescribed by state law, will be discharged on habeas corpus.

Application by A. Carmignani for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

Dorsey & Campbell, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Petitioner pleaded guilty in the police court of the city of Bakersfield to a charge of having in his possession, in a public place in that city, intoxicating liquor containing more than one-third of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, contrary to section 4 of Ordinance No. 165 of that city. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $500 and also to imprisonment in the county jail for a period of 180 days. He paid the fine, but nevertheless was committed to jail pursuant to the terms of his sentence to imprisonment. It seems to be conceded that this is petitioner's first offense against the liquor laws. If therefore the ordinance, in so far as it attempts to prescribe penalties for its infraction, is unreasonable and void, petitioner is entitled to his discharge even though the complaint in the police court be sufficient to state an offense under the state law. This is so for the reason that the maximum penalty provided by the statute for the illegal possession of intoxicating liquor is a fine of $500, if it be the first offense. In re Adams, 61 Cal. App. 239, 214 P. 467.

We have recently held that the punitive provisions of this ordinance are unreasonable and void for the reason that the penalties prescribed thereby greatly exceed those provided by the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) for kindred offenses. In re Simmons (Cal. App.) 235 P. 1029. This leaves no authority for the sentence save such as may be found in the state law; and as that law only authorizes a fine in such a case as this, it follows that the part of the judgment under which petitioner was committed to jail is invalid and void, and that he must be discharged from custody.

Petitioner is discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Suit by the Mohawk Oil Company, a corporation, against Ed. W. Hopkins, County Assessor of the County of Los Angeles. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Weil and Forrest A. Cobb, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward T. Bishop and J. A. Tucker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. [1-3] This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant as county assessor of the county of Los Angeles, after an order sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to further amend. The action was one brought by the plaintiff to enjoin the defendant as such county assessor from the collection of certain taxes upon the plaintiff's property. The facts as they appear upon the face of the complaint may be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff, a California corporation, is the grantee and holder of certain oil and gas leases granted to it by the owners of certain parcels of land described in its complaint, by the terms and conditions of which leases the plaintiff has been granted the right to drill for and extract oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances from said lands, and to have the possession of the same for such purposes, the terms of said leases to be 20 years and as long thereafter as said substances can be extracted from said lands in paying quantities, the consideration for such leases being certain royalties to be paid by plaintiff to the owners of such lands, respectively, in proportion to the amount of such substances so to be extracted from their respective tracts of land. The defendant is county assessor of said county, and is claiming and attempting to exercise the right to demand and collect county taxes upon the plaintiff's possessory rights and oil and gas leases in and upon said lands, and to have the same paid in conformity with section 3820 of the Political Code, or, in default of said payment as provided in said section, to have the plaintiff's said possessory and leasehold rights seized and sold under the provisions of sections 3821 and 3822 of said Code. It is the plaintiff's contention that its said possessory rights and leasehold interests in said real estate are themselves real estate, and that whatever taxes are or are to be imposed thereon should be assessed, levied, and collected in the same manner as taxes upon other real estate are assessed, levied, and collected, and that the foregoing provisions of the Political Code, in so far as they attempt or purport to authorize the defendant as county assessor to assess, levy, collect, or enforce the collection of taxes upon the plaintiff's said properties, in any other manner than that provided by law for the assessment and collection of taxes upon real estate, are violative of the provisions of section 1 of article 13 and section 25 of article 4 of the state Constitution, and are also violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution; wherefore it sought the relief prayed for in its amended complaint, and, being denied such relief by the trial court, has prosecuted this appeal. Section 3820 of the Political Code reads as follows:

"The assessor must collect the taxes on all property when, in his opinion, said taxes are not a lien upon real property sufficient to secure the payment of the taxes. The taxes on all assessments of possession of, claim to, or right to the possession of land and the taxes on taxable improvements located upon land exempt from taxation, shall be immediately due and payable upon assessment and shall be collected by the assessor as provided in this chapter."

This section of the Political Code was amended in 1921 (Laws 1921, p. 370) by adding thereto the clause therein reading "and the taxes on taxable improvements located on land exempt from taxation," but otherwise the wording of the section has remained unchanged since 1895.

The first case before this court interpreting this section in its relation to leases for the extraction of oil from land was the case of Bakersfield & Fresno Oil Co. v. Kern County, 144 Cal. 148, 77 P. 892. In that case the plaintiff's property was subjected to taxes and to the immediate payment thereof under the terms of section 3820 of the Political Code. It paid such taxes under protest, and thereafter brought suit to recover such taxes so paid. This court held, upon the appeal in that case, that interests in mining claims and oil leases were real estate under the definition of section 3617 of the Political Code, and were properly assessable as such under the provisions of section 3820 of the Political Code, and, having been so assessed, the taxes thereon were properly collectible under the terms of said last-named section, and that, the taxes of the plaintiff in that action having thus been properly assessed and paid thereunder, were not recoverable.

The next case before this court upon appeal touching the assessment and collection of taxes upon oil leases was the case of Graciosa Oil Co. v. County of Santa Barbara, 155 Cal. 140, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. In that case also the action was one for the recovery of taxes paid under protest upon certain oil leases, and the possessory rights thereunder in lands owned by certain lessors, and the question presented was whether such possessory rights and the privileges to extract oil from the leased premises were assessable separately from the assessment of the lands themselves, or whether such attempted assessment thereof was not double taxation. The court held that the possessory right to lands for a term of years, embracing the privilege to bore for and extract oil therefrom differed materially from ordinary leases for usufructuary purposes, and that the right vested in a lessee in lands for the purpose of taking oil therefrom during a prescribed term was in the nature of a servitude on the land and a chattel real at common law, and as such was separately assessable from the land itself, and that its assessment and the collection of the taxes thereon under the provisions of sections 3820, 3821, and 3822 of the Political Code were proper and legal, and should have been upheld by the trial court. It is true that, while in each of these cases the assessment and compulsory payment of taxes upon oil leases under the foregoing sections of the Political Code were upheld, the precise constitutional question urged in the instant case was not urged. It is also, however, to be noted as a conceded fact herein that during the 20 or more years which have elapsed since the decision of the case of Bakersfield, etc., Oil Co. v. Kern Co., supra, taxes upon oil leases have been uniformly assessed and collected in accordance with the three last-named sections of the Political Code. These sections of said Code have remained unchanged except in the single respect above referred to, whereby section 3820 has been broadened so as to permit the assessment and collection of taxes upon possessory rights in, and taxable improvements upon, lands which are themselves exempt from taxation.

The present contention of the plaintiff and appellant herein is that, since possessory rights and leasehold interests in lands are real estate under section 3617 of the Political Code, as interpreted in the foregoing cases, no reason exists for the application to these forms of real estate of a different principle and method of assessment and of the payment of taxes than that which, under the general laws relating to taxation of real property, is provided for the assessment and collection of the taxes upon the land out of which these lesser interests therein have been carved. This contention was answered in part by this court in the case of Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara, supra, wherein Mr. Justice Shaw pointed out certain essential differences between possessory rights under leases for the extraction of oil and like substances from the land and ordinary possessory interests under leases for the purpose of usufructuary production which import to the former a character resembling that of a servitude or chattel real. There are yet other differences easily to be discerned. The operations of lessees under oil leases contemplate the erection of derricks and other structures of an impermanent character and the sinking of deep wells at large expense, but which derive their main value, not from the expenditure necessary to their creation, but from the oil content of the land into which they penetrate. If oil or other mineral substance or essence is found and extracted, these immediately become personal property upon their severance from the soil, the value of which is to be realized only by their removal from the place of their extraction to near or distant markets. The failure to find the oil or other mineral content of the soil strata, or the failure of the well to hold up to its original outflow, may render the lease and the structures used in the operation of the well or wells under its terms practically valueless, either for use, or for security for the taxes which have been rightfully assessed against this form of property. In the case of the land itself, it remains and is subject to the lien of taxes assessed against it during the year or more within which the two installments of such taxes are made payable; but in the case of the oil lease, not only is that which constituted its main value converted into personal property and removed or removable from the land, and hence from subjection to any lien for taxes, but the very value of the lease itself, either for use or for security, is liable at any time to be entirely lost through the failure of the well to find the land content sought for, or to continue to be operated profitably in its extraction. In the foregoing respects and in others not necessary to enumerate a very essential difference exists between the land itself as the subject of taxation and those possessory rights therein which obtain under oil leases, a difference which would fully suffice to justify the classification which the Legislature has seen fit to make in the enactment of section 3820 et seq. of the Political Code, providing a different and more drastic method for the collection of taxes upon possessory rights under oil leases such as those presented in the instant case. We can perceive no constitutional objection to the subjection of these latter classes of property, considered as real estate, but in many respects resembling personal property, to the same principles and methods for the assessment and collection of the taxes thereon which are given application to personal property, the taxes upon which are unsecured by any lien other than that which would be created by their summary seizure and sale under the provisions of the statute relative to the collection of taxes upon such forms of property.

The argument that the owners and holders of possessory rights under oil leases are more oppressively subjected to taxation than are the owners of the lands to which such possessory rights and oil leases relate is answered by the fact that they are no more oppressively borne upon in that regard than are the owners of personal property who constitute a large part of our taxpaying population, and who are subject to the same compulsions in the absence of realty holdings upon which the lien of their personal property taxes could be imposed. In the case of Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 518, 51 P. 869, 39 L. R. A. 342, this court held that the provisions of the statutes relating to the assessment and collection of taxes upon personal property, where such taxes were not secured by a lien upon real estate, were neither in conflict with article 13 of the state Constitution, requiring property to be taxed in proportion to its value, nor with subdivision 10 of section 25 of article 4 thereof, which prohibits special legislation for the assessment or collection of taxes. We regard that decision as authority for the conclusion which we have reached in this case, that no constitutional rights of the plaintiff and appellant herein have been violated by the application of the provisions of sections 3820 et seq. of the Political Code to the possessory rights and privileges which it asserts under the oil leases set forth in its amended complaint, the de-murrer to which we think was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MORANI. (Cr. 2759.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1925.
Rehearing Denied June 8, 1925.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 365(1), 369(2), 370, 371 (1, 12), 372(1)—When evidence of other crimes is admissible.

Evidence of other crimes than that charged is admissible when it tends to establish intent, guilty knowledge, motive, or common scheme, plan, or system, or to connect defendant with crime charged, or when other crimes are part of res gestæ.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 370, 371(4)—Evidence of similar offense three and one-half years before held admissible.

In prosecution for second degree murder by performing operation to produce abortion, in violation of Penal Code, $\S$ 274, where defendant claimed that his sole purpose was to determine whether deceased had a tumor, evidence that he had performed similar operations on another woman three and one-half years before, and that miscarriage resulted therefrom, was admissible to prove guilty knowledge and intent to produce miscarriage; remoteness in time being immaterial.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 370, 371(1)—Remoteness in time of another offense, relevant to show knowledge and intent, does not affect admissibility.

Remoteness in time of another offense, relevant to show knowledge as essential element of criminal intent, may go to weight of evidence thereof, but not to its admissibility, as where it is admissible solely as tending to prove common scheme, plan, or system.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Pasqual Morani was convicted of second degree murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Lacey and Milton E. D'Askquith, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

MYERS, C. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of murder in the second degree, growing out of the performance of a criminal operation upon a pregnant woman for the purpose of producing an abortion, in violation of Penal Code, $\S$ 274, and which resulted in her death. It is not claimed herein that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. As is usual in such cases, it was sharply conflicting upon various points, but the evidence produced by the prosecution was, if believed by the jury, ample to support the following statement of facts:

The defendant, who was following the occupation of a barber in San Francisco, was known as "Doctor Morani," and claimed to have studied medicine eight years, but admittedly he had never been licensed to practice medicine, surgery, or any other method of treating the sick. He had told Mr. Dahl, the husband of the deceased herein, that he knew how to successfully perform abortions, and an arrangement was made between them for the performance of an abortion by him upon Dahl's wife, who was then pregnant. By appointment Dahl brought his wife to the defendant's home in San Francisco, where the defendant made an examination of her, and an appointment was made for the defendant to come to Dahl's house in Fruitvale the following Saturday evening and there to perform the operation. This appointment was kept; the defendant bringing with him a small satchel containing surgical instruments. Upon arrival at the house defendant said "he had to do some work on her that evening," and used the term, "I have to dilate the womb." Defendant then went into the bedroom with Mrs. Dahl, where they remained about 15 minutes and upon coming out the defendant said to her, "I did not hurt you much, did I?" and she said, "No; that was quite easy. I hope the last of it will be as easy as that."

Defendant remained in the house that night, and the following morning asked Mrs. Dahl if she had any bearing down pains, to which she replied in the negative, and he seemed somewhat surprised and disappointed that she had no pains. Then Dahl took the children out of the house, with the understanding that an operation was going to be performed by the defendant during his absence. Upon his return at 1 o'clock in the afternoon defendant said to Dahl that he had performed or attempted to perform the abortion; that it was more of a job than he thought it would be; that he pulled a piece out of her that was a piece of a hand, showing indications of fingers, and that evidently she had gone four months instead of three, and if he had known that she was gone four months instead of three he would not have taken the case for a million dollars. During the remainder of the day defendant repeatedly urged Mrs. Dahl to permit him to finish the operation, at which she demurred; but, finally consenting thereto, in the evening, she was placed upon the bed and defendant inserted a speculum and expanded it, and through it inserted an instrument about a foot long, which opened up something like a pair of scissors, and defendant inserted this and worked it like a pair of scissors, at which the woman gave a terrible scream, and defendant desisted, saying, "She won't let me work; it is no use." When the instrument was withdrawn it was covered with blood, and Dahl noticed a chunk or clot of blood in the chamber underneath where the defendant was working. The woman was then in terrible pain and Dahl went in search of a physician, finally procuring one about midnight, who called, examined her, gave her an opiate, and who the next morning had her taken to a hospital and there performed a curettage, in the course of which he discovered that the uterus had been opened by some instrument or foreign body and had been punctured and there was a cut or tear about an inch and a half long in the walls thereof, resulting in a hemorrhage into the abdominal cavity and consequent peritonitis, from which the woman died.

Defendant denied that he had examined the woman at his home in San Francisco, and testified that he went with Dahl to the latter's home in Fruitvale on Saturday evening for the sole purpose of examining the woman for a suspected tumor. He denied that he used a speculum or curette or any other instrument upon her person, and insisted that he did no more than to make a digital examination of her uterus; that by this means he found that she was or had recently been pregnant; that she had been attempting to produce a miscarriage upon herself and that the water had broken, and he thereupon urged Dahl to call a physician to treat her. He admitted that he remained at the Dahl home from Saturday evening until the following Monday morning; that he took with him upon that visit a speculum and "a few other instruments," and that he threw the speculum away out of the car window upon leaving the Dahl house Monday morning. He was unable to give any reason for so doing. The prosecution also produced witnesses who testified that three and one-half years previously this defendant had agreed to perform an abortion upon another pregnant woman, and that in carrying out his agreement he had proceeded in the same manner and had done the same things which he is shown by the evidence to have done in the present case; that the result thereof in the former case was a miscarriage, which nearly caused the death of the woman. The contention of the appellant herein is that the trial court committed prejudicial and reversible error in admitting the evidence of the previous offense because of the remoteness thereof in point of time, with the result that the defendant was, in effect, convicted upon this trial of the previous offense as to which the statute of limitations had run.

[1] It is well settled that a defendant in a criminal cause can be tried for no other offense than that charged in the indictment or information, and therefore it is not competent for the prosecution to prove the commission of independent crimes by the defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged. But this rule does not exclude such evidence when it logically tends to prove any fact necessary or pertinent to the proof of the crime for which the defendant is being tried. Such evidence is not to be rejected, because it also tends to prove the commission of other crimes or because it may prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors. Generally speaking, such evidence is admissible when it tends to establish intent, guilty knowledge, motive, a common scheme, plan, or system, or when it tends to connect the defendant with the crime charged, or when the other crimes are part of the res gestæ. 8 Cal. Juris. p. 60 et seq.

[2] The evidence here complained of was admitted for the sole purpose of proving guilty knowledge and intent, and it was so limited by the court in its instructions to the jury. It seems to us that it was fairly admissible for this purpose. Defendant herein claimed that his sole purpose was an innocent and proper one, namely, to make an examination for the purpose of determining whether or not the woman was afflicted with a tumor. The jurors may have believed that he did the things above related, and yet they may have reasonably doubted that he did those things with the intent of producing a miscarriage. They may reasonably have doubted that the defendant even knew that the doing of those things would be likely to produce a miscarriage. He was not a physician or surgeon, and his examination upon the witness stand indicated that his knowledge of medicine and surgery was extremely limited and fragmentary. Under these circumstances it was not only proper but necessary for the prosecution to prove that the defendant in performing the acts testified to did so with the intent of producing a criminal miscarriage. When the prosecution showed that the defendant had previously performed precisely similar operations upon the body of another pregnant woman, and that a miscarriage resulted therefrom, this evidence tended to show that the defendant, when he thereafter performed the same acts upon the person of Mrs. Dahl, did so with the knowledge that those acts would be likely to produce a miscarriage, from which it could be justly inferred that he did so with the express intent of producing such miscarriage. The evidence was therefore relevant for the purpose of showing knowledge as an element of criminal intent. In this view of the case, the remoteness in point of time of the previous offense is of no material consequence. If the defendant acquired such knowledge three and one-half years previously under the circumstances here shown in evidence, it is not at all likely that he had forgotten it in the interim.

[3] Where the evidence of another offense is admissible and relevant for the purpose of showing knowledge as an essential element of criminal intent, the remoteness in point of time of such other offense may go to the weight of the evidence, but not to its admissibility. The rule in this respect is different from that applicable where the evidence of other offenses is admissible solely upon the ground that it tends to prove a common scheme, plan, or system embracing the commission of two or more crimes so related to each other that proof of one tends to establish the other, in which case the evidence of such other offenses must be closely related, both as to time and character. The case of People v. Northcott, 45 Cal. App. 706, 189 P. 704, is similar in many respects to the case at bar. In that case the defendant was charged with murder growing out of the performance of a criminal abortion, and evidence was received of other abortion operations performed by him previous to the offense charged. The District Court of Appeal held, upon the authority of cases cited from other states, that such evidence was admissible, and this court in denying an application for transfer withheld any expression of opinion as to its admissibility under the circumstances of that case. In that case, however, the defendant denied, not merely that he had performed the operation with criminal intent, but denied that he had performed any operation whatsoever upon the person of the decedent, and denied that he had ever seen her. Under those circumstances it was argued that such denials on his part negated any possible contention that he had performed the acts with an innocent purpose, and that for this reason the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial. The case of People v. Hickok, 56 Cal. App. 13, 204 P. 555, more closely approximates the present case. The defendant there was charged with a violation of Penal Code, § 274, and, while he did not himself take the stand, produced a medical witness whose testimony tended to indicate that the operation performed by the defendant was performed for an innocent purpose. The court held that under these circumstances evidence of other abortions previously performed by the defendant was admissible in order to rebut this implied contention of the defendant; that the circumstance that it would have been proper only in rebuttal goes merely to the order of proof, and that the defendant was not prejudiced by the fact that such evidence was received as part of the prosecution's case in chief. The court said:

"As a rule, upon the trial for a particular crime evidence which tends to show the commission of another and distinct offense by the defendant is inadmissible. To this rule there are, however, several exceptions. According to one line of authorities the state would have the right to introduce such testimony as a part of its case in chief in order to negative the possibility that the operation was necessitated by the condition of health of the patient. People v. Hagenow, 236 Ill. 514 (86 N. E. 370); People v. Northcott, 45 Cal. App. 706 (189 P. 704); People v. Sindici, 54 Cal. App. 193 (201 P. 975). In two California cases the Supreme Court, in denying petitions for their transfer to that court, withheld its approval of this doctrine; the exigencies of those cases not requiring its application. However, it is settled that such evidence is admissible whenever it appears that the defendant claims that the operation was innocently performed and for a lawful purpose. People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259 (137 Pac. 1076). * * *

"In the case of People v. Seaman, 107 Mich. 348 (61 Am. St. Rep. 326, 65 N. W. 203), it is said: 'Upon principle and authority it is clear that where a felonious intent is an essential ingredient of the crime charged, and the act done is claimed to have been innocently or accidentally done, or by mistake, or when the result is claimed to have followed an act lawfully done for a legitimate purpose, or where there is room for such an inference, it is proper to characterize the act by proof of other like acts producing the same result as tending to show guilty knowledge, and the intent or purpose with which the particular act was done, and to rebut the presumption that might otherwise obtain.'"

We conclude that the evidence here complained of was relevant to prove knowledge of the defendant as an ingredient of the criminal intent which was an essential element of the crime charged. This conclusion disposes of the point made that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in making reference to the previous offense in his opening statement to the jury.

The judgment of conviction and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

JARVIS v. WEBBER, Sheriff. (Sac. 3504.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1925.
Rehearing Denied May 25, 1925.)

1. Assignments for benefit of creditors — 53, 81, 170—Conveyance to trustee, not complying with statutes, void as to nonconsenting creditor.

Where trust agreement, whereby property of insolvent debtors was transferred to a trustee, did not contain list of creditors of grantors, was not made to sheriff, and was not recorded as required by Civ. Code, §§ 3449, 3458, 3459, such trust agreement, considered as a general statutory assignment for benefit of creditors, was void as against a nonconsenting creditor.

2. Assignments for benefit of creditors — 44—Assignment for benefit of creditors complying with statute binding on nonconsenting creditor.

If an insolvent debtor makes an assignment for benefit of creditors in compliance with Civ. Code, § 3449 et seq., such assignment is binding on nonconsenting as well as consenting creditors.

3. Assignments for benefit of creditors — 45—Transfer of property of insolvent debtor in trust to secure certain obligations valid, if made for benefit of creditors generally.

A transfer of property of an insolvent debtor in trust to pay and secure certain obligations of debtor is not invalid in view of Civ. Code, §§ 3432, 3451, because it does not conform to provisions of code relating to general assignments for benefit of creditors, and if such transfer is made for benefit of creditors generally, it is protected, as to delivery and continued change of possession by exception contained in section 3440, as amended by St. 1917, p. 255, § 1.

4. Assignments for benefit of creditors — 4—Trust agreement held not an "assignment for benefit of creditors generally" and not binding on nonconsenting creditor or free from presumption of fraud.

Deed and trust agreement, whereby insolvent debtors transferred property to trustee, for benefit of named creditor, and all other creditors consenting thereto, was not an assignment for benefit of creditors generally, within Civ. Code, §§ 3449-3473, and was not binding on nonconsenting creditors, nor within section 3440, excepting general assignments from presumption that all transfers not accompanied by change of possession are fraudulent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assignment for Benefit of Creditors.]

5. Appeal and error — 1010(1)—Whether delivery and change of possession accompanied transfer of property, question of fact and decision conclusive when supported by substantial evidence.

Whether there was delivery and change of possession of property under trust agreement for benefit of certain creditors so as to prevent presumption, under Civ. Code, § 3440, that such transfer was fraudulent, is question of fact to be determined by trial court, and where trial court's finding is not without substantial support, its decision on such question is conclusive on appeal.

6. Assignments for benefit of creditors — 45—Transfer of property by insolvent debtor conclusively presumed fraudulent and void against nonconsenting creditors, where not accompanied by delivery and change of possession.

A trust agreement whereby insolvent debtors transferred property to trustee for benefit of particular creditors, is conclusively presumed fraudulent and therefor void as against nonconsenting creditors, under Civ. Code, § 3440, where there was no delivery and change of possession, and such property was not exempt from attachment under section 3431, at instance of a nonconsenting creditor.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by O. W. Jarvis against J. B. Webber, as Sheriff of Butte County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Archibald M. Johnson and A. A. DeLigne, both of San Francisco, and Duard F. Geis, of Willow, for appellant.

Bond & Deirup, of Chico, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The appellant brought an action against the respondent as sheriff of Butte county for the recovery of personal property seized under attachment and sold on execution. Judgment was entered for the defendant and the plaintiff has appealed.

The action in which the attachment was issued was brought by the Commercial Bank of Durham against W. A. D'Egilbert and the Western Rice Growers, Inc. It appears that D'Egilbert, the Western Rice Growers, Inc., and Western Warehouses, Inc., were associated in rice culture in Northern California in the year 1920, D'Egilbert owning a controlling interest in both corporations. On account of continuous rains, starting early in the fall of that year, they were unable to harvest their crops, and were in such financial difficulties that they were unable to pay their employees and their other creditors. D'Egilbert, his wife, and his associate corporations executed a document, purporting to be a bill of sale and a deed absolute, whereby a number of tracts of land and a large amount of personal property, including the property subsequently attached by the sheriff, were transferred to O. W. Jarvis, the appellant herein. This document, hereafter referred to as the deed, was dated January 24, 1921, and was acknowledged by the several grantors, their officers and agents on February 5 following. It was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Butte county, at the request of D'Egilbert, on February 19. At the same time there was executed another instrument, purporting to be a trust agreement, which was also dated January 24, 1921. It was never acknowledged, but bears the notation that on the 11th day of March it was "subscribed and sworn to" by D'Egilbert and the officers of the two corporations. In this instrument, hereafter referred to as the trust agreement, the parties named as grantors in the deed, D'Egilbert, the Western Rice Growers, Inc., and the Western Warehouses, Inc., are designated parties of the first part. Appellant, O. W. Jarvis, party of the second part, is designated and referred to as "the trustee." The "Sacramento-San Joaquin Bank and all other creditors of the parties of the first part, or either of them, who shall consent to the agreement" are the parties of the third part; but the instrument did not contain, nor was there at any time attached thereto, a list of the names of the creditors of the parties of the first part, their places of residence, the amount of their demands, or the amount or nature of any security therefor.

By this instrument the parties of the first part "grant, bargain, sell, convey, assign, transfer, deliver, and set over unto said O. W. Jarvis, the second party, * * * designated as said trustee, all the real property owned by them, or either of them, or in which they or either of them has any interest, and situated * * * in the state of California, and also all the personal property of every kind, nature, and description owned by them, or either of them, * * * wheresoever situated, except the household goods and furniture of said D'Egilbert." The holders of more than two-thirds of the issued capital stock of both corporations, parties of the first part, in writing attached to the instrument, approved and consented to the transfer. The evidence indicates that this instrument was delivered to Jarvis on the 7th or 8th day of February, 1921, but it was never recorded.

At the time of the execution and delivery of the deed and trust agreement, D'Egilbert and the Western Rice Growers, Inc., were indebted to the Commercial Bank of Durham in the sum of $2,500 and interest. The bank at no time assented to the trust agreement or to any assignment or transfer of the property. It brought the action heretofore referred to, and on the 16th day of February, three days before the deed to appellant was recorded, Webber, as sheriff, acting under a writ of attachment issued in the cause, attached personal property of the defendant which is the subject of the present controversy. Judgment in the action was entered in favor of the Commercial Bank of Durham against D'Egilbert and the Western Rice Growers, Inc., for the sum of $3,068.13. A writ of execution was thereupon issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff with instructions to sell all of the personal property held by him under the attachment, or a sufficient amount thereof to satisfy the execution and judgment. Three days before the sale, appellant Jarvis demanded of the sheriff possession of the property about to be sold, asserting a right to the possession thereof under the provisions of section 689 of the Civil Code, which provides that a present interest entitles the owner to the immediate possession of property. In the claim he alleged himself to be the owner of the attached personal property, and that he had deraigned title thereto through "an assignment and transfer of title to said personal property" on or subsequent to the 24th day of January, the date of the deed of trust agreement hereinbefore referred to, "accompanied by an immediate and continuous change of possession." Disregarding the claim of appellant, the sheriff sold the property at public auction for the sum of $2,824.90. After paying costs of sale, and a preferred laborer's claim amounting to $100, he paid the remainder of the amount received at the sale to the bank in partial satisfaction of its judgment. Thereafter Jarvis brought this action against the sheriff for the recovery of possession of the property sold, or the value thereof in case delivery could not be had.

The trial court found the facts we have heretofore set out, and, in addition thereto, that at the time of the execution of the so-called trust agreement D'Egilbert and the two corporations were insolvent, which fact was known to all of the parties to the transaction. It also found that, at the time of the execution and delivery of the instrument, D'Egilbert and the Western Rice Growers, Inc., were in the actual possession and control of the property, and the purported transfer was not accompanied with immediate or any delivery to Jarvis, and was not followed by an actual, or continued, or any change of possession. On these facts the court concluded that the purported transfer to Jarvis was an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and that, as to the Commercial Bank of Durham and the attaching sheriff, it was void and of no effect. It therefore held that the sheriff had not unlawfully converted the goods and chattels and rendered judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed, presenting for our determination two main questions: (1) Whether or not the deed and the trust agreement, upon which appellant relies as vesting title in him, constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors within the meaning of sections 3449-3473 of the Civil Code; (2) if the instruments did amount to an assignment, whether or not they were sufficient to vest title in appellant as against the attaching bank, notwithstanding the fact that they were not intended to, and did not, conform to the code sections. There is also presented the question whether or not immediate and continued change of possession was essential to the validity of appellant's claim of title as against the attaching creditor.

The appellant contends that the instrument denominated a trust agreement was not a statutory assignment for the benefit of creditors, and that the transfer to Jarvis was not therefore in violation of any of the provisions of the sections of the code relating to such transactions, supra, but that it was in fact a valid, nonstatutory transfer and assignment for the benefit of creditors generally, within one of the exceptions expressed in section 3440, supra, making immediate and continued change of possession of personal property unnecessary in such cases. It is his contention that the conveyance was for the purpose merely of conserving and protecting the interests of the grantors in their business and properties, and for that purpose it was intended to give to the Sacramento-San Joaquin Bank, and all their creditors who should assent to the transaction, the security of having the affairs of the grantors managed and controlled by a trustee, and to have the payment of their claims made or provided for to the satisfaction of the trustee, which being accomplished, the property should be returned to the grantors. It was not therefore, according to the appellant, the usual assignment to convert properties of the grantors into money and apply the same to the claims of creditors generally.

Respondent concedes that it was within the power of D'Egilbert and his associated corporations to execute to the bank, or to particular creditors, or to a trustee for particular creditors, a deed of trust or a mortgage to secure specific debts, even though thereby a preference might be given, and such mortgage or deed of trust could carry with it the right of possession, and that, on the other hand, it was in their power to execute an assignment for the benefit of creditors in the hope or expectation that all the creditors would join, which assignment would be valid as to all creditors who did join.

The exact nature of the transaction can only be determined by a definite understanding of the legal effect of the purported transfer to appellant. Consequently, an intelligent consideration of the questions presented cannot be had without a more or less extensive statement of the terms of the so-called trust agreement. The instrument recites that D'Egilbert has a controlling interest in the two corporations, who are his cograntors, and that the parties of the first part have carried on their business in such manner that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to separate their properties, liabilities, and obligations, by reason of which fact it would be for the benefit of all the parties of the first part to have their properties and obligations consolidated and handled as one business and property. Being in need of ready money, and deeming it for the best interests of themselves and their creditors and others interested in their affairs that their business and properties "be managed, directed, operated, and controlled by a trustee for the benefit of said parties of the first part, and for the benefit of all of their creditors," and desiring to transfer all their property to O. W. Jarvis, as trustee, for the purpose of having their property administered and disposed of "for the benefit of all the creditors of said parties of the first part," for and in consideration of the sum of $10 paid by the trustee, "and for other divers good and valuable consideration moving to said parties of the first part from said trustee, and from the creditors of said parties of the first part," D'Egilbert and the two corporations granted, bargained, sold, conveyed, assigned, transferred, delivered, and set over to Jarvis, as said trustee, all their property heretofore mentioned, "the intent and purpose" of the parties "being that said trustee, upon the execution and delivery of this instrument, shall have and be vested with the same right, title, and interest in all the real and personal property belonging to the parties of the first part, or either of them * * * (with the exceptions noted), including the right to operate and carry on the business of said parties of the first part, or either of them, and control and dispose of the property of the parties of the first part, or either of them, to the same extent and with the same full power that said parties of the first part, or either of them, had before the execution and delivery of this instrument; but in trust, nevertheless, for the following uses and purposes, that is to say": (Then follow some 25 declarations of powers granted to Jarvis, as trustee). The substance of these is that the trustee shall take, hold, manage, and deal with all of the property transferred to him in such manner as in his judgment shall be for the best interests, primarily, of the creditors of the parties of the first part, and, secondly, for the best interests of the parties of the first part, who granted to the trustee full and absolute power and authority to sell and transfer, pledge, mortgage, hypothecate, and exchange the property; to borrow money, to pay, satisfy, adjust, compromise, and discharge debts; to declare dividends out of the funds in his hands as trustee to the creditors of the parties of the first part, the distribution of the dividends so declared by said trustee to be made in the same manner as is provided by law to be made by a trustee in bankruptcy, had each of the parties of the first part been adjudged bankrupt on the date of the trust agreement; to receive and collect moneys, interest, rent, issues, and profits; to invest and reinvest the proceeds of the trust property, and generally to have and exercise all other and additional powers, some special, others general, "necessary to carry on the business of said parties of the first part, or any of them, fully and to the same extent as said parties of the first part, or any of them, would carry on the same, and and to do and perform all and every act and thing necessary to carry on said business."

The assignment and transfer to the trustee is made absolute and irrevocable, and there is conferred upon him full and absolute power and authority "to deal with any and all of the trust properties and assets of the trust estate as fully as if the trustee were the sole and exclusive owner thereof in his own right." There follows a provision that the trust "shall continue until all the claims and the entire indebtedness of the creditors of said parties of the first part for whose benefit this assignment is made shall have been fully paid, satisfied, and discharged." Upon request of the parties of the first part, and their delivering to the trustee a written request or consent of all persons who may be beneficiaries under it, or upon the parties of the first part depositing with the trustee the money to pay in full the obligations of their creditors, the trust shall terminate, upon which event the trustee shall convey the residue of the trust estate remaining in his hands to the parties of the first part. There are other provisions to the effect that the trustee shall not be under any personal liability by reason of the trust, providing what shall be done in the case of his resignation or death, and a final provision that all of the parties of the third part who shall consent to the trust in writing shall be entitled to an equal pro rata right, with all other creditors who consent to the trust in writing, in the benefits thereof. All claims of lien or preference in respect to the property of the trust, or in its benefits, are to be determined and governed upon the hypothesis that each of the parties of the first part had been adjudged a bankrupt on the date of the instrument.

[1] In order to determine the validity of a transaction purporting to be a statutory assignment for the benefit of the creditors of an assignor, we look to the provisions of the Civil Code, found in the title covering that subject. Watkins v. Wilhoit, 104 Cal. 395, 399, 38 P. 53. It is therein provided that an insolvent debtor may, in good faith, execute an assignment of property in trust for the satisfaction of his creditors (section 3449). Such assignment must conform to the provisions of the code sections. It must be in writing, must contain a list of the creditors of the assignor, their places of residence, the amount of their respective demands, and the amounts and nature of any security therefor. If the assignor is a resident of the state, the assignment must be made to the sheriff of the county wherein he resides, whose duty it is to forthwith take possession of all the property assigned to him, and keep the same until delivered by him to the assignee elected at a meeting of the creditors called for that purpose, by notice published and mailed by the sheriff. There is the further requirement (section 3458) that an assignment for the benefit of creditors must be acknowledged, approved, and certified in the mode prescribed by the chapter on recording transfers of real property, and must be recorded. Unless that be done, the assignment is void against every creditor of the assignor not assenting thereto (section 3459). The trust agreement in this case did not contain a list of the creditors of the grantors, it was not made to a sheriff, and it was not recorded. Considered, therefore, as a general statutory assignment for the benefit of the creditors of D'Egilbert and the two corporations, it was void against the Commercial Bank of Durham, which did not assent thereto. Wilhoit v. Lyons, 98 Cal. 409, 412, 33 P. 325; Garn v. Thorwaldson, 40 Cal. App. 62, 66, 180 P. 9, 11.

Certain transfers made by insolvent debtors are not affected by the provisions of the title of the Civil Code relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, and appellant contends that the transaction between his grantors and himself is within the exception. The sections of the code relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors were made part of the Civil Code of 1872. At the same time another section of the code was enacted, which has not been changed. It provides that a debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another (section 3432). Section 3451 of the code, found in the title relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, provided, as enacted in 1872, that the provisions of the title did not affect the power of a person, although insolvent, to transfer property to a particular creditor for the purpose of paying or securing the whole or a part of a debt owing to such creditor, whether in his own right or otherwise. The section bearing on the subject attempted no definition of assignments for the benefit of creditors, and the earlier decisions of the court were not always clear on the question. Matters stood in this situation when the case of Sabichi v. Chase, 108 Cal. 81, 41 P. 29, was decided. The court there said (page 86 [41 P. 30]) that there are qualities which, when appearing in an instrument of transfer, characterize it as among those required to conform to the statute, or else be treated as void as to creditors. It was contended in that case that a conveyance of property to trustees to be disposed of, converted into money, and distributed ratably among 10 designated creditors, was in the nature of a mortgage to secure the debts of certain creditors. The court held the transaction amounted to an assignment for the benefit of creditors. It said:

"The distinction between such an instrument and an assignment for the benefit of creditors has been thus stated: 'If the conveyance is to a trustee, and the debtor intends to divest himself, not only of the title to the property, but of all control over it; if it is intended as an absolute conveyance of all of his property, and is made for the purpose of securing a distribution of its proceeds among his creditors, or a portion of them, in legal effect it is an assignment for the benefit of creditors, no matter what name or designation the parties may have given it. On the other hand, if the intention of the debtor is merely to secure his debt to one or more of his creditors, and the conveyance is not intended as an absolute disposition of his property, but he reserves to himself a right therein, the conveyance will be treated as a mortgage, even though the debtor is insolvent at the time and it covers all his property and but a portion of his debts are secured by it.' Cadwell's Bank v. Crittenden, 66 Iowa, 240, 241. And this seems to be a fair statement of the result of the authorities upon this much-vexed question, though great diversity is found in the adjudged cases, due largely to the differences which obtain in the statutes of the several states which have sought to regulate or suppress the evils supposed to arise from the unrestricted right to make preferential assignments allowed by the common law. (See May v. Tenney, 148 U. S. 64.) 'The material and essential characteristic of a general assignment is the presence of a trust' (Brown v. Guthrie, 110 N. Y. 441; Burrill on Assignments, § 3); and while it cannot be said that every transfer of property to trustees for the benefit of creditors is an assignment within the statute (Lawrence v. Neff, 41 Cal. 566; Handley v. Pfister, 39 Cal. 283; 2 Am. Rep. 449; Priest v. Brown, 100 Cal. 626), yet, when a continuing trust is created presenting the features prominent in this case, we think it must be held that the transfer is such an assignment as the Legislature designed to regulate by the provisions of the code (Civ. Code, §§ 3449-73); if not, then those provisions would as well be repealed.

"It has been several times assumed in this court that such a trust indicates an assignment of that nature. Dana v. Stanford, 10 Cal. 269; Wellington v. Sedgwick, 12 Cal. 469; Saunderson v. Broadwell, 82 Cal. 132, 133. The provision that a surplus of proceeds remaining after satisfaction of the claims of the creditors named should be returned to the grantors does not, as supposed by appellants, distinguish the contract as one of security only. Hall v. Denison, 17 Vt. 318; Lochte v. Blum, Tex. Civ. App., April 10, 1895; 30 S. W. Rep. 925. The reservation of an interest in the possible surplus—not in the property itself—marks the transaction more clearly as an assignment for the benefit of creditors." Kenefick v. Perry, 61 N. H. 364.

See, also, 3 Cal. Jur. pp. 313, 314.

The court also held in the case (Sabichi v. Chase, supra, at page 85 [41 P. 29]) that the provision of the section of the code (supra), allowing a debtor to pay one creditor in preference to another, or to give one creditor security in payment of his demand in preference to another must be construed in connection with the other provision (supra), that an assignment for the benefit of creditors is void as against any creditor of the assignor not consenting thereto, if it gives a preference of one debt or class of debts over another, and that the law must be construed as virtually saying to the debtor that he may give a preference by paying or securing a creditor, but such preferred payment or security must not take the form of an assignment for the benefit of creditors. The result of the decision in Sabichi v. Chase was to cast some doubt on the correctness of the rule laid down in the earlier cases cited by the court in the opinion relative to transfers for the purpose of paying or securing a particular creditor. Code Commissioner's note. In 1903 this court decided the case of Heath v. Wilson, reported in 139 Cal. at page 362, 73 P. 182. In that case a deed, absolute in form, was executed by the debtor. Contemporaneously with the execution of the deed, the grantor and grantee verbally agreed that the property thereby conveyed should be held in trust for certain uses and purposes, which were subsequently set forth in an instrument of even date with the deed. The purposes of the trust were in many material respects similar to those of the case at bar. It was attempted there, as here, to apply the rule laid down in Sabichi v. Chase, supra. The court again reviewed the earlier decisions, and decided (page 366 [73 P. 184]) that sections 3432 and 3451 of the Civil Code expressly authorized a conveyance for the purpose of paying or securing certain creditors, and that such transfer was not invalid because it did not conform to the provision of the code relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors generally.

While the case of Heath v. Wilson was pending, in fact only a few weeks before the decision was handed down, section 3440 of the Civil Code, providing that certain transfers of personal property are conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, was amended (Stats. 1903, p. 111) to provide that the provisions of the section should not apply or extend to any transfer or assignment made for the benefit of creditors generally. In 1905 (St. 1905, p. 622), section 3451 of the code was amended by providing that the provisions of the title relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors do not affect the power of a person, although insolvent, to transfer property in good faith to a particular creditor, or creditors, or to some other person or persons in trust for the purpose of paying or securing the whole or part of a debt owing to such creditor or creditors. Under a more recent amendment (Stats. 1917, p. 255), the provisions of section 3440, supra, relating to fraudulent transfers, are declared not to apply or extend to any transfer or assignment, "statutory or otherwise," made for the benefit of creditors generally.

[2, 3] We think it must be conceded, therefore, that two kinds of transfers or assignments for the benefit of creditors generally are recognized in the code sections we have enumerated. One is the statutory assignment for the benefit of creditors, enabling an insolvent debtor, through his assignee, to provide for the immediate conversion of the assigned property, or the disposal thereof, and the distribution of the proceeds ratably among the creditors. Civ. Code, § 3449 et seq. If the debtor adopts this method of satisfying his creditors, it matters not whether the creditors give their consent to the transfer. If the provisions of the code are complied with, the assignment is binding on consenting and nonconsenting creditors alike. The other form of transfer is one which, while containing certain characteristics of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, is, in effect, only a conveyance in trust by way of paying or securing certain obligations of the debtor. These transfers are not invalid because they do not conform to the provisions of the sections of the code relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors. Civ. Code, §§ 3432 and 3451; Heath v. Wilson, supra. If made for the benefit of creditors generally, such conveyances are protected in their operation as to delivery, and continued change of possession of the property transferred, by the exception contained in section 3440 of the code as amended. But in the present case we are unable to agree with appellant that the transaction whereby D'Egilbert and his allied corporations transferred the property to Jarvis resulted in an assignment for the benefit of creditors generally. By its terms, it inures only to the benefit of one named creditor of the grantors, "and all other creditors * * * who shall consent to the agreement," the final provision being that the creditors "who shall consent to the trust in writing shall be entitled to an equal pro rata right, with all other creditors who consent to the trust in writing, in the benefits thereof."

[4] A nonconsenting creditor is not bound by such a transfer, and his consent thereto cannot be compelled by any act of the debtors, the trustee, or the other creditors. In order, therefore, that an attempted transfer by a debtor, for the purpose of paying or securing one or more creditors—which does not amount to an assignment for creditors generally—may be made effective as against nonconsenting creditors, the conveyance must be executed with due regard to the general principles of law applicable to such transactions. We are unable to construe the transfer in this case as an assignment for the benefit of creditors generally. It was, therefore, not within the exception provided by section 3440, supra. The question whether or not delivery and change of possession attended the transaction thus becomes a material consideration in the case.

[5, 6] The trial court found that the deed and trust agreement were executed at a time when D'Egilbert and the Western Rice Growers, Inc., were in possession and control of the property, and that the transfer was not accompanied by an immediate, or any, delivery to the appellant, and was not followed by an actual and continued change of possession. Appellant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding. The testimony tending to support it, he contends, was "too insubstantial, indirect, and immaterial to amount to a contradiction of the main facts established by direct and positive testimony." But, whether, under the tests necessary to determine the issue, there was a delivery and change of possession was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court upon a consideration of all the evidence in the case. Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 P. 800. Its decision upon that, as upon the other issues of fact, is conclusive on this court on appeal, for, reading the evidence in the light and with the inferences most favorable to the conclusion reached below, we cannot say that the finding is without substantial support in the record. It follows that the attempted transfer of the personal property to appellant in this case was conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, and therefore void against nonconsenting creditors. Civ. Code, § 3440. There was, therefore, nothing in the transaction which militated against the attachment levied by the Commercial Bank of Durham (Civ. Code, § 3431), or which prevented the respondent sheriff from selling the attached property under the execution placed in his hands.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re BROWN'S ESTATE.

BROWN et al. v. RILEY, State Controller, et al.

(S. F. 10518.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 2, 1925.
Rehearing Denied June 1, 1925.)

1. Taxation ⚡904—Method to be pursued, when order fixing inheritance tax is attacked, stated.

Where any attack is made on an original order fixing inheritance tax, the complaining party must pursue either of alternative remedies specified in Inheritance Tax Acts of 1917 and 1921, § 11, subd. 3, for the modification or reversal of such order, within time specified for either remedy, but where the order is not questioned and it is merely sought to recover an amount erroneously paid, arising from error or inadvertence in paying under original order fixing tax, remedy is found in subdivision 4.

2. Taxation ⚡904—Statute referring to recovery of taxes erroneously paid refers to inheritance tax in general.

The term "said taxes" in Inheritance Tax Acts of 1917 and 1921, § 11, subd. 4, providing for recovery of tax erroneously paid, does not refer to excessive tax mentioned in section 11, subd. 3, but to inheritance tax in general as provided for in section 2.

3. Taxation ⚡904—Modification or reversal of original order fixing tax prerequisite to refund of amount alleged to have been erroneously paid.

One seeking refund of inheritance tax, alleged to have been erroneously paid, has not the alternative remedy of either applying for modification or reversal of order fixing tax, under Inheritance Tax Acts 1917 and 1921, § 11, subd. 3, or applying for amount erroneously paid, directly under section 11, subd. 4, but in view of section 18, to be entitled to refund, original order alleged to be erroneous must be modified or reversed, either by superior court having jurisdiction or on appeal, and section 11, subd. 4, is not within exceptions contemplated by section 18.

4. Taxation ⚡904—Application for refund of tax held to constitute an attack on validity of original order calling for adjudication of amount of tax fixed therein.

An application for refund of inheritance tax, alleging that order fixing tax was erroneous and illegal, and that payment of taxes was illegally exacted, and together with prayer for order requiring refund and "for such other relief as court may deem proper in the premises" held to constitute an attack on validity of original order calling for an adjudication of amount of tax fixed therein rather than an application for refund of amount "erroneously paid," thus bringing case exclusively within Inheritance Tax Acts 1917 and 1921, § 11, subd. 3, instead of section 11, subd. 4.

5. Taxation ⚡886½—Separate transfers cannot be joined into one but each entitled to separate exemption fixed by statute in force when transfer made and taxable at rate prescribed therein.

Transfers of property in 1909 and 1910, each being separate, distinct, and complete transaction, should be treated as independent transfer entitled to exemption fixed by statute in force when it was made, and taxable at rate prescribed therein, especially as both are governed by Inheritance Tax Act of 1905, and act of appraiser in joining such transfers into a single transfer and allowing but single exemption was erroneous.

6. Taxation ⚡886½—Transfer made prior to 1917 act cannot be joined with one made subsequent to such act for purpose of determining tax.

Inheritance Tax Act 1917, permitting joining of independent vested transfers, applies only when all of such transfers were made after act became effective, and does not permit the joining of transfers made in 1909 and 1910, to one made in 1920, for purpose of determining tax thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Application by Matilda E. Brown and others against Ray L. Riley, State Comptroller, and another, for refund of portion of inheritance tax paid by the estate of Matilda Brown, also known as Mathilda Brown and as Mathilda A. Brown, deceased. From a judgment denying application, applicants appeal. Reversed with directions.

Delger Trowbridge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. C. Lucas and W. H. H. Gentry, both of San Francisco (Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The appellants herein have taken an appeal from a judgment based on an order sustaining the demurrer of respondents without leave to amend. Appellants filed a petition in the superior court for a refund of a portion of an inheritance tax paid by the estate of Matilda Brown, deceased, also known as Mathilda Brown and as Mathilda A. Brown. On June 1, 1909, the deceased made a deed of gift of an undivided one-fourth interest in two pieces of property, the Broadway property and the Fourteenth street property in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, to her children, Matilda E. Brown, Annie F. Brown, David E. Brown, Everett J. Brown, and Elsie G. Hardin, the appellants herein, reserving in herself a life estate in these properties. On March 15, 1910, she executed another deed of gift to the same children, which deed of gift conveyed to them an additional one-twelfth interest in both pieces of property, again reserving a life estate in herself. Immediately afterwards the children conveyed back to decedent an undivided one-third interest in the Fourteenth street property. This left them with an undivided one-third remainder interest in the Broadway property. On April 16, 1920, decedent died intestate, leaving as her estate the one-third interest in the Fourteenth street property, and certain other property, both real and personal. The inheritance tax appraiser, in fixing the tax on this estate, found that on June 1, 1909, and March 15, 1910, decedent deeded to her children an undivided one-third interest in the Broadway property, with the intent that these transfers should not take effect in possession or enjoyment until her death. The two transfers of June 1, 1909, and March 15, 1910, and the transfer of all the property in her estate by intestacy were treated as one transfer, and only one exemption to each of the five children, appellants herein, was allowed on the two transfers inter vivos and the transfer by succession. The following shows the method of computation:

"Matilda E. Brown (adult daughter).
One-fifth prop-	erty deeded..	$66,666 66	$ 4,000 00 exempt.
			21,000 00 at 1%
			25,000 00 at 1½%
			16,666 66 at 2%
			66,666 66
One-fifth estate	9,842 77	9,842 77 at 4%
			$1,312 04
Less one per cent additional $6,000 exemption under 1905 [should be 1917] act.....
			$1,252 04"

The inheritance tax was formally fixed by the inheritance tax appraiser and his report was duly made and filed on April 13, 1921. Notice was given by posting and mailing in the manner required by law, and thereafter, on April 22, 1921, the order of the court was made approving the report of the inheritance tax appraiser as filed. It is claimed by appellants that the order of the court approving the report was inadvertently made nine days after the posting and mailing of notice instead of ten days thereafter as required by the statute, but they "make no point of that on this appeal."

On April 22, 1922, the application for a refund was made to the superior court. A demurrer thereto was interposed on May 12, 1922. On October 31, 1922, the application was amended in certain particulars and it was stipulated on November 13, 1922, that the said demurrer may stand as a demurrer to the amended application. The demurrer was sustained on each cause of action on November 21, 1922, with leave to amend within five days, to which the appellants noted an exception and declared in open court their refusal to amend; the court thereupon ordered the demurrer sustained without leave to amend. Judgment denying the application for refund was made on November 21, filed on November 22, and entered on November 27, 1922. Appellants' notice of appeal was filed December 9, 1922.

The application was demurred to on the ground that where an inheritance tax is paid in pursuance of an order of the superior court having jurisdiction fixing such tax, the court has no jurisdiction of an application for refund of any part of said tax, unless and until said order is modified or reversed by the superior court having jurisdiction, or on an appeal taken therefrom. This ground, it has been insisted by respondents, is determinative of the appeal.

Appellants' position is, "First, that all three of the transfers in this case should have been treated as three independent transfers, each of which should have been allowed separate exemptions and should have been taxed at the primary rates; and, secondly, that even if the proposition just stated is not true that, in any event, to tax the transfers of 1909 and 1910 as one transfer would result in an unconstitutional impairment of vested rights fully created in 1909 and 1910, so as to be beyond the reach of the amendment of 1917." Thirdly, " * * * that they were entitled to make this application under section 11, subd. 4, of the Inheritance Tax Acts of 1917 and 1921 * * * " as "it is clear that this provision of the statute is applicable to this case, because subdivision 3 of section 11 of the same acts gives relief to the heirs where the order fixing the inheritance tax is modified or reversed by the superior court or is modified or reversed on appeal. This being so, the following section (subdivision 4) must be applicable to a case where there has been no attempt made to have the order fixing the inheritance tax modified or reversed either by the trial court or on appeal." Or, as stated, " * * * that subdivision 4 is intended to cover all cases where there is some error in the order fixing the inheritance tax pertaining to matters other than the subsequent or erroneous allowance of debts, which other matters have not been litigated in the superior court or on appeal; in other words that this subdivision allows a review of any erroneous order fixing a tax that was made without any objection or contest. * * * " Their position, with regard to the necessity of having the order modified, is that " * * * under subdivision 4 of section 11 of our act * * * it is absolutely unnecessary, because of the sweeping terms in which the right to relief is given, to modify the order before ordering a refund of money paid under it."

After reiterating their contention that where an inheritance tax is paid in pursuance of an order of the superior court having jurisdiction, there can be no refund of said tax or of any portion thereof, unless and until said order has been modified or reversed by the superior court having jurisdiction, or on an appeal taken therefrom, as provided in subdivision 3 of section 11, respondents proceed to set forth their interpretation of subdivision 4 of said section as follows:

" * * * It seems to us that the only reasonable interpretation of the act is to hold that subdivision 3 provides for a refund of money paid in pursuance of a judgment, and subdivision 4 provides for a refund of any amount 'erroneously paid' and that no amount is 'erroneously paid' if paid in accordance with the judgment fixing the tax. * * * "

Respondents' construction of subdivision 4 is again set forth as follows:

"It seems to us that the only construction to be placed on said subdivision 4 to make it harmonize with subdivision 3, is to hold that it refers to errors of the taxpayer and not to errors of the court. Correction of errors of the court is covered by subdivision 3. Errors of the party are covered by subdivision 4.

Amounts 'erroneously paid' are amounts paid in excess of the amount fixed by the order. Instances of such payments were mentioned in our original brief herein. There may be others. These would be covered by said subdivision 4."

"(3) If, after the payment of any tax in pursuance of an order fixing such tax, made by the superior court having jurisdiction, such order be modified or reversed by the superior court having jurisdiction within two years from and after the date of entry of the order fixing the tax, or be modified or reversed at any time on an appeal taken therefrom within the time allowed by law on due notice to the state controller, the county treasurer shall refund to the executor, administrator, trustee, person or persons by whom such tax was paid, the amount of any moneys paid or deposited on account of such tax in excess of the amount of tax fixed by the order modified or reversed, out of any inheritance tax moneys in his hands or custody, and credit himself with the same in the account required to be rendered by him to the controller on his semiannual settlement; but no application for such refund shall be made after one year from such reversal or modification, unless an appeal shall be taken therefrom, in which case no such application shall be made after one year from the final determination on such appeal or of an appeal taken therefrom, and the representatives of the estate, legatees, devisees or distributees entitled to any refund under this section shall not be entitled to any interest upon such refund, and the state controller shall deduct from the fees allowed by this act to the county treasurer the amount theretofore allowed him upon such overpayment.

"(4) When any amount of said tax shall have been erroneously paid, the superior court having jurisdiction, on application after notice to the state controller, and on satisfactory proof to it, shall by order require the county treasurer to refund and pay to the executor, administrator, trustee, person or persons who had paid any such tax in error the amount of such tax so erroneously paid; provided, that all applications for such repayment of such tax so erroneously paid shall be made within one year of the date of the entry of the order fixing tax or of the decree of final distribution of the estate. Such refund shall be made by said treasurer out of any inheritance tax moneys in his hands or custody and he shall credit himself with the same in the account required to be rendered by him to the controller on semiannual settlement; and the state controller shall deduct from the fees allowed by this act to the county treasurer the amount theretofore allowed him upon such erroneous payment."

It is plain to us that the purpose of subdivision 3 is to provide for a modification or reversal of the original order by the superior court or on appeal and to require a refund, when so modified or reversed, by the county treasurer on an order of the superior court.

The party complaining has, under subdivision 3, an alternative remedy, one by appeal from the original order and the other by application to the superior court for a modification or reversal thereof. A party may take an appeal from the original order in the manner and within the time prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure (part 2, tit. 13, c. 1, §§ 939-959), without applying to the superior court for a modification or reversal of the original order, or apply to the superior court for a modification or reversal thereof without taking an appeal; the court having continuing jurisdiction for two years after the making of the original order within which, either on its own motion or on the application of the complaining party, to modify or reverse it. With regard to the latter remedy, the subdivision does not provide, in terms, that a party complaining may apply to the superior court for a modification or reversal of the original order but, as that court is given power to modify or reverse within two years, it would follow that the party complaining would have the right to invoke its action. But an application for an order of refund, directed to the county treasurer, must be made to the superior court within one year after the original order has been modified or reversed, unless an appeal is taken from such modified or reversed order, in which event the application for the order of refund must be made within one year after the determination of the appeal. When such order of refund is obtained within the period named, upon the presentation thereof the county treasurer shall refund the excessive amount. It will be observed that the subdivision does not expressly provide that the application must be made by the party aggrieved nor that an application for an order of refund shall be made to the superior court, but it is not likely the Legislature intended that the county treasurer should make the repayment without a judicial order. The requirement of such an order is expressly provided for in subdivision 4.

Subdivision 4, on the other hand, is concerned solely with the repayment of amounts of tax "erroneously paid" in all cases where an adjudication is not necessary to determine the amount excessively paid. Subdivision 3, however, as stated above, requires an adjudication that the order fixing the tax was excessive in amount, and then prescribes an exclusive mode for the recovery thereof. In other words, where the original order is modified or reversed the repayment also is made under that subdivision—3; all other repayments are made under subdivision 4. But the remedy prescribed in subdivision 4 is not predicated upon an adjudication that there has been an overpayment; it extends to all those cases where no complaint is made of the original order fixing the tax but due to some error or inadvert-ence in giving effect to it a sum was "erroneously paid." Under this subdivision application for an order, directed to the county treasurer, for the repayment of the excessive amount must be made to the court within one year of the date of the entry of the original order fixing the tax or of the decree of final distribution of the estate.

[1] From the foregoing discussion of these two subdivisions their scope may be thus briefly summarized: Where any attack is made on the original order fixing the tax the complaining party must pursue either of the two alternative remedies specified in subdivision 3 for the modification or reversal thereof within the time prescribed for either remedy. But, where the order fixing the tax is not questioned, and it is merely sought to recover an amount "erroneously paid" arising from an error or inadvertence in paying under the original order fixing tax, then the remedy is found in subdivision 4.

[2] This subdivision (4) in the opening sentence refers to "said tax" and it has been suggested that this term connotes the excessive tax mentioned in subdivision 3. In view of the variant statutes of limitations the phrase is not susceptible of such a construction. Moreover, the "said tax" would more consistently refer to the inheritance tax in general as provided for in section 2 of the act.

[3] In view of the language of subdivisions 3 and 4 we are unable to accept the reasoning of the appellants that it is not necessary to have the original order alleged to be erroneous modified or reversed in order to effect a refund—that is to say, recourse may be had to subdivision 4 for a refund due to any error in the amount fixed in the original order without having the said order otherwise modified or reversed; that it is optional with the aggrieved party to ask for a refund of the amount "erroneously paid" either by applying for a modification or reversal of the order under subdivision 3 or by applying for the amount "erroneously paid" directly under subdivision 4.

If meaning is to be given to section 18 of the act (Stats. 1917, p. 900; Stats. 1921, p. 1520), which provides that an order fixing tax is to have the effect of a judgment in a civil action it would follow that if any such order has fixed an erroneous amount it would have to be in some manner modified or reversed before a refund of any portion of the tax paid thereunder could be accomplished, for the order otherwise would have the effect of a final judgment in a civil action. Appellants have offered no suggestion as to what disposition would be made of the unmodified or unreversed order, which has ripened into a final judgment. It is conceded by appellants that where the original order is to be modified or reversed, it must be done under subdivision 3, contending, however, that:

" * * * Under subdivision 4 of section 11 of our act * * * it is absolutely unnecessary, because of the sweeping terms in which the right to relief is given, to modify the order before ordering a refund of money paid under it."

Subdivision 4 does not provide for an adjudication of the amount of the tax fixed in the original order in any case; and to allow a refund thereunder where it is claimed the order fixed an erroneous amount would, in effect, be a modification or reversal of such order—a function assigned in plain terms to subdivision 3. Subdivision 4, as already stated, looks solely to the repayment of amounts "erroneously paid" under a valid order, but the order itself is not open to attack on the ground it fixed an erroneous amount. It should be kept in mind that subdivision 4 repeatedly refers to amounts "erroneously paid"—thus indicating an amount was "erroneously paid" and not that the determination of the amount was erroneous.

Nor do we think the Legislature intended to give a complaining party an election of remedies where the amount of the original order fixing tax is alleged to be erroneous—the election of proceeding either under subdivision 3 or subdivision 4. If that had been the intention of the Legislature, each subdivision would have fixed an identical statutory limit within which application should be made to the court for the order on the county treasurer directing the "refund" provided for in subdivision 3, or the repayment of the amount "erroneously paid" in subdivision 4. On the contrary, as we have shown, the time within which the application must be made is not the same in each subdivision.

There is no merit in the contention that subdivision 4 is one of those exceptions contemplated by the phrase "except as otherwise herein provided" in section 18 of the act, and that therefore it provides a mode of review of the original order without a modification or reversal thereof or appeal therefrom. As we have shown, subdivision 4 applies only to those cases where the order fixing the amount of the tax is not questioned. Subdivision 3 provides for a modification or reversal of the order by the superior court or on appeal, while subdivision 4 does not, as already indicated, provide for an adjudication of the amount of the order. It follows that as the respective subdivisions cover different situations they cannot be held to provide alternative remedies.

Appellants have cited authority to the effect that it is not necessary to take an appeal from the original order to secure a refund, but that this may be accomplished by an alternative remedy. It is true, as we have shown, that under our statute where the refund is sought on the ground that the order fixing tax has prescribed an excessive amount the party need not appeal therefrom, but may obtain the refund by having the original order modified or reversed by the superior court. But this alternative remedy, as we have said, is peculiar to subdivision 3 and is in no way contemplated by subdivision 4.

As stated, appellants have claimed and now claim they are entitled to a refund under subdivision 4 without securing a modification or reversal of the original order under subdivision 3. It was upon this question that the demurrer was sustained. But, it is apparent from the foregoing interpretations of the respective subdivisions that if appellants are entitled to relief it is not under subdivision 4; such relief, if at all, can only be granted under subdivision 3.

It was suggested by the court during the oral argument whether, if the facts set up in the application for refund were sufficient, it might be considered as an application under subdivision 3 for modification or reversal by the superior court of the original order fixing the tax rather than an application for relief under subdivision 4.

The brief of appellants, filed after oral argument, contains the following statement:

"On leaving this subject of modification it may be well to say that we concur with respondents' argument * * * that we cannot now move to modify the original order because of the passage of the two-year period mentioned in subdivision 3 of section 11, although we deny there is any necessity under subdivision 4 for modifying the original order. * * *"

Following the conventional allegations the application alleges that:

"Said inheritance tax report, the order fixing said inheritance tax report, and each of them was and is erroneous and illegal, and the payment of said inheritance taxes as alleged * * * was erroneously and illegally exacted. * * *

"That as a result of said erroneous and illegal inheritance tax report and decree fixing said inheritance tax as aforesaid your petitioners * * * were erroneously and illegally compelled to pay inheritance taxes as aforesaid. * * *

"Wherefore, said petitioners * * * pray for an order of said court requiring said county treasurer to refund and repay to each of said petitioners, * * * and for such other relief as to the court may seem proper in the premises." (Italics ours.)

[4] We think the application is sufficient to constitute an attack on the validity of the original order calling for an adjudication of the amount of tax fixed therein, rather than an application for refund of an amount "erroneously paid," thus bringing the case exclusively within subdivision 3 instead of subdivision 4. The demurrer went to this point. This being so, should not the application be determined under subdivision 3?

We quote with approval what was held in Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 88, 193 P. 84, 87:

"It is not essential that a complaint state a cause of action for the relief which plaintiff seeks, provided the facts stated show some right of recovery, and a party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have mis-conceived the form of relief to which he is entitled. * * *

Respondents' position is thus stated :

"If we grant that the petition states facts sufficient to warrant relief under said subdivision 3, we are confronted with the fact that said petition also shows that the tax, as fixed, has been paid. Therefore, in order to entitle appellants to a refund, the order must be modified 'within two years.' It is not enough that the petition be filed or the motion made within two years, but the order of modification must, under the wording of said subdivision 3, be made within two years. The two years have elapsed and the order has not been made. We take it, that even if this court should hold that the superior court should have overruled the demurrer and modified the order fixing the tax, in spite of the fact that appellants did not ask it to do so, that the judgment of the superior court will not now be reversed when it appears that appellants are not now entitled to said modification, the two years having elapsed, and that the superior court would not now have the right to make such a modification."

In the face of the record facts the contention of respondents cannot be maintained. It has been shown that the original order was made on April 22, 1921. The application for refund was filed April 22, 1922. The demurrer was interposed on May 12, 1922, and sustained November 21, 1922, and the notice of appeal from said order and the judgment based thereon was filed December 9, 1922, less than 20 months after the original order was made. In view of the fact that the jurisdiction of the superior court was suspended by the filing of the notice of appeal during the two-year period mentioned in subdivision 3, it is not necessary to decide whether the running of the statute would date from the filing of the application or from the taking of the appeal. Having concluded that the application of appellants may be determined under subdivision 3, we are brought to consider whether the original order fixed an erroneous amount of tax.

We have already stated the contention of appellants that the method of computation employed by the inheritance tax appraiser in the instant case is illegal and erroneous, as being contrary to the holding in the second decision in Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 P. 826, handed down after the filing of the appraiser's report herein. That case involved the question of the rates of computation of inheritance tax upon the valuation of property given at the death of decedent and that given prior to her death, respectively. In the first decision the court held that the rates in force at the time of the transfer are controlling, but that, as a transfer made in contemplation of death is only taxable in aid of a succession tax, the Legislature has power to consider, in fixing the rate of taxation upon the property passing at the time of death, all property which has theretofore passed to the legatee by gift in contemplation of death, and the fact that it has no power to increase the amount of tax upon the property already vested in the legatee in no way bears upon the power to consider that element in fixing the tax to be paid by the legatee for property transferred at death. In the decision upon rehearing upon the order was reversed, the court holding that the value of the parcel of property transferred by the gift and the value of the parcel transferred at death cannot be combined for the purpose of ascertaining the rate chargeable upon the property left to the child at the death of the parent, but the rate is to be calculated and the exemption allowed solely upon the value of the property vesting in the child at such time, without adding the value of the previous gift. It is to be noted that the act of 1917, in which transfers made before and after the taking effect of that act are to be combined in one taxable entity, was not involved in the Estate of Potter, supra, for the reason that it was not in force in 1916, the date of the death of the parent. Respondents point out there is "nothing in the final opinion in said matter [Estate of Potter] inconsistent with the order of the court fixing the tax in the instant case, under the changed facts, Mrs. Brown having died after the taking effect of the 1917 act." The final majority decision declares, concerning the 1917 act:

"Likewise it is clear that the language does not indicate an intent to declare that for the purpose of taxing the property received at the death of Mrs. Potter in 1916 it shall be raised into the class above $500,000 in value in order to tax it at 12 per cent. on the whole thereof. The only statute which purports to authorize such a combination of values for computing the tax is the act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 880). Section 2 of that act declares that when, 'either before or after the passage of this act' more than one transfer has been made by a decedent to one person, the tax shall be imposed upon the aggregate market value of all such transfers as if the property had passed by one transfer. (Subd. 9.) This act cannot be given a retroactive effect upon transfers vested in 1916, so as to increase the tax thereon. Any attempt to do so would, of course, be void."

[5] In Estate of Potter, supra, each of the transfers involved was governed by a different act, and the court was concerned primarily with the question of whether or not the amendment of the 1917 act was retroactive, so as to allow a combining or lumping of an antecedent transfer with one occurring at the death of the grantor for the purpose of determining the tax on the transfer resulting from the death of the grantor—that is to say, considering both transfers as a single taxable entity with one exemption. Nevertheless, the court expressed the view that in so far as transfers of property were amenable to an inheritance tax, each was to be treated as a separate and distinct transaction, the taxpayer being entitled to a separate exemption on each transfer and subject to the primary rate prescribed by the act in force at the time such transfer was made. This view is not, expressly or impliedly, restricted to transfers occurring under different acts, but is broad enough to extend to all transfers whether governed by the same or different acts, there being no provision for the joining of the several transfers into one taxable entity. It follows that the inheritance tax appraiser in computing the tax in the instant case had erroneously joined the transfers of 1909 and 1910 into a single transfer and allowed but a single exemption. Each of said transfers being a separate, distinct, and completed transaction should have been treated in line with the reasoning of Estate of Potter, supra, as an independent transfer entitled to the exemption fixed by the statute in force when it was made and taxable at the rate prescribed therein—this, in view of the fact that both of such transfers are governed by the same Inheritance Tax Act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341).

[6] Now, with regard to the transfer which vested on the death of the decedent in 1920 after the amendment of 1917, which provided for the first time for a joining of several independent transfers: By adding the amount of the transfers of 1909 and 1910 to that of 1920 a total of over $75,000 to each heir was arrived at, thereby fixing a higher rate on the last transfer.

In our opinion the amendment of 1917 permits a joining of independent vested transfers only where all of such transfers were made after it became effective. We have seen that the rate of taxation on the transfers of 1909 and 1910 cannot be increased by a statute passed subsequent to such transfers. To hold that those transfers could be joined to that of 1920 for the purpose of determining the rate on the latter would, in effect, be to impute to the Legislature an intention to do indirectly what could not be done directly. The illustration was given in Estate of Potter supra, that where a decedent having two children made a gift to one of them in advance of death, dividing at death the remainder of his estate equally between them, the tax imposed on the one receiving the gift would approximately be three times as large as that on the other. The opinion continues:

"This would seem to put the Legislature in the position of attempting to do indirectly what it could not do directly; that is, to increase the burden of his tax on his share of the estate and discriminate between him and his brother in that respect, solely upon the ground that he had received a prior gift taxed at a lower rate, which the state was unable to increase by the subsequent statute. A construction imputing to the state a design so indicative of resentment or regret should not be adopted. Such meaning, if intended by the Legislature, should be clearly expressed in the statute."

Respondents point out that in Estate of Potter, supra, the respective transfers were made under different acts, and that, had they been made under one act as the transfers of 1909 and 1910 in this case, the court would have been disposed to allow them to be joined. In support thereof they quote as follows:

"A comparison of the respective sections of the acts of 1905 and 1913 on this subject shows that while each act provides for an appraisal of all property subject to tax, including that passing by a prior gift as well as that passing at death, and perhaps the imposition of the tax on the whole thereof passing to the same person at the tax rates fixed by the respective acts, the language in which these provisions are expressed is not by any means the same in the two cases."

If it be conceded that the language we have italicized was intended as a qualification of the rule laid down, it would be obiter dicta for the reason that Estate of Potter, supra, did not involve two transfers under the same act; and, moreover, it would be opposed to the holding that no transfer can be joined to another to increase the rate on either, unless a statute is in existence at the time each transfer is made authorizing such a joinder.

The question of prior transfers made under the same act was not, of course, involved in Estate of Potter, supra, and hence the decision contains no definite statement that the rule would be the same as when prior transfers come under different acts; but, nevertheless, the decision indicates that the holding would have been no different if the transfers had been made under the same act. We think no other conclusion could have been adopted.

And as the transfers of 1909 and 1910 may not be joined in determining the tax thereon, notwithstanding the 1920 transfer was subsequent to the amendment of 1917 providing for joining transfers, those of 1909 and 1910 cannot be availed of to increase the rate on the later transfer, because that would be doing indirectly what could not be done directly.

Finally, as each of the three transfers herein involved must be treated as a separate and independent transfer taxable at the rate fixed by the act in force when each was made, allowing the exemptions provided for in each act, the order and decree appealed from are reversed, with directions to the superior court to overrule the demurrer and take such further proceedings as are in accordance with the views herein expressed.

DAVIS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5140.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 11, 1925.)

1. Prohibition ☞9—Writ will lie only where inferior tribunal about to do some act unauthorized by law.

Writ of prohibition will lie only where inferior tribunal is about to do some act unauthorized by law.

2. Prohibition ☞13—Would not lie to restrain superior court from hearing an appeal after determination thereof.

Writ of prohibition would not lie to restrain superior court from trying appeal from justice court because fees required to be paid to justice court under Code Civ. Proc. § 981, had not been paid in time, where superior court had prior to service of writ heard and determined appeal.

3. Prohibition ☞28—Application for writ not treated as writ of review when complete record not brought up.

Application for writ of prohibition to restrain superior court from trying an appeal from justice court would not be treated as a writ of review upon determination of appeal by superior court before service of writ, where a complete record had not been brought up so that court could know that it was doing exact justice between parties.

Application by Robert Taylor Davis and another for writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Alameda, Hon Joseph S. Koford, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

C. W. White, of Hayward, for petitioners.
J. J. Rose, Jr., of Oakland, and W. W. Laidley, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent superior court from further proceeding to try the purported appeal in the case of Davis v. Stadler.

The application was made to this court on December 22, 1924. On the 23d day of December, 1924, this court ordered an alternative writ to issue returnable before this court on the 12th day of January, 1925. The respondent answered by filing an affidavit by J. J. Rose, Esq., attorney for Stadler, a general demurrer and a certified copy of the judgment of the superior court made and entered in the case of Davis v. Stadler on the 29th day of December, 1924. The cause was submitted on all of said documents, as on a motion for judgment on the pleading.

On the 14th day of June, 1924, Hon. Jacob Harder, Jr., as justice of the peace of the township of Eden, county of Alameda, state of California, in an action wherein Robert Davis and Elise Davis were plaintiffs, and Jacob Stadler was defendant, entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant in the sum of $267.52, and said justice thereupon gave written notice to all parties that said judgment had been entered. Thereafter a purported appeal was taken to the superior court. Thereafter the plaintiff appeared in the superior court and made a motion to dismiss, alleging that the said appeal had not been legally perfected by reason of the fact that the fees required to be paid to the justice court under the provisions of section 981, Code of Civil Procedure, were not paid until a date more than 30 days after the rendition of the notice of judgment in the said action entitled Davis v. Stadler. The petition further recites that the motion to dismiss was thereafter presented to the superior court and that the superior court denied the motion, and it is further averred that the respondent superior court will proceed and try said action de novo unless restrained by this court.

The petition does not raise any issue on the question: (1) That a notice of appeal was duly and regularly filed; (2) that an undertaking in due form to recover costs and to stay proceedings was duly and regularly filed; but (3) it does present an issue as to whether the fees required by the provisions of section 981, Code of Civil Procedure, were paid within 30 days after the judgment was rendered by the justice court. The petition is so drawn that it shows on its face that the question as to whether said fees were paid was, under the facts of this case, a mixed question of fact and law and which question was presented to the superior court in the form stated when the petitioner applied to the superior court to dismiss the appeal. The petition recites that the motion to dismiss the appeal was supported by "all the records and files in said action together with the affidavit of J. J. Rose, Jr., the affidavit of Jacob Harder, Jr., justice of the peace, and the written stipulation of counsel of the respective parties, * * *" but the petition does not purport to set forth that evidence, excepting to furnish a copy of the two affidavits specified. In its return the respondent superior court alleges that on the 29th day of December, 1924, and prior to the service upon it of the alternative writ of prohibition, the case of Davis v. Stadler was heard and determined and a judgment in favor of the defendant was entered therein; and to that return is attached a copy of the judgment.

[1, 2] It is settled law of this state that a writ of prohibition will lie only where the inferior tribunal is about to do some act unauthorized by law. It is a preventive rather than a corrective remedy and issues only to restrain the commission of a future act and not to undo an act already performed. Blade

v. Fresno County, 60 Cal. 290; Hull v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 179; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 393-394, 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 75 P. 336. It is clear, therefore, that a writ of prohibition should not under the facts of this case be issued.

[3] At the time of the argument the petitioner requested that this court treat this proceeding as an application for a writ of review. When the petition is filed in time and a complete record has been brought up and all of the facts are before the court so that the court can know that it is doing exact justice as between the parties, the court will adopt that procedure (Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 236, 207 P. 903); but the record in this case does not bring it within the purview of that rule. In the first place, all of the evidence taken before the trial court is not before this court, and, in the second place, the evidence taken before the trial court consisted of certain affidavits which were very brief and did not even purport to state all of the facts.

The writ is denied.

CLARK v. BURNS HAMMAM BATHS et al.
(Civ. 5014.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 7, 1925.)

1. Bailment ⇨14(4)—Defendant held grossly negligent in delivering plaintiff's property to person presenting key, without ascertaining his identity.

Where plaintiff, as patron of a bathhouse, deposited his valuables with clerk, who placed them in a box, delivering key thereto to plaintiff, delivery of such valuables to person presenting key, without inquiry as to his identity, was gross negligence, rendering defendant liable for their value.

2. Bailment ⇨14(4)—Defendant was bailee for hire and required to use ordinary care for preservation of things deposited.

Where plaintiff, as patron of a bathhouse, deposited his valuables with the clerk, who placed them in a box, and delivered key thereto to plaintiff, who paid value for such keeping, defendant was a bailee for hire and required to use at least ordinary care for preservation of things deposited, under Civ. Code, § 1852.

3. Bailment ⇨14(4)—Contributory negligence of plaintiff held immaterial, where proximate cause of loss was defendant's negligence.

In suit to recover value of property deposited for safe-keeping with bathhouse proprietor and placed in box to which plaintiff was given a key, contributory negligence of plaintiff in not going to office immediately on discovering loss of his key held immaterial, where proximate cause of loss was defendant's negligence in not requiring identification of some kind before delivering property to person presenting key.

4. Bailment ⇨14(4)—Plaintiff not contributorily negligent barring recovery for misdelivery of deposited property by not securing different type of sleeping quarters.

In suit to recover value of property deposited with bathhouse proprietor and by him delivered to person presenting key to box in which it was kept, plaintiff held not contributorily negligent in not paying a larger sum and securing a different type of sleeping quarters so that key would not have been stolen, since it was defendant's duty to exercise same care in handling guest's property irrespective of price paid for accommodations.

5. Bailment ⇨31(2)—Evidence, showing that none of patrons of bathhouse establishment had suffered any loss under system of handling property used in plaintiff's case, held properly excluded as immaterial.

In suit to recover property deposited with bathhouse proprietor, and by him delivered to person presenting key to box in which it was kept, evidence showing number of patrons of such establishment during year preceding loss, and that none of them had suffered any loss under system of handling property, was properly excluded as immaterial.

6. Damages ⇨64—Plaintiff's recovery against bathhouse proprietor misdelivering his deposited property not affected by insurance thereon.

In suit for value of property deposited with bathhouse proprietor and misdelivered by him to person presenting key to box in which it was kept, that plaintiff had insurance on one of articles lost was immaterial, since defendant had no interest in any benefit under policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Clark against the Burns Hammam Baths and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Albert I. Loeb, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Egan & Morris, of San Francisco (Hugh F. Keon, Jr., of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant Burns Hammam Baths from a judgment against it in the sum of $889.50, the value of certain property intrusted by the plaintiff to the care of said defendant, which was never returned to the plaintiff.

On July 23, 1921, the plaintiff was a patron of the bathhouse operated by the defendant and deposited money and jewelry in a box provided by the defendant for that purpose, which box was locked and the key, attached to a rubber band, fastened about plaintiff's wrist. At the time of receiving this property, an employee of defendant wrote the name of the plaintiff, together with a list of the articles deposited in the box by him, upon a slip of paper and attached this slip of paper to the outside of the box in some manner, and then replaced the box in its proper compartment. The box and the key for the same were numbered 26.

After plaintiff had availed himself of the bathing facilities of the establishment, he retired for the night to a room, which was merely separated from other rooms by curtains. In the morning, about 8:45 o'clock, he went to a washstand provided for his use, and while there, noticed that the key to his box was not attached to his wrist. He mentioned this to a Chinese laborer cleaning up the place and was told to go "downstairs." The office was downstairs. Plaintiff returned to his room and dressed, and called at the office about 15 minutes later, explaining that his key had disappeared and he wished the contents of his box. There he was told that the key had already been presented by some one else and the contents of the box carried away by such person. This litigation resulted. The trial court found that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence in making no inquiry as to the identity of the person presenting the key for access to box numbered 26, and that the defendant at that time had the means of identifying said person.

[1] The question presented is whether or not this finding is supported by the record. We think it is. As we have stated, the defendant had placed outside the box the name of the person owning the property and the nature of that property. When the key was presented, it would have been very simple and effective to have asked the person presenting it for his name. In this case, such a precaution, probably, would have prevented the loss. The clerk who delivered the contents of the box stated that he did not ask for the man's name, nor use any precaution to identify him; that he had no recollection even of his appearance.

[2] The defendant was a bailee for hire. The plaintiff had paid a lump sum for the privilege of a bath, and the use of a room and a lockbox for his valuables. A depositary for hire must use at least ordinary care for the preservation of the thing deposited. Civil Code, § 1852. We agree with the trial court that ordinary care required the defendant to inquire as to the identity of the person presenting the key, and the fact, that the defendant had a paper upon which was written the name of the owner of the property fastened to the outside of the box, placed the defendant in a position where it could have exercised easily a precaution which doubtless would have prevented the loss.

[3] The appellant contends that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, because he did not go to the office immediately upon discovering the loss of his key, but waited until he had dressed completely. The plaintiff testified that he discovered the loss of the key only about 15 minutes before notifying the office. The clerk who delivered the property testified at the trial that he recalled delivering the same about 15 or 20 minutes before the plaintiff appeared and stated he had lost his key. There is a conflict in the evidence upon this question, however, for the record contains the statements of a police officer, who investigated this matter on the morning of the loss, to the effect that when he questioned the clerk as to the appearance of the man who had received the property and the time at which he had received it, the clerk stated that he did not recall anything about it; that he did not know at what time he had delivered the property, and thought the night clerk had probably delivered it before he left at 6 o'clock in the morning. But even though we accept the version most favorable to appellant, it appears that the proximate cause of the loss was the negligence of defendant in not requiring identification of some kind before delivering the property. If it had taken the simple precaution of asking the name of the man, it would have discovered the fraud and it would have been immaterial then whether the plaintiff reported the loss at 9 or 10 or 11 o'clock. It is only where contributory negligence is the proximate cause of an injury that it will bar recovery.

[4] It cannot be successfully argued that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence barring his recovery, because he lost his key, for it does not appear in the record that he lost it. It may have been removed from his arm while he slept, so far as the record discloses. To meet this situation, the appellant urges that plaintiff was negligent in not paying a larger sum and securing a different type of sleeping quarters—a room with a door which could be locked. We think there is no merit in this contention. The defendant offered accommodations at different prices and it was its duty to exercise the same care in handling the property of guests who had paid only $1.75 for their accommodations as in handling the property of guests who had paid $2.25.

[5] Complaint is made because the trial court excluded offered testimony to show the number of patrons of this establishment during the year preceding the loss, and the fact that none of them had suffered any loss under the system of handling property which was used in the plaintiff's case. We think the testimony entirely immaterial. In this case loss was suffered; a simple method of precaution was available to defendant by which it might have been avoided, and it is immaterial that in innumerable other instances the defendant failed to use this same simple precaution and, nevertheless, escaped without loss.

[6] The fact that the plaintiff had $150 insurance upon one of the articles lost is of no advantage to the defendant. The insurance was not for the benefit of the defendant. The plaintiff stated he had not collected this money from the insurance company, and the adjustment of the loss is a matter between him and the insurance carrier. Doubtless the insurance company would have had a right of subrogation to plaintiff's claim against the defendant had it paid this loss, but the defendant has no interest in any benefit under the policy. It is answering for its own tort, and the adjustment between the plaintiff and the insurance company need not concern it.

The judgment is affirmed.

BIRD v. MURPHY et al. (Civ. 2872.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 26, 1925.)

1. Trial $\S$ 397(1)—Material issue at trial must be determined.

In action to quiet title, where fraudulent conveyance of lots in question to plaintiff was in issue, failure of trial court to pass on question held error.

2. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 299(12) — Evidence held sufficient to support issue of fraudulent conveyances.

Where husband conveyed property to wife immediately after daughter had obtained judgment for maintenance against him under Civ. Code, $\S$ 206, evidence held sufficient to support issue of fraudulent transfer.

3. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 269(1)—Issue of fraudulent transfer raised on general denial of title in action to quiet title.

In action to quiet title, where complaint is silent as to source of plaintiff's title, general denial that plaintiff is owner or entitled to possession is sufficient to raise issue of fraudulent transfer without specific allegation, since defendant is not required to anticipate source of plaintiff's title.

4. Pleading $\S$ 34(7)—All reasonable deductions will be made in favor of cross-complaint objected to for first time on appeal.

Where objection to cross-complaint for failure to state cause of action is raised for first time on appeal, all reasonable deductions will be made in favor of pleading.

5. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 241(5)—Execution not prerequisite to maintenance of equity suit to enforce judgment, where clearly fruitless.

Where transfer of lots left judgment debtor without any property, issuance and return of execution, which would clearly be fruitless, held not prerequisite to raising issue of fraudulent conveyance.

6. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 226 — Title remains in fraudulent grantor so far as existing judgment creditor is concerned.

Title of property conveyed with intent to defraud remains in grantor so far as existing judgment creditor is concerned.

7. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 237(1) — Conveyance to defeat subsisting judgment can be set aside.

Conveyance to defraud creditors and defeat valid subsisting judgment may be set aside in proper proceeding.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Dan W. Bird against Lulu Mig-non Murphy, in which S. S. Murphy and wife were made cross-defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

B. M. Bainbridge and A. P. Hayne, both of Stockton, for appellant.

John R. Cronin, of Stockton, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an action to quiet title to two lots at Lodi, San Joaquin county. The defendant specifically denied the allegations of ownership and right of possession by the plaintiff. In a cross-complaint the defendant also alleged the existence of a judgment in her favor in said county, and a fraudulent conveyance of the property to plaintiff to defraud creditors and defeat her judgment. The cross-defendants appeared and filed disclaimers and specific denial of the alleged fraudulent conveyance. From a judgment quieting title in plaintiff, and failing to pass upon the issue of fraudulent conveyance, this appeal was taken.

[1] The question of the fraudulent conveyance of the lots was an issue at the trial, and should have been passed upon by the trial court.

The complaint contains the simple allegations of a suit to quiet title, as follows:

"That the plaintiff is now, and for a long time hitherto has been, the owner and in possession of those certain lots (describing them). * * * That the defendant claims an estate or interest therein adverse to the plaintiff. * * * That the claim of the defendant is without any right whatever."

The complaint fails to allege the source of plaintiff's title.

The answer and cross-complaint are inartificially drawn. The material portions are in the following form:

"Denies that plaintiff holds any cause of action against the defendant. Denies that the above Dan W. Bird and wife are the real owners of the hereindescribed property, or any interest therein.

"Admits that the property was recorded in the name of the above Dan W. Bird on November 13th, 1914. * * *

"Admits that the said property was recorded in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy on August 10, 1914. * * *

"Admits that the defendant holds a judgment against the above S. S. Murphy, which said judgment clouds the therein title.

"Admits that said defendant holds a judgment lien against the title and premises therein by reason of a judgment in an action in above court against the above S. S. Murphy. Said judgment found and docketed in her favor prior to the above transfer into the name of the above Dan W. Bird. * * *

"Alleges that above defendant, with full knowledge on the part of above plaintiff Alice K. Murphy, secured above judgment against the grantor S. S. Murphy prior to the above recording of said property into the name of Alice K. Murphy, from the name of above S. S. Murphy.

"Further, by way of cross-complaint (defendant) complains:

"That above defendant S. S. Murphy has paid all of the payments due above defendant under said judgment * * * up to and including May 5, 1914. That said defendant S. S. Murphy thereupon ceased to pay and refused to pay said defendant any further moneys * * * under said judgment. That there is now due * * * sixty-two months payments * * * under said judgment. * * *

"That, at the time * * * the said judgment * * * was found, * * * above S. S. Murphy was the owner of the above property. * * * That, soon after the * * * recording of the above property in the name of Dan W. Bird, said property was mortgaged in favor of above Alice K. Murphy. * * *

"Therefore above defendant holds that the aforescribed transfer of above property into the several names of Alice K. Murphy and Dan W. Bird * * * was for no legal purpose whatever, but said transactions were for the purpose of defrauding said Lulu Mignon Murphy out of the income of * * * said judgment * * * and evading payment thereof."

Then follows the prayer, asking among other things that the court "declare that the afore-described transfer of the above-described property into the name of said Alice K. Murphy was not for any legal purpose whatever, but for the purpose of defrauding the above defendant. * * *" And further asked the court to find that the judgment created a lien upon the property in question, and that an execution might issue against said property for the satisfaction of said judgment.

The plaintiff, Bird, answering the cross-complaint, denied that he acquired the property "for the purpose of defrauding the defendant," or for the purpose of "assisting S. S. Murphy to evade any judgment that the said defendant held against him." And further alleged that the property was acquired in good faith and for a valuable consideration.

Cross-defendants S. S. Murphy and Alice K. Murphy, answering the cross-complaint, denied that the plaintiff acquired the real property in question "for the purpose of defrauding defendant." They further alleged that plaintiff acquired the property in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Both cross-defendants disclaimed any interest in the property.

[2] The evidence shows that the defendant is a daughter of cross-defendant S. S. Murphy. In an action for maintenance under section 206 of the Civil Code, the defendant obtained a judgment against her father for the sum of $15 per month, payable in monthly installments. This judgment was rendered July 2, 1914, and was entered nunc pro tunc as of March 21, 1912, and was docketed October 8, 1914. No part of the judgment has been paid or satisfied since July, 1914. At the time of the commencement of the present action to quiet title, that judgment for maintenance was in full force. A considerable sum was then due and payable thereon. August 8, 1914, the cross-defendant S. S. Murphy conveyed the lots in question to his wife Alice K. Murphy. Cross-defendants testified that the consideration consisted of voluntary contributions from the wife's separate funds to the household expenses. The amounts of these alleged contributions are very uncertain. There was no previous agreement to refund these sums so advanced, nor to recompense the wife therefor. The conveyance of these lots was made from the judgment debtor to his wife one month after the entry of the judgment. S. S. Murphy owned no other property, except, as he says, one jackknife. Three months later the lots were conveyed to this plaintiff. The consideration for the last transfer was $500. This was paid with plaintiff's note. He denied securing this note by mortgage. Yet February 19, 1915, he executed his mortgage on these same lots to Alice K. Murphy to secure payment of his note for the sum of $500. He also took the acknowledgment as notary public to the deed from S. S. Murphy to his wife.

These circumstances furnish at least some evidence of a fraudulent conveyance.

[3] Even though it may be said that the allegations of the cross-complainant are insufficient to raise the issue of a fraudulent transfer, still, under the general denial that the plaintiff is the owner or entitled to the possession of the lots in question, since the complaint is silent as to the source of plaintiff's title, and the defendant is not required to anticipate the source of plaintiff's title, a fraudulent transfer may be shown by defendant without specifically alleging such fraud. 12 Cal. Jur. 1056; Mason v. Vestal, 88 Cal. 396, 26 P. 213, 22 Am. St. Rep. 310; Howe v. Johnson, 107 Cal. 77, 40 P. 42; Banning v. Marleau, 121 Cal. 240, 53 P. 692.

In this case there was no objection on the part of plaintiff or cross-defendants to the answer or cross-complaint, by demurrer or otherwise. Nor has the insufficiency of defendant's answer or cross-complaint been attacked on appeal, either by briefs or oral argument. In the case of United Land Ass'n v. Pacific Improvement Co., 139 Cal. 370, 69 P. 1064, 72 P. 988, it is said:

"We are * * * of the opinion that in a suit to quiet title, as in other suits, a denial of the allegations of the complaint is a sufficient answer."

[4] It is the general rule that an objection to a complaint, or cross-complaint, on the ground that it fails to state a cause of action, may be raised for the first time on appeal, yet "objections of this character * * * are looked upon with great disfavor, and if, with all reasonable deductions that can be drawn therefrom, the facts alleged are sufficient to show a cause of action, the pleading will be upheld. 2 R. C. L. 87; County Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Jack, 148 Cal. 437, 83 P. 705, 113 Am. St. Rep. 285; Johnson v. Taylor, 150 Cal. 208, 88 P. 903, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181.

[5] The defendant held a valid judgment against S. S. Murphy, at the time he conveyed the lots in question to his wife, and thence to plaintiff. She then had a right to issue execution against these lots for the satisfaction of the accrued portion of said judgment. Ordinarily a judgment creditor must exhaust his remedies at law before he can proceed in equity to satisfy a judgment, but, when it appears that the issuing of an execution would be fruitless, the issuing and return of the execution is not a necessary prerequisite to the maintenance of a suit in equity. 12 Cal. Jur. 1038; Blanc v. The Paymaster Mining Co., 95 Cal. 524, 30 P. 765, 29 Am. St. Rep. 149. In this case it clearly appears that the transfer of the lots left the judgment debtor without any property subject to execution. Therefore the issuing and return of an execution prior to the raising of the issue of a fraudulent conveyance was unnecessary.

[6, 7] So far as an existing judgment creditor is concerned, the title and ownership of property conveyed with intent to defraud creditors remains in the fraudulent grantor as completely as though the transfer had not been attempted. A conveyance made to defraud creditors, and to defeat a valid subsisting judgment, will be set aside in a proper proceeding. Ohio Electric Car Co. v. Duffet, 48 Cal. App. 678, 192 P. 298; First National Bank v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 P. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64; Bank of South San Francisco v. Pike, 53 Cal. App. 524, 200 P. 752; Hyde v. Stockwell, 44 Cal. App. 344, 186 P. 391; Smith v. Morse, 2 Cal. 524.

There was an effort on the part of defendant to plead a fraudulent conveyance of the property. The form or insufficiency of this pleading was not objected to. The question of a fraudulent conveyance was an issue in the case. There is substantial evidence in the record to support this issue. There is an absolute right to have a material issue which is presented determined by the findings of the court. A failure to make a finding upon such material issue is reversible error. 2 Cal. Jur. 1032; Conway v. Supreme Council, etc., 131 Cal. 437, 63 P. 727.

Because of the necessity to reverse the judgment in this case for failure to find upon the issue of fraudulent conveyance, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether a judgment payable in installments creates a judgment lien.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

FEIGENBAUM et al. v. AYMARD et al.
(Civ. 4795.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1925.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(13)—Finding that new lease was not executed sustained.

In unlawful detainer, finding that new lease, which had been drawn up and signed, and under which rent was to be secured by chattel mortgage, had not been executed held sustained under evidence.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨25(5)—Mere signature of lease without delivery to lessee not binding.

Mere signature of a lease without delivery to lessee who refused to comply with terms demanded by lessor held not to create binding obligation; lease not being fully executed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Unlawful detainer by Lionel B. Feigenbaum and another against Frank Aymard and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for appellants.

TYLER, P. J. Action in unlawful detainer. The plaintiffs are the owners of certain premises known as the Hotel Lafayette, situated in San Francisco, and defendant entered into possession of the hotel as a tenant under a written lease. This instrument provided for a three-year period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1919, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1922, at a monthly rental of $650. It also contained a clause to the effect that, in the event the lessee should hold over beyond the term provided for, such holding over would be a month to month tenancy at a rental of $650, payable monthly in advance. At the expiration of the written lease defendant held over. On November 29, 1922, he was served with a written notice, informing him that the terms of his then month to month tenancy would be changed on and as of January 1, 1923, in respect of the amount of rent, which would be increased from $650 to $800 per month. Prior to the date named the parties met, and it is plaintiffs' claim that it was finally agreed that the rental should be the sum of $700 under a month to month tenancy, and that under this arrangement defendant paid the $700 for the months of January and February, 1923. On January 29th plaintiffs served on defendant a written notice, terminating this tenancy, and which took effect February 28, 1923. Defendant refused to vacate, and this action in unlawful detainer was thereupon commenced.

Defendant in his answer denied the alleged tenancy from month to month, and claimed that the agreement by which the rent was increased to the sum of $700 contemplated a new lease for a period of three years, to be secured by a chattel mortgage similar in effect to that which secured the terms of the written lease under which defendant originally entered in 1919. In this connection the answer alleged that plaintiffs drafted the lease agreed upon, which was fully executed by the parties. It is then charged that plaintiffs presented for execution a chattel mortgage entirely different from the one agreed upon, for which reason defendant refused to sign the same. By way of further defense he alleged that possession was held by him under an executed parol agreement, the terms of which had been fully performed.

Prior to the institution of this action defendant had filed a suit in specific performance. By stipulation that action was consolidated with the instant one.

Upon the question of what agreement was reached by the parties upon the termination of the original lease with reference to an extension of the tenancy there is evidence to show that they had in contemplation the execution of a new lease at the monthly rental of $700, which was to be secured by a chattel mortgage different in terms from the one given as security for the original lease, and that pending its execution defendant was to hold under a month to month tenancy at the monthly rental of $700, and that under this arrangement defendant paid two months' rent. It appears therefrom that the negotiations for a new lease were carried on through the attorneys of the respective parties. A lease providing for a three-year extension was drawn and signed, though it was never delivered to the lessee, for the reason that his attorney objected to the new conditions contained in the chattel mortgage. That the minds of the parties never met at any time upon the terms of the proposed three-year extension is clearly indicated by written communications had between the respective attorneys of the parties. The attorney for defendant addressed a letter to plaintiffs' representative as follows:

"It is now several days since I delivered to you the lease signed by Mr. Aymard for this hotel. Neither Mr. Aymard nor myself have received word that the lease with the corrections made at his suggestion have been accepted or signed by the owners, your clients. Mr. Aymard has refused to sign the chattel mortgage presented to him by the agent Louis Feigenbaum, who told him that he would either sign that chattel mortgage or he would get no lease. Mr. Aymard therefore notifies your clients and you, their attorney, that negotiations for the delivery of the lease to him are ended, and cancels the signature on the documents of proposed lease heretofore handed to you for submission to your clients. Be good enough to either return the same to me for canceling the signature of Mr. Aymard, or in lieu of that you are hereby authorized to cancel such signature yourself. Yours very truly," etc.

To this communication plaintiffs' attorney replied as follows:

"I am in receipt of yours of the 24th inst. announcing your withdrawal of further negotiations on the subject of the lease of Feigenbaum et al. to Aymard, and requesting your client's name be eliminated from the document. I am authorized by Messrs. Feigenbaum to communicate to you that in so far as Mr. Aymard is concerned at present all negotiations are concluded, and he is released subject to notice to vacate in thirty days. Yours truly," etc.

This correspondence shows that the negotiations for an extension of the lease were not successful. Notice terminating the month to month tenancy immediately followed, and plaintiffs made a new lease with others at a rental of $800 per month.

[1, 2] The trial court found in accordance with the facts we have recited, and gave judgment for restitution of the premises.

The evidence is amply sufficient to support the findings. Defendant never agreed to the terms of the chattel mortgage, for which reason the contemplated lease was never executed. The mere fact that the lease was signed by the parties in no manner affects the question. It was never delivered to plaintiffs for the reason that defendant refused to comply with the terms demanded by the lessors. It was therefore never fully executed, and the parties never became obligated under its terms. Stetson v. Briggs, 114 Cal. 511, 46 P. 603. This being so, other questions based upon the assumption that the lease was executed become unimportant.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROSE. (Cr. No. 1137.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 6, 1925.)

1. Criminal law — 1167(2)—Refusal to require state to elect in information charging grand larceny and embezzlement held not prejudicial.

Refusal to require state to elect in information charging grand larceny and embezzlement by same act held not prejudicial, in view of Pen. Code, § 954, where defendant was found guilty of embezzlement and acquitted of charge of grand larceny.

2. Embezzlement — 44(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for embezzlement.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for embezzlement.

3. Witnesses — 337(1)—Evidence as to defendant's reputation for truth, etc., held admissible, though defendant had not raised such issue.

In prosecution for embezzlement, in which defendant had testified, evidence that defendant's reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was bad in community in which he lived, was admissible, though defendant had not raised such issue.

4. Criminal law — 1036(2), 1044—Evidence that defendant's reputation was bad not ground for complaint, where no objection and motion to strike was not based on want of foundation.

In prosecution for embezzlement, admission of evidence that defendant's reputation for truth and honesty was bad was not ground for complaint, though witnesses had not discussed defendant's reputation with others, where he made no objection to introduction of such evidence and motion to strike was not based on lack of sufficient foundation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

L. F. Rose was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles I. Rosin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The information in this case consisted of two counts, respectively charging that the defendant committed the crime of grand larceny, in that he unlawfully stole, took, and carried away the sum of $475, lawful money of the United States, belonging to a Mrs. Clara Reich; and that at the same time he embezzled said sum of money.

Motion was made that the district attorney be required to elect upon which count the prosecution would be based, on the ground that each negated the other, and that inasmuch as the defendant could not have committed both offenses by the same act, the jury should not be compelled or permitted to convict upon both counts, or to make the election. There was some controversy as to when the defendant formed the intent to convert the money to his own use, and if he did so intend, and the trial court denied the motion upon the ground that the jury should decide whether he intended to obtain the money without giving consideration therefor, or legitimately obtained the same and thereafter converted it to his own use, should the evidence warrant a conviction upon either count.

[1] Section 954 of the Penal Code provides that an indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, under separate counts, and that the prosecution is not required to elect between the different offenses or counts, though the court may in its discretion require that they be tried separately. The jury were instructed, at appellant's request, that the defendant could not be convicted upon both counts, and that if they believed him guilty at all, they should convict him on but one count. From the nature of the evidence, as will hereinafter appear, it was a serious question of fact as to whether appellant at first conscientiously interested the prosecuting witness in the transaction, or did so with intent to defraud her, and the citation of authority requiring the submission of all questions of fact to the jury is not necessary. Since the jury found him guilty of embezzlement, and by a separate verdict acquitted him of the charge of grand larceny, we see no merit in appellant's assertion that error was committed in denying his motion.

[2] It is contended that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. It appears that appellant agreed that three lots in a tract known as the Val Halla Memorial Park, in Los Angeles county, should be sold to Mrs. Reich; that between the 20th day of December, 1923, and the 27th day of March, 1924, she paid him various amounts of money aggregating $375; that on several occasions she asked for a contract, but was at each time informed by appellant that she was not entitled to one until she had paid him more money; Mrs. Reich finally consulted an attorney who called appellant to his office, and after various consultations, her counsel advised her to cease paying. Appellant was taken to the district attorney's office, and, after making a statement, was arrested.

The prosecuting witness testified that appellant represented to her that he held an option on three lots in block F, or section F, of said tract, belonging to a Mr. Dunley, which appellant desired to sell for $750; that he demanded $300 as a first cash payment, but that she paid him $150, which was all she had; and that he told her a contract for the purchase of said lots would be furnished her upon the payment of $100 more. She said that she made payments by check, noting thereon "section F," "Val Halla Memorial lots," or "From Dunley," and at times paying cash, receiving appellant's receipt, on which he noted "lots Memorial Park on which I have option"; that she continued to press him for a contract; but that after she had paid him more than the additional $100 originally required, he still refused her a contract unless she pay him $100. She further testified that about the middle of March appellant suggested that three lots in section A be substituted for those at first agreed upon, that they belonged to the same people, but were worth more; that she consented to this change, believing that she was buying from Mr. Dunley, but that each time appellant mentioned price he increased the amount, at first from $750 to $875, then to $900; and that he finally informed her that these lots belonged to a Mrs. Archer, from whom he held an option.

In the meantime appellant has been subjected to a somewhat thorough quizzing by Mrs. Reich's counsel regarding the Dunley lots, and it was testified that appellant admitted to him that he had no option from Dunley, that "there is no Mr. Dunley; I just told her that," and that appellant declined to show any written option from Mrs. Archer, though he claimed to hold one. Mrs. Archer testified that she gave appellant no option in writing; that on March 21st he requested that she permit him to sell her lots for $900, and that she loaned him her contract, to be exhibited to Mrs. Reich's counsel; that she was not inclined to sell her property, but that inasmuch as she had paid but $450 therefor, and appellant had agreed to obtain much more, payable $30 per month, she consented; that he told her he would have a new contract prepared, and would collect his commission from the other party, but that she never saw this latter document. Mrs. Reich's attorney also testified that appellant demanded $900, stating that his commission or profit was to be all he could obtain for the property in excess of $500; that he finally submitted a form of contract, which was introduced in evidence, reciting that $18.25 should be paid to the Osborne-Fitz-Patrick Finance Company at first, and the same amount in two consecutive monthly installments, and thereafter the sum of $390 should be paid Mrs. Archer; this instrument was not signed, and the witness said that appellant demanded $106 down, a part of which he claimed to be due himself. The counselor also testified that he told appellant that there had been so much lying about the transaction that he would not permit Mrs. Reich to proceed further, and that he called the matter to the attention of the district attorney.

A deputy district attorney testified that appellant admitted to him that "Dunley" was a fictitious name; Mrs. Archer testified that if there was any mention of $390 in the contract, "there must have been some mistake," and that she never received any money from appellant in the transaction.

The defendant took the stand and denied that he ever mentioned a man by the name of Dunley to Mrs. Reich, that he knew a person by that name, but did not know whether or not he owned lots in said tract, or that he was even in the city; that Mrs. Archer had requested him to dispose of her lots; and that Mrs. Reich's attorney told him to bring the papers to his office and that he would turn the money over to him. He denied having ever represented to Mrs. Reich that she was buying lots in section F, or in block F, or that they were in any section, or block, but that he had a verbal option from Mrs. Archer to sell her lots, and that his compensation should be all over $500 that he might obtain for them.

The principal contention as to a lack of sufficient evidence to support the conviction is that it was immaterial whether the lots in question were the property of Dunley, or Mrs. Archer, or of some person unknown to appellant at the time of agreeing to sell them, so long as he should obtain them and ultimately furnish Mrs. Reich three lots in Val Halla Memorial Park; that the latter was interested only in buying three lots; and that she so testified upon the preliminary examination.

It is obvious from the evidence before us that regardless of the owner's name, appellant had no option on any of the lots when he collected payments aggregating $375 from Mrs. Reich. There being evidence of the falsity of appellant's statements regarding Dunley, representations concerning the latter's ownership were undoubtedly material, and might be taken by the jury as some evidence of appellant's criminal intent. They were justified in believing that he represented himself as being able to deliver three lots in section or block F, belonging to Dunley, and that he later admitted that there was no such person. He admits having received about $400 from Mrs. Reich, and the evidence tends to show that he demanded $106 more, but there is not the slightest intimation in the record that any one other than defendant L. F. Rose ever received a dollar of the money which he collected; the sole possibility of Mrs. Archer receiving any money arose from the provision of the draft of a proposed contract whereby Mrs. Reich would be required to pay her $390 three months thereafter, which Mrs. Archer said was not her agreement with appellant, but that she had been assured of a $900 consideration for her $450 purchase. Upon this state of facts the jury would be warranted in disregarding appellant's testimony, and if they did that they doubtless concluded that Mrs. Reich's money was converted by appellant to his own personal use; and even had they accepted as true appellant's intricate but novel recitation of details, which he repeatedly termed "explanations," the record is entirely silent as to any intention upon his part to devote her payments to any other purposes. He does not attempt to deny that he intended to keep her money, or to indicate to whom he believed it should be paid; and from the terms of his proposed contract and his own demands it would appear that Mrs. Reich would not only be required to pay Mrs. Archer, and the Osborne-Fitz-Patrick Finance Company, in full, but to contribute $106 more to appellant. If Mrs. Archer in fact agreed that he should receive $400 upon consummation of the sale of her lots, which she denied, such an understanding could not have arisen until after he had received that amount from Mrs. Reich, and it was procured by him when he was in dire straits to produce some sort of contract. This is true according to his own testimony.

[3] Two witnesses, asked if they knew the reputation of the defendant for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lived, answered that they did; asked what it was, they replied that it was bad—but each testified that he had not heard his reputation discussed. Appellant insists that it was error to deny his motion to strike this testimony, both because he had not raised the issue, and because they had not heard his reputation mentioned by others in the community. He is clearly in error as to the first reason assigned. In People v. Cowgill, 93 Cal. 596, 29 P. 228, it was said that—

"Evidence is not admissible to prove that the character of a witness for truthfulness is good, unless the opposite party has tried to impeach him by showing that his general reputation is bad." (Italics supplied.)

[4] Appellant is in no position to urge that the answers should have been stricken out on the ground that the witnesses had not discussed the defendant's reputation with others, because he made no objection to the introduction of the evidence in the first instance. In making his motion to strike he did not base it upon an alleged lack of sufficient foundation, and it is elementary that he must inform the trial court of the true ground for objection or motion to strike in order to avail himself of it upon appeal.

Appellant contends, further, that two of the witnesses for the people were impeached by the showing that they had made contradictory statements, but the jury were fully instructed in this respect, and since they were at liberty to disregard any portion of the testimony, we are unable to say that any construction which they may have placed upon minor conflicting details affected their verdict.

Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 204 P. 578, is quoted by appellant, as holding that—

"A person taking goods which he honestly believes are his own, under a claim of title, is not guilty of larceny, nor of embezzlement, if the property is openly and avowedly taken under a claim of title preferred in good faith."

Here again the jury were called upon to decide a question of fact as to the defendant's intent, but we fail to see how his actions could be reconciled with an honest belief upon his part that the money was his own, or the idea that any claim to it could have been made in good faith.

A motion was made that the case be dismissed, which motion was denied, and appellant assigns this as error; but we think the evidence amply sufficient to sustain the conviction, and we need not, therefore, discuss that point.

Other points attempted to be raised are equally untenable, and are unworthy of further discussion. We do not think there was prejudicial error in the proceedings below.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

GAIDOS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5154.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 20, 1925.)

Master and servant §417(7)—Commission's finding on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

On application by an injured employé for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, where evidence as to when employé first complained of injuries, and whether condition of his back was due to lumbago, injury, or congenital defect was conflicting, commission's findings thereon cannot be inquired into on certiorari.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Joseph Gaidos, opposed by the Western Brass Manufacturing Company, employer, and the Associated Industries Insurance Corporation, insurance carrier, in which an award was made by the Industrial Accident Commission refusing claimant compensation, and claimant applies for certiorari to review such award. Affirmed.

E. E. Keyes, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission refusing compensation to an applicant for certain injuries to his back alleged to have been sustained in the course of his employment.

It appears from the petition that Joseph Gaidos was, on the 1st day of April, 1924, the date of the injury complained of, an employee of the Western Brass Manufacturing Company, a corporation, one of the respondents herein, and that the Associated Industries Insurance Corporation was its insurance carrier. Petitioner filed in the office of the Industrial Accident Commission a claim against these companies for benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended). Respondents answered, denying all liability, and also traversing all the allegations except that the applicant was an employee of the company above named, and that the Associated Industries Insurance Corporation was the insurance carrier for that company. The application came on for hearing before the Commission, and evidence was taken by the referee appointed by it. On the 11th day of December, 1924, findings and award in favor of respondents and against petitioner were filed, the Commission concluding that the applicant had failed to prove his case.

At the hearing he testified that on the afternoon when the alleged injury occurred, he was assisting another workman to move a barrel filled with brass scraps and weighing from 300 to 400 pounds, and while doing so he felt a pain in his back; that he mentioned the matter to a fellow employee, and thereafter went home, and had been disabled ever since. There is a serious conflict in the evidence as to when he first complained of his back condition being caused by an injury. His own testimony on the subject is contradictory. It appears therefrom that he never attributed this condition to the alleged injury when first questioned by his attending physician, Dr. Scudder, who was called in immediately to care for the applicant. There is also a conflict in the evidence as to when the latter reported to his employer and others that he had received an injury. He first claimed that he told a fellow employee, who was assisting him in his work, that he had injured his back; while further on in his testimony he admits that he may not have done so. This employee testified that the applicant had complained of a pain in his back on the morning of the day of the injury but prior to the time of its occurrence. The superintendent of the company testified that no complaint was made to him concerning the matter, but that some time later in the month of April the applicant brought a doctor's certificate to him which indicated that he was run down and would have to take a rest on account of his back, but no claim at this time was made that the condition was due to any injury. There is also testimony in the record to show that petitioner had suffered two prior injuries, in one of which his back had been hurt, and that an insurance company had paid for the services of the physicians who attended him at that time. His wife gave testimony to the effect that he suffered from lumbago about eight years prior to the alleged injury.

The medical expert testimony is also conflicting as to the cause and nature of petitioner's ailment. The attending physician testified that he considered it a case of lumbago until informed, some weeks later, of the alleged injury. Other medical testimony was to the effect that petitioner's condition was due to arthritis, which is not caused by an injury, though it may be aggravated by it. X-rays of petitioner's spine were in evidence, and they showed a congenital enlargement of the articulating facets of the fifth lumbar vertebra with the sacrum. From the medical testimony as a whole, it is uncertain whether the back condition complained of was due to lumbago, injury, arthritis, or congenital defect. The case presents the situation where the findings of the Commission are based upon conflicting evidence, and, this being so, they cannot be inquired into upon certiorari. A petition for a rehearing based upon a medical report was denied by the Commission. There is nothing therein contained which would warrant a reopening of the case and it was therefore properly refused.

The award is affirmed.

71 Cal. App. 705

BONFIELD v. BONFIELD. (Civ. 5084.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 17, 1925.)

1. Divorce ☞ 165(5)—Objection to notice of motion waived by proceeding to hearing on motion without objection.

Objection that notice of motion to set aside final decree of divorce did not show on what grounds movant sought to be relieved, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1010, was waived by defendant proceeding to hearing on motion without objection.

2. Divorce ☞ 165(1)—Appeal or action in equity to set is aside proper method of attacking final divorce decree regular on its face.

Where order and judgment for final decree of divorce was regular on its face, the proper method of attacking such decree is by appeal or by an action in equity to set same aside for fraud or other sufficient reason.

3. Divorce ☞ 165(3)—Judgment granting final decree of divorce cannot be attacked by motion to set it aside because of fraud of plaintiff's attorney.

Where judgment granting plaintiff final decree of divorce is regular on its face, such judgment could not be attacked by plaintiff by motion to set it aside on ground of extrinsic fraud on part of her attorney, and, where plaintiff did not set up facts entitling her to relief under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, judgment is binding on her until set aside in proper proceeding.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Divorce action by Cleo A. Bonfield against Haswell T. Bonfield, in which a final decree of divorce was entered in favor of plaintiff. From an order setting aside such final decree on plaintiff's motion, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harold Ide Cruzan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco setting aside a final decree of divorce in favor of plaintiff.

The action was commenced on April 28, 1921, by the filing of a complaint charging extreme cruelty. After trial plaintiff secured an interlocutory decree of divorce on May 3, 1921. On February 23, 1923, defendant made a motion for the entry of the final decree. Plaintiff appeared and objected to the granting of the motion upon the ground that since the entry of the interlocutory decree the parties had lived together as husband and wife. As a result, the motion for a final decree of divorce was denied. Later the parties entered into a stipulation, waiving all legal objections to the entry of the final decree and requesting the court to enter the same, and the defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff the sum of $600, in monthly installments of $50. This stipulation was signed by the attorney then acting for plaintiff and the attorney for defendant. It was filed in court on May 11, 1923, and thereupon the order was made granting the motion of defendant for the final decree. On June 12, 1923, the plaintiff served a notice of motion to set aside the final decree of divorce. This motion was supported by the affidavit of plaintiff. It recites the entry of the final decree on May 12, 1923, and states that on or about the 11th day of May, 1923, the defendant, through the attorney for the plaintiff, signed a certain stipulation, wherein it was stated in substance that the final decree might be entered altering and modifying the terms of the interlocutory decree heretofore granted on the 3d day of May, 1921; that the stipulation purports to be entered into by the attorney for plaintiff and the attorney for defendant; that said stipulation was signed on behalf of the plaintiff by her attorney, without her knowledge or consent, and that the terms set forth in said stipulation for final decree were without her knowledge and consent, and that it was made wholly and solely at the request of the defendant, and without any knowledge on the part of his attorney, and was solely made and agreed to by and between plaintiff's attorney and the defendant; that the attorney for plaintiff repeatedly importuned her to agree to the granting of the final decree in accordance with the terms set forth in said stipulation; that in order to compel the plaintiff to sign a stipulation granting the final decree, her attorney informed her that the defendant was making every effort to have her sent to the insane asylum, and advised her rather than go through that it would be better for her to sign said stipulation; that she thereupon refused so to do, and that afterwards without her knowledge and consent her said attorney signed said stipulation as her attorney without any authority so to do. The foregoing statements are contradicted in counter affidavits, but, as the trial court has resolved the conflict in plaintiff's favor, we shall have to accept the statements in her affidavit as established facts.

[1] Appellant contends: (1) That the trial court was without jurisdiction to revoke the final decree; (2) that the control and management of the action was in plaintiff's attorney, and plaintiff is bound by his stipulations and actions taken therein, and may not repudiate his actions during the time he was her attorney of record; (3) that neither the notice of motion nor the record shows upon what grounds respondent seeks to be relieved from the effect of the final decree, and therefore the trial court was without power to grant the motion. Section 1010, Code Civ. Proc. The latter objection to the notice of motion was undoubtedly a good one, but it was one that could be and was waived by defendant in proceeding to the hearing upon the motion without objection. Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 61 P. 1123; Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 95.

[2] As to the jurisdiction of the court to make the order appealed from, it appears that the order and judgment for the final decree was regular upon its face, and that the proper method of attack was by appeal or by an action in equity to set the same aside for fraud or other sufficient reason. In was said in United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 151 P. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199:

"Nothing is more firmly settled in this state than the doctrine that the superior court may not revoke, modify, or otherwise disturb its judgments and orders regularly made in pursuance of plain statutory provision, where the statute prescribes the method by which such judgments and orders may be reviewed, except as authorized by statute."

In Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 P. 11, it was said:

"The decisions of this court are numerous and uniform to the effect that a judgment or order once regularly entered can be reviewed and set aside only in the modes prescribed by statute. If they have been entered prematurely, or by inadvertence, they may be set aside on a proper showing [citing cases] and if the order as entered is not the order as made, the minutes may be corrected so as to make them speak the truth [citing cases], but subject to these exceptions the order is reviewable only on appeal, and the decision of the trial court having been once made after regular submission of the motion its power is exhausted—it is functus officio [citing cases]."

"It cannot be doubted that a judgment can be nullified by the court which rendered it only, first, on motion for a new trial; second, by a motion under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where the judgment is inadvertently made and where application is made to set it aside within six months; third, by motion therefor at any time where the judgment is void on its face; fourth, by an independent suit in equity where the judgment is regular on its face but extrinsically void for want of jurisdiction, or by reason of fraud or mistake." Benning v. Superior Court, 34 Cal. App. 296, 167 P. 291.

[3] The present appeal presents a case where a judgment is regular upon its face, and plaintiff is claiming extrinsic fraud on the part of her attorney as a reason for setting it aside. She does not set up facts entitling her to relief under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. If she is not bound by the action of her attorney under the cases of Holmes v. Rogers, 13 Cal. 191; Clemens v. Gregg, 34 Cal. App. 245, 167 P. 294; Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 124 Cal. 134, 56 P. 797, then, in any event, the judgment is binding upon her until set aside in a proper proceeding, and it appears that the one adopted in this case was not the proper proceeding.

The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. VATEK. (Cr.824.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 26, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1925.)

1. Homicide ⚡253(1)—Conviction of first degree murder held supported by evidence.

Evidence held to support conviction of first degree murder.

2. Criminal law ⚡1144(1/2)—People presumed to have presented case on any theory of which proofs are reasonably susceptible.

Appellate court may assume that case was presented by people in court below on any theory of which proofs are reasonably susceptible.

3. Homicide ⚡169(2)—Testimony that articles found in defendant's room and on his person were in witness' possession when he entered house held admissible.

In murder prosecution, testimony of state's witness that when he entered defendant's house on day of homicide therein he had possession of articles found secreted in defendant's room and on his person when arrested, held material and relevant in proof of defendant's guilt, on theory that defendant assaulted deceased either because incensed by latter's protest against, and attempt to prevent theft of such articles from, witness, or because of fear that witness might testify for people in case of defendant's prosecution for larceny.

4. Witnesses ⚡281—Question to defendant whether police officer asked him if knife found on his person was one he cut deceased with held not objectionable as assuming fact.

District attorney's question to defendant as to whether police officer asked him if knife found on him after homicide was one he cut deceased with held not objectionable as assuming fact, not in evidence, that defendant stabbed deceased.

5. Witnesses ⚡387—Question to defendant as to whether police officer asked him if knife found on person after homicide was one with which he cut deceased proper for impeachment.

In murder trial, question to defendant, on cross-examination, as to whether police officer asked him if knife, found on his person immediately after homicide, was one with which he cut deceased held proper for impeachment purposes.

6. Witnesses ⚡387—May be cross-examined as to former statements inconsistent with present testimony.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, witness, whether party to action or defendant in criminal case or not, may be asked, on cross-examination, any question as to any material statement, made by him at some other time, inconsistent with his present testimony, for purpose of securing admissions or to lay foundation for impeachment.

7. Witnesses ⚡268(1), 340(3)—Cross-examination of defendant's wife as to whether she was practicing prostitution in rooming house, operated by her and defendant and wherein murder was committed, held improper.

In murder trial, cross-examination of defendant's wife, associated with him in operating rooming house in which homicide was committed, as to whether she was practicing prostitution there held improper for impeachment or any purpose.

8. Criminal law ⚡706 — Prosecuting officer should not ask question which would only degrade character of witness without eliciting competent testimony.

Prosecuting officer should ask no question, which he knows or should know could not elicit relevant or competent testimony, but would only degrade character of witness in jury's estimation.

9. Criminal law ⚡1044, 1129(1) — Improper cross-examination of defendant's wife held not reviewable, in absence of assignment as misconduct or request for instruction to disregard.

Question, on cross-examination of defendant's wife in murder trial, as to whether she was practicing prostitution in house wherein homicide was committed held not reviewable, where defendant did not assign it as misconduct nor ask court to admonish jury to disregard it, and district attorney did not pursue inquiry after objection was sustained.

10. Criminal law ⚡1144(12)—Presumed that jurors understood that sustaining of objection to question meant that subject-matter should be disregarded.

Presumption is that jurors were persons of intelligence and clearly understood that sustaining of objection to question on cross-examination of defendant's witness meant that subject-matter was irrelevant and should be disregarded, and that they did disregard it.

11. Criminal law ⚡1186(4)—Improper cross-examination of defendant's wife held not to have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

District attorney's question to defendant's wife in murder trial as to whether she was practicing prostitution in house wherein homicide was committed held not to have influenced verdict, or resulted in miscarriage of justice, within Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of strong case made by people.

12. Homicide ⚡178(1) — Testimony as to movements and statements of one whom defendant claimed might have committed crime held properly excluded.

In murder trial, testimony as to movements and statements of one whom defendant claimed might have committed crime charged, on day and evening thereof, held properly excluded for lack of sufficient evidence to connect such person with crime or commission thereof.

13. Criminal law ⚡359—Proof tending clearly to point out another as guilty of crime charged necessary to permit evidence of his commission thereof.

To permit evidence that another committed crime charged there must be such proof of his connection therewith or such train of facts and circumstances as tend clearly to point him out as guilty party, and remote acts, disconnected and outside crime itself, cannot be proved for such purpose.

14. Witnesses ⚡388(1)—Sheriff's testimony as to defendant's wife's statement exculpating another suspect held admissible.

In murder trial, testimony of defendant's wife that she did not remember whether she had made statement to sheriff and district attorney, on day named, that one whom defendant claimed might have committed crime charged left her room in afternoon of evening in which crime was committed held sufficient foundation for introduction of sheriff's testimony as to such statement for impeachment purposes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Sam Vatek was convicted of first degree murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Davies and E. S. Norby, both of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, a Greek, and his wife, Ethel Vatek, an American, were jointly indicted by the grand jury of Yuba county for the crime of murder. A motion for a separate trial of the accused having been allowed by the court, the defendant, Sam Vatek, was put upon his trial for the crime charged, and the jury returned against him a verdict of guilty of murder of the first degree, and fixed the penalty at imprisonment in the state prison for life. Penal Code, § 190.

A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant and denied, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial.

The points urged for a reversal are: Insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and alleged errors in rulings involving questions as to the admissibility of certain evidence.

The homicide took place in the early part of the evening of March 31, 1924, in a rooming house conducted by the defendant and his wife at the southeast corner of Second and D streets, in the city of Marysville. The party charged to have been slain by the defendant was a Hindu by the name of Arjan Singh Brar, who was of the age approximately of 21 years, and said by one of the witnesses (an American) to be a student. Brar was occupying room No. 2 in said rooming house at the time of the tragedy.

The building in which the homicide occurred consists of three stories, the first or ground floor of which was occupied by one Heisch as a soft drink saloon and a cigar store, and the two upper stories used as a rooming house by the defendant and his wife, as above stated. On the evening of March 31, 1924, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock, a noise resembling that which would ordinarily be produced by the falling on a floor of a human being or an article of heavy weight, a sort of thud, as Heisch expressed it, was heard to proceed from the second story of the building by said Heisch and a night watchman by the name of Dehoff. These men were in the store of Heisch at the time this noise was heard by them. Dehoff said that the noise sounded as though some one had fallen downstairs. No other noise was heard to proceed from the second story for an interval of about 15 or 20 minutes, when the same parties heard a noise sounding like some persons were "scuffling" or, perhaps, engaged in a fight. Dehoff, from the nature of the noise, suspecting that a general fight was in progress in the second story, immediately telephoned the police station, and reported that a disturbance was taking place in said rooming house. Dehoff then left the store, and hurriedly started south on Second street with the expectation of meeting any police officer who might have been detailed to investigate the matter. Reaching an alley near the post office, a few feet south of the rooming house, he met Police Officer Allen and one Bennett, the first named having been directed to respond to Dehoff's telephone call and to proceed to the rooming house and ascertain the cause of the noises. About the time Dehoff was proceeding towards the alley he observed a Hindu step out upon the sidewalk from the Second street entrance to the stairway leading to the second story of the rooming house. This Hindu, whose name the officers thereafter learned was Dahram Singh, took several steps in the direction of the alley or the post office building, and was still walking in that direction when Officer Allen and Bennett came out of the alley and were met by Dehoff. This was a few minutes after 8 o'clock p. m. Immediately Allen, Dehoff, and Bennett together proceeded to the entrance of the second story of the rooming house, taking with them the Hindu, Dahram Singh. Bennett was stationed by Allen at the foot of the stairway, and instructed by that officer to allow no one to leave or enter the building until after a full investigation of the disturbance in the second story had been had. Dehoff was the first to reach the second story, and was immediately followed by Allen, with Dahram Singh. When Dehoff reached the top of the stairway at the second story, the first thing observed by him was a man—an American whose name was later learned to be W. H. Ladner—lying, apparently in a state of unconsciousness, on the floor in room No. 6. This room was near the head of the stairway, and was occupied by the defendant and his wife. Then he saw the defendant's wife run down the hallway and turn into room 6. She, so Dehoff said, was intoxicated. Immediately thereafter Dehoff saw three Hindus and the defendant come from the direction of room No. 2. The defendant passed Dehoff and entered room No. 6. The Hindus approached Dehoff and said to the latter: "The Greek (referring to the defendant) stuck a Hindu boy in the front room." Dehoff thereupon entered the room, and there he saw the deceased, Arjan Singh Brar, lying on the floor, apparently in an unconscious condition. While all this was going on, Officer Allen, having reached the second floor within a moment's time after Dehoff had arrived at said floor, entered room 6, where the defendant and his wife then were, and in which as seen, Ladner was lying on the floor in an unconscious condition. Dehoff, after a limited investigation, discovered that Arjan Singh Brar had been stabbed in the breast. Blood was flowing from the wound, and had soaked through the front part of his shirt. Dehoff reported this to Allen. At the same time three Hindus were standing in the hallway near room 6, and one of them, so Dehoff testified, "hollered into Allen," still in room 6, accusing the defendant of having stabbed the deceased. Dr. Hoffman, of Marysville, was called, and shortly after his appearance and a superficial examination of the deceased the young man passed away. It was then about half past 8 o'clock p. m. An autoptical examination of the body of the deceased, later conducted by Dr. Hoffman, disclosed that the cause of the death of Arjan Singh Brar was "hemorrhage as the result of an incised wound of the heart." Dr. Hoffman gave it as his opinion that a person so wounded would probably not retain consciousness for a longer period than two minutes.

Officer Allen's version of what transpired after he reached the second floor may the better be told as he related it in giving his testimony at the trial, as follows:

"When I arrived at the head of the stairs room No. 6 was on the right, the door was open. I saw a man lying on the floor, who later was identified as Mr. Ladner. I started to go in the door, and Mrs. Vatek was just inside of the door, she grabbed the door and slammed it shut. I gave it a couple of kicks, and kicked it open before she could get the lock turned, and then I stepped inside of the room. The defendant, Vatek, was coming from the corner of the room where there was a wash basin in the corner, coming towards me. I asked what the trouble was; Mrs. Vatek, who seemed to be highly intoxicated, said there wasn't any trouble, and began—I says 'What are you trying to keep me out of here for?' She said, 'There's no trouble, go on out,' and put her hands on me and began to try to shove me out of the room, and I shoved her away from me a few times, and in the meantime there was several of these Hindus, this Hindu wearing a turban, Bishan Singh, he came right up to the door and he told me there was a man cut, a Hindu man cut in another room; I told Dehoff to go see. He came back and told me, yes, there was a Hindu in there lying on the floor that was cut, so I told him to stay there while I went and looked at the Hindu. I looked at the Hindu, tried to talk to him, couldn't get anything out of him, I was asking him who cut him. I asked Mit Singh to ask him to tell him to tell me who cut him and what the trouble was. Mit Singh told me he could speak good English; that Arjan Singh, the man on the floor, was a student. So I went back and told Officer Dehoff to get a doctor. He left the building to get the doctor, and I had returned then to room No. 6, and Mrs. Vatek attempted to close the door again to room No. 6, I kicked it open again. At that time, when I entered she put her arms—tried to put her arms around my neck, she was just in a drunken condition, trying to get me out of the room, trying to smooth things over, telling me everything was all right. I pushed her away from me; in pushing her away she stumbled and fell over this man Ladner that was still lying on the floor, and then the defendant, Vatek, rushed over to me, grabbed me by the arm, and began to say, 'This is white woman, you no strike this white woman, this white woman like you'; then Bishan Singh, he told me, he said, 'You look out, this man has got knife,' pointing towards Vatek, the defendant. So I struck with the back of my hand; he had hold of my clothes, my coat; I struck with the back of my hand like that, struck him on the throat, he staggered back against the bed; then I grabbed him by both arms and reached in his inside coat pocket here and pulled a paring knife—

"Q. Who reached in there first, he or you? A. I reached in there first, when I knocked him against the bed he staggered back, and he reached like this, I was right on top of him immediately, and I reached in the same pocket he started to reach in first and found this paring knife.

"Q. I will show you a knife and ask you to look at it and ask you if you can identify it? A. That is the same knife.

"Q. That is the same knife that you took out of his inside coat pocket? A. Yes. * * * I asked Mit Singh and Bishan Singh who cut this Hindu, and they both told me that the Greek did.

"Q. Was Vatek present at the time? A. He was present.

"Q. Did they point to him? A. They pointed to him; said this Greek cut him—this was in room 6—the Hindus were just outside the door, but Vatek and myself were inside the door.

"Q. Where was Vatek's wife? A. She was right there, she was present, part of the time she was on the floor, part of the time she was standing up; I pushed her down several times; after that she would get up and come to me, put her hands on me; after I took the knife from Vatek, he looked in a highly excited manner, was glancing around the room, and I pulled my revolver around in front like this, my scabbard, had my coat unbuttoned, I told him to stay over in that corner and not start anything or I would drill him. I told him he had killed this Hindu and I wasn't fooling with a murderer. We remained in about that position until Officers McAuliffe and Barrett arrived, and I placed my handcuffs on Mrs. Vatek, and Officer Barrett placed his handcuffs on Vatek, the defendant, and these two officers took the defendants and started off.

"Q. At the time that the Hindus told you that Vatek had cut the Hindu what did Vatek say? A. He didn't say anything, that is, he didn't say yes or no. * * *

"Q. When you got that knife out of his pocket did you ask him anything? A. I asked him what he was doing with that knife in his pocket, and he said that he used it to cut greens with.

"Q. Did you ask him if he had used that knife to cut the Hindu with? A. I don't recall now whether I asked him that or not.

"Q. What was Vatek's condition at that time? A. In what respect?

"Q. Intoxicated or sober? A. He was apparently sober, but in a highly excited condition."

Allen stated that he aroused Ladner from his sleep and asked him a few questions, but that all he could get from him was, "I'll fight 'em—I can hold my own." Allen said that Ladner's shirt had been "pulled up above his trousers, and he had a money belt on under his shirt that was exposed"; that "his coat was open, and there were papers from his inside coat pocket, some were out and looked like they had been pulled out and stuck back again"; that Ladner had blood on his right hand, which "looked like a smear of blood, and a little blood on his hair. His hat was lying over in the corner of the room." The officer, on making an examination of the room, found a raincoat smoothly tucked under the mattress of a bed in the room, opera glasses in the drawer of a dresser under some feminine wearing apparel, a knife on the floor near where Ladner had been lying, and a little over $4 in silver under a rug in the room. He also found under the cover of the dresser a notice addressed to Ladner from a Marysville newspaper, notifying him that his subscription had expired.

Allen testified that all of the Hindus present, with the exception of one Rulla Singh, were sober. Rulla Singh appeared to be much under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

The witness, Mit Singh, testified that he, Bishan Singh, Nadham Singh, and Rulla Singh went to the rooming house in question at about the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. of March 31, 1924, and rented room No. 3, in which there were several beds. They were assigned to said room by the wife of the defendant; Nadham Singh writing the name of each in the register. After registering and being shown their room they left the house and went down upon the streets. About 8 p. m. of said day the witness and Bishan Singh, accompanied by another Hindu, who was met by the first witness on one of the streets of Marysville, returned to the rooming house. Mit Singh testified that just as he and his companions reached the top of the stairway at the time last mentioned the defendant's wife partly opened the door of room 2 (occupied by the deceased), looked towards him and the other Hindus, and then started out of the door into the hallway, and, addressing the Hindus, commanded them to "go back," or "go away," repeating the command several times. The witness, or one of the other Hindus, replied that they "had rooms there and would not go back." She thereupon hastily passed the Hindus and entered her own room, No. 6. Immediately following the entrance of defendant's wife into room 6, the witness continued, the defendant, holding the deceased about the upper part of his body with his left hand and his right hand extending down and backwards, came out of room 2. The witness saw no knife or other weapon in the right hand of defendant. On observing the Hindus in the hallway, the defendant ordered them to "go away," and at about the same instant of time he released his hold on deceased and rushed past the Hindus, and, as other witnesses testified, entered his own room. The deceased fell to the floor, and Mit Singh and the other Hindus hastened to his side to assist him. The deceased called for water several times, also exclaimed that he had given "his life for the old American," and thereafter lapsed into unconsciousness, from which state he did not recover. Before the young man expired the Hindus carried him into room 3, and placed him on a bed from which he rolled or fell to the floor, where, as seen, he was lying at the time the police officers and Dr. Hoffman arrived at the premises. In room 3, during all the times mentioned, was Rulla Singh, who had in the course of the afternoon become intoxicated and had gone to said room. Rulla was lying on a bed apparently oblivious to his surroundings and the occurrences of which we have spoken.

The testimony of the other Hindus who were with Mit Singh was, substantially, the same as that of the latter in all important particulars. Bishan Singh, though, added that, when Allen and Dehoff appeared at the second floor, he said to the former that Brar had been stabbed, "so look out for this Greek (referring to the defendant), he had a knife." It should be stated that Dahram Singh testified, and he was corroborated in this by two of the other Hindus, that, when the serious condition of the deceased was discovered, he was requested to go to the police station and get an interpreter. This accounted for Dahram Singh leaving the rooming house and being met by the officers on the sidewalk as above explained.

All of the Hindus named testified that there was no fight, altercation, or difficulty of any kind or character by and between them or any one of them and the defendant or his wife on the 31st day of March, 1924.

The defendant, his wife, the four Hindus above named, and Ladner were placed under arrest and taken to the police station. Later the defendant and his wife were removed to the county jail. On examining the person of the defendant a watch and chain which he admitted belonged to Ladner were found in his possession.

W. H. Ladner, an American, and a farmer of Yuba county, and of whom mention is made above, testified that between the hours of 4 and 5 p. m. of March 31, 1924, he went to the rooming house in question to procure a room; that when he reached the second floor, and was still near the last upper step of the stairway, the defendant's wife came into the hallway from her room, and seeing him, asked him "if I ever drank"; that he asked her what kind of liquor she had, to which she replied, "Some good wine." She invited Ladner into her room (No. 6). There were then in the room, so Ladner testified, the defendant and another man. The witness had four drinks. He paid $1 for the wine. The interval of time between the drinks was from 10 to 20 minutes. He remembered nothing that occurred in the room after taking the fourth drink. He stated that he was perfectly sober when he arrived at the rooming house; that he was accustomed to drinking wine; and that ordinarily four of such glasses of wine as he drank on that occasion would not have the effect of rendering him so intoxicated as to lose his senses. It was later discovered that Ladner had received an injury on the back of his head. There was matted blood in his hair on that part of his head. He testified that he did not know how the injury was caused; that he had not had a fight with any one that afternoon or evening, and did not know that any one had struck him, if he had been struck. When he first arrived at the premises, he stated, he had on his person about $12 in money. He recalled that he had a $5 and a $2 bill and some silver. He also had a raincoat, a watch and chain, a pocket knife, a pair of gloves, a pair of spectacles, or, as some of the witnesses called them, "opera glasses." At the trial he identified the coat, the opera glasses, the knife, gloves, etc., found in the defendant's room, as described by Officer Allen, as his property. He also identified the watch and chain which had been taken from the person of the defendant as his property. He testified that he did not give said personal property to any one and did not know how or by whom they were taken from his possession.

The sheriff of Yuba county, certain police officers, and the district attorney testified that on a number of occasions after his arrest the defendant, referring to the trouble occurring in his house on the evening in question, declared: "I had to do it to protect my wife"; and, on one occasion, when he made the declaration just quoted, the sheriff asked him what he did with his knife, but the defendant made no answer, and appeared not to be disposed further to discuss or talk about the case.

[1] The above is a sufficient statement of the people's proofs to show that the verdict of the jury is well supported, evidentially. Indeed, it would be difficult to conceive how the jury, if they believed the witnesses testifying for the people, as the verdict implies that they did, could have formed any other conclusion than that at which they arrived. It is true that no knife with blood upon it was found in the defendant's room, or anywhere on the premises, nor did the potato knife found in his coat pocket have upon it blood stains; but, while the circumstance of finding in the room of the defendant or upon his person a blood-stained knife would have afforded strong support to the other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, yet the proof of such circumstance was not, in view of the strong case otherwise made by the people against the accused, indispensable as in proof of the defendant's guilt or as in justification of the verdict arrived at. But there was testimony, as, for instance, the fact that the defendant was seen to rush towards the sink in his room just as Officer Allen entered the apartment, a circumstance from which, in view of the many strong inculpatory circumstances disclosed by the evidence against the accused, the jury might and could well have reasoned that his purpose in going to the sink was to cleanse the "potato knife" of blood stains, and that he did so, or the jury might have concluded that the knife with which the fatal wound was inflicted had in some way been secreted about the premises or so disposed of as to make it impossible to find or locate it. There is some testimony relating to the condition of the premises which would lend support to that theory. But there is no call for an analytical examination herein of the testimony to demonstrate that, as before declared, the verdict is amply supplied with evidentiary support. Some one killed Arjan Singh Brar. It is not claimed that the fatal wound was self-inflicted, nor, in view of the character of the evidence presented by the people, could such a claim reasonably be advanced or sustained. There is no testimony that any one of the Hindus present at the time committed the crime. All the proved circumstances appear to point to the guilt of Vatek. Of course, the latter vigorously denied that he was the author of the homicide, and attempted to explain, consistently with the theory of his innocence, the many damaging circumstances which the evidence by the people developed against him. His wife, testifying for him, attempted to support his plea of innocence. An effort was also made to bolster the defendant's plea of not guilty upon the theory that another party, a Greek, known as Pete Kumbus, might have committed the crime. All of these matters, though, were for the jury to consider with all the other evidence and determine what the truth was as to the ultimate issue upon which their judgment was required. But we find it necessary to examine herein the Kumbus theory, not that the effect thereof, from the standpoint from which a Court of Appeal must view the proofs, has been to introduce a doubt as to the impregnability of the case made by the people, but solely because it bears upon the rulings of the court disallowing certain testimony presented by the defendant, and which, it is contended, involved errors highly prejudicial to the rights of the accused. Before taking up these assignments for consideration we will dispose of several other points arising from rulings admitting certain evidence.

[2, 3] Assignments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 involve exceptions to the rulings of the court in allowing the district attorney, over objections by the defendant, to show by the witness Ladner that the several and various articles of personal property which, with the exception of the watch and chain, which, as seen, were found on the person of the defendant, were found on the evening of the homicide secreted in different places in the room of the defendant, belonged to the witness. The several articles mentioned were shown to Ladner when he was on the witness stand, and he identified them as his property and which he had in his possession when first he went into the room of the defendant on the invitation of the latter's wife on the afternoon of the day the homicide was committed. Except in so far as it may be extracted from the evidence as a whole, the particular theory upon which the testimony now under consideration was offered by the people and allowed by the court is not shown by the record. The evidence presented by the people, however, obviously justifies and supports this theory: That, when Ladner entered the room of the defendant, the latter conceived the idea of taking from him any money or other personal property he had in his possession; that, to accomplish that purpose, he plied Ladner with liquor in which he had placed some sort of narcotic in a sufficient quantity to produce sleep or unconsciousness; that Ladner having, as a result of drinking the liquor, become unconscious, or so much so as to render him incapable of appreciating his surroundings or realizing what was going on about him, the defendant proceeded to carry out his scheme to deprive Ladner of whatever personal property he then had in his possession; that the man other than the defendant that Ladner saw in the latter's room when he (Ladner) first entered it was the deceased; that, while the defendant was engaged in taking or perhaps had taken from Ladner his personal belongings, the deceased protested against such conduct, and thus a fight between the defendant and the deceased was precipitated, resulting finally in the slaying of the deceased by the defendant. Or a reasonable theory from the evidence is that, after Ladner had gotten under the influence of the liquor, the defendant started to remove from his person whatever money and other personal property were then in his possession; that Ladner was not so far intoxicated as not to be able to realize what defendant was trying to do, and that he resisted or attempted to defend himself and his property; that the deceased went to Ladner's assistance, and so attempted to prevent his being injured or his property taken from him; that in the skirmish Ladner was knocked or thrown violently to the floor by the defendant, sustaining an injury to the back of his head, and by the blow rendered unconscious; that the defendant, either incensed at the interference of deceased in the matter, or fearful of what he might, in the event of his (defendant's) arrest and prosecution on the charge of larceny, become a witness for the people, assaulted the deceased; that the latter thereupon fled to his own room, and was followed by defendant, and that in said room the latter dealt the knife blow that caused the death of the deceased. The declaration of the deceased, just before he passed away, that he had given his life "for the old American" is significant, and would seem to afford strong support, when considered with the other evidence, to the general theory suggested upon either of the hypotheses pointed out. This court may assume that the theory upon which the case was presented by the people in the court below is any theory of which the proofs are reasonably susceptible. Obviously the theory suggested is pregnant with a motive in the defendant for the commission of the crime, and the testimony of Ladner that the articles of personal property found secreted in the room of the defendant and on his person when arrested, that he had said property in his possession when he entered defendant's room on the day of the homicide, and that he gave the property to no one or otherwise voluntarily parted with it, was, of course, peculiarly material, relevant, and important in proof of the defendant's guilt upon that theory.

[4-6] Assignment No. 7 is based upon a ruling permitting the district attorney to propound the following question to the defendant on cross-examination: "Did he (Police Officer Allen) ask you if this is the knife you cut the Hindu with?" referring to the "potato knife" found in the coat pocket of the defendant immediately after he was seen holding and later letting go his hold of the deceased as described. The objection to the question was that it assumed something not in evidence—that is, that the question proceeded on the assumption, unauthorized by any evidence, that the defendant stabbed the deceased and so took his life. The objection was not well taken. It will be noted that the defendant himself was not asked, as a witness, "if this is the knife you cut the Hindu with," but whether the officer, in a conversation with the defendant shortly after the homicide, asked the latter "if this is the knife you cut the Hindu with." Readily it will be seen that the question was not obnoxious to the particular objection urged against it. Nor was it subject to any objection. The question was proper for the purpose of impeachment. The rule is elementary, and, indeed, expressly declared in our Code, that a witness, whether or not he is a party to the action or whether he be the defendant in a criminal case, may be asked on cross-examination any question as to any material statement he might at some other time have made inconsistent with his "present testimony" for the purpose, either of securing an admission from him of the fact which it is the design of the question to elicit, or for laying the foundation for his impeachment as to the particular matter to which the question was addressed. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052.

[7-11] The district attorney (assignment No. 8), cross-examining defendant's wife, put this question to her: "Was any prostitution being practiced on the premises?" referring to the rooming house in which the homicide occurred. The defense objected to the question on the usual grounds. Before the court had time to rule on the objection the district attorney withdrew the question and then asked this question: "Were you practicing prostitution there?" a prompt objection to which was made, and as promptly as well as properly sustained. The line of inquiry involved in the question did not constitute a proper mode for the impeachment of the witness, if such was its purpose, and, indeed, was not proper for any purpose. The witness being the wife of the defendant, and associated with him in the operation of the rooming house in which the homicide was committed, the asking of the question, if having any effect at all upon the jury, would be unjustly to militate against the interests of the defendant or wrongfully diminish the force of any defense which he had interposed or was putting before the jury. A prosecuting officer, as often the Supreme Court and this court have said, should never ask any question which he knows or ought to know could not elicit relevant or competent testimony, but whose only effect would be to degrade the character of a witness in the estimation of the jury. But the defendant here did not assign the fact of the asking of the question as misconduct on the part of the district attorney, nor did he ask the court to admonish the jury to disregard the question and the unsavory imputation which it carried. It has been held that, where a district attorney, in the examination or cross-examination of a witness in a criminal case, asks questions relative to a matter wholly foreign to the issues and which are pregnant with an innuendo against the personal character of the witness or the defendant, the latter must, to preserve his right to have the conduct of the prosecuting officer in asking such questions reviewed on appeal, except to and assign such conduct as misconduct, and also request the court to instruct the jury to disregard the questions and all that they imply. This rule has been departed from in cases where the district attorney, after objections to the questions have been sustained, has persistently pursued the inquiry to which the questions were addressed. Here the prosecuting officer did not pursue the inquiry after the objection to the question was sustained. Furthermore, the presumption is that the jurors were persons of intelligence and that they clearly understood that the action of the court in sustaining the objection by the defendant to the question meant that the subject-matter thereof had no true relation to the case, and should be by them disregarded in considering whether the accused was or was not guilty, and that they did disregard it. At all events, we cannot say, in view of the strong case of guilt made by the people against the defendant, that the asking of the question could have exercised any baleful influence in bringing about the verdict returned. Certainly, after considering the entire record, this court cannot justly hold that the alleged misconduct of the district attorney in asking the question referred to resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[12] Assignments Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 are founded on the rulings disallowing proof in support of the rather vaguely grounded theory, above referred to, that the crime charged against the defendant might have been committed by one Pete Kumbus. As all of these assignments relate to the same general proposition, they may be considered together. To clarify the consideration of said assignments, it will be requisite to state herein briefly the circumstances which the defendant seemed to have conceived afforded a handle for the introduction of or an attempt to introduce a theory which might bring home to Kumbus responsibility for the homicide.

The defendant and his wife testified that in the early morning hours of March 31, 1924, they left Marysville in their automobile for Yuba City, Sutter county, which is situated south of and just across the Feather river from the city of Marysville, their object being to gather "some greens" growing near Yuba City; that, reaching said place within a few minutes after they left their home, and not knowing just where greens could be found, they called at the residence of an acquaintance in Yuba City, one Paul Diacoumes, a Greek, and asked him where the greens could be obtained; that Diacoumes accompanied them to a spot several blocks from his residence, and pointed out where the greens were growing; that defendant and his wife gathered a quantity of the greens, and thereupon, with Diacoumes, returned to the latter's home, where they had lunch at the noon hour, and thereafter remained until about 2 p. m., when they left in their car, first taking a short ride, and then returning to their home, reaching there about the hour of 3 p. m. The defendant testified that the Pete Kumbus mentioned above called at the home of Diacoumes while they were having their lunch, and that he also ate lunch with them; that he (defendant) was introduced to Kumbus on that occasion; that Kumbus then stated to him (defendant) that he (Kumbus) expected to go to work within a few days as a section hand for the W. P. R. R. Co. at Marysville. The wife of the defendant testified that, while it was true that she had seen Kumbus at different times on the streets of Marysville prior to the 31st day of March, she could not recall that she saw him at the house of Diacoumes in Yuba City on the 31st day of March. Both the defendant and his wife testified that about 30 minutes after they reached their home from their trip to Yuba City Paul Kumbus appeared at their rooming house; that Kumbus was invited into the room of defendant and wife, and remained there several hours drinking wine; that Kumbus was there while Ladner was there. Shortly after 7 o'clock p. m., the defendant, so he testified, left the rooming house and went to a Chinese restaurant to procure a chicken for dinner, leaving both Kumbus and Ladner in the room with his wife; that he had previously invited both Kumbus and Ladner to remain and have dinner with him and his wife; that he returned about 5 minutes to 8 o'clock, and that Kumbus was not there, having before his (defendant's) return left the house; that Ladner was still there; that, while he was in the kitchen preparing the dinner, Ladner started to leave and stepped out into the hall, where there were four or five Hindus "standing around"; that the Hindus, for some reason, attacked Ladner, and that his wife excitedly ran into the kitchen and told him of the attack; that he thereupon ran out into the hallway, found that Ladner had been knocked or fallen down the stairway a few steps, and that he began fighting the Hindus for the purpose of protecting Ladner from further assault at their hands; that finally the fighting ceased, and he and his wife then assisted Ladner into their room and laid him on the floor. In this connection it may be stated that the defendant, in explanation of his possession of Ladner's watch and chain, testified that when he assisted Ladner to his feet from the stairway he saw the watch and chain lying on one of the steps and that he picked them up and placed them in his pocket. Mrs. Vatek testified that Kumbus was still in their room when the defendant returned with the chicken, but left while her husband was in the kitchen preparing the dinner and prior to the time of the alleged assault upon Ladner by the Hindus.

No one saw Kumbus leave the rooming house, nor is there any evidence in the record showing the precise time at which he did leave. As to the time that he left the room of the defendant the testimony of the latter and that of his wife, as will be observed, do not agree. It is important to note, however, that their testimony is in accord upon the significant fact that he left the room before any disturbance occurred in the house and was not seen by either defendant or his wife while the alleged fighting was in progress.

This statement is sufficient to point the reasons moving the court to disallow the testimony offered for the purpose of showing the movements and statements of Kumbus.

We now proceed to the consideration of the rulings excluding the testimony so proposed. As stated above, the assignments now to be considered all relate to the same general proposition, and the testimony offered for that purpose and excluded by the court may generally be stated as follows: By Paul Diaconoules: That, having stated that Kumbus had been stopping at his home, the period of time during which he had lived there, when he left there and whether the witness saw Kumbus on the evening of the 31st day of March, 1924, after he (Kumbus) had left the witness' house earlier in the day. By one Steve Ontales, section foreman for the Western Pacific Railroad Company at Marysville: Whether Kumbus, on Monday morning, March 31, 1924, applied to said foreman "with reference to obtaining work" and also by the same witness, who testified that at different times Kumbus worked under the witness for said railroad company, whether he saw Kumbus at his residence on the evening of March 31st, and, if so, as to how long he (Kumbus) remained there, and whether the witness had seen Kumbus since the evening of the 31st of March, and whether witness had a conversation with Kumbus on the occasion just mentioned. Exception No. 15: The striking out of the testimony of one Otto after he had testified that in the evening of the day of the homicide, about 8 o'clock, as he was crossing an alley about 120 feet from the entrance to the rooming house of the Vateks, he was run down by a man who bore the appearance of being a Hindu; that when witness first noticed this man the latter was "looking up Second street towards the entrance of the Vatek house; that, after striking him (witness) the man proceeded down the alley as fast as he could until he disappeared from sight." Allowing, over objection by defense, Sheriff McCoy to say, in response to questions by the district attorney, that, in a conversation with Mrs. Vatek on the 2d day of April, 1924, two days succeeding that upon which the tragedy occurred, she stated that "there was another Greek there (referring to her room) that afternoon" (March 31st), and further said that "he left there about 4 o'clock."

[13] The court was clearly right in excluding and striking out the testimony purporting to show the alleged movements and statements of Kumbus on the day and evening in question. There was no showing worthy of being called such which in any measure or degree connected Kumbus with the crime or the commission thereof, and therefore his statement to others as to his intentions with respect to applying for work with the railroad company, that he was offered work and agreed to accept the same, and then abandoned his purpose to enter upon such work, was hearsay and incompetent. There was no offer to show that Kumbus had any acquaintance with the deceased, or knew that he was rooming at the house of the defendant, or that he was at said house at the time he (Kumbus) was there on the 31st day of March, or that he ever had any trouble with the deceased, or any reason or motive for having trouble with or slaying him. It is true that it is proper for the defendant "to show by any legal evidence that another person committed the crime with which he is charged, and that he is innocent of any participation therein. But before such testimony can be received, there must be such proof of connection with it, such a train of facts or circumstances, as tend clearly to point out such other person as the guilty party. Remote acts, disconnected and outside of the crime itself, cannot be separately proved for such a purpose." 8 R. C. L. § 178. It is to be added that there was no testimony, nor offer to introduce any, that Kumbus, while at the rooming house, had trouble with anybody, or that, immediately after leaving the room of the defendant, there was any noise indicating that trouble or a fight or an assault took place in the room of the deceased, which was located near the room of the defendant and within sight thereof. To the contrary, according to the testimony of the defendant and his wife, the first and only disturbance which occurred on the second floor of the house on the day in question or the evening thereof was that between the Hindus and Ladner and in which the defendant took a hand. There was no testimony, or even pretense that, assuming that the disturbance or fight described by the defendant and his wife did actually take place, either the deceased or Kumbus took part in it or was in the hallway when it occurred. The proposed testimony of the witness Otto as to seeing a dark complexioned person, resembling a Hindu, passed rapidly down an alley at about the time the disturbance was heard in the upper story of the house constituted the most powerful of all the circumstances which the defendant proposed to introduce as tending to show that Kumbus might have been the slayer of Brar. But, if allowed, that testimony, without assistance from other facts more directly tending to connect Kumbus with the commission of the crime, could not have had the effect of supporting the theory that the latter was the author of the crime, or of shaking the force of the people's evidence, both positive and circumstantial, tending to show, and, indeed, if believable (and the jury believed it), clearly enough showing that the defendant took the life of the deceased.

[14] The ruling allowing Sheriff McCoy to say that Mrs. Vatek, on the 2d day of April, 1924, stated to the witness, in the presence of the district attorney, that Pete Kumbus left her room at 4 p. m. on the 31st day of March was proper. Mrs. Vatek, when testifying, was asked whether she made such a statement to the sheriff and the district attorney on the day named, and replied that she did not remember whether she had or not. Thus the proper foundation was laid for the introduction of the sheriff's testimony as in impeachment of Mrs. Vatek regarding the matter to which the said testimony related.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

1. Railroads — 400(10) — Pedestrian's negligence held for jury.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by train, whether he was negligent held for jury.

2. Trial — 260(8) — Refusal of instruction held not erroneous in view of given instruction.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by train, refusal of instruction that even though train operators failed to give warning of its approach, plaintiff was not relieved from duty of ordinary care to look and listen for trains which might injure him, and if by use of such care he might have ascertained that a train was coming and failed to do so, he could not recover if such failure proximately contributed to his injury, held not erroneous in view of given instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Joseph E. McDonald against the Southern Pacific Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ostrander & Carey, Philip M. Carey, and Chapman, Trefethen & Chapman, all of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them for $25,000, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The defendant company is the owner and operator of the electric train which caused the injury, and the other defendant is the motorman who operated the same.

The defendants admit, in the briefs filed on their behalf in this court, that, from the conflicting evidence upon the subject and the implied finding of the jury, this court must start from the premise that the negligence of the defendant was established. The question argued by appellant upon appeal is that the evidence offered by plaintiff on his own behalf convicts him of contributory negligence, barring his recovery.

The accident occurred near the intersection of Fourteenth and Franklin streets, in the city of Oakland, Cal. Franklin street runs north and south. It is intersected by Fourteenth street, which runs east and west. The block to the east of Franklin street, between Fourteenth and Thirteenth, is used by the appellant company as a depot where trains to and from San Francisco have their terminals. Double tracks approach the terminal from a northerly direction on Franklin street, and turn in a curve into the depot premises, and in doing this, necessarily, cross the east sidewalk on Franklin, between Fourteenth and Thirteenth streets. In walking in a southerly direction on the east sidewalk of Franklin street opposite the depot premises, the first track to be passed is that used by the outgoing or west-bound San Francisco trains, while the second track is used by the incoming or east-bound trains. All of these incoming trains come to a stop on the north side of Fourteenth street before proceeding over that street and into the depot premises. The distance between the outgoing and incoming tracks is approximately 35 feet. The accident occurred in the afternoon. Plaintiff was walking in a southerly direction on the public sidewalk on the east side of Franklin street, approaching its intersection with Fourteenth street. Upon arriving at the north side of Fourteenth street, he looked both ways for traffic and proceeded across the street. When at about the center of Fourteenth street he looked back and saw a single south-bound car of the defendant at a stop on the north side of Fourteenth street near the "Stop" sign. He continued to cross Fourteenth street, and after crossing the sidewalk on the south side of Fourteenth street, proceeded on the east sidewalk of Franklin street across the tracks of the defendant, which turned off Franklin street on a curve and into its station property. When he arrived at about the center of the more easterly north-bound track, he again looked back and saw the car standing in the same position as before. He continued on his way, and when he was upon the west or south-bound track, he heard a rush of air, and looking around, saw the car was almost upon him. He jumped back, but was struck by the left-hand front corner of the car. The car had moved rapidly over the crossing, and was then allowed to coast around the curve and across the sidewalk without any bell or warning being sounded, and without any lookout being kept by the person operating the same.

Appellants contend that because the plaintiff did not turn and look for the third time before stepping upon the south-bound track he is guilty of negligence as a matter of law under the cases decided in this state. We think the facts of this case distinguish it from the cases depended upon by appellant. Here the plaintiff looked twice, and both times saw the car standing stationary. He then attempted to walk about 35 feet, relying upon the car either remaining stationary or giving a warning signal of its approach. He was in plain view of the motorman upon the car, and the car came up behind him. To see it again he would have had to turn around. An adequate idea of his situation and the naturalness of his actions under the circumstances cannot be conveyed without the aid of the map appearing in the record, or a view of the premises involved here. Such a view was had by the jury, and the physical facts evidently had much to do with the determination of the controversy.

The peculiarity of the physical situation, the noisy, congested portion of the city in which the accident happened, the fact that the car approached plaintiff from the rear on a curve, the fact that the car was at a standstill on both occasions when the plaintiff looked at it, are factors entering into the determination of what was reasonable care upon the part of the plaintiff.

[1] It is a question for the jury to determine what would be the conduct of a person of ordinary prudence under similar circumstances. Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677. The jury has done so in this instance under most careful instructions, after hearing the evidence and viewing the premises.

[2] The only other question raised is as to the failure of the court to give certain instructions on behalf of the defendant. One of these instructions was to the effect that even if the operators of the train failed to give a warning of its approach, this would not relieve the plaintiff from the duty of ordinary care to look and listen for trains which might injure him, and if by the use of such care he might have ascertained that a train was coming and failed to do so, he cannot recover if such failure proximately contributed to his injury. The same idea is embodied in the following instruction given by the court:

"The tracks of a railroad company are themselves a sign of danger, and one about to cross such tracks must exercise his faculties of sight and hearing to watch and listen for trains or cars going in either direction, and if, by exercising his faculties of sight and hearing as would an ordinarily careful person, he could see or hear a car approaching either from the side or from behind, he fails to see such train and is injured thereby, and his failure so to see or hear said train contributes in the slightest manner, directly or proximately, to the collision, * * * the plaintiff cannot recover."

Repeatedly the court laid down the rule in the instruction:

"* * * If in this case you find from the evidence that plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care or caution and that such failure on his part contributed * * * to such accident in the slightest degree, or in any manner whatever * * * plaintiff cannot recover."

Again, the jury was instructed:

"* * * A pedestrian, if upon a railroad track, must leave it when a train approaches, and must use his senses of sight and hearing while walking over or along a railroad track to ascertain whether a train is approaching in either direction, and if he fails to take such precaution he is guilty of contributory negligence. * * *"

We think the instructions fully and fairly covered the defendants' rights in this litigation.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

SALISBURY v. CAMPE-ROSE CO.
(Civ. 5102.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 16, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 15, 1925.)

- 1. Appeal and error ⚡635(3)—Appeal will be affirmed where only statement under assignment is that evidence is insufficient to sustain verdict and evidence is not printed in record.

Appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, providing for appeal by filing transcript in lieu of bill of exceptions, will be affirmed, where assignment relating to insufficiency of evidence is submitted on statement that it is self-evident that the competent evidence in record is insufficient to justify verdict, and no other argument is made to support point, and evidence is not printed in record, especially where appellant stated in reply brief that "no issues of fact are now before this court."

- 2. Appeal and error ⚡882(19) — Appellant cannot complain that damages were result of passion and prejudice, where his evidence might have unfavorably influenced jury.

Appellant cannot complain that damages were result of passion and prejudice, where the only evidence in transcript which might have prejudiced jury was evidence by appellant's witnesses of appellant's trickery and deception.

- 3. Appeal and error ⚡1078(1)—Record will not be searched for error, if assignment is not argued in brief.

Appellate court will not search record to find error, if assignment of error is not argued in brief.

- 4. Appeal and error ⚡901—It is appellant's duty to show wherein evidence is insufficient to sustain verdict.

If verdict was not sustained by evidence, it is appellant's duty to show wherein evidence was insufficient.

- 5. Witnesses ⚡227—Unnecessary to reswear witness to whom judge directed questions at close of trial.

Where trial judge, at close of trial, directed questions to party who had previously been sworn as witness, it is unnecessary to again swear him, and whether he answered questions from witness stand or while standing at counsel table is immaterial.

- 6. Appeal and error ⚡932(1)—It is assumed that evidence is sufficient to warrant verdict in the amount rendered.

It will be assumed on appeal in support of judgment that jury deemed evidence sufficient to warrant verdict in the amount which it rendered.

- 7. Appeal and error ⚡1033(9) — Appellant cannot complain of reduction of verdict against him.

Error, if any, in reducing verdict against appellant is not error prejudicial to appellant, and therefore not ground for appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by W. S. Salisbury against the Campe-Rose Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hoefler, Cook & Lingenfelter, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Colston & Hamm and J. G. Moser, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action for damages for breach of contract. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict for $3,231, the full sum demanded in the complaint, was returned in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly. Thereafter the defendant moved for a new trial, and pending the determination thereof the trial judge reduced the judgment to the sum of $2,110. This remission was accepted by the plaintiff, the motion for a new trial was denied, and judgment for the reduced sum was accordingly entered. From this judgment the defendant appeals under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

On this appeal four assignments of error are made as follows: (1) Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice; (2) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict and judgment; (3) that the verdict is against law; and (4) error in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the defendant.

[1] The second assignment of error, that relating to the insufficiency of the evidence, is submitted to us by the appellant on the mere statement that "it is self-evident that the competent evidence in the record is insufficient to justify the verdict." No other argument is made in support of this point, and the evidence itself is not printed in the record. For this reason alone we should affirm the judgment upon that point. Estate of Berry (Cal. Sup.) 233 P. 330. In addition to this, after the respondent had printed portions of the evidence tending to support the verdict, and had pointed out to us the conflict in the testimony of various witnesses, the appellant in its reply brief practically withdrew the point in its statement that "no issues of fact are now before this court."

[2] Upon the point that the damages were excessive, the appellant does not print any of the evidence and does not direct our attention to any portion of the typewritten transcript bearing upon the point urged. From our examination of the transcript we are unable to find any evidence supporting the contention that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice, unless it be that the jury was influenced by the unfavorable picture which the appellant's witnesses disclosed of its own trickery and deception in the conduct of its business relations with the respondent. We cannot say whether this evidence influenced the verdict, but, if it did, it is not an error of which the appellant may complain.

[3] To the point "error in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the appellant," the appellant has not directed our attention to any specific error, and has not made any argument in support of the point urged other than to refer us to what is said under the heading, "The verdict is against law." If an assignment of error is not of sufficient importance to justify an appellant in making an argument in the brief in support of it, it is not incumbent upon this court to search the record to find error to aid the appellant on the appeal.

Under the assignment that the verdict is against law, the whole argument is based upon a misconception of the issues of the case. The respondent sued upon a claim for damages for breach of contract, and alleged that on December 27, 1921, he entered into a written contract with Lou H. Rose Company whereby respondent was to act as dealer of Maxwell motor vehicles for which said company was then distributor. It was then alleged that, while the respondent was acting under the terms of this contract and about July 1, 1921, the appellant Campe-Rose Company, a corporation, became the successor of Lou H. Rose Company, and that the plaintiff continued to act as such dealer for the appellant under the old contract; that about the 12th day of July, 1922, appellant and respondent entered into a supplemental agreement to the effect that the contract should terminate upon plaintiff's completing any unfinished business then on hand; that in accordance with said agreement and the supplement thereto the respondent continued in the actual sale of said motor vehicles and to take orders therefor, and that he, did actually sell and contract to deliver 15 touring cars, 1 sedan, and 1 coupé for the total price of $16,145, for which he was entitled to a discount by way of commission at the rate of 20 per cent. on the factory price of the cars sold.

All the material allegations of the complaint were denied in the answer, and the affirmative allegation was made that on the first day of June, 1922, the appellant entered into a contract with the Maxwell Motor Sales Company whereby it became a distributor for Maxwell motor vehicles in the same territory as that named in the original contract with Lou H. Rose Company, and that said Lou H. Rose Company was not interested in the latter contract.

From this it is argued that, the Lou H. Rose Company having ceased to be a distributor for the Maxwell cars on June 1, 1922, its contract with the respondent became ab-rogated on that date. From the foregoing résumé of the pleadings it will be seen that the claim for damages is based, not upon the contract of Lou H. Rose Company of December 27, 1921, but upon the contract between appellant and respondent made on the 12th of July, 1922. This contract referred to in the pleadings and briefs as the supplemental contract of July 12th is found in the appellant's letter of that date addressed to the respondent and signed by Lou H. Rose, vice president of that corporation. It was written upon the following letter head of the corporation: "Campe-Rose Co., Successors to Lou H. Rose Co.," and reads as follows:

"W. S. Salisbury, 555 Valencia St., San Francisco, Cal.—Dear Mr. Salisbury: The correspondence which we have been awaiting from Detroit arrived to-day and I regret to report that the general policy as outlined indicates very clearly that for the future the factory will expect us to cover our retail territory. Under these circumstances, and as explained in our recent conversation, we feel that you should be advised as to what the future policy will be so that you can make your plans accordingly. I believe you mentioned at the time another proposition pending, which, under the circumstances, would most likely be advisable to accept. I will say, however, that there is no objection on our part to your completing any unfinished business now on hand. Both Mr. Campe and myself are very sorry that future policies will not justify a continuance of our relations. Yours very truly, Campe-Rose Company [Signed] Lou H. Rose."

The pith of the contract is in that portion of the letter from which it appears that the appellant authorized the respondent to complete any unfinished business then on hand. Evidence was offered without objection to show that from June 1, 1922, when the Lou H. Rose Company retired from business as distributor of the Maxwell cars, the respondent and all other dealers within the territory covered by that company were orally directed to continue the business as such dealers upon the same basis as that fixed in their written contracts with the Lou H. Rose Company. Evidence was also offered that all these dealers, including the respondent, were led to believe that they would be given written contracts with the appellant, and in the case of respondent the agent for appellant frankly admitted that his purpose was to deceive the respondent into thinking that his contract would be rewritten until the appellant was able to procure another dealer or make other arrangements regarding the sale of cars in the territory covered by respondent's contract. During all this time the respondent was led to believe that the appellant corporation was the successor in interest to the Lou H. Rose Company, and the appellant held itself out to the public to be such. During all this time the appellant led the respondent to believe that he was acting as dealer for it under the same terms as those contained in the contract with Lou H. Rose Company, and cars were delivered to the respondent by the appellant and settlements made therefor upon the basis of the old contract. At the same time the appellant corporation caused to be printed in the public press an advertisement of the Maxwell cars in which the corporation announced the respondent as its authorized dealer. The letter of July 12, 1922, was therefore merely a written confirmation of the oral arrangements between the parties whereby the appellant obligated itself to pay the respondent for any unfinished business in the hands of the respondent upon the terms of the old contract. The question of fact to be determined by the jury was, therefore, How much unfinished business the respondent then had on hand.

From the fragmentary portions of the evidence printed in the briefs it appears that the respondent claimed to have had on hand orders for 15 touring cars, 1 sedan, and 1 coupé, and that for these cars written orders covering 10 were received in evidence, and that as to the others respondent claimed to have procured a sale, though he had no written order as evidence thereof.

[4, 5] The jury returned a verdict for $3,231, which was the full amount demanded in the complaint. Appellant attacks this verdict upon the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence, and that it must be against law, and that it can only be accounted for as damages upon the contract with the Lou H. Rose Company. In this regard the appellant directs our attention to the court's instruction that the breach of the original contract did not entitle the plaintiff to any damages against the defendant, Campe-Rose Company. We do not understand that this instruction is involved in the verdict at all. The respondent was not seeking damages for breach of the original contract by the appellant, but was merely seeking damages for the breach of the contract contained in the letter of July, 1922. If this verdict was not sustained by the evidence, it was the duty of the appellant to make that showing upon this appeal. That it has not done so has already been pointed out in connection with the first assignment of error. The appellant has merely copied from the transcript portions of the evidence covering the subject of the price of the cars at the factory and showing that the discount was to be allowed on that basis, a point which is not in dispute upon this appeal. In addition to this, the appellant has printed portions of the transcript covering a colloquy between the trial judge and counsel at the close of the trial wherein the trial judge endeavored to clear up the conflicting evidence covering the number of cars sold and the discounts which should be allowed. At that time the trial judge directed his questions to counsel for both parties, as well as to the respondent, and this was all done without objection from either party. The only objection which appellant makes at this time is that the respondent was not sworn when he gave these answers. It appears from the record that he had been previously sworn and testified, and, of course, it was wholly unnecessary to put him through the form of swearing again. Whether he gave his answers from the witness chair or while standing at the counsel table does not appear in the record, and it is wholly immaterial anyway.

[6, 7] Appellant has not cited us to any evidence bearing in any respect upon the point at issue; that is, the amount of business which the respondent had on hand when appellant's letter of July 12th was written. We must therefore assume, in support of the judgment, that the jury deemed that evidence was sufficient to show that the respondent had on hand a sufficient number of car orders to warrant a verdict in the amount which it rendered. In reducing the amount of the verdict the trial judge merely exercised his discretion, probably reaching the conclusion that the orders which were not in writing should not be deemed to be business on hand. Though we are not prepared to say the trial judge was correct in this ruling, it is plainly evident that the appellant was not prejudiced thereby, and it has therefore no ground of appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INS. CO. (Civ. 5091.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 14, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 11, 1925.)

Evidence — 413—Liability insurance policies, issued on trucks after collision, held admissible to show oral agreement to insure trailers also.

Liability insurance policies, issued on motor trucks only, after collision of truck and trailers with automobile, held admissible to show that oral contract sued on covered trailers, as well as trucks, in language identical with that of policies; not being attempt to vary terms of written instrument.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by H. S. Smith against the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

G. C. Ringole, of San Francisco, Henry Hauser, of San Jose, and Samuel Hamburg, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff, as assignee, commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment for moneys alleged to be due under an alleged oral contract of insurance. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant has appealed.

Prior to July 26, 1920, B. C. Martin and M. P. Martin, doing business under the name of Martin Bros., were engaged in operating automobile trucks and trailers in transporting milk from Santa Clara and the adjacent neighborhood to San Francisco. Shortly prior to that date an accident occurred that resulted in an insurance adjustment being made by and through Burdette A. Palmer. On the date last mentioned Mr. Palmer called upon Martin Bros., and held a conversation with M. P. Martin. At the time of holding that conversation, and until after the Swanson accident, which will hereafter be adverted to, it is the uncontradicted evidence that Mr. Palmer was an insurance solicitor and adjuster of insurance for the firm of Goodwin, Klinger & MacKay, and that that firm was the general agent of the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company in the transaction of the automobile department of that company's business on the Pacific Coast. When Mr. Palmer called on Mr. Martin, a conversation was had, looking toward the taking over of the automobile insurance business of Martin Bros. As he represented indirectly the appellant, we shall take the story as testified to by him.

Mr. Palmer testified that he held the conversation with Mr. Martin at San Jose in the presence of Mr. Martin's sister.

"I made the trip down there at the request of Mr. MacKay, a representative of Goodwin, Klinger & MacKay. I went down there on an adjustment of a loss and the soliciting of business. I went down to adjust a loss on a truck which Mr. Martin had and to solicit additional business in the insurance line on the trucks which were not covered. This visit was made in the latter part of July. I adjusted the loss on Mr. Martin's car and naturally brought up the question of full coverage in a collision, as he was not covered in his present policy. His trucks were covered, but that is with what is known as a $100 deductible collision policy, and naturally Mr. Martin was very much disappointed. He had to stand $100 of the loss and then I explained to him the features of the full coverage clause. A full coverage clause amounts to this, that in case of a loss he would not have to lose a cent himself, but that the company would have to assume the entire liability. This was on his Packard truck, the Reo truck, and also two trailers which were operated in conjunction with the two trucks in hauling loads to San Francisco. The trailers were attached to the rear end of the trucks. I solicited full coverage in collisions, features which we decided upon, depending on the rates. I then solicited property damage and public liability, and, not having the rate manual with me, I telephoned to Mr. Tompkins in San Francisco. Mr. Tompkins is at the counter, and is what is called the underwriter of Goodwin, Klinger & MacKay, or the office manager, and he quoted all the rates. Mr. Martin gave me the numbers of the Packard truck and also of the Reo truck. We looked for the numbers on the Trailmobile and on a Reliance trailer. We could not locate any number on them, and I came back to San Francisco. He explained how he was using those trucks and those trailers; that they were being worked in conjunction; and that he would hook up a trailer on the rear of his truck. He told me the number of gallons of milk that he could carry on the truck and the number of gallons of milk that he could carry on the trailer. I don't remember which truck was for which trailer, but I believe that Mr. Martin operated two trucks, and he had the two trailers, and, if he would pull off one truck, he would use the other one, and he would hook it on with either of the trailers, if one of the trailers was undergoing minor repairs. I asked Mr. Martin how many men he carried on these trucks and he told me that there was always two drivers so that in case one man fell asleep the other man would be there to handle it.

"That is about all of the conversation with the exception that Mr. Martin was insured. He received full coverage. He was covered. He was absolutely insured. I told him that he had a full coverage collision insurance on his trucks and on his trailers. The amount was $5,000 for injury to one person and $10,000 as the maximum injury to two persons or more. I told him it would not make any difference if he had truck No. 1 hooked to the Trailmobile and then if truck No. 1 was laid off and truck No. 2 was put into service; that we were taking care of those trucks and trailers and they would be protected; that the truck and the trailer attached were jointly insured. When I returned, I took the insurance right into the office of Goodwin, Klinger & MacKay. There I saw Mr. Tompkins; he was at the desk. I filed a written application. I made it. That paper is not now available; you will remember that Mr. Klinger testified the application is lost. On that written application was the make of the truck, whether a Packard or a Reo, and the style of the trailer and the year in which manufactured, the tonnage of the truck and the general extinguisher, etc., and the names of the Martins and their address, and the general use in which the trucks were to be put. The collision was changed from a $100 deductible to collision on each one of the trucks and they fully covered the trailers. They had property damage on each truck and public liability on each truck. They had property damage on each trailer and I believe that, at that time that I wrote that, that covered both trailers, and I took those applications into the office to Mr. Tompkins and verified the numbers of the trucks, both the motor numbers and the serial numbers and the capacity, and checked that up with the manual to see that the motor numbers corresponded with the year in which they were manufactured and also with the capacity. I got down to the trailers and on those there were no numbers—no serial number or motor number. Those are supposed to be the same as the automobile equipment, and I told Mr. Tompkins that I was not able to get the serial numbers, but he said that he would carry them for me and, if possible, I was to get the serial numbers even if necessary to make another trip to San Jose to get them. Mr. Tompkins said that he would carry them; that the whole equipment was covered from then on; and that on my next trip to San Jose I was to secure those numbers on both of those trailers, the Trailmobile and the Reliance trailer. He accepted the application to cover the trucks, and to cover with us means for a period of a year. Nothing was said at that time with reference to the length of time of that oral coverage. Nothing was said at that time as to when I should go to San Jose to get the numbers of the trailers. I made a second trip to Santa Clara. I saw M. P. Martin and B. C. Martin on the occasion of that visit. I had a conversation with them concerning this insurance at that time and place. I said to Mr. Martin that I wanted to get the numbers off the trailers and then we again tried to find the numbers. We looked every place we possibly could, but we couldn't find them. Then Mr. Martin finally succeeded in getting those numbers off an old policy or a bill of sale which he had and then those numbers were turned into Mr. Tompkins. They were turned in by me some time in the first part of August.

"The amount of the premium agreed to between Mr. Martin and myself I have forgotten. It was some place in the neighborhood of $1,000 for the whole coverage; that is, for the public liability, property damage, and the additional feature of collision insurance."

The story above recited is confirmed in every material detail by the testimony of Manuel P. Martin, one of the members of the firm of Martin Bros., and the individual with whom Mr. Palmer held his conversation.

At 12:30 midnight on the morning of August 9, 1920, an accident occurred between one of the trucks and trailers and an automobile being operated by Emil J. Swanson, and a little later during the same morning Martin Bros. called up the office of Goodwin, Klinger & MacKay, and spoke to Mr. Palmer over the telephone and advised him of the accident, whereupon Mr. Palmer replied, "All right, Mr. Martin, I will take care of you."

Communications between Martin Bros. and the defendant and the agents of the defendant are not called to our attention again until the month of January, 1924. During that month a summons and complaint was served on M. P. Martin. Thereupon Mr. Martin called up Mr. Palmer on the phone, made an appointment with him, and thereafter came to San Francisco. On arriving here he met Mr. Palmer and Mr. Tompkins and they went upstairs into the office of Mr. Hill, who was the attorney of the appellant. Mr. Potwin, the authorized agent of the appellant, was also present. Mr. Martin testified:

"They first began to read the policy to me—I just can't recall whether it was Mr. Hill or Mr. Potwin who read the policy, I can't say just what one read the policy. Prior to that time I had not received any policy from the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company, the defendant in this case. * * * I didn't think it was just right and I came down and I went home. The next day I hired Mr. Hauser as my attorney and we went back. Mr. Tompkins, Mr. Hauser, and myself went upstairs to the office of the Massachusetts Bonding Company and at that time we got the policies. Mr. Hill and Mr. Potwin were there. Mr. Hill handed the policies to Mr. Hauser and remarked, 'We refuse responsibility.'"

As recited above, in January, 1924, a summons and complaint were served on M. P. Martin. The portion of the record showing whether or not that summons and complaint issued in the action of Swanson v. Martin has not been called to our attention. We assume they did, because the record is clear that after the accident above mentioned as occurring on the night of August 9, 1920, Swanson commenced an action against the Martins and thereafter recovered judgment in the sum of $8,000 and $1,062 as costs, and that thereafter the Martins settled the judgment for the sum of $5,500, and then commenced this action to recover under their alleged oral contracts of insurance.

The policies above mentioned were Nos. 121800 and 121811. The respondent produced them in court and offered them in evidence for the purpose of showing the terms of the oral contract of insurance as contended for by the respondent. The policy No. 121811 covers the Reo truck hereinabove mentioned, and, so far as has been called to our attention, squares with the oral testimony hereinabove recited. Policy 121800 covers the Packard truck. Same remark. But, in violation of the oral agreement as contended for by the respondent, neither of the policies contained any reference to the trailers. In pleading his case, the respondent treated the two policies as being the contract between the parties, in so far as the trucks were concerned, and he pleaded that the parties had orally agreed to insurance as to trailers; the language being identical with that of the policy on the trucks and that the policies should have been issued accordingly. In reply to this contention, the appellant takes the position that the respondent should have maintained an action to reform the policies and in that action should have prayed for relief under the contracts as reformed. Failing so to do, it is the position of the appellant that nearly all of the evidence offered by the respondent was objectionable because the respondent was attempting to vary the terms of a written instrument. The vice in that contention is that it assumes that there was a written instrument. The liability of the appellant rests on its contractual relations as they existed at 12:30 midnight, August 9, 1920—the date of the accident. At that time the uncontradicted testimony is to the effect that Martin Bros. were fully covered, both as to trucks and trailers, under and pursuant to an oral contract. There was no writing; hence the objection that the respondent was attempting to vary the terms of a written instrument was not well founded. True it is that subsequently policies were issued on trucks and that, as far as they went, they truly stated the contract. However, as no collision occurred between a truck and any other vehicle, we are not concerned as to whether the trucks were insured or otherwise. As pieces of evidence admissible for the purpose for which they were offered, the policies were clearly admissible, and the trial court did not commit any error in admitting them in evidence.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIES-OVERLAND CO. v. BLENKIRON
et al. (Civ. 4224.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 16, 1925.)

1. Sales —472(3)—Conditional vendee may convey only such title as he has.

Vendee under conditional sales contract may convey only such title as he possesses.

2. Sales —472(3)—Vendor ordinarily permitted to protect himself by contract against transfer by vendee to financially irresponsible or other undesirable person.

Vendor should ordinarily be permitted to protect himself, in conditional sales contract, against transfer by vendee to financially irresponsible person, or one with whom vendor, for any reason, may not care to intrust property.

3. Sales —472(3)—Vendor held not entitled to refuse unpaid contract price tendered by vendee's assignee.

Vendor, under conditional sales contract, containing stipulation against assignment of automobile by vendee without vendor's written consent, could not refuse to accept total unpaid contract price, tendered by one to whom vendee assigned his interest without such consent; purpose of stipulation being solely for vendor's financial protection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Davies-Overland Company against Paul Blenkiron and another, copartners, doing business as the Imperial Valley Buick Sales Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for appellant.

E. R. Simon and Harry B. Ellison, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In this action it appears that defendants sold an automobile on a conditional sales contract, and that the vendee sold his interest in the automobile to the plaintiff, with the understanding that the original vendee would pay to defendants the balance remaining due on the automobile, or, in the event that such vendee should fail in that regard, the plaintiff would make such payment. On the day on which the next succeeding payment on the automobile became due under the terms of the contract, the plaintiff offered to pay to defendants the total unpaid contract price on the automobile, but defendants refused to accept the same or any part thereof. The contract called for no interest on deferred payments until after such payments had matured. Defendants obtained possession of the automobile from plaintiff without plaintiff's consent, and refused to return it to plaintiff after plaintiff's demand upon defendants so to do. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery against defendants, and paid into court, for defendants' benefit, an amount greater than the total unpaid balance due on said automobile. Judgment was ordered in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The conditional sales contract contained the following stipulation:

"Said purchaser agrees that he will not, and has no right to, assign, pledge, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of, this contract, or said automobile or any part thereof, * * * during the existence of this agreement without the written consent of the owner."

The sole point involved in the appeal is whether or not, in a conditional sales contract containing a stipulation which requires that, before an assignment of the vendee's right therein may be made, the written consent of the vendor must be first obtained, upon a sale thereof by the vendee without first obtaining such consent, the vendor may refuse to accept from the assignee of the vendee the total unpaid contract price, whether tendered to him by the vendee or by his assignee.

[1-3] It is clear that a vendee under a conditional sales contract may convey only such title as he possesses; also that it is only reasonable that by contract with the vendee the vendor should ordinarily be permitted to protect himself against a possible transfer by the vendee to a financially irresponsible person, or to one with whom for any reason the vendor might not care to intrust the property. There are but few cases officially reported which deal with a situation such as is here presented.

The case of Dame v. Hanson & Co., 212 Mass. 124, 98 N. E. 589, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 873, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 329, involved the sale of personal property under a conditional sales contract which contained a provision that, if the vendee should sell, mortgage, pledge, or attempt to sell, mortgage, or pledge the property, or any part thereof, or should fail to pay a promissory note given by the vendee to the vendor, the vendor should have the right to take immediate possession of the property and hold it, absolutely free from all claims and demands of the vendee. Few facts are stated in the opinion; but it appears that, in violation of the terms of the contract, the vendee mortgaged the property, and thereupon the vendor took possession thereof. Among other things, the court said:

"Assuming that the title was in the defendant [the vendor], it was held by it subject to the performance by Terrell [the vendee] of the conditions named, and Terrell had therefore a right or interest which he could and did convey in mortgage to the plaintiff [citing cases]. Upon tender of the amount due by Terrell or his assignee before possession was taken by the defendant, the title vested in Terrell or his assignee [citing cases]. * * * In the present case possession was not taken till after the tender, when the rights of the plaintiff to redeem had become fixed."

In the case of Oppenheimer v. Telhiard, 123 Miss. 111, 85 So. 134, a conditional sales contract for the sale of personal property contained a provision that the vendee should not sell, sublease, transfer, loan, pawn, give away, or remove said article or articles from his house or place of residence, except in case of fire, without the written consent of the vendor. Contrary to the terms of the agreement, the vendee sold his interest in the personal property which was the subject of the contract, and the new vendee tendered to the original vendor the full amount of the balance due thereon, which offer was refused by such vendor. It was held that the assignee of the vendee was entitled to judgment against the original vendor for the possession of the property. See, also, Finance Corporation v. Jones, 98 N. J. Law, 165 (1922) 119 A. 171.

No authorities have been called to the attention of this court which hold to the contrary of those just cited. In the instant case, it is clear that the vendee acquired an interest in the property which was sold to him under the contract in question. The only property right retained by the vendor was that of repossessing the property in case the vendee failed to make the payments on the purchase price as they became due. Whether those payments were made at the times they actually became due, or whether they were combined and paid in one sum, could not injuriously affect the rights of the vendor; but, to the contrary, a payment of the entire balance of the purchase price of the automobile would be a benefit to defendant to which he would not be lawfully entitled. The purpose of the stipulation in the contract against assignment thereof, without the written consent of the vendor, was solely for his financial protection. His only interest in the contract was to receive the total amount of money for which he sold the property. Whether the money was to be paid in one lump sum by the vendee or by the assignee of the vendee was of no concern to the vendor. "One man's money is just as good as another's." By such payment the vendor's rights in the premises would be fully protected, and he would have no cause for complaint.

The judgment is reversed.

COOPER et al. v. REARDON. (Civ. 5093.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 12, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 11, 1925.)

1. Street railroads ⇨24(5)—Municipal street railway not controlled by statute regulating franchise conditions imposed on private corporations.

Assessments levied on abutting property owners for paying entire street, including space between tracks of street railroad operated by city, held not violative of Civ. Code, § 498, providing that city in granting franchise must require street railroad corporations to pave portion of street used by track between rails, and for two feet on each side thereof, such statute referring only to private corporations.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨425(3)—Failure to assess municipal street railway for paving not violative of charter.

Failure to assess city operating street railway for portion of paving improvement held not violative of San Francisco Charter, art. 6, c. 2, §§ 7, 8, 9, imposing such expenses on corporations required by law to keep portion of street in order, city not being required by law to pave such portion, and Civ. Code, § 498, not being applicable to cities.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨278(1/2)—Ordinance providing for paving improvement properly authorized under charter.

Ordinance of 1918, providing for paving improvement, was authorized and adopted in accordance with 1916 amendment to charter, and therefore that power created by amendment to charter in 1911, allowing adoption of an ordinance similar to one in question, had been exhausted, would not be material.

4. Appeal and error ☞1079—Constitutionality not determined in absence of proper presentation.

Whether ordinance providing for paying assessment was violative of Const. art. 1, § 21, should not be considered in absence of proper presentation and submission of authority.

5. Municipal corporations ☞437—Assessment for paving street requiring expensive blocks along municipal street car track held not burden for benefit of others.

Where, in paving street on which city operated street car, basalt blocks, required along track, were more expensive per square foot than asphalt, assessment on abutting owners held not burden for benefit of others, as maintaining railway system, in view of showing that blocks were to protect asphalt, and that space occupied by track added to that of basalt blocks rendered that area no more expensive pavement than the asphalt.

6. Appeal and error ☞937(1)—Objection on grounds not raised by pleadings cannot be raised on appeal.

Objection to validity of assessment, on grounds not raised by pleadings, and on which no finding was made, cannot be raised on appeal, it being assumed in support of judgment that appeal was not taken on such grounds.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiffs, as abutting property owners along a public street in San Francisco, brought this action to set aside an assessment for improvement of the street levied under the San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1918. The defendants are the members of the board of public works of the city and county, and the contractor who performed the work which was the basis of the assessment. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment went for the defendants, from which the plaintiffs appeal under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The controversy revolves about the single fact that over the entire portion of the street included in the assessment the city owned and operated a municipal street railway, and that in the improvement of the street the abutting property owners were assessed to pay the entire cost of the street improvement, including the paving between the rails of the street railway, and for two feet on each side thereof, whereas, in the case of a privately owned street railway, this cost is imposed upon the owner of the railway.

The appellants designate six points as grounds for a reversal of the judgment. We will consider them in the order presented:

[1] (1) That the assessment violates section 498 of the Civil Code. This section reads in part as follows:

"The city or town authorities, in granting the right of way to street railroad corporations * * * must require a strict compliance with the following conditions: * * * (2) To plank, pave, or macadamize the entire length of the street, used by their track, between the rails, and for two feet on each side thereof, and between the tracks, if there be more than one."

The appellants have not made any argument or cited any authorities in support of their point, but the respondents point out that the section is found in part 4 of division first of the Civil Code, which relates solely to private corporations, and has no reference to public utilities owned and operated by municipalities for the public benefit. The arrangement of the section in this part of the Code, as well as the context of the section itself, makes it apparent that it deals only with the conditions to be imposed by the municipal authorities in granting franchises to private corporations and individuals. Now a city does not require a franchise to operate a public utility for the benefit of its own citizens; that power is inherent in the municipality if authorized by the charter under which it operates. "It is not true that a city is a private corporation when carrying on a municipally owned public utility. No decision so holds. All the decisions on the subject recognize the fact that a city does not change its character by engaging in such enterprises." City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 530, 192 P. 25, 27 (10 A. L. R. 1425).

Such being the case, when a city is engaged in the operation of such a public utility, it is not controlled by statutory regulations covering conditions to be imposed in the grant of franchises to private corporations or individuals. United Railroads of San Francisco v. San Francisco, 249 U. S. 517, 520, 39 S. Ct. 361, 63 L. Ed. 739; United Railroads of San Francisco v. San Francisco (D. C.) 239 F. 987, 994; Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 200 U. S. 22, 36, 26 S. Ct. 224, 50 L. Ed. 353.

[2] (2) That the assessment violates sections 7, 8, and 9 of the San Francisco charter, meaning, we assume, sections 7, 8, and 9 of chapter II, article VI, of that charter. The only argument advanced by appellants on this point relates to that portion of the charter sections cited which provides that:

"The expense of all work on such portion of any street required by law to be kept in order by any person, company, or corporation, having railroad tracks thereon, shall be borne and paid for by such person, company or corporation, and shall be included in the assessment hereinbefore provided for."

The argument is that, as section 498, Civil Code, places the expense of paving the roadbed on the municipality, the assessment should have charged the cost of that portion of the work to the city, and the assessments upon the abutting owners should have been reduced accordingly. But we have seen that the code section does not require the municipality to bear the cost of this work, and we have not been referred to any other statute which places this burden on the city. Therefore, the city is not "required by law" to keep that portion of the street in order, and the charter sections relating to the apportionment of the cost of street improvements do not apply to a municipality owned street railway.

[3] (3) That the ordinance of 1918, under which the assessment was made, is void. The argument is that, as the city charter was amended in 1911 authorizing the board of supervisors to "adopt an ordinance which may from time to time be revised or amended, providing a method of procedure for such improvement and assessment," and that, as the board did in 1913 adopt an ordinance providing such a method, its power was then exhausted, and the ordinance of 1918, being a new ordinance, was beyond the charter authority. But the appellants neglected to inform us that the charter was again amended in 1916, giving the board of supervisors similar authority, and that the ordinance of 1918 was adopted in accordance with the 1916 amendment.

[4] (4) That the ordinance of 1918 is void as offending the constitutional inhibition against class legislation. The attack under this subdivision is directed to that portion of subdivision 13 of section 21 of the ordinance of 1918, which, after requiring "the expense of all work on such portion of any street required by law to be kept in order by any person, company, or corporation, having railroad tracks thereon, shall be borne and paid for by such person, company or corporation, * * *" contains the following proviso:

"The provisions of this subdivision shall not be deemed applicable to any street whereon railroad tracks have been constructed and are being maintained by the city and county."

The argument is that this exemption imposes an unequal burden on those property owners abutting a street whereon the city maintains a street railway, as against those abutting a street whereon a private corporation operates a street railway, and this, it is said, violates the provisions of section 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which prohibits the granting of privileges and immunities to any citizen which are not on like terms granted to all citizens. No authorities are cited in support of appellants' point, and the argument is merely a statement of the proposition advanced. The respondents have been content to submit the point merely upon the statement that the distinction made by the ordinance is one between the municipality and a privately owned street railway, and not one between property owners subjected to assessments to pay for street improvements.

The ordinance has been in force for more than six years, and has been made the basis of a large number of street improvement proceedings. Through these proceedings assessments have been made upon properties widely scattered throughout the city, and property rights have grown up as a result. The ordinance has been before the courts on several occasions, and has been sustained against constitutional attack generally, but the question here presented has not been passed on. We do not feel that we should seek to determine this question without having it fully presented, and we do not feel that it is incumbent upon us to assume the burden of original research to support the position of either party to the appeal.

[5] (5) That the assessment is void because it places a burden on a few for the benefit of all. As we understand the position of appellants under this heading, it is that as the work called for the laying of basalt blocks on either side of the four rails, and that as this was properly a part of the maintenance of the railway line rather than an improvement of the street, the cost thereof should have been paid by the entire city, and should not have been included in the assessment.

The evidence was that the basalt blocks were laid to protect the asphalt pavement of the street from being broken by vehicular traffic, and not to benefit the railway. It was also shown that, though the cost per square foot of laying these blocks was more than the cost of laying an equal surface of asphalt pavement, the total cost was less because of the space occupied by the rails. The trial court found in accordance with this evidence, and held that none of the appellants suffered any detriment by reason of the fact that these basalt blocks were laid. These findings are supported by the evidence, and the appellants do not argue to the contrary. They dispose of their objection to the assessment, as they demonstrate that the appellants were charged for street improvement work only and not with the cost of improving the railway system.

[6] (6) That the assessment is void because it is in excess of the contract price. The appellants instance the case of Mr. Wright, who was one of the plaintiffs below—the owner of a 25-foot lot. The assessment against this lot was $247.93. Appellants claim that it should have been $227.68 when calculated according to the bid and the contract. The reason for the difference in these figures is not explained in any of the briefs, but it does appear that these appellants appealed to the board of supervisors in protest against the assessments, and that these protests were overruled.

The appellants have not directed our attention to any portion of the record showing what grounds were urged before the supervisors on these appeals, but from our own examination it appears that the point now urged was not raised in the pleadings before the trial court, and no finding was made thereon. We must assume, in support of the judgment, that the appeals were not taken on the ground now urged, and the point cannot, therefore, be raised by appellants at this time. Federal Construction Co. v. Newhouse, 186 Cal. 284, 289, 199 P. 519.

ROSENER v. HANLON DRY DOCK & SHIPBUILDING CO. (Civ. 4864.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 23, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 21, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—When supported by some evidence, findings conclusive.

Where record contains some evidence to support findings, they are conclusive.

2. Appeal and error ⇨193(6)—Lack of particularity in pleadings not considered, where objection is first raised on appeal.

Failure of petition to specifically set forth particular failure to perform contract cannot be raised for first time on appeal by party who failed to object to evidence, and introduced evidence on the subject.

3. Judgment ⇨251(1), 256(1) — Answer and findings held to support judgment for defendant.

Answer, alleging written contract to act as consulting engineer and give work usual attention, and findings that engineer did not give work usual attention, and that he neglected to exercise reasonable skill, care or diligence, and was negligent, held to support judgment for defendant, in engineer's action for balance due, independent of amendment setting up oral agreements, and findings thereon.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Finding of negligence, supported by testimony, conclusive.

In action for money due on contract, where defense was plaintiff's failure to use skill required, thereby resulting in damage, finding that damage was caused by plaintiff's want of necessary care, which was supported by testimony, held conclusive of appeal.

5. Contracts ⇨280(3)—Consulting engineer held to knowledge of use and necessity of well-known safety device in dry dock.

Consulting engineer, who held himself out as an expert, and assumed responsibility of supervising construction of marine railway dry dock, which was one of largest in world, held to a knowledge of necessity of safety device practically indispensable to a dry dock similar to one in question and in general use and well known.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Leland S. Rosener against the Hanlon Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco (Hunt C. Hill, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action in which he sought to recover something over $6,000, balance due him upon a contract with the defendant by which plaintiff was to act as consulting engineer in the building of a marine railway dry dock at Oakland, Cal.

The defendant denied that the plaintiff had performed his written contract set out in his complaint and also filed an amendment to its answer, setting out that the written contract between the parties did not have incorporated in it all the terms of the agreement and that, among other things, and in addition to the written contract, the plaintiff agreed, at the time that the written contract was made:

"To personally superintend the building of said dry dock and to give said plans and said superintendence his personal attention, and that said dry dock was to be designed and built under his superintendence and to be of the highest class of design, and as nearly perfect as a dry dock could be built, and of such a character that the same could be operated by an inexperienced operator without the danger of any breakdown, and without the danger of any harm or danger to said dry dock or any part thereof * * * that by reason of said failure and neglect of said plaintiff * * * said defendant was required to and did rebuild portions of said marine railway dry dock, and rebuild and replace portions of the machinery designed and provided therefor, all to said defendant's damage in excess of the amount claimed by plaintiff."

[1] We shall not discuss the evidence in detail, because we must begin our investigations from the findings of the trial court in a case like this one, where the record contains some evidence to support those findings. The court found the foregoing allegations to be true, except that it found the representation that the dry dock would be of such a character that the same could be operated by inexperienced operators without danger of a breakdown, etc., was made during the construction of the same, and not at the time of the making of the contract between the parties.

It was further found that, at the time of the making of the written agreement, plaintiff agreed that he would give to the work to be performed by him his usual attention, and would use all the skill possessed by him in doing this work, and would use all the care, attention, and skill reasonably required by the character of said work. It was found that plaintiff had fulfilled his contract in all particulars, except that he had failed and neglected to give to the work his usual attention or the care or attention or skill reasonably required by said work, or agreed by him to be given to said work, and failed and neglected to exercise reasonable skill, care, or diligence in the performance of said work and was negligent in the performance of said work in the following particular:

"That plaintiff failed and neglected to design or specify for use in connection with the operation of said marine railway dry dock any tachometer, or other device or means by which or whereby the person operating said marine railway dry dock would be advised, or could know, with any reasonable degree of accuracy or certainty, the speed at which either the said marine railway dry dock, or the induction motor which was a part of the equipment for the handling of said marine railway dry dock, was being operated, and failed and neglected to install any such device, or to cause the same to be installed, as a part of the machinery for the operation of said marine railway dry dock, or otherwise, and failed and neglected to advise or notify said defendant that such installation was proper or necessary as a part of the machinery or equipment for the operation of said marine railway dry dock, and, on the contrary, stated and represented to said defendant that said marine railway dry dock could be properly and safely operated by an inexperienced operator, and with the equipment installed thereon, and as a part thereof, under the direction and supervision of the said plaintiff; that said marine railway dry dock was not properly equipped, and that the machinery for the operation thereof, in part designed by plaintiff and in part selected and designated by plaintiff, and all of which was either designed by plaintiff or selected and designated by him, and all of which was installed under the direction of said plaintiff, was not reasonably adapted for the purpose for which the same was installed, without the installation of a tachometer or similar device to be used in connection therewith; that for at least 20 years last past the use and purposes of tachometers, and the necessity for the use of tachometers, in connection with the equipment and operation of machinery similar to the machinery installed under plaintiff's supervision as a part of such marine railway dry dock equipment, have been generally known to persons in the same profession and calling as plaintiff, and for said period of time tachometers have been generally used by such persons in connection with the equipment and operation of machinery similar to the machinery installed under plaintiff's supervision as a part of said marine railway dry dock equipment, and that the said uses and purposes of tachometers were well known to said plaintiff at all times during the construction of said marine railway dry dock; that by reason of the negligence of said plaintiff * * * and by reason of his failure * * * to fully and faithfully perform the work, and to do the things agreed by him to be performed and done, and on the 23d day of August, 1922, and while said marine railway dry dock was being operated by plaintiff, and in accordance with the instructions of said plaintiff, and without any negligence on the part of defendant, the said induction motor was wrecked, and the operation of said marine railway dry dock was rendered impossible until after the installation of another motor and the incurring of a large expense by said defendant."

[2] Appellant contends that the issue upon which the trial court found against him was not properly raised by the pleadings. It is true that it is not specifically stated in the answer, but it is alleged that plaintiff failed to build a dry dock of the highest class and design or as nearly perfect as plaintiff knew how to build it, and failed to build a dry dock that could be operated by inexperienced operators without danger of a breakdown, and that, because of this failure and negligence on the part of plaintiff, defendant was compelled to rebuild and replace portions of the machinery designed and provided therefor. While the pleading might have set forth specifically the incident relied upon, nevertheless, the plaintiff tried the case without objection to evidence about this incident, and sought by testimony offered on his own behalf to explain and excuse the absence of the tachometer, and we think it is now too late for him to complain that it was not specifically set forth in the pleadings.

[3] The appellant complains that by amendment to its answer the defendant was permitted to set up alleged oral agreements modifying and changing the written contract between the parties. Plaintiff objected to this amendment and now contends that it and the findings in response thereto are in violation of sections 1625 and 1698, Civil Code, and of section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But to concede this point to the appellant would not compel a reversal of the judgment, for it appears that there is enough in the pleadings and findings relative to the written obligations of the parties to warrant the judgment. The written contract upon which plaintiff relies, and which was pleaded by him and found by the trial court to have been entered into by the parties, contains the agreement by the plaintiff to act as consulting engineer in the construction work contemplated, to design the hauling machinery, and "whereas I am continually in touch with all of my jobs, it must be understood that the details of your work will be taken care of directly by my office assistants, though no effort on my part will be spared to give your work expedition and our usual attention."

[4] Plaintiff pleaded that he had fulfilled the terms of his contract. Defendant denied this, and the court found that the plaintiff had failed to give the work his usual attention or the care or attention or skill reasonably required by said work or agreed by him to be given to said work, and failed and neglected to exercise reasonable skill, care, or diligence in the performance of said work and was negligent in the performance of said work. The failure to include a tachometer in the hauling machinery with the resultant damage is recited in the findings as the basis for the conclusion as to negligence and want of skill and care. There is expert testimony in the record from which this finding may be supported and so our inquiry upon appeal comes to an end. It is useless for appellant to argue that the damage was proximately caused by the negligence of defendant's servant in the operation of the machinery, for the record contains a finding that the defendant was free from negligence in the operation of the dry dock at the time of the accident.

[5] Appellant devotes some time and many authorities to the proposition that the plaintiff is to be held responsible only for the ordinary skill and experience possessed by persons in his line of work. There is no dispute about this matter, but the testimony and findings are to the effect that tachometers had been in general use for many years; that they were a practical necessity upon machinery such as was used in the dry dock and that their use and necessity were well known to persons in the engineering profession. Plaintiff certainly held himself out as an expert in his line when he undertook so large a responsibility as that presented by the building of one of the largest dry docks in the world to cost about $380,000. This dry dock was designed to haul ships to the weight of 10,000 tons. The plaintiff was to be paid a lump sum of $10,000 for his services and a specified sum per hour for any time his assistants, devoted to the work, which latter charge amounted to over $5,-

000. The plaintiff was to act as consulting engineer, design the hauling machinery, and generally to supervise all the construction work which was to be done by the defendant. Obviously, he should be held to a knowledge of the use and necessity for a safety device which, the record discloses, was practically indispensable and in general use and well known to the profession, and which had been included in similar hauling machinery which was installed at another large dry dock under the general supervision of plaintiff.

The appellant contends that there is not sufficient evidence of damage suffered by the defendant to offset the claim of plaintiff. The record might well be more specific upon this matter, but there is evidence to support the conclusion that the damage suffered by the defendant exceeded the claim of plaintiff. There are no other objections which require discussion by us, and the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. YATES. (Cr. 1147.)

1. Criminal law ⚡507(2)—Witness held not an accomplice.

Where witness listened to proposal of accused to aid in committing robbery, and told him that he would assist, but did not do anything further, his testimony was not required to be corroborated under Penal Code, § 1111, on ground that he was accomplice.

2. Criminal law ⚡507(3)—Witnesses helping accused to escape, who did not know of offense, not accomplices so as to require testimony to be corroborated.

In prosecution for robbery, where witnesses who took accused to another town did not know of his connection with offense, or even that offense had been committed, they were not accomplices so as to require their testimony to be corroborated under Penal Code, § 1111.

3. Criminal law ⚡824(7)—Accused wishing jury instructed in words of statute as to weight of testimony of accomplice has duty to offer such instruction to court.

In prosecution for robbery, if accused wished jury instructed in words of Penal Code, § 1111, defining accomplice, he should have presented such instruction to court.

4. Criminal law ⚡780(3)—Instruction that accused could not be convicted on testimony of accomplice, unless corroborated, held proper.

In prosecution for robbery, where evidence tended to show that only one witness was accused's accomplice, instruction that accused could not be convicted on testimony of accomplice, unless it was corroborated by other evidence tending to connect him with offense, was proper.

5. Criminal law ⚡510½—Admitting newspaper article in evidence to corroborate testimony of witness as to conversation with accused about it not error.

In prosecution for robbery, in which witness testified as to admissions by accused in conversation with him concerning newspaper article, admitting such article in evidence was not error, in view of instruction that it was limited to connect testimony of witness with conversation which he claimed to have had with accused.

6. Witnesses ⚡278—Refusal to permit cross-examination of accomplice as to what kind of gun accused had held not error.

In prosecution for robbery, where accused's accomplice testified that he did not know whether accused had a gun at time in question, rejecting question by accused as to what kind of gun it was was not error, in view of fact that previous testimony as to gun related to possession of one by another person concerned in robbery.

7. Witnesses ⚡282½—Sustaining objection to question theretofore asked and answered held proper.

In prosecution for robbery, sustaining objection to question theretofore asked and answered on cross-examination was proper.

8. Robbery ⚡24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for robbery.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

W. H. Yates was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Robert E. Austin, John N. Helmick, and O. V. Willson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted on the charge of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Briefly, the evidence shows that, as a messenger from a station of the Pacific Electric Railway Company located at the city of Sherman approached a bank with approximately $4,000 in cash in his possession, for the purpose of depositing the money in the bank, he was halted by two men named Hanna and Goslyn, respectively, who ordered the messenger to place the money in an automobile in which the two men had been riding, at the same time telling the messenger that he was "covered" with a pistol by a third man who was standing across the street from the place where the messenger was being robbed. The messenger complied with the order, and the two men, Hanna and Goslyn, escaped, but were shortly thereafter arrested and subsequently convicted of the crime of robbery.

On behalf of the people, Goslyn testified to the details of the robbery as committed by him and Hanna with defendant, Yates, as the "lookout."

A witness by the name of Moore testified, without objection thereto, that about 15 days before the robbery occurred defendant had tried to induce Moore to assist defendant and a third man (who was not present at the conversation and with whom Moore was unacquainted) in the commission of the crime, but that, while Moore told Yates in effect that he would assist in the contemplated "hold up," he was "just kidding, playing with him, and * * * didn't think he was going to do it, and (Moore) * * * didn't mean anything like that"; that later defendant brought to see the witness the man to whom defendant had referred in their conversation regarding the proposed robbery, which man inquired particularly of Moore regarding the defendant and his occupation—that is, whether or not defendant was a policeman; that on the evening of the day after the robbery had taken place he and defendant had a conversation, including the following:

"He (defendant) said, 'They made the holdup down in Sherman.' I said, 'Yes, who was it?' He said, 'I don't know, but I believe it was this fellow that came over here with me.' I said, 'Yes, how do you think so?' He said, 'Because I told those fellows how to do it, and since the day we came over here I haven't seen that fellow, so I thought that this thing was over.' He said, 'I didn't think that this fellow was going to do it, so I thought I would call it off.' He said, 'I did not see this fellow any more, and I didn't hear anything about this thing, and this fellow, he got somebody else, I guess,' he told me, 'and went and done it himself, and he didn't want to get me with him because maybe he had another best friend than I was,' and he says, 'and wanted to give him the part instead of me.' I asked him, 'Are you sure you wasn't with him?' and he said, 'No.' Then I had to go, and I told him, 'I will be right back.' He said, 'I will be right back, too.' So I told him, 'All right.' He went out and come back in about a half an hour, and he brought a newspaper, and then he told me, 'Come here, Tom.' So I stopped, and I asked him what, and he says—he looked around, and he says, 'I don't like to talk to you right here.' I asked him why, and he said, 'Oh, I feel nervous. Let's go around the back there.' I told him, 'All right.' We went in the corner where the cars were parked. I told him, 'But we can't see the paper here. What is it?' So I lighted the dashlight off of a car and he read the paper for me where it says about the holdup, and then it says on the paper about a fellow with a—wearing a mustache, black suit on, and black hat on, and then the way the paper said I told him, 'That is you, Yates,' and he said, 'Yes, that is me; it can't be anybody else.' Then I looked at him and I says, 'No, it ain't.' And he says, 'Why? What makes you think so?' I told him, 'Because the paper says the fellow with a black mustache and you haven't got it.' He said, 'Yes; but I shaved it off.' Oh, I laughed, and then he started to get nervous and shaking there, and I told him, 'What was the matter?' And he says, 'Nothing, Tom; I just feel this way because if this fellow pulled off this thing, the one I talked to, he might want to get me into it too.' I said, 'Why, you didn't make the holdup with him?' He said, 'No, but I planned it to him, told him how to make it,' he says. So I told him, 'That don't make any difference, I guess,' but he said, 'Yes, it does,' and I told him, 'Yes, and what do you want to do now?' Then he thought it over and he told me, 'I guess the best thing I could do was to get out of town, to be safe.' I told him, 'Yes; you can do that, too, if you don't feel safe enough here.' Then he told me, then he thought it over again, and he said he had a friend in Sherman, and I told him this way, I told him, 'No, if I would be you I wouldn't go away if I wasn't with him when they done the holdup, if it is that way you say you haven't seen him for fifteen days, I wouldn't go away.' He said, 'Oh, yes, Tom. I got scared. I know I planned this thing, and they will get me in it.' * * * So I told him—then he asked me—then he told me he would like to get out of town anyway. So I told him, 'Where do you want to go to?' He said, 'I would like to go to Riverside,' and I told him, 'Well, why don't you catch the stage?' He said, 'No time for the stage now.' 'The stage runs until 7:20 or 8:30,' he told me, 'and the last stage has done passed,' and he got no time to catch it, 'and then I haven't got no money.' 'Well,' I told him, 'If you want a dollar, I can lend you a dollar.'

That thereafter on that evening the witness lent defendant $1, procured an automobile, and induced one Tona to take defendant to the city of Riverside, where defendant had said that a brother of his was living.

Tona testified that on that night he took defendant to Riverside, where they arrived at about 2 o'clock a. m. the next day, and that defendant there produced $1, with which they bought five gallons of gasoline for use in the automobile in which they had ridden from Los Angeles to Riverside.

A witness named Moreno testified that he accompanied defendant and Tona on the trip to Riverside, and that on one or two occasions on the way there, when it became necessary to make some repairs on the automobile, "he (defendant) got out a couple—when we were going out, he got out in a couple of places and hide (hid) over in the trees while we were fixing the machine."

There was also testimony to the effect that on the day when the robbery took place defendant lived in and was familiar with the city of Sherman and with the practice and method adopted by the Pacific Electric Railway Company and its messenger in depositing funds in the manner which was employed or attempted to be employed on the occasion in question, and that defendant had means of knowledge of the amount of cash likely to be in the possession of such messenger at such times.

Defendant testified that on the day following the robbery he left the city of Sherman and rode on a public bus to the city of Riverside; that on the next day he rode in an automobile with his nephew to Yuma, Ariz., where he boarded a train for El Paso, Tex., which was the place of his residence and where he arrived on the fourth day following the robbery, and at which last-named place he remained until he was extradited and brought back to Los Angeles some two or three months after the robbery occurred.

[1, 2] Appellant's first specification of error is that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a new trial to defendant on the ground of lack of sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict against him. It is urged that Goslyn was an admitted accomplice, and that under the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code, before defendant could be convicted of the crime with which he was charged, it was necessary that Goslyn's testimony be corroborated by other evidence which tended to connect defendant with the commission of the offense. In connection therewith appellant contends that Moore, Tona, and Moreno were likewise accomplices, and hence disqualified from furnishing the necessary corroboration of Goslyn's testimony. The record discloses no evidence from which it may be deduced that any one of the corroborating witnesses was an accomplice within the meaning of the statute. The most that may be inferred is that defendant suggested to the witness Moore the feasibility of committing the crime, and intimated that he would like to have him join with defendant and a third man in its perpetration; but the evidence further shows that, while Moore listened to defendant's proposal, and told him that he would assist in the commission of the robbery, Moore was "just kidding, playing with him, * * * and didn't mean anything like that." At any rate, whatever may have been Moore's real intentions, whether he was willing or unwilling to become a partner in the criminal enterprise, is of little consequence in view of the lack of evidence that as a matter of fact he ever actually did anything in furtherance thereof. He may have suspected that defendant was considering the advisability of committing the crime and that he would like to have Moore join with him in its commission; but, if Moore neither actually participated in its commission nor conspired to commit it, he cannot be said to have been an accomplice. Regarding the testimony given by the witnesses Tona and Moreno, the evidence shows that the only knowledge possessed by either of them was that, for some reason of which each of them was ignorant, defendant wished to leave Los Angeles and go to the city of Riverside. So far as the record shows, at the time to which their testimony relates neither of them had any knowledge whatsoever regarding defendant's connection with the robbery, or even that a robbery had been committed. It necessarily follows that appellant's contention in that connection cannot be sustained.

[3, 4] Appellant also complains that, while the judge of the trial court correctly instructed the jury generally as to the law affecting the admissibility of, and the weight to be accorded to, the evidence given by accomplices, no instruction was given in the language of the statute by which an accomplice is defined as "one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." Section 1111, Pen. Code.

In the first place, it appears that no such instruction was requested by defendant. He must have known that corroboration of the testimony given by Goslyn was essential to the successful prosecution of the case against him. Hence, if he thought it proper or advisable for the protection of defendant's rights in the premises that an instruction couched in the language of the statute should be given to the jury, it was his duty to offer such instruction to the court for the consideration of the jury. Goslyn was an admitted accomplice. On the trial it was not even suggested that either of the other witnesses was an accomplice. In the circumstances of the case there was no compelling reason for such an instruction to be given. However, the court did instruct the jury that the defendant could not be convicted on the testimony of an accomplice, unless such testimony was corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. Judged by the evidence, there was no accomplice other than Goslyn, and the jury was properly instructed with reference to the weight which should be attached to his testimony.

[5] Appellant contends that the trial court erred to the prejudice of defendant in admitting a certain newspaper in evidence over defendant's objection.

The newspaper in question was a copy of the one referred to in the testimony of Moore to which reference has been had. The only part thereof to which the attention of the jury was directed was that it was a "Sports Pink"; that it contained a large-type heading, "Shoot P. E. Bandits," and a paragraph as follows:

"In a statement to police, Hanna, who was wounded in his right arm, said a third bandit had participated in the holdup, and described him simply as wearing a black mustache."

At the time the newspaper was admitted in evidence the judge instructed the jury "that newspaper is being admitted in evidence simply for the purpose of connecting up the testimony of this witness as to the conversation had with the defendant which he has related, but as to any statements contained in that article they are not to be considered as statements of fact in this case."

The jury was thus plainly told that the newspaper was limited in its effect as evidence to "connecting up" the testimony of the witness Moore with a conversation which such witness testified he had had with defendant. While, for obvious reasons, the value of such testimony was slight, it is possible that it did have a tendency to corroborate the testimony given by the witness regarding his conversation with defendant. With the limitation placed by the trial judge upon the purpose and effect of the evidence, we are unable to perceive that defendant was prejudicially affected by its reception in evidence.

[6] Appellant's next specification of error is that the court erroneously refused to permit defendant to cross-examine the witness Goslyn, who testified in behalf of the prosecution. An examination of the transcript to which appellant refers discloses the fact that the witness was being asked regarding a "gun" which defendant was supposed to have had on his person at the time the robbery occurred, and that the witness had stated that he did not know whether defendant had a "gun" or not. Defendant then asked the witness: "Q. What kind of gun?" to which question an objection interposed by the district attorney thereto was sustained by the court. Taking into consideration the fact that immediately before the quoted question was asked the witness had disclaimed any knowledge regarding any "gun" which defendant was supposed to have had, it is difficult to understand how it would have been possible for the witness to answer the question submitted to him. While preceding the question heretofore set forth the witness had testified in substance that at the time the robbery took place he knew that "the defendant" had a "gun" in his pocket, it is clear from subsequent testimony given by the witness that his testimony with reference to a "gun" did not relate to defendant Yates, but did refer to defendant Hanna.

[7] Another specification of error in the ruling of the trial court relates to the sustaining of an objection to a question asked on cross-examination; the basis of the ruling being that the question had theretofore been asked and answered. The record shows that the trial judge was correct in his conclusion in that regard.

[8] It is finally further contended by appellant that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a new trial to defendant, for the reason that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, because of the fact, as claimed by appellant, that the only evidence of defendant's guilt was that contained in the testimony of the witnesses Moore, Tona, and Moreno regarding defendant's flight, and that such circumstance is not evidence of guilt, but merely tends to show guilt. But, even though solely for the sake of the argument it be admitted that appellant is correct in his statement of the legal principle, and that it is not subject to any limitation or exception (which in fact we are not prepared to do), in view of defendant's manner and his many admissions, including his statement that he had planned the crime, also the additional facts testified to by other witnesses; that defendant was in the vicinity of the scene of the crime at the time it was committed; that he was without funds; and that he left his place of abode so precipitately and under such suspicious circumstances immediately after the robbery occurred, without any apparently satisfactory reason being shown to the jury therefor—we are constrained to hold that appellant's point that the verdict is not sufficiently supported by the evidence is untenable.

It follows that the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

71 Cal. App. 575

PEOPLE v. FRANK. (Cr. 1198.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 7, 1925. Rehearing Denied April 6, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, May 4, 1925.)

1. Criminal law §338(7)—Permitting evidence as to defendant going under assumed name held prejudicial error.

In prosecution for burglary and robbery, admission of evidence, disclosing that on three different occasions defendant had gone under assumed name, held prejudicial error.

2. Witnesses §318—Evidence as to credibility of witness not admissible, where credibility not attacked.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2053, where credibility of certain witnesses for state had not been attacked, no evidence regarding their credibility could be received, though it consisted of commendatory remarks by judge and deputy district attorney.

3. Criminal law §1163(2)—Prejudicial error conclusively presumed from trial court's misconduct, which might have influenced jury in rendering verdict.

Prejudicial error will be conclusively presumed for any misconduct on part of trial judge, from which it may be rightfully deduced that jury was influenced in rendering its verdict.

4. Criminal law §1186(4)—Reading into evidence commendatory remarks of judge and deputy district attorney as to high standing of state's witnesses held prejudicial error.

The reading into evidence before jury of commendatory remarks made by trial judge and deputy district attorney as to high standing of important state's witnesses, made at time when defendant was not present, held prejudicial error, requiring new trial, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½, especially where defendant's identification as perpetrator of crime was dependent on strength of testimony of such state's witnesses.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted on an information in which he was charged with the commission of the crimes of burglary and robbery. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant makes the point that the court erred in allowing the deputy district attorney, over defendant's objection, to interrogate witnesses as to whether or not defendant had previously gone under certain assumed names.

An examination of the record shows that, against defendant's specific objection thereto, on three separate occasions the court permitted questions to be asked and answered which disclosed the fact that on each of such occasions defendant had gone under an assumed name, and that on no two of which times had he used the same name. However, as to the use by defendant of one of the assumed names, the judge instructed the members of the jury that they should "purge it from their minds." Regarding the second occasion when defendant used an alias, it was shown in connection therewith that he had been arrested on a bench warrant for his failure to appear for trial and, when taken into custody, was found in a hotel, where he had registered under an assumed name. The third occasion or occasions had to do with a false name used by defendant when first arrested and by his use of the same name at his arraignment both in the justice court and in the superior court. On no one of the occasions when a witness was thus interrogated with respect to the use by defendant of an assumed name was the questioning done under proper cross-examination.

[1] The authorities are numerous which hold that in a criminal action a defendant cannot be held to account for the use by him of an assumed name, and that it is prejudicial error to permit the introduction of evidence thereof. People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 381, 136 P. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881;

People v. Mohr, 157 Cal. 732, 109 P. 476; People v. Arlington, 123 Cal. 356, 55 P. 1003; People v. Denby, 108 Cal. 54, 40 P. 1051.

When the case against defendant was originally called for trial in the superior court, defendant was not present. At that time and place a Mr. and a Mrs. McPherson, who had given their testimony at the preliminary examination of defendant in the justice court, were in attendance as prospective witnesses. In the absence of defendant and the consequent necessity of a continuance of the hearing of the action, the trial judge suggested the advisability of laying a foundation for the use of the testimony given by such witnesses at the preliminary examination of defendant. Acting upon such suggestion and without the presence of defendant, certain testimony of the two McPhersons was taken. Mr. McPherson was "sworn as a witness on behalf of the people." In answer to questions propounded to him at that time by the deputy district attorney, he testified in substance that he resided at Ft. Worth, Texas.; that he was in the construction business; that he was the husband of Mrs. McPherson "who was just on the stand"; that he was temporarily in Los Angeles for the purpose of testifying in the action; that theretofore he had testified at the preliminary examination when defendant was first charged with the offense of "robbery and burglary"; and that on the next day the witness intended to return to the state of Texas. At the request of the deputy district attorney, Mr. McPherson then submitted exemplars of his handwriting, which were formally witnessed by the clerk, the bailiff and the deputy district attorney, whereupon the following occurred:

"The Court: It (the exemplar) is ordered filed. Now, Mr. and Mrs. McPherson, the court desires to extend to you the thanks of the court for coming out here to be witnesses in this case. We regret the necessity of postponing the case, but we appreciate your being here just the same as though you had testified.

"Mr. Hill (deputy district attorney): May I supplement that—that I think both Mr. and Mrs. McPherson are to be heartily commended for the patriotic duty that they have assumed as American citizens, coming here at their inconvenience and expense merely for this purpose, as there was no power on the part of any officer of this state to have summoned or compelled Mr. or Mrs. McPherson to be here; they were outside the state of California, and the process of the state courts does not extend beyond its borders. We have no power to subpoena, and no other power that could be enforced to have brought Mr. and Mrs. McPherson here against their will; and I say when they have at their great personal inconvenience, made this trip across here for the purpose of testifying in this case, I believe that they should be publicly commended for their act.

"The Court: I am pleased to unite in that commendation. You do not know how much the state is frequently inconvenienced by not being able to get witnesses, and the unwillingness of witnesses of high standing to come and testify; and, when witnesses do come from a sister state to tell all they know of the facts, it is always a satisfaction to the officers having the responsibility of enforcing the law, and it is always commendable, the patriotism and high standard of citizenship of such persons who are willing to come. We appreciate it very much."

When the case against defendant finally came on for trial, after hearing certain evidence with reference to the absence of the two McPhersons, the judge of the trial court made an order to the effect that the testimony given by such witnesses at the preliminary examination of defendant in the justice court might be read in evidence. Thereafter, in the presence of the jury, over defendant's objection, for the ostensible purpose of "further laying the foundation," the deputy district attorney read into evidence the so-called testimony given by said two witnesses at the time when defendant was not present, including the congratulatory and commendatory remarks made to such witnesses by the judge and the deputy district attorney heretofore quoted herein.

During the reading of the proof preliminary to the introduction in evidence of the testimony given by the said two witnesses at the preliminary examination of defendant, the court declined to accede to defendant's request that the jury be excused from the courtroom. After the testimony of the two McPhersons which had been taken when defendant was not present, together with the commendatory remarks to them by the judge and the deputy district attorney which had been made at the same time, had been read in the presence of the jury, the judge "admonished" the jury that all such proceedings were addressed to the "law side of this case" for the purpose of laying a foundation for the exercise of discretion as to whether or not the depositions of the two McPhersons should be received in evidence. The judge continued:

"It is all preliminary and addressed to the court on the question of the reading of those depositions. When those depositions are read, if they are read, you pay attention to all the things brought out in those depositions, because they will be for you to pass upon. All things prior to that are for the court to pass on, and any questions asked, rulings or comments by the court, or any objections made by Mr. Allender (attorney for defendant), are things that you have nothing to do with.

[2] While appellant bitterly complains of the conduct of the trial judge in permitting evidence to go to the jury which was received at a time when defendant was not present, the greater part of his criticism is directed against the action of the court and the deputy district attorney in effect testify-

ing to the jury of the "high standing" of the two McPhersons. As the case was presented, the credit which was to attach to the identification of defendant by the two McPhersons was of paramount importance, without which his conviction would have been doubtful, if not impossible. Without considering the question of the possible admissibility at any time of the evidence given by the two McPhersons at a time when defendant was not on trial or even present, in the status of the case at the time the remarks regarding the two McPhersons by the judge and the deputy district attorney were permitted in the hearing of the jury, no such testimony was admissible from any source. The credibility of the witnesses had not been attacked; consequently no evidence regarding their credibility could be received by the court. Section 2053, Code Civ. Proc.; People v. Bush, 65 Cal. 129, 3 P. 590; People v. Cowgill, 93 Cal. 596, 29 P. 228. But even assuming the admissibility of such evidence at a proper time and in proper circumstances, at the time in question neither the judge nor the deputy district attorney had been sworn as a witness in the case, nor had the necessary foundation been laid for the reception of such evidence. In addition thereto, the right of cross-examination of the judge and the deputy district attorney, as such witnesses, had not been accorded defendant's counsel. It may be that there was no intention that either the deputy district attorney or the judge should offer testimony affecting the credibility of the two McPhersons. Their remarks were probably meant only for the purpose of courteously expressing appreciation of the trouble which the two McPhersons had taken in the matter, to say nothing of the expense borne by them which was incident to and connected with their trip from the state of Texas to the city of Los Angeles. However, the intent and purpose of the deputy district attorney and the judge in making such remarks are not controlling factors in the determination of the rights of defendant in the premises. If the effect of their conduct was substantially to prejudice defendant's case in the eyes of the jury, he cannot be said to have had such a trial as is vouchsafed to him under the laws of the land.

[3] The rule, as announced in numerous authorities, is that for any misconduct on the part of the trial judge, from which it may be rightfully deduced that the jury was influenced in rendering its verdict, prejudicial error will be conclusively presumed. In the case of Collins v. State, 99 Miss. 47, 54 So. 665, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1256, the court quoted with approval the following from the case of Green v. State, 97 Miss. 834, 53 So. 415:

"It is a matter of common knowledge that jurors, as well as officers in attendance upon court, are very susceptible to the influence of the judge. The sheriff and his deputies, as a rule, are anxious to do his bidding, and jurors watch closely his conduct, and give attention to his language, that they may, if possible, ascertain his leaning to one side or the other, which, if known, often largely influences their verdict. He cannot be too careful and guarded in language and conduct in the presence of the jury to avoid prejudice to either party. 21 Ency. P. & P. 994, 995, and notes. The court will not stop to inquire whether the jury was actually influenced by the conduct of the judge. All the authorities hold that, if they were exposed to improper influences, which might have produced the verdict, the presumption of law is against its purity; and testimony will not be heard to rebut this presumption. It is a conclusive presumption."

In the case of Smith v. Rothschild & Co., 13 Ga. App. 293, 79 S. E. 88, a new trial was granted "solely because of the remark made by counsel for the plaintiff" in the presence of the jury that, if a certain witness on the stand "were let alone, she would impeach herself." In the course of the opinion the court said:

"If the testimony of a witness authorizes the conclusion, an attorney may properly argue that the witness has shown himself to be unworthy of credit on account of the unreasonable and contradictory statements appearing in the testimony; but this is quite a different thing from telling the jury, while the witness is on the stand, that, if he is let alone, he will impeach himself. In harmful effect this may be equivalent to testimony that the witness is of bad character and not worthy of credit; and a witness is impeachable only by legal evidence. In the case of a popular and influential attorney, such as was the counsel who made the remark in this case, an expression of his opinion as to the character of the witness is likely to have weight with the jury and prejudice the adversary's case. * * * The object of all legal investigations is the discovery of the truth; but truth must be discovered by the application of rules of law to competent and relevant evidence, and after a trial in accordance with orderly procedure. The remark made by the counsel in the present case was doubtless inadvertent and not intended to prejudice the adversary's case. But its harmful effect was not removed, either by a withdrawal of the improper remark and explanation by the counsel, or by a rebuke by the court * * * [citing cases]."

In the case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Furlow, 121 Ark. 244, 180 S. W. 502, an attorney, in his closing argument to the jury, said that—"He and Mr. Young had been raised boys together, and had loved each other like brothers ever since, and Mr. Young's veracity was beyond question."

In commenting upon the propriety of such remark and its probable effect upon the minds of the members of the jury, the court said:

"With this assurance, the jury would be more likely to believe Mr. Young than the operator, and its effect would be to induce the jury to disregard the statement of the operator in regard to the notations on the telegram. This attempt to bolster up the evidence of Mr. Young was improper and prejudicial."

[4] If it is reversible error for an attorney to make a derogatory remark regarding a witness in the presence of the jury, or, on the other hand, to vouch for the veracity of a witness, it would seem that the granting of a new trial should result from highly commendatory remarks by the judge and the deputy district attorney concerning important witnesses, as was done in the instant case.

A California case, which in its effect is strikingly similar to the case at bar, is that of McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300. A statement of the necessary facts, with the ruling thereon is, contained in the opinion of the court, which we quote as follows:

"Johanna Maume was examined as a witness on behalf of plaintiff to prove Mathew Maume's prior possession of the demanded premises. On her cross-examination inquiries were made of her respecting her residence and business. The plaintiff's counsel objected to this course of examination. The objection was overruled, but at the same time his honor, the judge, stated that the witness was one of the most respectable women in his neighborhood. To this remark the defendants' counsel excepted, when the judge further stated that he did not mean to say that she was one of the most respectable, but a woman of respectability. The defendants complain of the conduct of the judge in this particular as an irregularity of sufficient magnitude to authorize the reversal of the judgment.

"From the high and authoritative position of a judge presiding at a trial before a jury, his influence with them is of vast extent, and he has it in his power by words or actions, or both, to materially prejudice the rights and interests of one or the other of the parties. By words or conduct he may on the one hand support the character or testimony of a witness, or on the other, may destroy the same, in the estimation of the jury; and thus his personal and official influence is exerted to the unfair advantage of one of the parties, with a corresponding detriment to the cause of the other. We regret the necessity for an expression of our disapproval of the irregularity of which complaint is made, and, though we do not impugn the expression as designed to aid the side of the plaintiff, we may say we should not hesitate to reverse the judgment because of it, if the same depended in any material degree upon the testimony of the witness whose character and standing was thus indorsed. * * *

On the same point, see the following California cases: Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 311, 68 P. 827, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135; People v. Conboy, 15 Cal. App. 97, 101, 113 P. 703; People v. Pitisci, 29 Cal. App. 727, 736, 157 P. 502.

In the case of People v. MacDonald, 167

Cal. 545, 140 P. 256, the defendant was charged with the commission of the crime of rape. In the course of the trial the judge referred to the prosecuting witness as being "court-ous, kind, and modest." The Supreme Court in condemning the remark by the trial court, said, in part:

"Under a system of law which prohibits judges from charging juries with respect to matters of fact (Const. art. 6, § 19), and which gives to the jury the exclusive power to determine the facts (Pen. Code, § 1126), the trial judge should, as has often been pointed out, use the greatest care to avoid, in the presence of the jury, any utterance which may be construed as an intimation of his opinion on the issues of fact which are to be determined by the jury [citing cases]. * * * Anything said by the judge, indicating that the witness on the stand had, by her demeanor, created a favorable impression on his mind, would naturally tend to lead the jury to give to her testimony greater weight than they otherwise might. * * * Such an intimation constituted an invasion of the jury's province of judging the facts, in the light of the appearance and demeanor of witnesses, and might be highly prejudicial."

It was, however, concluded in that case that the circumstances surrounding the remark by the trial judge were such that it was the duty of counsel for the defendant to direct special attention of the court to the objectionable matter, in order that the court might have had an opportunity to disclaim any intention to express an opinion on the weight of the testimony.

It is further pointed out in the opinion that, while a claim of misconduct on the part of the trial judge cannot ordinarily be considered on appeal unless it appears that at the time of the occurrence the complaining party directed the attention of the court to the alleged impropriety and assigned the criticised action as misconduct, nevertheless if the objectionable remark was of "such a character that the harmful result could not be obviated by any retraction or instruction," the failure to make such assignment of misconduct would not affect the rights of the injured party. In the instant case, although there was no assignment by defendant of misconduct as such, there was no occasion for him to do so. Nor is it urged by respondent that appellant's claim of misconduct by the judge and the deputy district attorney is not allowable because of defendant's failure to take exception thereto and make assignment of error thereon at the time such remarks were made. It will be remembered that the remarks by the trial judge and the deputy district attorney were not originally spoken in the course of the trial of defendant, but occurred at a time when defendant was not present and when a part of the testimony of the two McPhersons was taken for the purpose of establishing the fact that they would be absent from the state when the case was to be tried. Those remarks by the judge and the deputy district attorney were read in evidence to the jury over the repeated objections by defendant's counsel that such remarks, together with the remainder of the proceedings at that time, were "hearsay * * * incompetent * * * no proper foundation * * * not made in the presence of the defendant * * * prejudicial to the defendant, and necessarily injurious and not involving any issue in this case." But, even though it might be considered that either on the making of the remarks by the judge and the deputy district attorney, or when the same were read to the jury, defendant should have excepted thereto and assigned error thereon, if there had been such special assignment of misconduct, it is apparent that any attempted correction thereof would have but accentuated the error. As was intimated in Smith v. D. Rothschild & Co., 13 Ga. App. 293, 79 S. E. 88, supra, their injurious effect would not have been removed either by a withdrawal of the improper remarks or by an explanation thereof. The "harmful result could not be obviated by any retraction or instruction. In such cases the misconduct will furnish ground for reversal, even though the court may have taken immediate steps to correct any impression improperly conveyed to the jury." People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 551, 140 P. 256, 259, citing People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 P. 226.

The action of the court in admitting evidence regarding the use of false names by defendant could have had but one result, namely, that of discrediting the defendant's testimony. On the other hand, the action by the court in recommending to the jury the "high standing," etc., of the two McPhersons, could have had but the effect of increasing the credibility to be attached to their testimony.

The testimony of the McPhersons, which the jury necessarily believed in order to convict defendant, was in substance that the offense was committed, and the McPhersons identified defendant as the man who had robbed Mr. McPherson, and who also had burglarized their apartment. Defendant denied that at the time the crime was committed he was present at or in the vicinity of the place where the McPhersons were living. The issue as between the defendant and the McPhersons was either that of veracity of the opposing witnesses or that of possible mistake in the matter of identification of defendant by the McPhersons. The matter of credibility therefore was necessarily the determining factor in the evidence. In such circumstances defendant was entitled to have his evidence go to the jury unimpaired and unimpeached by inadmissible testimony regarding the use by him of any assumed name. Considering the extreme importance to the defendant of the testimony of the McPhersons relating to defendant's identification, the "bolstering up" of their testimony by the judge and the deputy district attorney was likewise most prejudicial to defendant's rights in the premises.

If the evidence presented on the trial of the case had been such that the guilt of the defendant was manifest, it is possible that, under the "saving grace" of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, it might be held that there had been no miscarriage of justice. But, while it cannot be denied that evidence on the part of the prosecution strongly points to defendant's guilt, the "alibi" presented by defendant and several apparently respectable and disinterested witnesses would, if believed, have established defendant's innocence. The question of defendant's identification as the robber and burglar, having been dependent upon the strength of the testimony of the two McPhersons, may have been and probably was solved by the jury and thus determined against defendant because the trial judge threw his judicial weight into the scales and vouched for the "high standing" of such witnesses.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

I concur: CURTIS, J.

CONREY, P. J. I dissent. I am of the opinion that no prejudicial error was committed in relation to the evidence that on certain occasions defendant had gone under an assumed name. It is true that, when the defendant on cross-examination was asked whether he at one time went under the name of William Mack, an objection to this question was overruled, and defendant answered in the affirmative. But shortly thereafter the court reconsidered that ruling, sustained the objection, struck out the answer, and informed the jury that all questions in regard to the witness going under the name of William Mack, and all inferences to be drawn therefrom, and the answers to such questions, were stricken out, "and the jury instructed to purge it from their minds." With regard to the testimony showing that the defendant, when arrested for the first time under this charge, gave the assumed name of Williamson, and when arrested on a bench warrant after his failure to appear at the trial on July 1, 1924, was found in San Francisco under another assumed name, I think that there was no error in admitting such testimony. In each instance the use of the assumed name was an incident closely connected with and, in substance, a part of the act of flight after the crime was committed. Considered in that light, I think the rulings of the court are not subject to the general rule established by the decisions to the effect that a defendant may not be discredited before the jury by proof that, on prior occasions entirely disconnected with the action, he has used an assumed name. I understand that, in order that flight may be considered as an element tending to indicate a guilty mind, there must be evidence that the defendant knew that a crime had been committed, and perhaps, also, that he knew that he was charged therewith. 8 Cal. Jur. p. 347. This defendant used the name of Williamson, not only when he was arrested with a part of the stolen property in his possession, but after he had been indicted under the assumed name of Williamson, he pleaded by that name as his true name, although later he gave his true name. And, of course, it cannot be denied that, when he used the name of Herold in San Francisco, he knew of the pendency of this action. On the morning of July 1, 1924, only half an hour before the case was to be called for trial, he was in his attorney's office apparently in preparation for the trial, yet he disappeared before the case could be called, and thereby forced the case from the calendar of that date.

Referring back to the evidence concerning the use of the assumed name William Mack, I think that, since the testimony was stricken out in the manner above stated, there remains no possible ground of complaint by the defendant, unless it be that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking the questions. But the defendant cannot avail himself of that objection, since the record does not show that defendant made any assignment of misconduct in relation to that matter. 2 Cal. Jur., p. 281.

The other important point discussed in the main opinion relates to a matter connected with certain testimony given by the McPhersons, and especially to remarks made by the judge and by the district attorney at the close of the giving of that testimony. Prior to that time certain depositions of the McPhersons had been taken, which were on file in the action. On July 1, 1924, the McPhersons had come from their Texas home to California, in order to testify at the trial of this action. When the abrupt disappearance of the defendant compelled a postponement of the trial, the court, in the absence of a jury, and in the absence of the defendant, took the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. McPherson, showing the fact of their intended immediate return to Texas, and furnished the court a means of identification of their signatures. This was evidence addressed solely to the court as a part of the ground for admission of the depositions in evidence in the event that at the later trial of the case the personal presence of the McPhersons could not be obtained. It was at the close of the giving of this testimony that the judge and district attorney made the remarks referred to in the main opinion. It is clear enough that there was no intention to make comments upon the credibility or accuracy of the testimony contained in the depositions. But assuming that in some degree the remarks as made amounted to a commendation of the character of those witnesses, I think that there was no error except one in the nature of an unintentional misconduct by the judge and the district attorney. I have searched the record to find any assignment of misconduct made by the attorney of the defendant in connection with this matter, either at the time when the remarks were made, or at the time when the court allowed them to be read, in the presence of the jury at the trial of the action, as a part of the evidence constituting the foundation for admission of the depositions in evidence. Therefore the same rule applies to which I have referred in connection with the questions asked of the defendant concerning the use by him of the assumed name of William Mack. In each of these instances, if there was any misconduct, I think that it was not of such a nature that the court can say that it was beyond cure by means of appropriate instructions. This being so, the rule applies that defendant cannot avail himself of an objection to such misconduct, when he omits to present that objection to the lower court, and only presents it for the first time in the court of appeal.

Inasmuch as I understand that the evidence here very strongly tends to establish beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of the defendant, I have been unable to agree that the said errors, assuming them to be such, would justify a reversal.

PEOPLE v. ONE 1923 OAKLAND SPORT AUTOMOBILE, MODEL 6-44, etc. (ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST CO., Intervener). (Civ. 2848.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 7, 1925.)

Intoxicating liquors ⚡250—Proof necessary to warrant forfeiture of automobile used to transport intoxicating liquor stated.

Proceeding to forfeit private automobile used in transporting intoxicating liquor, being one to enforce criminal penalty or judgment of sentence in criminal case, though civil process of court may be invoked, people must show, by direct or circumstantial evidence, that legal owner under conditional sale contract had actual knowledge of such use or intent to so use such property, and fact that such owner might have so discovered by keeping car under constant espionage, without tangible or substantial reason therefor, is insufficient, especially in view of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 26 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138-1½mm), made part of Wright Act by reference.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against One 1923 Oakland Sport Automobile, Model 6-44, etc., in which the Anglo-California Trust Company intervened as claimant. From judgment forfeiting automobile, claimant appeals. Reversed as to claimant.

R. G. Hudson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur W. Hill, Dist. Atty., and J. J. Cairns, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Eureka, for the People.

HART, J. The intervening claimant, above named, has brought this appeal to this court from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Humboldt, condemning and forfeiting to the people of the state of California the defendant automobile, and directing the sheriff of said county to sell the same at public auction, and pay into the treasury of said county of Humboldt the proceeds of said sale, after deducting the expenses in keeping said defendant and the costs of conducting such sale.

In December, 1923, one Charles Dolan had possession of defendant automobile in Humboldt county, and while having such possession, used the car as means for the transportation of intoxicating liquor in said county. On said day he was arrested by an officer of said county, and later was formally charged, under the state Prohibition Enforcement Act (Laws 1921, p. 79) before a justice of the peace, in the city of Eureka, in said county, with the crime of transporting intoxicating liquor. At the same time the said automobile was seized and taken possession of by the officer making said arrest. Subsequently Dolan was tried for and convicted before said justice's court of the crime of transporting intoxicating liquor.

This action was brought by the district attorney of said county of Humboldt, under the provisions of the said Prohibition Enforcement Act to condemn, confiscate, and forfeit to the people of the state said automobile, alleging in his petition that, having been used for the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor, said automobile thereupon became a common nuisance, and subject, under the terms of said act, to such condemnation and forfeiture.

These facts were set out in the complaint of the intervening claimant and appellant, and shown by uncontradicted evidence: On the 28th day of July, 1924, J. W. Leavitt & Co., a corporation engaged in the business of selling automobiles in the city of San Francisco, sold the defendant automobile to one Lillian Gernandt under a contract of conditional sale; said contract being in writing. The purchase price of said automobile was $1,521.13, of which the sum of $482.58 was paid at the time of the delivery of the automobile to said Gernandt; the balance to be paid in monthly installments of $57. After the initial payment of $482.58, certain of the installments provided for by the contract were paid. Subsequently to the execution of the contract and the delivery of the automobile to Lillian Gernandt, the seller, J. W. Leavitt & Co., sold and assigned the contract and all the rights of the former thereunder to the intervening claimant, Anglo-California Trust Company.

Under the express terms of the conditional sale contract, the legal title to the defendant automobile was to remain in the seller, or its successors or assigns, until all payments should be made and all the conditions of the contract were complied with. Ever since the sale of the said contract to Anglo-California Trust Company, it has been and was at the time of the commencement of this action the legal owner of the automobile and entitled to all payments provided for in said contract; that at the time of the seizure of the car there was, and ever since has been, due the Anglo-California Trust Company on the purchase price of said automobile the sum of $865.45; that said trust company had no confiscation insurance on said automobile; that Lillian Gernandt, the registered owner of the automobile, "is without property or assets upon which an execution could be levied by the Anglo-California Trust Company, and has no assets or funds from which could be collected the balance due from her upon said contract."

Among the provisions of the contract of sale between Leavitt & Co. and Lillian Gernandt was one to the effect that the purchaser should not use said automobile nor permit it to be used for any unlawful purpose. While of no consequence here, since she has not appealed, it will do no harm to state that Lillian Gernandt also answered the complaint or petition, alleging that she had an interest in the car, and, while admitting that she loaned the automobile to Dolan, of which fact, she alleged, she did not advise the appellant, alleged that she had no knowledge of the fact that Dolan used or intended to use it for the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquors or for any other unlawful purpose.

The court found that defendant automobile was sold by J. W. Leavitt & Co. to Lillian Gernandt under a conditional contract of sale, in writing, at the time and for the price and on the terms stated in appellant's complaint in intervention; that on the purchase price of the car ($1,521.13), said Gernandt paid the sum of $482.50 on the delivery of said automobile to her; that thereafter certain payments were made on said contract by Gernandt; and that, at the time of the trial of this action, the sum of $865.45 was unpaid on said purchase price. The court further found:

"That the said intervener, Anglo-California Trust Company, at the time said automobile was delivered to said Lillian E. Gernandt did not have personal knowledge or information that said automobile was to be used or was being used in unlawfully transporting liquor, and the court further finds that, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, said intervener could have known, and should have known, that said defendant automobile was being used for the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor, and for its failure to exercise reasonable or any diligence in that behalf said intervener was guilty of laches."

The foregoing finding rests entirely upon the doctrine of notice—that is, that the appellant had knowledge or information of such facts as were sufficient to put a prudent person upon inquiry which, if prosecuted with reasonable diligence, would have disclosed to the appellant that it was the intention to use the automobile, or that it was being used, for an unlawful purpose. This, it would seem, is the only permissible theory of the finding upon which the judgment is planted, since the court, as will be noted, expressly found that the appellant "did not have personal knowledge or information that said automobile was to be used or was being used in unlawfully transporting liquor."

The finding by which it is sought to vitalize the decree from which this appeal is taken is wholly insufficient to support a judgment confiscating and forfeiting property employed as means for facilitating the violation of the prohibition enforcement laws. It must be remembered that, while the civil process of the courts may be invoked to enforce the penalty of forfeiture of private property, authorized in proper cases by the Volstead (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138 $\frac{1}{4}$ et seq.) and Wright (St. Cal. 1921, p. 79) Acts, the fact is that, after all, the object of such proceeding, as is that of the present proceeding, is to enforce a criminal penalty or, it may aptly be said, to enforce a judgment of sentence in a criminal case. In substantial effect, it is nothing less than that; hence, wisely, the law contemplates that, when a party has been charged with and convicted of committing any offense under the prohibition enforcement law, and it develops that, in committing such offense, he has used as an agency therefor certain property, the legal title to which is in another, and it clearly appears that such owner has not himself actually participated in the commission of the crime, before the legal owner can be deprived of his property by the people of the state through proceedings of forfeiture, based upon the fact of the use of such property for such illegal purpose, it is incumbent upon the people to show by sufficient evidence that such owner had actual knowledge that the intention was to use such property, or that it was being used, as an instrumentality for consummating the commission of such crime. Of course, the fact of knowledge by the legal owner of the property that the intention was to use the property, or that it was being used, as in aid of or an agency for the commission of the crime may be proved, as may any other ultimate fact, by circumstantial evidence, but the circumstances must go further in their probative effect than merely to show, as seems to be the extent of the showing here, that the owner, though having no tangible or substantial reason for so proceeding, might discover that the car was being used for an unlawful purpose, if he would at all times, and wherever it might be taken or driven, keep it under espionage. Such a duty certainly is not imposed upon dealers in automobiles. If it were, there would be few, if any persons of law-abiding proclivity who would engage in such business.

The above views coincide with the provisions of section 26 of title 2 of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138 $\frac{1}{2}$ mm), also by reference made a part of the state enforcement law known as the Wright Act (Traffic Truck Sales Co. of California et al. v. Justice Court, 192 Cal. 377, 220 P. 306; People v. Buttulia [Cal. App.] 233 P. 401), as that section has been construed by the courts. Said section provides that, where intoxicating liquors are transported illegally, the same, together with the vehicle being used for that purpose, shall be seized and taken possession of by an officer, who shall at once proceed against the person arrested, etc.—

"but the said vehicle or conveyance shall be returned to the owner upon execution by him of a good and valid bond, with sufficient sureties, in a sum double the value of the property, which said bond shall be approved by said officer and shall be conditioned to return said property to the custody of said officer on the day of trial to abide the judgment of the court. The court upon conviction of the person so arrested shall order the liquor destroyed, and unless good cause to the contrary is shown by the owner, shall order a sale by public auction of the property seized, and the officer making the sale, after deducting the expenses of keeping the property, the fee for the seizure, and the cost of the sale, shall pay all liens, according to their priorities, which are established, by intervention or otherwise at said hearing or in other proceeding brought for said purpose, as being bona fide and as having been created without the lienor having any notice that the carrying vehicle was being used or was to be used for illegal transportation of liquor, and shall pay the balance of the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

There could be nothing clearer than that the meaning of said section is that, where the legal owner of an automobile in the possession of a conditional vendee can and does satisfactorily show, in the case of the seizure of such automobile under the Wright Act, that he had no knowledge that the car was to be used or was used or being used by the conditional vendee or any other party for the illegal transportation of intoxicating liquor, he then establishes the "good cause" which the statute intends will operate as a perfect defense against the confiscation and forfeiture of the seller's interest therein. It has, indeed, been plainly so held in Jackson v. United States (C. C. A.) 295 F. 620, and in the very recent case of People v. One 1924 Studebaker Sport Automobile (Cal. App.) 234 P. 856. In the case first named, one Bostick, conditional purchaser of the automobile therein involved, was convicted of the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor by means of said automobile. The court found as a fact that the intervening claimant, who was the seller of the car, and in whom the legal title was to remain until the payment in full of the agreed purchase price, which price had not been paid at the time of the trial, had no personal knowledge that the automobile was to be used, or was in fact used, by Bostick in the unlawful transportation of liquor, but, nevertheless, denied his petition for the return of the machine, and directed its sale without any right of the petitioner to any of the proceeds thereof. The Circuit Court of Appeals held, in effect, that the finding was insufficient as a matter of law to uphold the decree, as it denied the right of the legal owner of an automobile expressly given him by the Volstead Enforcement Act, to save his rights in the property by a showing that the car had been used by the conditional vendee for the unlawful purpose without his knowledge, consent, or acquiescence. The trial court, in an opinion filed in that case, among other things, declared:

"An owner may show 'good cause' if he show that the car was taken and used without his knowledge or consent; but, where he turns it over to another for a price, giving absolute control to such other, he is not in a position to show 'good cause' against a forfeiture, if the car be seized while unlawfully used in the transportation of liquor, by asserting that such use was without his knowledge."

To which the Circuit Court of Appeals made answer:

"If, as the court there says, the owner may show the 'good cause' referred to in the statute, by showing that the vehicle was taken and used by the purchaser without his knowledge or consent, we are unable to see why that right is necessarily defeated by the fact that, by the terms of its conditional sale, its purchaser was given the absolute control of it within a certain designated territory, and so long as he complied with all of the terms of the sale. If that be so, no conditional sale of such personal property could be made with any security to the seller except by his paying for a policy of insurance. We agree with Judge Thomas in the case of United States v. Sylvester (D. C.) 273 Fed. 253, that 'it is apparent that the Congress intended to penalize only the wrongdoer,' and not the innocent party or parties to the transaction. As said by the court in that case:

"When a defendant is arrested for transporting intoxicating liquor, and the vehicle is seized, what is to be done with it depends upon what interest the defendant has in it. If he had no interest—that is, if he had stolen it, or had borrowed it from its real owner, who neither knew nor could be presumed to have knowledge of the illegal purpose for which it was to be used—manifestly the wrongdoer had no interest to forfeit, and it logically follows, under the provisions of the act, that the vehicle should be returned to its rightful owner, by order of court. If, on the other hand, the wrongdoer had an interest in the vehicle, his interest should be confiscated and the vehicle ordered sold. What, then, is to become of the interest of the conditional vendor or the interest of the mortgagee? Are such persons to lose their interest in the vehicle or the value of their property right? The answer is a negative one, and is found in the provisions of section 26, which guard against such loss, so far as possible."

Very much the same views are expressed in the case last above named—People v. One 1924 Studebaker, etc., Automobile—by Presiding Justice Langdon of the First Appellate District. The finding upon which the judgment in that case was grounded is in precisely the same language as is the finding by which it is sought to support the judgment in this case. Speaking of said finding, it is said by Judge Langdon that:

It "cannot have any legal force or effect and is immaterial here because it cannot be seriously contended that a seller of automobiles is bound to be 'reasonably diligent' to ascertain the use to which each car he sells is put or suffer a penalty of forfeiture of his interest in the same. No provision of the Wright Act nor of the National Prohibition Enforcement Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, §§ 10138¼ et seq.) is authority for this position, and, certainly, no general rule of law would warrant it."

Again, in the same case, it is said:

"It is admitted by the respondent that no penal provision contained in the Volstead Act authorizes the judgment, and that, on the contrary, said act expressly provides for reimbursement of lienholders in the event of the sale of property used in transportation of intoxicating liquor, where such lienholders had no knowledge of the illegal use. It is settled that the Wright Act adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act [People v. Butulia, 46 Cal. App. Dec. 61]. Respondent contends that the method provided in the Volstead Act for disposition of the proceeds of a sale is a procedural provision, and is not a part of the Wright Act. We think this reasoning is 'beside the mark.' The situation merely presents a case where it is sought to enforce an extreme penalty against an innocent owner of an automobile, which penalty is not only not provided in the Volstead Act, but is expressly denied therein, and, consequently, is not a penalty under the Wright Act."

The district attorney, in his brief, declares that the true rule applicable in cases of the forfeiture of property arising under the Volstead or Wright Act is as it is stated and applied in Goldsmith, Jr.-Grant Co. v. United States, 254 U. S. 505, 511, 41 S. Ct. 189, 65 L. Ed. 376. That case arose over the violation of a federal statute which provided for the forfeiture of goods or commodities upon which a tax was imposed, and such goods or commodities were removed, deposited, or concealed in any place, with the intent to defraud the government of such tax, and further provided that every boat, cart, wagon, or other conveyance and all horses and animals, used in such removal, shall also be forfeited to the government. Under that statute, a libel was filed against a Hudson automobile, charging that it had been used by certain named persons in removing, for deposit and concealment, a quantity of distilled spirits, upon which a tax was imposed by the United States, and which had not been paid. The owner of the automobile intervened, alleging and proving that he had no knowledge of the use of the car for the unlawful purpose charged. The court held, in effect, that the fact that the owner had no knowledge of the illegal use to which the automobile had been put and was innocent of all wrong in connection with the illicit transaction, was not a consideration material to the decision of the case; that the statute, without qualification, declared that the property so used should be forfeited and sold, and the proceeds of the sale turned over to the government, and that therefore there was no other legal alternative but to order a forfeiture of the property. The reasoning by which that conclusion was reached need not be repeated herein. It is enough to say that there is no ground for a difference of opinion as to the soundness of the conclusion therein announced, unless we deny the right of Congress to authorize a forfeiture of privately owned property in such a case and under such circumstances, and this cannot successfully be done. But there is a broad and clear ground of distinction between the statute involved in the Goldsmith-Grant decision and the statute with which we are now dealing, in that, in the former there was no "saving clause," so to speak—no provision affording means by which the legal owners of automobiles, having no knowledge of the unlawful use of their property, may protect their rights therein—while here, as has been shown, there is a provision expressly declaring that the legal owner, where he himself has not been a party to the crime, may intervene in the forfeiture proceedings and so protect and preserve his rights in the premises.

The foregoing considerations are decisive of this case. Still it is not improper to suggest that, if the theory of the finding upon which it is sought to rest the decree entered herein were maintainable, there is not a particle of evidence which lends the slightest support to that finding. In other words, the evidence does not show a single fact or circumstance which would have conveyed to the seller of the defendant automobile the slightest intimation or suggestion that the automobile was to be used, or at any time was being used, in the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor. In a word, the record is absolutely silent as to any reason why the seller "could have known and should have known" that the automobile was to be used, or was being used, for the illegal purpose mentioned. But, as stated, these considerations, in view of the conclusion first above declared, are of no consequence in the decision of this case.

The judgment as to the appellant is reversed.

PEOPLE v. ONE 1923 BUICK COUPE AUTOMOBILE, MODEL 23-36, etc. (McKEON et al., Interveners). (Civ. 2920.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District.
California. March 7, 1925.)

Intoxicating liquors ⇄250—Proof necessary to warrant forfeiture of automobile used to transport intoxicating liquor stated.

Proceeding to forfeit private automobile used in transporting intoxicating liquor, being one to enforce criminal penalty or judgment of sentence in criminal case, though civil process of court may be invoked, people must show, by direct or circumstantial evidence, that legal owner under conditional sale contract had actual knowledge of such use of, or intent to so use, such property, and fact that such owner might have so discovered by keeping car under constant espionage, without tangible or substantial reason therefor, is insufficient, especially in view of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 26 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½mm), made part of Wright Act by reference.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against One 1923 Buick Coupe Automobile, Model 23-36, etc., in which Helen McKeon and another intervened, as claimants. From a judgment forfeiting the automobile, claimants appealed. Reversed as to claimants, with directions.

P. H. Ryan, of Eureka, for appellant McKeon.

Nelson & Ricks, of Eureka, for appellant National Surety Co.

Arthur W. Hill, Dist. Atty., and J. J. Cairns, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Eureka, for the People.

HART, J. The district attorney of Humboldt county, purporting to act under the state prohibition law, known as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), instituted this action in the name and on behalf of the people of the state of California, against the defendant automobile, to secure a decree declaring and adjudging it to be a common nuisance, and directing the sale thereof, by the sheriff of Humboldt county at public sale, "and that the proceeds of such sale be applied to the payment of the costs of this action * * * and the balance thereof be disposed of as provided by law," etc.

It appears from the complaint that, at all times mentioned therein, Helen McKeon was the registered owner of said automobile, and that Airth Automobile Company of Eureka, Cal., was the legal owner thereof; that on the 17th day of November, 1923, in the county of Humboldt, one C. La Chappelle had possession of said automobile, "and then and there willfully and unlawfully used and employed said defendant for the transportation of intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky"; that at said time and place and on the date stated, said La Chappelle, while so using said automobile, was arrested, and said automobile seized by a detective connected with the office of the district attorney of Humboldt county; that, on the same day, a complaint was filed in the justice's court of Eureka township, charging said La Chappelle with unlawfully transporting intoxicating liquor by means of said automobile; that thereafter he was arrested, appeared before said justice's court, entered a plea of guilty to said charge; and that, subsequently, and upon said plea, judgment of conviction and sentence was entered against and imposed upon him by the justice of said court.

Both Helen McKeon, as the registered owner, and National Surety Company, as the legal owner of the defendant automobile, filed complaints in intervention, each of said complaints alleging, among other things, that the intervener had an interest in said automobile (describing such interest), and that the intervener had no knowledge of the unlawful use of the defendant automobile, as charged, or that it was the intention so to use it at the time mentioned in the district attorney's complaint or at any other time.

Upon a trial of the issues as thus framed, the court entered its decree condemning said automobile, and forfeiting it "to the people of the state of California," and directing the sheriff of Humboldt county to sell the same at public auction, and, after deducting necessary costs and expenses from the proceeds of such sale, to pay the sum remaining into the treasury of Humboldt county.

The interveners appeal from said decree.

The court found that neither the intervenor Helen McKeon, the registered owner, nor Airth Automobile Company, the legal owner of defendant, at the time La Chappellee was using the automobile, "had personal knowledge or information that said defendant would be used for the transportation of liquor, or that it would be used to transport liquor from San Francisco to Eureka," but found that, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, said Helen McKeon and said Airth Automobile Company could have known and should have known that said defendant automobile was used and being used for the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor, and that, for failure to exercise reasonable or any diligence in that behalf, said Helen McKeon and said Airth Automobile Company were guilty of laches. It was further found that the allegations of Helen McKeon's complaint in intervention that she purchased the automobile from the Airth Automobile Company for the sum of $1,535, that at the time of the seizure thereof there was unpaid on the contract price the sum of $609, that, since said seizure she has paid on account of said contract the sum of $87, "and that the sum of $522 of said purchase price is now unpaid," were true. The court also found that the National Surety Company has succeeded to all the rights of said Airth Automobile Company in and to said defendant and the contract evidencing the sale thereof.

This case, in the facts and the legal points, parallels the case of People v. One 1923 Oakland Sport Automobile (Civil No. 2848) 236 P. 194, in which an opinion has this day been filed in this court. The findings in both cases are exactly the same. Upon the authority of that case and the authorities therein considered, the judgment in this case must be reversed. It may, with no impropriety, be stated, however, that, if it were true that the findings upon which the judgment as to both Miss McKeon and Airth Automobile Company proceeded were sufficient in law to support a judgment in a proceeding under the Volstead (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.) or Wright (St. Cal. 1921, p. 79) Acts, looking to the forfeiture of property used in violating any of the provisions of said acts, still there is no evidence that supports those findings. In other words, there is no evidence showing or reasonably tending to show that either of the parties named had knowledge of any fact or facts or circumstances which would have put them, as prudent persons, upon inquiry which, if pressed with reasonable diligence, would have brought to them actual knowledge that the defendant would be used or was used or being used in the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor, and that, having failed to exercise that degree of diligence, they were guilty of laches which charged to them actual knowledge of the fact. But since, as we have said, the findings referred to are without legal force, and therefore impart no life to the judgment, it is not necessary that we should further pursue the present consideration.

The finding that the parties named at no time had personal knowledge or information of the unlawful use to which the defendant automobile was put, or was intended to be put, by La Chappelle conclusively establishes the invalidity of the judgment.

The judgment as to both of the appellants is reversed, with directions to the trial judge to enter judgment on the findings in favor of both appellants.

McCONNELL v. QUINN. (Civ. 2870.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 14, 1925.)

1. Highways $\S$ 184(2)—Burden on plaintiff to prove collision caused by, and injuries sustained as direct result of, defendant's negligence.

In action for injuries to driver of wagon struck by defendant's automobile, burden was on plaintiff to prove that collision was caused by defendant's negligence, and that plaintiff suffered some injury or damage directly caused by such negligence.

2. Highways $\S$ 184(3)—Whether collision was caused by, and injury sustained as direct result of, defendant's negligence held for jury.

Whether collision between wagon driven by plaintiff and defendant's automobile was caused by defendant's negligence, and whether plaintiff suffered any injury or damage directly caused by such negligence, held for jury.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1001(1)—Jury's conclusion on facts binding, unless testimony, as matter of law, does not support verdict.

Jury's conclusion on facts is binding on appellate court, unless testimony compels conclusion, as matter of law, that it affords no support to verdict.

4. Damages $\S$ 185(1)—Implied finding that plaintiff's injuries were minor and temporary held warranted by testimony.

Physician's and parties' testimony, in action for injuries to driver of wagon struck by defendant's automobile, held to support jury's finding, implied from verdict for defendant, that plaintiff's injuries were minor and temporary, and did not appreciably interrupt or interfere with performance of his usual duties.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 932(1)—Presumed, in support of verdict for defendant, if latter was negligent, that jury regarded damages as only nominal.

It must be presumed, in support of verdict for defendant, if latter was negligent and plaintiff entitled to some damages, though injuries were slight and temporary, that jury regarded amount as nominal only and not more than amount paid by defendant for medical treatment of plaintiff.

6. Damages $\S$ 185(1)—Implied finding that automobile driver's conduct was not wanton, malicious, or in conscious disregard of other's rights held warranted.

Evidence held to warrant implied finding that automobile driver's act in suddenly turning to right and striking wagon after starting to pass it from rear, was not wanton or so reckless as to evince malice or conscious disregard of another's rights so as to justify exemplary or punitive damages.

7. Damages $\S$ 91(3)—Proof necessary to warrant exemplary or punitive damages stated.

To justify exemplary or punitive damages in personal injury suit, defendant's conduct must have been wanton or so reckless as to evince malice or conscious disregard of others' rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. H. McConnell against Mary H. Quinn. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, and O. O. Collins, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. E. Perkins and Power & McFadzean, all of Visalia, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is for damages for personal injuries. The case was tried before a jury, who found for the defendant, and judgment was entered in accord therewith. A motion for a new trial by the plaintiff was denied, and he appeals from the judgment and said order.

In the forenoon of the 26th day of April, 1921, the plaintiff, driving a team of horses hitched to a four-wheel delivery wagon, was traveling in a northerly direction upon a paved highway in Tulare county, and when near Traver, a railroad station in said county, the defendant, driving an automobile in the same direction upon the same highway, and rearward of plaintiff, ran her car into and so collided with the rear of plaintiff's wagon. The impact caused the horses attached to the plaintiff's wagon to jump, with the result that the plaintiff fell from the seat of the wagon to the pavement and received certain injuries.

The second amended complaint describes the injuries suffered by plaintiff by reason of the collision, and alleges that they were directly or proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The answer consists entirely of specific denials of the material allegations of the complaint.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the evidence, as a matter of law, shows that the defendant was guilty of negligence which proximately caused the injuries he received as a result of the collision, and that, therefore, the court erred in refusing the request of plaintiff for a directed verdict in his favor; that the verdict is not supported by the evidence and is against law. On the other hand, the defendant contends that the question of negligence was for the jury, but that, even if it be assumed that the evidence upon its face shows that she was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury, the verdict and judgment are supported by evidence that plaintiff suffered no damage other than that for which he was compensated by the defendant.

The defendant's story of how the collision occurred is, in substance, as follows: That she was driving at a rate of speed of between 25 and 30 miles an hour in a northerly direction over the paved highway mentioned above; that, immediately in front of her, at a distance of about the width of an ordinary street, another party was driving a Dodge roadster at approximately the same rate of speed at which she was traveling; that at or near a curve in the highway, near Traver station, the driver of the Dodge roadster swerved to the left and passed the wagon of the plaintiff; that she started to follow the Dodge car, was in the act of driving to the left of the plaintiff's wagon, and had proceeded but a few feet when she observed a large truck in the highway traveling towards her, going in a southerly direction, and at the same instant of time she saw another car turn from the rear and to the left of the truck and into the center of the highway, traveling in a southerly direction or towards her, at a rapid rate of speed. At once realizing that she could not pass the plaintiff's wagon before either said other car or the truck reached the point where the wagon then was, she suddenly turned her car to the right, and, in doing so, struck the rear end of plaintiff's wagon. The defendant testified that the force of the impact by reason of the collision was hardly noticed by her, and in this she was corroborated by a young lady riding with her and occupying the front seat of the car at the time the collision happened. The bumper on her automobile was slightly bent and the front wheels thereof thrown out of alignment as a result of the collision. The noise of the impact seemed to have frightened the horses, and this made them lurch forward, causing the plaintiff to be thrown from the wagon to the ground as above stated. The horses started to run, and did run, for a short distance, when, in making a sudden turn, they in some manner became detached from the wagon, and ran some distance, when they were stopped by the driver of the truck referred to, who "tied them" to a fence. The wagon and the harness were damaged to some extent.

The defendant, immediately following the collision, alighted from her car, and started to the spot where the plaintiff had fallen. Before she reached that spot the witness Rice, the driver of the Dodge roadster, had stopped and turned and driven back to where the plaintiff was lying on the pavement and assisted him to his feet. Blood was flowing from a wound on his head. Rice stated that at first plaintiff appeared to be somewhat dazed, but within a few minutes seemed to recover himself and insisted on getting his wagon and team and proceeding on. He was, however, urged by those present, including the defendant, to go to a doctor and receive treatment. As to this matter and what followed the visit to the doctor, the defendant testified:

"He had this cut on his head which was bleeding, and I felt that it ought to be cleansed, so I said to him, 'I would like to take you to a doctor and have that cleansed.' He said he had never been in a doctor's office before, and he was not hurt much, and he did not wish to go. But, in spite of his protesting, I insisted that he go. I took him in my car and took him to Dr. Gillespie at Kingsburg. Dr. Gillespie dressed this wound on his head, this cut, and just felt of the head in—just felt of him in a general way. I remember a scratch on his elbow. I do not remember that he said a word about his neck or his hip or anything else when we were in Dr. Gillespie's office. And after that was done we took him on to Fresno, which was his destination. We piled all of his things into our machine, and took him on to Fresno, because he said that was where he was going and where he wanted to go. We took him to his home in Fresno.

"Q. When you were talking to him there before you put him in your car did he complain anything about suffering from pain? A. No; he said he was not hurt very much. He said his harness and wagon were all right, he could drive the team.

"Q. And after you got him in the car, between that time and the time you got to Dr. Gillespie's office, did he complain of any pain? A. No; not a word.

"Q. After Dr. Gillespie had dressed his wound and you started with him to Fresno, did he complain of anything? A. I do not remember that he said a word about any pain. I do not remember that our conversation was about that. We talked and visited, just as friendly as any person ever visited. I never dreamed of his suing me.

"Q. When did you next see him? A. I did not see him again until—it was some time before Christmas of that same year.

"Q. Where did you see him then? A. He came to my house to see me.

"Q. Did you have any conversation with him at that time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you remember the substance of it? A. Yes; I think I do. He came to see me. see what I was going to do about that accident, and I told him I was not going to do anything, that I did not feel that I owed him anything, and we talked about it. And I said that 'I took you to the doctor in Kingsburg to have that cut in your head dressed because I thought it was a kind thing to do; and you did not want to go to the doctor.' And I said, 'Wouldn't you have done that for me, if I had been the injured one?' He said, 'Yes, I would.' Then I said that day he had every appearance of being a very poor man, and the damage to his wagon and harness seemed to mean a great deal to him, and I told him that I would fix up the wagon and harness for him."

A. W. Quinn, husband of defendant, testified that, some time after the date the accident happened, the plaintiff called on him at the bank with which he (Quinn) was connected at Exeter, Tulare county, and "stated he had a bill against me for some damages that was done by this accident out north of Traver. And I asked him what they were, and he said—I can't remember the exact amount, but it was a dollar or two for his repairing his wagon, it seems to me, and a doctor bill of $3 or $4, something like that. I don't remember the exact amount." The witness gave plaintiff a check for the amount. The check was produced, was identified by the witness as the one he gave to plaintiff, and was introduced in evidence. It called for the total sum of $19.75, payable to plaintiff. On the back of the check, in the handwriting of the witness, was this indorsement: "Wagon repair, $15; doctor bill, $4.75." The witness stated that that indorsement was written on the back of the check before he delivered the check to plaintiff. The witness stated that, before delivering the check to plaintiff, the latter made no complaint of having suffered any personal injuries other than those already spoken of, and made no claim to damages other than those for the injury to his wagon and the bill of the doctor for medical treatment. After receiving the check, though, the plaintiff, so the witness testified, said that—"He would want something for personal injury. I do not know whether he used 'personal injury' or not, but that was the sum and substance of it. I asked him in what way he was damaged. Well, he said he did not know, but since the injury he had not been able to do much of anything, he felt he was injured, and that he would want something for it. I asked him what he thought he was damaged, and he said he did not know, and that was about all of the conversation we had.

"Q. Did you decline to pay him anything? A. He did not state what he wanted. I told him I did not know anything about it, that I was not there, and if he felt he was injured in any way to go and see my wife. And later he did call upon my wife. In substance that is about all I can remember of the incident at that time."

Dr. J. A. Gillespie, to whom the defendant took the plaintiff for treatment immediately after the accident, testifying for the plaintiff, stated that, because the plaintiff at the time he treated him immediately following the accident, "did not seem to be very badly hurt," he took and preserved no notes of the nature of the injuries. He stated that at that time he found on the top of plaintiff's head "a little injury, not much," and also "a few scratches upon his body. * * *

The only injury I treated was on the top of his head at that time." Subsequently plaintiff called at the doctor's office two or three times, and "if I remember correctly he complained of his back or neck or something. It has slipped my memory, because it has been so long ago. Q. Did you render any treatment to any other portions of his body? A. I do not know whether I gave him something to—or strapped it or what I did. I have forgotten what I did do—not much. Q. You do not recollect of putting a plaster on his body any place? A. Well I may have strapped it, that is, put some adhesive on it like I often do in cases, * * * Q. You do not recollect how many times Mr. McConnell came to your office? A. Oh he was backwards and forwards between Fresno and Goshen Junction two or three times. Q. And he came to your office that many times, you recollect? A. He would stop, yes."

The plaintiff, after telling what he remembered as to the manner in which the collision was brought about, which varied little, if any, from the defendant's description of the way that it occurred, testified that he was stunned and for an instant of time dazed as a result of his fall to the pavement. He said that the defendant insisted on taking him to a doctor, and recalled saying to her and others present that he "did not think he was hurt bad," but that he got in defendant's car and was by her driven to Kingsburg and to Dr. Gillespie's office; that the doctor dressed a wound on the top of his head; that no stitches were taken in the wound, but that the doctor cleansed the wound with some medicinal preparation, and then covered it with cotton, over and upon which he put an adhesive plaster. Plaintiff was not certain whether the doctor examined his neck, back, and hip at that time, but that subsequently he did; that he had no recollection of what the doctor said at any time as to the condition of his back, neck, and hip; that he was then "suffering pretty badly with my neck," but "not so much with my hip"; that he could not say whether on that occasion he told Dr. Gillespie that his hip "was bothering him." Plaintiff then told of having been taken to his home in Fresno by the defendant; that he was not certain that he and defendant talked about or discussed his injuries while they were on their way from Kingsburg to Fresno, or whether he stated to her "how he felt." Plaintiff called on Dr. Gillespie, so he testified, on the 28th day of April, 1921, two days after the accident. At that time, he said, the doctor put a plaster on his hip; that that was the first time that the doctor had so treated his hip; that the plaster remained on his hip until the 25th of May, 1921, when he, assisted by members of his family, removed it. In the meantime, he said, he consulted and was given treatment by a Dr. Edwards, a chiropractic, at Fresno, and later, he further said, he was treated by a Dr. Gass, an osteopath, residing at Visalia. A few days prior to the beginning of the trial a Dr. Morehouse, an osteopathic physician at Visalia, examined the hip, back, and neck of plaintiff. (Neither Dr. Edwards nor Dr. Gass was called as a witness. Dr. Morehouse testified for the plaintiff.) The plaintiff, continuing, said that, from the time of the accident to the time of the trial, his neck was swollen; that this "swelling would pass off at times, went down." On cross-examination he stated that, when a young man, some forty years prior to the date of the accident, he suffered occasionally from rheumatism in his back and in the regions of his hips, but that it had been years since he had so suffered. He further stated that he had never consulted "any physician or surgeon for the purpose of ascertaining whether the pain he complained of came from any other cause than this collision that he had at Traver." Further, on cross-examination, he stated that, before the collision involved herein, he had met with "different accidents"; that a horse once "hit me on the wrist. * * * Q. Did that hip that you complain of being in pain now, did it ever receive an injury before—ever fall on it before? A. Well, I might have fell sometimes, probably did." On redirect he stated that he had suffered continuously from pain due to the injuries received by him, "until the present time, unless when I was asleep it might have stopped."

Dr. Morehouse testified that he found, on his examination of plaintiff, "a vertebra loose in his neck." This defect, the doctor said, was not a dislocation; that it was produced by some cause external to the body. He could not say when the wound or injury was produced. The doctor also found, so he said, that there was a disorder in the region of the hip. The latter condition, he explained, could have been produced by different causes. "Riding in a car will do it," he said, "simply riding in an automobile will do it, or a blow applied there will do it. Sometimes it follows an infection of the teeth or tonsils." He stated that this condition may last for a long period of time, unless it is corrected; that he had known it to last "four or five or six years." Such a condition, he stated, was a source of pain, constant in most cases, to the patient. He said that he did not examine the teeth and tonsils of plaintiff. As to the swelling in or about the neck, the doctor stated that it "was caused by a lesion occurring by a trauma" (external violence of some sort). There are "so many conditions that could cause that, though. I have had cases where persons have been jounced and their head hit against the top of the machine, and that caused it; where a person has gone over a rough bump." He stated that a large proportion of the people that he has treated are afflicted with the same ailment in the neck.

Members of the family of plaintiff testified that the latter's physical condition had been bad continuously from the time that the collision occurred down to the date of the trial. Some of them stated that the wound on his head consisted of a gash over four inches long; that he had suffered great pain in the region of his hip and back almost incessantly.

Dr. A. W. Preston, a practicing physician and surgeon at Visalia, was called in rebuttal by the defendant as a medical expert. He testified that he listened to and heard the plaintiff describe the examination to which he had been subjected by the chiropractic above named, as follows: "That he (the chiropractic) felt over my neck and felt a place he said was out of place, and he tried to put them back in place." The witness said that a condition so described and the pain attending it would mean a dislocation of a vertebra, and would be very serious; that such a dislocation "would be attended by serious disarrangements of other bodily functions." In order to determine, said Dr. Preston, the cause of such a pain, it would be necessary to make a complete physical examination of all the functional organs--the kidneys, the heart, blood pressure, the reflexes of the nervous system. He expressed the opinion, from the description of the hurt in or about the neck, that the pain which the plaintiff said he had suffered in that region of his body was not the result of the dislocation of a vertebra or any other kind of dislocation. As to the alleged injury in the region of the hip, the doctor said that, ordinarily, a bruise of such a description, or a swelling of the parts produced from such a bruise or injury as the plaintiff stated he had suffered and as the latter described it, would heal "in a few weeks--perhaps from three to six weeks. * * * No ordinary injury would cause any swelling that would last from" the month of April, 1921, down to the date of the trial. On cross-examination Dr. Preston declared that it would not be possible for "the man to have a cracked vertebra and still continue about his business and not know it was cracked for some time." To clarify the opinion previously given by him relative to the condition of a person injured as the plaintiff said he had been by falling from the wagon, Dr. Preston explained, on cross-examination:

"My supposition and proposition is this: That, if Mr. McConnell received an injury to his back or hip two and a half years ago, and still has a swelling in the region of that injury in his side, hip or back, that it is still present, that his injury at the time must have been very severe, and that the man would have been in a very critical condition during the two and a half years," and that "he would be in that same critical condition at the present time."

The above statement embraces an accurate as well as a comprehensive conspectus of the important testimony presented by both sides.

[1-5] Obviously, as in all personal injury cases, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove these two general propositions of fact, to wit: (1) That the collision and its consequences to plaintiff were caused by the negligence of the defendant; (2) that, by reason of such negligence, the plaintiff was damaged—that is, that he suffered some injury or damage which was directly caused by such negligence. And it was for the jury to determine whether the plaintiff established those propositions by sufficient evidence. It is also true and, indeed, so much a commonplace as a legal proposition in this state as to render its statement superfluous, that the conclusion of the jury upon the facts is binding upon a Court of Appeal, unless the testimony is of such a character as to compel the conclusion that, as a matter of law, it affords no support to the verdict. As seen, the plaintiff contends that the defendant's own testimony, which, as to the circumstances under which the collision was caused, is not contradicted but supported, upon its face, or, as a matter of law, shows that she was guilty of negligence in running her car into the wagon of the plaintiff, and that such negligence constituted the direct cause of the injuries inflicted upon him and his wagon. The defendant while resisting that position, insists that, conceding it to be sound, the verdict must nevertheless still be permitted to remain undisturbed, for the reason that it is sufficiently supported by the testimony bearing upon the question of the nature and extent of the damage suffered by the plaintiff as the result of the collision. To this proposition the plaintiff has offered no reply, and we think none can successfully be interposed. It must be said that the evidence as to the nature and the extent of the damage suffered by the plaintiff is in conflict, and it may therefore be granted that, had the verdict been for the plaintiff, the conclusion of the jury that the plaintiff had received physical injuries of a more serious character than Dr. Gillespie's testimony indicates that they were might stand immune from disturbance by this court; but the testimony of that doctor, corroborated by the testimony of the defendant and the expert testimony of Dr. Preston, and, indeed, in a noticeable degree by the testimony of the plaintiff himself, sufficiently supports the implied finding of the jury that the physical injuries inflicted upon the latter were of a minor and temporary character, and in no way or to any appreciable extent interrupted or interfered with the performance by him of his usual or ordinary duties. If it be said that, conceding the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to recover some damage, even though the injuries were slight and their effect not permanent, the reply would be that we must presume that the jury regarded the amount of the damages to which he might be entitled would be nominal only—indeed, not in excess of the amount which the defendant paid for the medical treatment administered to plaintiff by Dr. Gillespie.

[6, 7] It is not claimed, nor does the evidence appear to justify such a claim, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover anything more or further than compensatory damages; for defendant testified that, seeing the Dodge roadster which was a short distance ahead of her turn to the left and pass the wagon, she assumed that she could safely do likewise, and so attempted to follow the roadster around the wagon; that, on making the turn, she discovered that a large truck and an automobile were approaching, and so near where the wagon was that it appeared to her that there would be great danger of a collision between her car and either the approaching automobile or the truck, and she thereupon suddenly swerved to the right and struck the rear of plaintiff's wagon. Thus it is clear that, if the defendant was guilty of culpable negligence, it was because she failed, before attempting to pass the wagon, to take the precaution to ascertain whether the highway before her was clear of vehicles approaching from the opposite direction and so near the wagon as to make it perilous to attempt to pass around it. So it is manifest that the jury could have found, and the implication from the verdict is that they did find, that the act of defendant in turning suddenly to the right as she started to pass the wagon was, according to her best judgment, formed under the circumstances as indicated, necessary to protect herself against serious injury, and that it was therefore not wanton or the result of "such recklessness * * * as evinces malice or a conscious disregard of the rights of others" (Lyles v. Perrin, 119 Cal. 264, 51 P. 332), and this must be shown in an action for personal injuries to justify the imposition of exemplary or punitive in addition to any compensatory damages which may be assessed.

The foregoing views and the conclusion necessarily following therefrom make it unnecessary to consider herein whether, as the plaintiff contends, the verdict, in so far as it may concern the question of the defendant's alleged negligence, is contrary to the undisputed evidence and the legitimate inferences to be deduced therefrom.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

(236 P.)

Ex parte EWELL. (Cr. 1243.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 20, 1925.)

1. Habeas corpus ☞22(1)—Facts and matters adjudicated in judgment, under which petitioner imprisoned, cannot be impeached.

On habeas corpus facts and matters adjudicated in judgment under which petitioner is imprisoned, cannot be impeached, but must be taken as true.

2. Contempt ☞27—Sending of letter to judge designed to change his views upon law and facts expressed by him held contempt of court.

The sending to a judge of a letter designed to change his views upon the law and facts expressed by him, at a time when the judge still had before him the duty of exercising judicial functions in the case, held a contempt of court.

3. Contempt ☞27—Petitioner's dictation of contemptuous letter, and aiding and abetting another in sending it to judge, rendered him culpable without his signature.

Attorney's dictation of contemptuous letter, and his aiding and abetting another in sending it to a judge, rendered him as culpable as if he had personally signed the letter.

4. Contempt ☞6—Attorney held guilty of contempt committed in presence of court.

Conduct of attorney, in asking for production in evidence, on hearing of motion, of a contemptuous letter addressed to the trial judge, the sending of which petitioner, instigated, held to render him punishable as for contempt committed in the presence of the court, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 282.

Application by Raine Ewell for writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from custody on a commitment under a judgment adjudicating him in contempt of court. Judgment affirmed, writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

R. M. J. Armstrong, of San Francisco, for respondent.

John J. Goldberg and E. F. Treadwell, both of San Francisco, for Sheriff of City and County of San Francisco.

KNIGHT, J. [1] Petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of court and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for a period of 24 hours by the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, department 16 thereof, Hon. Louis H. Ward presiding. The return of the sheriff to said writ sets forth a copy of the commitment embodying the judgment of contempt. Incorporated in said judgment are the facts upon which the adjudication of contempt is based. The return, we think, is legally sufficient in form and substance, and we do not agree with petitioner that in a habeas corpus proceeding a petitioner may go behind the judgment and offer evidence to impeach the facts and matter adjudicated therein; those facts must be taken as true. In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 P. 458; Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 198, 19 P. 380, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263.

Petitioner also filed and presented a petition for a writ of certiorari whereby he seeks to have said judgment of contempt reviewed and annulled. The circumstances leading up to the contempt proceedings are fully set forth in the latter petition and in the copies of the documents and pleadings thereto attached and made a part thereof. Those circumstances may be briefly stated as follows: During the latter part of the year 1923 an action in interpleader came on for trial in department 16 of said court before Hon. Claude F. Purkitt, judge of the superior court of Glenn county, presiding. One of the cross-defendants in said action was Kenneth M. Mays, who, according to the record before us, was an unfortunate drug addict, and either at the time of the trial of said action was, or soon thereafter became, a prisoner in the state penitentiary. The petitioner, who is a licensed member of the bar, was also a cross-defendant, having acquired an interest in the subject-matter of said litigation by assignment from said Mays. Petitioner also appeared in said action as the attorney for Mays. Owing to the apparent conflict between the interests of these two cross-defendants, Judge Purkitt made an order appointing attorney J. A. Brown to protect the rights of Mays. Brown thereupon caused an amended answer to be filed on behalf of Mays, alleging that the assignment from Mays to petitioner was fraudulent. On or about December 19, 1924, Mays was released from prison. On December 31, 1924, Judge Purkitt filed a written opinion and order for judgment in said action, in which it was held, among other things, that petitioner, as assignee of Mays, was entitled to receive a sum of money less than the amount called for by the terms of said assignment. After said opinion had been filed, and before findings were prepared or signed, to wit, on January 4, 1925, Mays mailed a seven-page typed letter signed by him, but dictated by petitioner, to Judge Purkitt, insinuatingly criticizing the manner in which the case had been decided, vigorously assailing the integrity and faithfulness of Attorney Brown, impugning the honesty of the successful cross-defendants, praising the value of the services and sincerity of purpose of petitioner, and insisting that petitioner's assignment be recognized and enforced to the full extent of the terms thereof. In said letter it was further stated that Mays had filed notice of motion to substitute petitioner as his attorney, and request was made that no further steps be taken in the action until after the hearing of said motion. Said motion came on for hearing before Judge Ward, then presiding in department 16 of said court, on January 16, 1925. Mays was sworn as a witness in his own behalf. During the examination of said witness petitioner called for the letter of January 4, 1925, which Judge Purkitt had forwarded to the clerk of the court, and which was then in the possession of Judge Ward, and, upon its production, offered the same in evidence. Mays testified that said letter had been dictated by petitioner, and that the statements contained therein were not his but were petitioner's. The court then interrogated petitioner as follows:

"The Court (addressing Mr. Ewell): You dictated this letter to this gentleman?"

"Mr. Ewell: So far as the language was used. I put it in proper English for him."

"The Court: Yes."

"Mr. Ewell: And corrected the spelling for him, but as to the wording of that letter, that letter was at the will of Mr. Kenneth Mays. Now I want to show by examination—"

"The Court: Well let me say this to you Mr. Ewell."

"Mr. Ewell: Yes, sir."

"The Court: You made statements here this morning accusing very reputable gentlemen of crookedness, didn't you?"

"Mr. Ewell: I did not accuse them of crookedness; I accused them of perjury in this answer, yes, sir."

A moment later the court said:

"Now this letter is in a sense an attack upon Judge Purkitt."

"Mr. Ewell: I think it is; yes, sir."

The court thereupon adjudged petitioner guilty of contempt of court upon the ground that said letter was an attack upon the honor and integrity of the court; that petitioner's part in dictating said letter, having it written by said witness, presenting it to Judge Purkitt through the mail, and afterwards injecting it into proceedings on the hearing of said motion, coupled with the language used by petitioner during the hearing of said motion, was contemptuous; and petitioner was thereupon sentenced accordingly.

[2, 3] Aside from the question of whether the innuendoes arising from the language employed in said letter were defamatory of the court and the judge thereof, we believe that the contents of said letter show without doubt that the manifest purpose of preparing the same and sending it at that particular time to the judge who tried the case was to create a feeling of resentment toward and prejudice his mind against those whom he had indicated in his opinion should be successful in said litigation, and thus, by such improper means, attempt to persuade the judge, if possible, to change his views upon the law and the facts as expressed by him in said opinion and to decide the case favorably to the interests of Mays and petitioner. The sending of such a letter under those circumstances to a judge who still had before him the duty of exercising judicial functions in the case was, we think, clearly an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court and an attempt to obstruct the course of justice, and therefore a contempt of court. The fact that petitioner dictated said letter and abetted in the sending the same to the judge rendered him as culpable as if he had personally signed the letter.

[4] The situation presented is not one wherein an attorney representing a party to the action, in good faith, calls attention of the judge, by letter, after mailing a copy to opposing counsel, to some inadvertent statement of law or fact set forth in the judge's written opinion. The letter here was made up principally of charges involving the moral turpitude of the other parties to the action in reference to which neither the writer of the letter nor any one else would have been allowed to testify in court. Moreover, the writing of the letter cannot be said to have been intended as an application for a new trial, because petitioner, as an attorney, was familiar with the code provisions to the effect that such application could be legally made only upon notice, after findings and judgment have been entered; neither can said letter be construed as a request for substitution of attorneys, because the law makes adequate provision for such substitution by motion, upon notice, at the hearing of which motion proof, either oral or documentary, may be introduced in support thereof.

When the petitioner afterwards, at the time of the hearing of said motion, without legal justification, asked that said letter be produced and offered it in evidence, with the obvious purpose of exploiting and emphasizing in public the charges of collusion and unlawful practices therein contained, and when, in the same discussion, or a part thereof, he declared that said letter was also an attack upon the judge who tried and decided the case, we think that petitioner was remiss in his duty, as an attorney and an officer of the court, "to maintain the respect due courts of justice and judicial officers" (Code Civ. Proc. § 282), and that his conduct in the respects mentioned was an aggravation of the contempt he had already committed by instigating the sending of said letter, and rendered him liable to punishment for contempt committed in the presence of the court.

The judgment of contempt is therefore sustained; the writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff holding the commitment; and it is ordered that upon the reapprehension of petitioner under said commitment, or his voluntary surrender in obedience thereto, the bail heretofore given by petitioner be exonerated.

Where appellants did not file brief within 30 days after filing of transcript, affidavit of one of appellants' attorneys, stating that his associate is district attorney and affiant is deputy district attorney, and that they have been extremely busy with official business of county, and have been giving such time to preparation of brief as was possible, and did not believe that respondent's attorney would move to dismiss appeal without giving some notice, without stating any reason why brief was not filed or application made for extension, held not to warrant relief from default.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by A. L. Waugaman against A. L. Richardson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On respondent's motion to dismiss appeal for failure to file brief within required time, in which appellants applied for relief from their default. Application for relief from default denied, and appeal dismissed.

Henry S. Lyon, of Placerville, for appellants.

Thomas Maul, of Placerville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The transcript on appeal herein was filed in this court on the 29th of December, 1924. March 7, 1925, the respondent filed notice of motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellants had failed to file their points and authorities within 30 days after the filing of the transcript. Appellants' brief was thereafter filed on the 21st of March. Respondent's motion was heard and submitted March 23d. At the hearing the appellants applied for relief from their default. In support of the application for relief the affidavit of one of the attorneys for appellants was presented. Affiant therein states that his associate is district attorney of El Dorado county and the affiant is deputy district attorney; that "during all of the time since the filing of the said transcript on appeal both affiant and his said associate have been extremely busy with official business of said county of El Dorado, but had not neglected the preparation of appellants' brief, but had given to it such time as was possible between the performance of acts of official duty; that at the time their period of time for the filing of appellants' opening brief expired said attorneys were both busy with official duties, and the time was inadvertently allowed to pass without an application for an extension of time, but said attorneys did not believe that respondent's attorney would move to dismiss the appeal without giving some notice to them that he intended to insist that the brief should be immediately filed, or filed within some given time." No reason is stated why the brief was not prepared and filed or an application made for an extension of time during the five weeks succeeding appellants' first default. Neglect of the character of that stated in the affidavit has never been held sufficient ground for relieving a party from his default. Weinmann v. Factor, 63 Cal. App. 592, 219 P. 461; Berendsen v. Babdaty, 62 Cal. App. 185, 216 P. 385, and cases cited. Appellants' application for relief from their default is denied, and the appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. NELSON. (Cr. 837.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 16, 1925.)

1. Bastards $\S$ 17½—Evidence held to show defendant's failure to provide for his illegitimate child.

Evidence held to show a failure by defendant to provide for his illegitimate child, within meaning of Pen. Code, § 270.

2. Bastards $\S$ 17½—Agreement for support of illegitimate child is admission of parentage, and that defendant is willing to pay a certain sum.

Agreement for support of an illegitimate child is an admission of parentage, and that defendant is willing to pay certain sum, but is not evidence that such sum has been paid, or that agreement had been kept, or that amount stipulated to be paid is sufficient or within ability of defendant to pay.

3. Bastards $\S$ 17½ — Weight and effect of agreement for support of illegitimate child is for jury.

Weight and effect of an agreement for support of an illegitimate child is for jury.

4. Bastards $\S$ 17½—Instructions held to cover defendant's theory that his agreement for support of illegitimate child constituted a complete defense.

In prosecution for failure to support an illegitimate child, instructions held to cover fully defendant's theory that his agreement for support of such child and negotiations attendant thereon constituted a complete defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

William Nelson was convicted of unlawfully failing to provide for an illegitimate child, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was indicted for unlawfully failing, without legal excuse, to furnish necessary food, clothing, etc., for an illegitimate child, and thereby violating the provisions of section 270 of the Penal Code. Judgment of conviction followed, and the defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, the matter is now before this court upon the defendant's appeal. The judgment entered in this cause provided, first, that the defendant should be confined in the county jail of the county of Mendocino for a period of two years; secondly, that execution of judgment should be suspended, and the defendant placed upon probation, conditioned upon his paying forthwith to the mother of the illegitimate child the sum of $326.50, on account of arrears in monthly payments, at the rate of $25 per month, and that the defendant, beginning with the 1st day of January, 1925, during said period of two years, deposit in the Savings Bank of the county of Mendocino the sum of $25 per month during each and every month of said two years' period, said money to be deposited to the credit of the mother of the illegitimate child involved, to be used by her for its support and maintenance. The record shows that the initial payment required by said judgment was complied with, and the defendant was thereupon allowed his liberty, subject to the provisions of the probationary order of said court as to future payments.

The record further shows that during the course of the trial there was introduced and read in evidence the following agreement:

"Agreement.

"This agreement, made and entered into this 28th day of August, 1923, by and between Inias Wilkinson, party of the first part, and William Nelson, party of the second part, both unmarried and both of Ukiah, California, witnesseth:

"That whereas, a male child was born to the party of the first part at the Langland Hospital at Ukiah, California, on the 25th day of August, 1923, with Dr. S. L. Rea as attending physician, and whereas the parties hereto are the mother and father respectively of said child, and the said parties are not husband and wife:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed that for and in consideration of the payment by the party of the second part to the party of the first part of the sum of $460 the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the party of the first part, and for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained to be performed by the respective parties hereto, the party of the first part hereby releases the party of the second part from any and all claims which the party of the first part individually may now have or hereafter acquire against the party of the second part resulting from or growing out of the birth of said child as aforesaid, or from any sexual relations between the parties hereto.

"It is further agreed that the party of the second part shall pay monthly to the party of the first part as and for payment for the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of said minor child the sum of $25 per month until such time as such sum shall be insufficient for said purposes, and thereafter the party of the second part will pay to the party of the first part such additional sum as may be necessary for such purposes, said payments to begin at the date hereof, and thereafter to be paid on the 28th day of each and every calendar month until such time as said minor child shall be legally adopted, or until such other time as the party of the second part shall be freed of his obligations to said child by operation of law.

"It is further agreed that the party of the second part does hereby consent to the adoption of said minor child by any person or persons to whom the consent of the party of the first part shall be given for such adoption.

"This agreement is executed in duplicate, and time is the essence hereof.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands the day and year first hereinabove written. Inias Wilkinson, Party of the First Part. William Nelson, Party of the Second Part."

The defendant, in support of his appeal, alleges that the evidence is insufficient to show that the failure of the defendant to support his minor child was willful, or that such failure was without legal excuse, and that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions asked by the appellant. In the appellant's brief we find the following statement: "The crime with which the appellant was charged was under consideration by this court in the recent case of People v. Swiggy, 232 P. 174. This particular section of the Penal Code having been so recently under consideration by this court, it will not be necessary for appellant to refer to any other decisions;" the contention of the appellant apparently being that the execution and introduction of the above agreement constitutes an answer to the charge of willful failure on the part of the defendant.

[1] After the execution of the agreement which we have hereinbefore set forth, it appears that the defendant paid the sum of $460, and thereafter paid the further sum of $119.50, and that for a period of some eight months preceding the finding of the indictment herein, nothing had been paid by the defendant for the support and maintenance of the minor child referred to in the agreement. During this period of time there appears to have been considerable negotiations between attorneys representing the defendant and parties representing the mother of the minor child relative to the sums which should be paid. The circumstances surrounding this case show that, owing to the premature birth of the child, a considerable expenditure of money was involved, and the appellant's defense was apparently based, more or less, upon the theory that the charges connected with and attendant upon the birth of the child were unnecessarily excessive, and the figures showing the amount of money expended by the defendant are presented to this court and considerable argument based thereupon. These were all matters, however, to be addressed to the jury, and whether due to the high cost of living, or to the high cost of sin, the finding of the jury thereon is conclusive upon this court. The fact remains that, notwithstanding the payment of such charges during the period of months which we have mentioned, nothing was advanced by the defendant toward the further support and maintenance of the minor child. The defendant also sets forth that the money to make the initial payment made by him was borrowed from one of his relatives. The amount of money earned by the defendant during the period of time was also shown to the jury. The complaining witness testified as to her efforts to obtain support for the child, and to the sacrifices she made for the support of the infant, and of the moneys necessarily expended by her. The theory of the prosecution was, and the testimony introduced tended to show, that the negotiations being carried on by the defendant were adopted as a means of avoiding payment, while on the part of the defendant, it was insistently contended that he was desirous of fixing, or coming to an agreement, as to some exact amount that should be paid monthly for the support of the minor child, and that such sum should be within his ability to pay.

Without setting forth the evidence in detail, it is sufficient to say that there was a failure on the part of the defendant, within the terms of the statute, if the jury believed the testimony introduced by the prosecution, notwithstanding the fact that the testimony introduced on the part of the defense, if accepted by the jury for its face value, would have warranted a verdict in his favor.

[2, 3] The argument presented to us on this appeal, based upon the case of People v. Swiggy, supra, does not appear to us to be well founded. The Swiggy Case did not decide that the execution of the agreement between the father and mother of the minor child constituted a complete defense to a charge based upon the provisions of section 270 of the Penal Code. That case was intended to and does decide only that an agreement such as appears in the record of the instant case is admissible in evidence to be considered by the jury, along with other testimony, for the purpose of determining whether or not the defendant is the parent of the illegitimate child, and whether or not there has been any willful failure on his part to support the same. Such an agreement is merely a piece of evidence to be considered by the jury for whatever it may be worth. In the case at bar, it amounts to an admission of parentage, and that the defendant is willing to pay a certain sum, or was, at the time of the execution of the agreement, but it is not evidence that such sum has been paid, or that the agreement has been kept, or that the amount stipulated to be paid is sufficient for the purposes, or within the ability of the defendant to pay. The Swiggy Case goes no further than to hold that such testimony is admissible. Its weight and effect are for the jury.

[4] The appellant finally complains that the court erred in refusing instructions based upon the theory that the agreement to which we have referred and the negotiations attendant thereupon constituted a complete defense. The instructions of the trial court, however, cover these points fully and completely, and were couched in such clear and concise language that we set them forth herein as a complete answer to the appellant's contentions:

"The omission, however, must be willful, which means with a deliberate intention or set purpose. Willfulness is a vital ingredient of the crime, and implies upon the part of the defendant knowledge and purpose to do wrong. In other words, before you would be warranted in finding defendant guilty, you must be satisfied to a moral certainty that he knowingly and with a purpose to do wrong failed to provide for his said child. If, therefore, you find that the defendant offered to support the child within his means by paying a reasonable sum for that purpose, taking into consideration his earnings, leaving to Miss Wilkinson, the complaining witness, the right to fix such amount, and Miss Wilkinson failed or neglected so to do, then and under such circumstances, I charge you that the element of willfulness in his omission to furnish such support is wanting, and the defendant is entitled to an acquittal. In order to convict the defendant in this case, the evidence must satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt of the following facts: (1) That the defendant is the father of the child. (2) That defendant did not support the child, within the means of the defendant. (3) That defendant's failure to support the child was with the knowledge and purpose to do wrong, and with an evil intent or set purpose to do so. (4) That defendant's failure to support the child was without lawful excuse, as defined in these instructions.

"All four of the foregoing elements must be established by the evidence, and if you have any reasonable doubt as to whether any one of them has been established, you must give the defendant the benefit of such doubt and find him not guilty.

"In determining whether the omission of the defendant to provide for the minor child was with the purpose to do wrong, the jury should take into consideration all of the actions and conduct of the defendant and his statements, if any, and his offers to perform, if any, and his promises to perform, if any such promises were made.

"Gentlemen of the jury, a contract purporting to have been entered into between Miss Wilkinson and the defendant has been introduced in evidence in this case. I charge you that the defendant should not be convicted of the crime charged because he did not fulfill the terms of that contract. Whether the defendant failed to pay or offer to pay $25 per month under that contract is wholly immaterial. Generally speaking, a person is not guilty of a criminal offense for failure to live up to the terms of his contract. The charge here is failure to provide for a minor child, and the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant must be determined by you independent of any written contract. Any liability under the contract is to be determined in a civil and not in a criminal action, such as this. I charge you that in such cases as this, inability to pay is a lawful excuse. If you find from the evidence that defendant borrowed $460, or any part thereof, to make an initial payment to Miss Wilkinson, the defendant is under a legal obligation to repay this loan. While there is a legal obligation on a parent to support his child, a failure so to do is not criminal if the parent has not the financial ability. I charge you that if you find from the evidence that the defendant, or some person authorized in his behalf so to do, offered to pay Miss Wilkinson a reasonable sum monthly for the support of the child, leaving Miss Wilkinson to state such reasonable amount, and Miss Wilkinson refused to accept such amount, then the defendant is excused from making such payment, and your verdict should be not guilty."

The judgment and order of the trial court are affirmed.

Action by the Maryland Casualty Company against the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York. From the judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John Ralph Wilson and Charles B. Morris, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover money paid out by plaintiff at the instance and request of defendant.

The material facts disclose the following situation: Plaintiff was the insurance carrier of a certain company under a workmen's compensation policy. While this indemnity policy was in full force and effect, one of the company's laborers suffered an injury, arising wholly by accidental means and in the course of his employment, by which he was ruptured, and he was thereupon conveyed at plaintiff's expense to a hospital for the purpose of having his injuries treated. During that process an employee of the hospital, in the performance of his duties, delivered to a surgeon attending the injured man a certain chemical preparation to be hypodermically injected into the patient's body. Through the negligence or carelessness of this attendant a different substance was substituted for this preparation, the injection of which caused pain and suffering to the patient and aggravated his injury, resulting in delay in his eventual recovery and an additional expense of $1,000, the amount here sued for. The hospital carried an indemnity policy of insurance against liability for negligence of its employees with defendant. Both plaintiff and defendant knew of the mistake which had been made, and that in consequence thereof delay would result in the injured man's recovery. The latter knew nothing whatever concerning the matter. Defendant thereupon represented and stated to plaintiff that, if it would not inform the patient of the injurious effects of the injection of the wrong preparation, and would pay the sum by which the expenses of the treatment had been increased in the hospital, defendant would reimburse plaintiff for such additional outlay. Plaintiff agreed to this arrangement, and, after it had made payment to the injured employee of all moneys due from it as the insurance carrier of the employer, it paid the further sum of $1,000 in settlement of the additional expense arising in the manner above stated. It was upon this promise of reimbursement by defendant that the complaint is predicated.

A demurrer to the complaint was sustained upon the ground that the contract was against public policy and good morals and therefore unenforceable. In rendering its decision upon this point, the learned trial court expressed its views in writing, and respondent has favored us with a transcript thereof. It relies for an affirmation of the judgment upon the reasons therein given, namely, that the contract upon which the action is based is so mischievous in its tendency as to merit judicial proscription.

Before entering into a discussion of this subject, it is perhaps as well to dispose of a preliminary objection which plaintiff interposes to the right of defendant to invoke the defense that the agreement is against public policy. It is contended by it that it would be a reproach to the law if respondent should be permitted by its trick and device to evade an obligation which it incurred to appellant by procuring from it the very favor which it now seeks to disavow under the pretext of the illegality of its promise.

[1-3] It has not seemed satisfactory to some able and just minds that courts should hold that, where parties to a contract are in pari delicto, they will leave the delinquents where they find them, because such a rule permits one to plead his own wrong or infamy, as the case may be, and thereby obtain an unconscionable advantage over his adversary through being relieved of an obligation for the assumption of which he has received a valuable consideration. Courts, however, are not called upon to settle any question of conscience between the parties, but are interested only in the higher duty of protecting society from the effect of contracts made in disregard of its interests. While, therefore, the defense advanced may be one which ill lies in the mouth of defendant to assert, nevertheless, if public policy requires it, the plea will be permitted even if it allows one to retain an advantage without rendering the stipulated return. Estoppel does not apply in such a case. A contract, void as against public policy, cannot be treated as valid by invoking such principle; nor can a party thereto waive his right to set up the defense of illegality in an action thereon brought by the other party. Millett v. Aetna Trust Co., 70 Ind. App. 451, 122 N. E. 344. In a suit brought upon such a contract relief will be denied and the parties left where they are found. Napa Valley, etc., Co. v. Calistoga, etc., Co., 38 Cal. App. 477, 176 P. 699.

[4] The sole question, therefore, with which we are concerned, is the validity or invalidity of the agreement as it is presented to us. As above indicated, the trial court was of the opinion that the agreement was void as being against public policy, in that it tended to violate a trust. It was further of the opinion that it might be classed with those agreements made for the purpose of hindering or defeating the collection of an indebtedness by a creditor of one of the parties, and therefore void.

In support of the trust theory, it is argued that ordinarily an injured man places himself unquestionably and trustingly under the care of those whom his employer or the employer's insurance carrier selects, and that this being so, the employer owes to his injured employee the duty of providing, directly or through the insurance carrier, reasonably good medical care and attention; that he becomes for the time being a sort of trustee of the injured employee's body for the purpose of restoring his health and vigor, and the hospital and attending physicians are agents for that purpose; and that, if through the negligence of such agents the injuries are aggravated or restoration retarded, then not only is there a grievance sustained by the employee himself, but there results also an impairment in some degree of the state industrial energy, as the agreement leads to a lessening of the care and watchfulness due to an injured employee, contrary to the interests of society.

It may be that an agreement which is calculated to induce dereliction or laxity in the performance of a public or private duty is hostile to the interests of society, but the facts of this case do not in our opinion present such a situation. Plaintiff had paid out and without question a sum of money that it was bound to pay under its indemnity policy. It had further agreed at the request of the defendant to advance an additional sum for which the latter was solely responsible for the reason heretofore stated, upon the understanding that the injured employee should be kept in ignorance of the arrangement. This understanding, however, in no manner affected the patient's rights, and we fail to see how vice was imported into the transaction by reason thereof, or how the arrangement was in any manner controlled or affected by public policy.

[5] An exact definition of public policy would be difficult to formulate. One that has been frequently approved is that adopted by Lord Brougham, namely, that no one can lawfully do anything which has a tendency to be injurious to the public welfare. The application of the principle to a given state of facts is not always easy, though it admits of some degree of latitude. Public policy often changes as the law changes. It is manifest, therefore, that there can be no single or fixed standard governing it. The question, what is public policy in a given case, is as broad as the question of what is fraud. It is primarily the prerogative of the Legislature to declare what contracts and acts shall be unlawful; but courts, following the spirit and genius of the law, written and unwritten, of a state, may declare void as against public policy contracts, which, though not in terms specifically forbidden by legislation, are clearly injurious to the interests of society. When the fact is called to the attention of a court that a contract sought to be enforced is illegal, it will refuse the plaintiff any relief, and will generally leave the parties where it finds them.

[6-8] In determining what is public policy in a given jurisdiction, recourse may be had, not only to enacted law, but also to the decisions of the courts of last resort. In considering this question, many courts have cautioned against recklessness in condemning contracts as being against public policy. Thus, it has been said by an English judge that public policy is an unruly horse astride of which one may be carried into unknown paths. A similar caution is one to the effect that, before a court refuses to recognize a contract which is made in good faith, and which stipulates for nothing which is malum in se or malum prohibitum, it should be satisfied that the advantage to accrue to the public from its holding is certain and substantial, not theoretical or problematical, and based upon certain economic or sociological problems. The power to invalidate agreements on the ground of public policy is so far reaching and so easily abused that it should be called into action only in case where the dangerous tendency clearly and unequivocally appears from the contract itself. Courts are reluctant, therefore, to declare a contract void as against public policy, and will refuse to do so, if by any reasonable construction it may be upheld.

[9] As above intimated, the mere agreement of the parties not to disclose their arrangement to the injured employee, to our minds, in no manner encouraged a relaxed responsibility or a lessening of the care and watchfulness due to him, contrary to the interests of society, which would justify its denouncement. The plaintiff owed no duty to the employee to divulge to him the fact that his recovery had been delayed through carelessness. That was a matter between the patient and the institution employed to care for him, but which did not concern the plaintiff. The policy of the law is and always has been against intermeddling in suits or stirring up strife or litigation, and the quieting of disputes and the adjustment and settlement of litigation have always been and always should be favored (2 Elliott on Contracts, § 731); and at common law intermeddling was defined as champerty and maintenance, and was punishable by fine and imprisonment.

[10] If, then, the insurance carrier owed no duty to the injured employee to divulge to him the arrangement it had entered into for the purpose of paying the additional expense of his illness, there certainly could be no relation of trust existing between them, and, consequently, no violation of such relation. It must be remembered that the employee is not here complaining of any injustice which he has suffered. The plaintiff has discharged its full liability under its indemnity policy, and in addition all amounts due (so far as it here appears) by reason of the delay in the patient's recovery attributable to the negligence of the hospital attendant. No confidential relation of any kind was breached, even assuming that such relation existed. And, we may add, to render a promise of the character here involved illegal, it must have been for the sake of gain. Ward v. Allen, 2 Mete. (Mass.) 53, 35 Am. Dec. 387.

Nor can the agreement, as claimed, be properly classed with those condemned upon the ground of public policy which are entered into for the purpose of hindering or delaying the collection of an indebtedness by a creditor of one of the parties. While such agreements are inimical to the social policy, no question of that kind is here involved. There was no attempt to hinder or delay the collection of any sum due the injured employee. On the contrary, the arrangement insured to him, so far as the complaint shows, everything to which he was entitled.

The cases relied upon for an affirmance of the judgment do not support respondent's contention. The case of Bliss v. Matteson, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 348, involved the validity of an agreement to control the action of the directors of a corporation in voting to pay plaintiff's claim irrespective of its legality. It was there held that an arrangement which is designed, or which in its nature or effect tends to lead persons charged with the performance of trusts or duties for the benefit of others to violate or betray them, is contrary to public policy. There is no question concerning the correctness of this rule.

Johnston v. Fargo, 184 N. Y. 379, 77 N. E. 388, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 537, 6 Ann. Cas. 1, involved the validity of an agreement whereby an employer sought to abridge by contract his common-law liability, and it was held that he could not do so as such an agreement was void as against public policy. The same may be said as to the application of the doctrine to this case. 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 769 et seq.

Church v. Muir, 33 N. J. Law, 320, merely holds that a contract, the purpose of which is to protect a debtor against just claims of creditors, is void.

Neville v. Dominion of Canada News Co. (L. R. 1915, 3 K. B. 560) was a case where a newspaper for a consideration agreed to refrain from commenting upon a fraudulent scheme. The contract, having its inception in fraud, was very properly condemned.

In Eggleston v. Pantages, 103 Wash. 458, 175 P. 34, it appears that an action had been instituted for the appointment of a receiver by certain stockholders without the filing of a complaint (as, it seems, may be done in the state of Washington). After the papers had been served, a contract was made between the parties, whereby, in consideration of a promise to pay a certain sum of money, the plaintiff agreed to withhold the complaint from the files and give no information to any one concerning the same or the commencement of the suit, thereby preventing those interested from learning the true state of facts. Here was a clear attempt to conceal judicial proceedings and to obstruct justice for the purpose of wronging others interested. Agreements of this character are clearly against public policy. 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 716.

In conclusion, it may be said that it seems clear to us that there is nothing in the agreement here involved that in any manner condemns it, and that the plaintiff, having parted with his money in reliance thereon, is entitled to recover it.

This conclusion renders unnecessary a discussion of the further question raised by appellant that it is possible for it to prove its execution without regard to the promise of secrecy, and that this being so, the complaint in any event states a cause of action.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 19, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 18, 1925.)

1. Criminal law § 742(1)—Truth of contradictory testimony is for jury.

Which of two officers correctly related what occurred when defendant was asked about stolen articles was question for jury on trial for burglary.

2. Criminal law § 510—Testimony of accomplice must be corroborated.

Under Pen. Code, § 1111, testimony of accomplice must be corroborated by other evidence tending to connect accused with commission of offense.

3. Criminal law § 407(2)—Refusal of accused to explain presence of stolen articles found in his garage was an admission of guilt.

Refusal of defendant to answer when asked about stolen articles found in garage, part of which was occupied by him, was in nature of admission of guilt.

4. Criminal law § 511(7)—Misrepresentations, contradictions, or silence of accused will have effect of confession or admission in corroborating accomplice.

Misrepresentations, contradictions, or silence of accused, when asked about incriminating evidence against him, will usually have same effect as a confession or admission in corroborating accomplice, as required by Pen. Code, § 1111.

5. Criminal law § 511(1)—Evidence corroborating testimony of accomplice sufficient to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for burglary, where accomplice testified to guilt of accused, corroborating evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

6. Criminal law § 780(3)—Refusal to instruct that testimony of accomplice is to be viewed with distrust not error.

Refusal to instruct that testimony of accomplice is to be viewed with distrust is not error.

7. Criminal law § 829(1)—Refusal of instructions fully covered by others given not error.

Refusal of requested instructions fully covered by other instructions given is not error.

8. Witnesses § 274(2)—Cross-examination as to whether character witness had ever discussed facts as to accused's connection with auto accessory thieves, not improper.

In prosecution, for breaking into garage with others and stealing automobile accessories, cross-examination of character witness as to whether he had ever discussed with any one connection of accused with theft of automobile accessories held not improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

H. H. Hendricks was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Peter J. Wilkie, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of burglary of the second degree. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

At the time of the alleged burglary the defendant and his wife resided in Sacramento. He was in the employ of a construction company, and his wife was working in a cannery. His wife's brother, Charley Hagerty, a boy of the age of 15 years, lived with them. In the year 1923, at the town of Gridley, the defendant had a speaking acquaintance with Raymond Cherry, of the age of 20 years, an accomplice in the alleged burglary. They later worked in a cannery at Palermo, but their acquaintanceship there was not intimate. In June, 1924, the defendant rented half of a double garage in which to keep his Oakland automobile. On the 8th of July Cherry and a lifelong friend and chum, Bob Webb, a boy of the age of 17 or 18 years, came to Sacramento and secured employment in the cannery in which the defendant's wife worked. On their arrival here the defendant introduced Cherry to the owner of the aforesaid garage, and Cherry rented the half of the garage not occupied by defendant's automobile, and thereafter kept his Ford automobile therein. The garage consisted of but one room with space therein for two machines.

Cherry testified that during the night of August 11th he and the defendant broke into a garage in which a Ford automobile was stored and stole therefrom a storage battery, a pump, and a sun visor, and carried them to the garage in which they kept their automobiles. The defendant denied that he in any manner participated in the burglary or was present at its commission.

The defendant further testified that during the evening of August 18th he took certain persons to a place near Florin, his wife, Cherry, and Webb accompanying him; that on his return he reached home about 10 or 10:30 o'clock; that he left his wife there and then drove to the corner of Twentieth and F streets, where he parked his automobile, arriving there about 10:45, Cherry, Webb, and Haggerty accompanying him; that he and Cherry then went to the alley between Nineteenth and Twentieth streets to look for a man to take the defendant's place with the construction company the next day; that he did not know where this man lived, except that the man had told him that he lived on that alley; that he did not find the man he was looking for; that he and Cherry had "just come to the car" on their return from the alley when police officers arrived and took them all into custody; that on his return from the alley to the automobile Webb was in the machine with an automobile jack which he said he had taken from an automobile that night. The defendant also testified that he did some repair work on Cherry's automobile on the evenings of August 11th and 12th, and that he first saw the stolen sun visor in their garage in the evening of the latter day.

[1] One of the police officers testified that on the 18th of August the defendant's car was parked at the corner of Twentieth and F streets, in front of a vacant lot, at 11:30 at night, when the officers discovered it and took the occupants into custody. The defendant and Cherry were placed in the county jail, and on the following day Cherry was taken to their garage, where the officers found the stolen battery installed in Cherry's automobile. The pump was in his machine and the sun visor was in front thereof, leaning against the wall. The officers returned to the jail and asked defendant about the stolen articles. One of them testified that defendant refused to answer their questions. Another testified that defendant said he "knew nothing about them." It was for the jury to determine which officer correctly related what occurred. The owner of the stolen articles testified that his garage had been broken into and the enumerated articles taken therefrom.

[2-5] According to his own testimony, Cherry was an accomplice. The conviction cannot be upheld, unless his testimony is corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, and "the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof." Pen. Code, § 1111. If the defendant told the officers that he knew nothing about the stolen articles, then his statement was false, because he testified that he saw the sun visor in the garage on the 12th of August. If he refused to make any reply when he was asked about the incriminating evidence against him, then his silence was in the nature of an admission of guilt. "Misrepresentations, contradictions, or silence of defendant when accusing statements are made usually will have the same effect as a confession or admission as corroborative of the accomplice." 16 C. J. 707; Holt v. State, 28 Ga. App. 758, 113 S. E. 49; Ettinger v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 338. "When a defendant, under conditions which fairly afford him an opportunity to reply, stands mute in the face of an accusation of crime, the circumstance of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of guilt." People v. Bringhurst, 192 Cal. 748, 752, 221 P. 897, 898; People v. Ong Mon Foo, 182 Cal. 697, 703, 189 P. 690; People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 234, 116 P. 521; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 533, 66 P. 794. In connection with defendant's silence or his false statement, as the fact may be, relative to knowledge of the articles which were stolen, the jury probably attached some importance, and reasonably so, to the fact that the stolen articles were found in the garage occupied by defendant. The evidence of what occurred during the evening of August 18th was admitted without objection; the greater part thereof being the defendant's own testimony. It cannot be said that the corroboration is insufficient.

[6, 7] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that "the testimony of an accomplice is to be viewed with distrust." In answer to the contention it is sufficient to cite the case of Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 142, 223 P. 451, where the question is exhaustively considered and decided adversely to appellant's contention. Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give another instruction proposed by defendant. Every proposition of law contained in the proposed instruction is fully covered by other instructions which were given.

[8] Complaint is made of the latitude allowed the district attorney in the cross-examination of character witnesses produced in behalf of defendant, and who testified that his reputation for honesty was good. One of such witnesses was asked questions as follows:

"Did you ever discuss anything with anybody in Sacramento about him being connected with a band of automobile accessory thieves? Did you ever discuss with anybody the fact that he was connected with two young men of the ages of 17 to 20, and that they had stolen an automobile jack and wrenches from a man's car, the owner's name being Mr. Pierce, of 1701 G street, and that they took some tools from a White truck belonging to a man named Roslyn, that they took a pair of side wings from a car at Del Paso Park, belonging to Mr. Harry P. Leach, and that they took a motor meter from a car belonging to a man named W. N. Aldrich?"

The questions were answered in the negative. It was not error to overrule defendant's objections to the questions. People v. Stennett, 51 Cal. App. 370, 197 P. 372; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 P. 435.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

A. C. BLUMENTHAL & CO., Inc., v. CRYER et al. (Civ. 4629.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 14, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨601—Zoning ordinances authorized.

Zoning ordinances establishing strictly private residence districts are within police power, delegated to municipality by Const. art. 11, § 11, and authorized by St. 1917, p. 1419.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨625—That inclusion of property in zone depreciates value not controlling on question of validity of zoning ordinance.

That inclusion of property in zone, wherein construction of apartment houses is forbidden by ordinance, depreciated its value is not of controlling significance on question of validity of such ordinance.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨601—Zoning ordinance may permit existing uses.

Zoning ordinance permitting continuation of existing uses of property held not void, power to zone not being limited to protection of established districts.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨11(4)—Validity of severable provision of zoning ordinance authorizing exceptions not considered, in absence of exception made affecting particular case.

Provision of zoning ordinance, authorizing council to make exceptions to restrictions established, held severable from rest of ordinance, which would be unimpaired even if such provision were invalid, so that question of its validity need not be determined, in absence of exception made affecting merits of particular case.

Original application by A. C. Blumenthal & Co., Inc., for writ of mandate to compel George E. Cryer, Mayor of the City of Los Angeles, and others, as Members of the City Council and Board of Public Works, to issue a building permit. Writ denied.

Milton M. Cohen, of Los Angeles, and Jerome H. Kann, for petitioner.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel respondents, and particularly the Board of Public Works of the city of Los Angeles, to issue to petitioner a permit for the construction of a class A fireproof apartment house upon certain property owned by petitioner. The application of petitioner for such permit was denied by the board of public works, upon the ground that petitioner's property is situated within the territory described as zone A in ordinance No. 42666 (N. S.) of said city, as amended by ordinance No. 43779 (N. S.), which ordinances provide that "no building, structure or improvement shall be erected, constructed, established, altered or enlarged in the A zone which is designed, arranged or intended to be occupied or used for any purpose other than a single family dwelling. * * *" The building proposed to be erected by petitioner would contain many apartments.

Petitioner contends that the act of the Legislature of 1917 authorizing municipalities to divide cities into zones for regulation of property uses, and the zoning ordinance of the city of Los Angeles prohibiting multiple residence buildings in residence districts, are obnoxious to the Constitution of California and the Constitution of the United States, and are therefore void; that the said act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1419), and the said zoning ordinance are unreasonable, arbitrary, and oppressive in conferring upon the city council and the planning commission a wide and unregulated discretion in controlling the use of private property; that the said zoning ordinance, in permitting the continuation of prior use of improvements and penalizing a similar use thereafter, and also in authorizing the city council to make exceptions to the restrictions established by the ordinance, renders said ordinance discriminatory and void. The argument for petitioner, in support of its objections to the ordinance, includes a statement of the principles governing the exercise of the police power, and reviews many decisions of the courts in this state and elsewhere applying to the particular subject now before the court.

[1] Two recent decisions of the Supreme Court of California have definitely passed upon all of the questions involved in this action. Miller v. Board of Public Works, (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 381; Zahn v. Board of Public Works (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 388. The Zahn Case affirms the validity of the same ordinance to which petitioner's objections herein are directed. In the Miller Case the court declared that the power to pass zoning ordinances is conferred upon municipalities in California by the fundamental law of the state (Const. of Cal., art. 11, § 11), and by a legislative enabling act (Stats. 1917, p. 1419). The validity of the enabling act was assumed by the court. After reviewing many decisions on the subject of zoning ordinances the court said:

"This brings us naturally to the question of whether or not there may be legally established, as a part of a comprehensive zoning plan, strictly private residential districts from which are excluded and absolutely prohibited general business enterprises, apartments, tenements and like structures. We are of the opinion that it may be done; that the establishment of such districts as a part of a systematic and carefully considered and existing zoning plan is a legitimate exercise of the police power delegated to the municipality. * * * There are some decisions which do not uphold the validity of a zoning ordinance establishing strictly residential districts. We are of the opinion, however, that the better-reasoned cases are in favor of the validity of comprehensive zoning which establishes strictly private home districts and that the most which can be said of the cases to the contrary is that they merely show that this is a question upon which reasonable minds may differ."

[2, 3] In the Zahn Case the court held that the fact that the inclusion of the petitioner's property in zone B rather than zone C depreciated its value, was not of controlling significance. Citing Spector v. Building Inspector of Milton (Mass.) 145 N. E. 265, 267. The court further said:

"As to the objection that the ordinance was not retrospective, but permitted the continuance of existing uses, it will suffice to say that for the purpose of zoning it is not necessary that existing uses shall be removed. Spector v. Building Inspector of Milton, supra. The ordinance was enacted for the purpose of directing the present and future development of the city and no attempt was made to remold its past development. * * * The power of the city council to zone is not limited in our opinion to the protection of established districts."

[4] Upon the point relating to section 4 of the ordinance, giving power to the council to make exceptions relieving any particular property from the restrictions of the district in which it is situated, it was held in the Zahn Case that such provision of the ordinance is severable, and, even if invalid, would leave the remainder of the ordinance unimpaired. Therefore it was deemed to be not necessary to determine the question, as there had not been any such exception made that could affect the merits of the instant case. The same is true in the case at bar.

The particular circumstances of location of petitioner's property, and of the character and condition of adjacent properties, with respect to improvements and uses of property, are in no respects better calculated to show discrimination against petitioner than were the circumstances considered by the Supreme Court in the Zahn Case. That case and the Miller Case have so thoroughly covered the subject and established the law that there is practically nothing for this court to do other than to recognize their authority and apply them to the case in hand.

The petition for a peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

PEOPLE v. TIBBITTS. (Cr. 1161.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 17, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⚡213—Objections to preliminary complaint, after examination and commitment, too late.

Objections to preliminary complaint, provided, under Pen. Code, § 806, only as a basis for warrant of arrest, must be taken while accused is being held under warrant, and, after preliminary examination and commitment, are too late.

2. Indictment and information ⚡147—Grounds of demurrer to information statutory.

Only legal grounds of demurrer to an information are specifically enumerated in Pen. Code, § 1004, and are want of jurisdiction of offense charged, nonconformity to requirements of sections 950-952, that more than one offense is charged except as permitted by section 954, that facts stated do not constitute public offense, or that it contains matter which, if true, constitutes justification, excuse or bar to prosecution.

3. Indictment and information ⚡148—Demurrer to information must specify particular respect in which information fails.

Demurrer must specify particular respect in which information fails.

4. Indictment and information ⚡148—Demurrer to preliminary complaint does not constitute demurrer to information.

A demurrer purporting to set up fatal defects in preliminary complaint, after waiver of preliminary examination and filing of information, does not constitute demurrer to information; there being no provision therefor under Pen. Code, § 1004.

5. Indictment and information ⚡122(1)—Variance between complaint and information not grounds of demurrer.

Where information set forth in hæc verba the newspaper article published by defendant, alleged to contain libel, but preliminary complaint, which alleged same facts as information, did not, there was no charge of another or different offense, and variance between complaint and information held not grounds for demurrer.

6. Criminal law ⚡211(1)—Preliminary complaint need not charge all elements of offense with technical nicety of information.

Preliminary complaint need not charge all elements of offense with technical nicety of information.

7. Criminal law ⚡639(1)—Prosecuting attorney, swearing out preliminary complaint, not disqualified to prosecute.

That preliminary complaint for libel was signed and sworn to by prosecuting attorney, who was subject of alleged libel, held not an objection to his prosecuting the case.

8. Indictment and information ⚡39, 51(2)—Deputy district attorney may sign and file informations.

Deputy district attorney may sign and file informations.

9. Indictment and information ⚡147—Objection that prosecuting attorney had sworn out complaint not grounds for demurrer.

In prosecution for alleged libel of district attorney, who signed and swore to preliminary complaint, any objections to his prosecution of case could not be taken by demurrer to information.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Jesse Olney, Judge.

John K. Tibbitts was prosecuted for libel. From an order sustaining his demurrer to the information, the People of the State of California appeal. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, for the People.

O. N. Hilton, of San Francisco, and Otto Christensen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The respondent was the owner and publisher of a newspaper in the county of San Bernardino, known as the Labor Journal, which criticised the conduct of George H. Johnson, who was district attorney of said county. Respondent was arrested upon a preliminary complaint filed by Johnson with the justice of the peace of San Bernardino township, charging respondent with libel, a high misdemeanor. A preliminary examination was expressly waived by respondent, whereupon the committing magistrate bound him over to the superior court, and in due time a deputy district attorney filed with the latter court an information embodying the alleged libelous article. Respondent demurred, setting up as grounds thereof fifteen different asserted defects in the preliminary complaint, and as another ground he alleged that the information was based upon another and different offense from that charged in the complaint. His demurrer was sustained by the trial court, and this ruling forms the basis of the appeal here presented.

The demurrer, although demanding that "the complaint and information be set aside and held for naught," does not assign any ground upon which the information could be susceptible to demurrer under the provisions of section 1004 of the Penal Code. It alleges that the preliminary complaint failed to charge that a public offense had been committed; that it did not set forth the alleged libelous words according to their tenor; that the words alleged in said complaint to have been written and published were privileged, were not libelous per se; and that the superior court had no jurisdiction to try or determine the matter presented by said complaint.

[1] The preliminary complaint in a criminal proceeding is merely an allegation in writing, signed by a person who knows the facts, charging that another has committed a designated offense. Section 806, Pen. Code. It is intended only as a basis for a warrant of arrest, and objections thereto must be taken while the defendant is being held under such warrant; and, if taken after preliminary examination and commitment, they come too late, since the complaint is then functus officio. People v. Warner, 147 Cal. 546, 82 P. 196; People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 P. 1028; People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 59 P. 984; People v. Storke, 39 Cal. App. 633, 179 P. 527.

[2, 3] The only legal grounds of demurrer to an information are those specifically enumerated in the statute. People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 260, 30 P. 814. Said grounds are that the court has no jurisdiction of the offense charged in the information; that the information does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code; that more than one offense is charged, except as provided in section 954, Penal Code; that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense; or that it contains matter which, if true, would constitute a legal justification or excuse of the offense charged, or other legal bar to the prosecution. Pen. Code, § 1004. And the demurrer is required to specify the particular respect in which the information fails.

[4] It is too obvious for argument that a demurrer which purports to set up alleged fatal defects in the preliminary complaint, after waiver of preliminary examination and the filing of an information, does not constitute a demurrer to such information, since there is no provision therefor under the terms of section 1004 of the Penal Code.

[5, 6] The information filed in the case at bar alleged the same facts that were presented by the complaint, though setting forth in hæc verba and fully the newspaper article which admittedly was published by the respondent. This did not, however, constitute another or different offense, and the asserted variance between the complaint and the information is not one of the grounds of demurrer specified in the statute. It is not necessary that a complaint shall charge the elements of an offense with all the technical nicety of an information. People v. George, 121 Cal. 492, 53 P. 1098.

[7-9] Since the complaining witness and the district attorney were one and the same person, it is argued that he should not have attempted to prosecute the case. It appears that Johnson signed and swore to the preliminary complaint in the justice's court as an individual. We are cited to no provision of the law, and know of none, which would prohibit him from taking such action. It would doubtless be his duty to do so if he believed that a public offense had been committed, either against himself or some other citizen. The information was signed by a deputy district attorney. Such an officer has authority to sign and file informations. People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 P. 237; People v. Griner, 124 Cal. 19, 56 P. 625. Under any circumstances, this objection is not one which could properly be the ground of a demurrer.

No valid objection to the information appears to have been presented to the superior court in this case, and its action in attempting to nullify the proceedings before it upon the strength of this so-called demurrer, which merely alleged defects in an extinct pleading over which the superior court had no jurisdiction, was void and ineffectual.

The judgment on order sustaining the demurrer is reversed.

WRIGHT & HOGAN, Inc., v. HEIDE et al.
(Civ. 5018.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1925.)

Appeal and error  417(1)—Notice that defendant desires, intends to, and has appealed held sufficient to give appellate court jurisdiction.

A notice of appeal that "defendant hereby gives notice that he desires, intends to appeal, and has appealed to the District Court of Appeal," though it might have been more explicit, is sufficient to give appellate court jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Wright & Hogan, Inc., against Charles H. Heide and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

William A. Spill of Pasadena, for appellants.

MacDonald & Thompson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Motion to dismiss appeal on the ground that no notice of appeal has been filed. In support of said motion the respondent has cited the following decisions of the Supreme and appellate courts of this state: Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 297, 122 P. 461; Marcucci v. Vowinkel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 P. 430; Michelson v. City of Sacramento, 173 Cal. 108, 159 P. 431; Eddy v. Hunter, 46 Cal. App. 370, 189 P. 291. These cases, it will be observed, were all decided under section 941b, Code of Civil Procedure, prior to its repeal in 1921. This section required that a notice of appeal given thereunder "shall state that the person giving the same does thereby appeal" from the judgment or order, and the cases cited by respondent hold that under said section a notice like that in the present action was not sufficient, and gave the court no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. The notice in the present appeal states that:

"The defendant hereby gives notice that he desires, intends to appeal, and has appealed to the district court of appeal from the findings, conclusions and judgment."

This notice was practically the same as that considered by the court in the case of Anderson v. Standard Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 445, 213 P. 65. The appeal in this last-named case was taken after the repeal of said section 941b, and the court there held that the notice was sufficient, and denied a motion to dismiss. In said action the court stated that:

"The disposition of the courts is to hear appeals upon their merits, and the sections of the code relating to the subject should be liberally construed with a view of promoting such purpose."

We are in accord with these views of the court, and we think the following language, used by the court in said action, is applicable in the present one:

"While it would be more satisfactory if the notice had been more explicit, * * * it must be held sufficient to give the appellate court jurisdiction."

Motion to dismiss denied.

SMITH v. RICHARDSON. (Civ. 4916.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⇐1071(6)—Omission of finding on issue which would necessarily be against defendant if finding made thereon not prejudicial to defendant.

In action on note, in which defendant alleged false representations as to a tractor for which note was given, and rescission by defendant, where every allegation of fraud on which right of rescission was premised was found against defendant, and a general finding was made that none of allegations of answer were true, held, that omission of finding on rescission was not prejudicial to defendant, as the finding on such issue would necessarily be against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by F. E. Smith against Eri H. Richardson. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Hamburg and J. R. Cunyningham, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chas. W. Humphreys, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Plaintiff prosecutes this action upon a promissory note executed by the defendant for the sum of $428.50. Defendant by answer admitted the execution of the note, but by way of affirmative defense alleged that at the time of its execution plaintiff and defendant entered into a conditional sales contract for the purchase and sale of a certain tractor, and that the note was given in payment thereof. It is then charged that at that time certain representations were made concerning the engine which were false, and that upon discovery of this fact defendant gave notice of rescission, and offered and did return everything of value. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

It is here claimed that the court below failed to make a finding upon the issue of rescission, for which reason, it is urged, the judgment should be reversed.

Every allegation of fraud and misrepresentation upon which the right of rescission was premised was found against appellant. The findings are full and complete upon the subject. There is also a general finding that none of the allegations of the answer are true. While there is no express finding upon the question of rescission, still, the findings are specific against defendant's claim of fraud upon which he predicated his right to rescind. The mere omission, therefore, of a finding upon the question of rescission did not prejudice appellant.

Where a finding is omitted upon an issue which would necessarily be against appellant if a finding were made thereon, appellant is not injured thereby. Here the court found upon issues that ultimately and necessarily determined the case, and they support the judgment. This being so, other issues became unimportant, and failure to find thereon in no manner prejudiced the defendant, nor does it constitute grounds for reversal. Morrison v. Stone, 103 Cal. 94, 37 P. 142.

Judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Under escrow agreement, by which escrow agent was authorized to deposit to its own account money placed in its hands by vendee and to return money to vendee if terms of escrow were not fulfilled by a check on such bank account, escrow agent was required at all times to keep in its bank account sufficient money to cover such deposit, and, when its account was overdrawn so that there did not remain sufficient money to cover such deposit, money of vendee was at that time embezzled.

- 3. Escrows §14(2)—Delivery of deed by escrow agent to vendee not ratified by vendor's suit against escrow for purchase price.

Where vendor instructed escrow agent to deliver deed to vendee on payment of purchase price, and vendee authorized escrow agent to apply deposit made by him to account of vendor when a title guaranty was secured, and escrow agent embezzled vendee's deposit before delivering to vendee deed and title guaranty, vendor held not to have ratified such delivery by commencing suit against escrow agent for the purchase price, where vendor was not aware that, on date title guaranty was secured, vendee's deposit had already been embezzled.

- 4. Principal and agent §166(1)—Principal not bound by ratification of unauthorized act of his agent.

Under Civ. Code, § 2310, a principal is not bound by ratification of an unauthorized act of his agent, unless he had previous knowledge of all the material facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Rodney Hildebrand against George H. Beck. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kemp & Clewett and H. S. Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. In this action of ejectment the undisputed facts of the case as disclosed by the pleadings and proof are these: The defendant and respondent, hereinafter referred to as the vendor, was the owner of certain property in the city of Los Angeles which he listed with the Eshleman Realty Company for sale. The plaintiff and appellant, hereinafter referred to as the vendee, agreed to purchase the property for the sum of $1,800. The vendee was also to assume certain incumbrances. The vendee paid to the Eshleman Realty Company $100 deposit on the purchase price, and subsequently on January 31, 1921, filed escrow instructions with said Eshleman Realty Company relative to the remainder of the purchase price. The material parts of the escrow instructions of said vendee are as follows:

"Escrow No. 4164.

"Los Angeles, Jan. 31st, 1921.

"H. B. Eshleman Realty Co., Escrow Dept.: I have handed the H. B. Eshleman Realty Co. $100 (sales deposit receipt) and hand you herewith my check for the further sum of $500.00 and will hand you the further sum of $1,200.00 within ten days from date hereof all of which you are authorized to use in connection with your Escrow No. 4164 when you can secure for me a title Guarantee on the property and premises situate at No. 1118 Orange Drive in the city of Los Angeles, according to the legal description thereof which will show that the record title to said property is vested in Rodney Hildebrand, a married man, as his sole and separate property free from incumbrances. * * * If you are unable to comply with the instructions within 30 days from this date said money and instruments shall thereafter be returned to me on my written demand, and in the absence of such demand you will proceed to comply with these instructions as soon as possible thereafter. * * * All disbursements may be made by check of H. B. Eshleman Realty Company."

On February 1, 1921, the vendor signed and deposited with the Eshleman Realty Company escrow instructions which were in part as follows:

"Escrow No. 4164.

"Los Angeles, Feb. 1, 1921.

"H. B. Eshleman Realty Co., Escrow Dept.: I will hand you a deed executed by myself, George H. Beck, a widower, to Rodney Hildebrand, * * * which you are authorized to deliver to the said Rodney Hildebrand or his representatives upon payment to you within 30 days hereof for account of myself the sum of eighteen hundred dollars (payable by check of the H. B. Eshleman Realty Co.) from which you may deduct your escrow charges, $7.50, * * * and from which you may deduct the sale commission of the H. B. Eshleman Realty Co. for $250.00.

Thereafter each of the parties complied with the requirements of the escrow on his part to be performed; the money being paid by the vendee, February 1, 1921, and deposited to the account of the H. B. Eshleman Realty Company, February 3, 1921, as shown by the bank's indorsement on the checks, the deed being delivered to the escrow holder by the vendor on February 12, 1921. On February 26, 1921, the deed was recorded, and a certificate of title was thereupon issued by a title insurance company showing title was vested in the vendee. The purchase price, however, was never paid to the vendor of the property. The evidence shows, and it is not disputed, that the money was not paid for the reason that H. B. Eshleman, sole owner of the Eshleman Realty Company, who carried on the business under the name of Eshleman Realty Company, absconded some time between February 28 and March 2, 1921, leaving a deficiency of over $40,000 in the escrow account of the Eshleman Company. An examination of the business affairs of the Eshleman Realty Company disclosed the fact that there was on hand on February 26, 1921, but $1,656.20 with which to meet all of the outstanding obligations of the company. An analysis of the bank statement of the company for the month of February disclosed the fact that on February 5, 1921, the bank account of the company was overdrawn to the extent of $41.10. Thereafter various sums of money had been deposited to the credit of the account and various other sums withdrawn therefrom. The evidence also shows the deficiency of $40,000 in the escrow account of the Eshleman Realty Company as distinguished from its bank account on February 23, 1921.

Demand was made by the vendee upon the vendor for the possession of the property in controversy, and upon the refusal of the vendor to give up possession this suit was commenced by the vendee to quiet title to the property and to obtain possession thereof. The judgment of the trial court was for the vendor. The findings of the trial court upon which the judgment was predicated, relative to the deposit of the money by the vendee, and the failure of the Eshleman Company to apply such deposit to the purchase of the property in controversy, are to the effect that the vendee placed in the custody of the H. B. Eshleman Realty Company, as escrow agent, the sum of $1,800 and directed said company to use said money in said escrow when said company could procure a title guaranty covering the title to the property, showing said title vested in the vendee; that said money was received by the said company for the account of the vendee herein; that immediately thereafter the money so deposited by vendee was embezzled and has never been returned either to the said company or to either of the parties thereto; that at the time of the delivery of the deed said company did not have on hand and had not received for the account of the vendor the sum of $1,800, or any other sum at all, and the delivery of said deed was unauthorized and void and conveyed no right, title, or interest in and to the aforesaid property to plaintiff.

It is the contention of the vendee that inasmuch as the vendor was entitled to receive from the Eshleman Realty Company, upon the completion of the escrow, but $1,537, less the cost of the title guaranty, and that there was in the bank balance of the Eshleman Realty Company on February 26, 1921, the day on which the deed to the property was recorded and the certificate of title issued by the title company, $1,656.20, the conditions of the escrow had been fulfilled, and that therefore the title to the property had passed from the vendor to the vendee.

With this contention we cannot agree.

[1] According to the escrow instructions of the vendor, the deed to the property was to be delivered to the vendee by the escrow company "upon the payment to you * * * for account of myself, the sum of $1,800." According to the escrow instructions of the vendee, the money deposited by him with the Eshleman Company was authorized to be used in connection with escrow No. 4164 [the escrow in controversy] "when you can secure for me a title guaranty." It is at once apparent that the money deposited by the vendee with the escrow company was not deposited with the company for the account of the vendor at the time the deposit was made, but that it was to be so applied when the Eshleman Realty Company could secure for the vendee "a title guaranty." Pending the procurement of the title guaranty the Eshleman Realty Company held the money in trust for the vendee and the vendor had no claim to it. In other words, the Eshleman Realty Company never had any money paid to it for the account of the vendor until the very instant that the company procured for the vendee "a title guaranty." If, in the interim between the deposit of the money with the company and the securing of the "title guaranty" by the company, the money was embezzled, then it was the money of the vendee that was embezzled, and the Eshleman Realty Company would have no authority to deliver to the vendee the title guaranty for the reason that at the instant of time when the title guaranty had been secured no money had been paid to the company for the account of the vendor.

As before indicated, the finding of the trial court was that the money deposited by the vendee was embezzled shortly after its deposit. If this finding is supported by the evidence, it follows that the money embezzled was the money of the vendee, and that as a result the Eshleman Realty Company, when delivering the deed and title guaranty to the vendee, was acting without its authority. The finding of the trial court that the property was embezzled shortly after its deposit and prior to the securing by the Eshleman Realty Company of the title guaranty is supported by the admitted fact that on February 5, 1921, the bank balance of the company was overdrawn and the further admitted facts that some time between February 28 and March 2, 1921, the sole owner of the company absconded.

[2] One of the provisions of the escrow instructions of the vendee, as previously indicated, is to the effect that if the Eshleman Realty Company was unable to comply with the instructions of the escrow within 30 days said money should be returned to the vendee upon his written demand. "All disbursements may be made by check of H. B. Eshleman Realty Co." This last provision gave the right to the Eshleman Realty Company to deposit the money to its own account. It cannot be said, however, that by that provision the vendee loaned the company the use of his money until the terms of the escrow should be fulfilled. The vendee had no intention by such provision of creating between himself and the escrow company the relation of creditor and debtor. Such provision did no more than authorize the Eshleman Realty Company to deposit the money to its own account and to return the money to the vendee if the terms of the escrow were not fulfilled by a check on such bank account. If the relation of creditor and debtor was not intended to be created by the vendee, it follows that the escrow company was under an obligation to keep within its bank account sufficient money to cover this deposit. It was not necessary by reason of this provision that the company should keep the amount deposited in a separate account, but it was necessary that at all times it should keep in its bank account sufficient money to cover this deposit. It follows that when on February 5, 1921, the account was overdrawn so that there did not remain in the bank balance of the escrow company sufficient money to cover this deposit, the money of the vendee was at that time embezzled. It is of no importance in determining the date of the embezzlement that the embezzler may have, at the time he embezzled the money, intended to return it. People v. Jackson, 138 Cal. 462, 71 P. 566.

The money of the vendee having been embezzled on February 5, 1921, there was no money of the vendee's in the hands of the company on February 26, 1921, when the certificate of title was issued by the title in-insurance company, to be applied to the account of the vendor. This being so, no title passed to the vendee, and the vendor is entitled to retain possession of the property.

[3, 4] The fact that, shortly after the discovery that H. B. Eshleman had absconded, the vendor commenced suit against the company for the purchase price of the property, does not militate against the conclusion heretofore reached that the title had not passed, upon the theory that by the institution of such suit the vendor ratified the delivery of the deed to the vendee. It is admitted by the stipulations of the parties that at the time of the institution of the suit the vendor had no knowledge of the fact that Eshleman had become short in his accounts, or that he did not have money enough on hand to cover all escrow agreements. In other words, he was not aware of the fact that on the date of the securing of the title guaranty for the vendee the money of the vendee on deposit with the escrow company had already been embezzled. A principal is not bound by a ratification of an unauthorized act of his agent unless he had previous knowledge of all the material facts. Section 2310, Civ. Code; Brown v. Rouse, 104 Cal. 672, 38 P. 507.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF SIGNAL HILL v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 8464.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 14, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 36(4)—Highway taxes collected from road district included in municipality cannot be disbursed in absence of provision for payment thereof to municipality.

In view of Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 2639, 2651, in absence of provision, such as section 2656, providing that, when a road district or part thereof is included in newly created municipality, proportionate unexpended amount collected from such annexed district must be paid to municipality, no disbursement of such moneys for highway purposes in territory from which it was collected could take place.

2. Statutes $\S$ 184—Ambiguous statute liberally construed to accomplish its apparent objects and purposes.

If terms of the statute are ambiguous, doubtful, or susceptible of different constructions, such liberality of construction is justified, within a fair interpretation of its language, as will accomplish its apparent objects and purposes.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 36(4)—Municipality held entitled to proportionate amount of highway taxes of included road district, notwithstanding no "general road fund" created.

The term "general road fund" in Pol. Code, $\S$ 2656, providing that, where a road district or part thereof is included in a newly created municipality, the proportionate amount of unexpended moneys in general road fund or highway taxes must be ascertained by county board of supervisors and paid to municipality, when construed in light of sections 4 and 326, does not refer to technical general road fund authorized by section 2651, which might, or might not, exist at option of county board of supervisors, but refers to general road "funds" or "taxes," and newly incorporated municipality is not to be deprived of highway taxes because board of supervisors failed to create a general road fund.

4. Constitutional law $\S$ 68(1)—Whether Legislature has accomplished intended purpose by phraseology employed judicial question.

How much of the unexpended taxes of a road district included in a newly created municipality should go to the municipality is a political question, but, when the Legislature has acted, whether it has accomplished intended purpose by particular phraseology employed is judicial question.

Application for writ of mandate by the City of Signal Hill against the County of Los Angeles and others. Writ granted.

Don G. Bowker, City Atty., of Los Angeles (Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Paul G. McIver, of Montebello, and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

SHENK, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents to pay to the petitioner certain tax moneys collected and in the course of collection for county highway purposes. Upon the return of the alternative writ the matter was submitted on a demurrer to the petition for want of sufficient facts. The proceeding involves the scope and effect of section 2656 of the Political Code added as a new section in 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 63). The enactment is entitled "An act to add a new section to the Political Code, to be numbered section 2656, and relating to the division of general road funds, upon the incorporation of municipalities, or annexation to municipalities." The section reads as follows:

"Whenever any territory is included in a city, or incorporated town, or city and county, either at the original incorporation of such city, incorporated town or city and county, or by annexation thereto subsequently, and such territory shall have constituted a road district, or a part of a road district, it shall be the duty of the county board of supervisors, as soon as practicable after such incorporation or annexation, to ascertain how much of the unexpended moneys in the general road fund or of the highway taxes of all kinds then levied and in the course of collection, is derived from property situate or persons residing in such territory; and they shall cause the amount so ascertained to be paid to the proper officers of such city, incorporated town, or city and county, as soon as practicable after it shall have come into the general road fund. The sum or sums so paid over to such city, incorporated town, or city and county, shall become part of the general fund of such city, incorporated town, or city and county."

The petition alleges that the city of Signal Hill is a municipal corporation duly incorporated as such on the 7th day of April, 1924, and situated within the county of Los Angeles; that the respondents are the county of Los Angeles, a body politic and corporate, and the board of supervisors of said county; that the territory included within the corporate limits of the petitioner at the time of its incorporation constituted a part of a road district within the county of Los Angeles; that all property within the territorial limits of the petitioner was duly assessed for highway purposes and highway taxes were regularly levied and collected thereon, and were in course of collection at the time of the incorporation of the petitioner; that on the 26th day of May, 1924, the respondents "ascertained and determined that the amount of unexpended moneys of the highway taxes of all kinds levied for the fiscal year 1923-1924 and in the course of collection was the sum of $18,998.75, which is derived from the property situate in said territory embraced within the territorial limits of said city of Signal Hill"; that for the fiscal year 1923-24 no general road fund as provided for by section 2651 of the Political Code was established by the respondents, and that respondents contend that not having established such general road fund for said year they are not required to pay petitioner any sum whatsoever under the provisions of said section 2656; that prior to the commencement of this proceeding demand was made upon respondents to pay or to take the steps necessary to provide for the payment to the treasurer of the petitioner the said sum of $18,998.75 so ascertained, but that the respondents have refused to comply with the demand.

The principal contention of the respondents is that the words "general road fund" used in section 2656 refer to the general road fund provided for in section 2651 of the Political Code, and that, as the respondents did not establish a general road fund for the fiscal year 1923-24, and as there is no such fund in existence, the respondents are relieved of all duty to comply with said section 2656, and that a peremptory writ must be denied. Said section 2651 provides in part as follows:

"The board of supervisors may, at the meeting at which they are required to levy the property tax for road purposes, establish a general road fund and order to be apportioned thereto an amount not exceeding thirty-five per centum of the aggregate road tax collected from all sources."

Secondarily, it is contended by respondents that under the language of section 2651 it is optional with the board of supervisors to create a general road fund. As to this contention the petitioner replies that, if the creation of such a fund be necessary to enable the respondents to comply with section 2656, the provision for the establishment of such fund is mandatory. But, in view of our conclusion as to the intent and effect of section 2656, it is unnecessary to determine that question. For the purposes of this proceeding it will be assumed that the establishment of a general road fund pursuant to section 2651 is optional with the board of supervisors.

[1] Even a casual reading of section 2656 impels the conclusion that the sole purpose of the enactment was to render available to newly incorporated territory, whether as a new city, or as newly annexed to an existing city, all highway taxes unexpended or levied and in course of collection and derived from property and persons located within the territory comprising the new city or the newly annexed territory, to the end that such highway tax moneys may be expendable for the benefit of the territory from which the same was levied and collected. When the section is complied with the said tax moneys would be expended on the authority of the municipal corporation having jurisdiction over the newly incorporated territory. In the absence of such provision for payment to the city or of compliance with such provision no disbursement of said moneys for highway purposes in the territory from which the same was collected could take place. See Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2641; Miller v. Kern County, 137 Cal. 516, 70 P. 549.

It was the obvious intention of the Legislature that the newly created municipality should be entitled to and should have paid to its proper officers without unnecessary delay the tax moneys described in the section. The statute is plain on that subject. The uncertainty or ambiguity suggested arises by reason of the reference to the "general road fund," which admittedly is an authorized particular and technical fund, but not in existence in the fiscal plan and policy of the respondent county. But it seems clear that the main and only purpose of the act should not be frustrated and set at naught by any application of the words "general road fund" which would entirely defeat its purpose if a construction may be placed thereon which is reasonable and would result in the effective operation of the section. By the requirements of the Code of which section 2656 is now a part we are directed to apply to that section a liberal construction with a view to giving effect to its plain purpose and intent. Pol. Code, §§ 4, 326. "It is indispensable to a correct understanding of a statute to inquire first what is the subject of it, what object is intended to be accomplished by it. When the subject-matter is once clearly ascertained and its general intent, a key is found to all its intricacies—general words may be restrained to it, and those of narrower import may be expanded to embrace it to effectuate that intent. When the intention can be collected from the statute, words may be modified, altered or supplied so as to obviate any repugnancy or inconsistency with such intention. * * * Words or clauses may be enlarged or restricted to effectuate the intention or to harmonize them with other expressed provisions. * * *

The particular inquiry is not what is the abstract force of the words or what they may comprehend, but in what sense they were intended to be used as they are found in the act. The sense in which they were intended to be used furnishes the rule of interpretation, and this is to be collected from the context; and a narrower or more extended meaning is to be given according to the intention thus indicated." 2 Lewis' Sutherland Stat. Cons. §§ 347, 376. As was said by this court in In re Reineger, 184 Cal. 103, 193 P. 81:

"A statute should always be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give each part thereof the meaning and effect which, from the act as a whole, appears to have been intended. A narrow or restricted meaning should not be given to a word, if it would result in an evasion of the evident purpose of the act, when a permissible, but broader, meaning would prevent the evasion and carry out that purpose." See, also, Barber v. Galloway (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 34.

[2] It is well settled that, if the terms of a statute be ambiguous or doubtful or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, such liberality of construction is justified as within a fair interpretation of its language will accomplish its apparent objects and purposes. Felton v. West, 102 Cal. 266, 36 P. 676.

[3] When the terms of section 2656 are considered in the light of the foregoing rules, it must be concluded that the use of the words "general road fund" was not intended as referring to the technical "general road fund" authorized by section 2651, which might or might not exist at the option of boards of supervisors, but rather in the sense of general road "funds" or general road "taxes." The title of the act adding the new section and above quoted would also seem to so indicate, for it declares that said section relates to the division of general road funds upon the incorporation of municipalities. It cannot be assumed that the Legislature intended that newly incorporated cities in counties wherein the board of supervisors might perchance have created a general road fund, as contemplated by section 2651, should be entitled to the tax moneys described in the new section, and that new cities in those counties where no such fund was created should be denied them. Such an absurd result cannot be held to have been contemplated by the Legislature. It was never intended that a board of supervisors should have the power to deny to a newly organized municipality the funds described in section 2656 by merely failing to create a general road fund.

The respondents admit that the territory embraced within the corporate limits of the petitioner was a portion of a county road district, and that they have ascertained and determined the amount of unexpended moneys of highway taxes of all kinds levied for the fiscal year in question and in course of collection. They must also concede that the said moneys are entirely within their control, and that payment thereof on their order may be made. But they say in effect to the petitioner:

"The money which you claim to be entitled to is on hand or in course of collection and within our power to disburse but you are not entitled to the payment thereof because we have not exercised our option to create a general road fund as authorized by section 2651."

They might also say:

"If we should create a general road fund the amount of taxes for road purposes to be apportioned to said fund is entirely optional with us so long as said amount does not exceed thirty-five per cent. of the aggregate road taxes to be collected from all sources. In the exercise of our discretion we will apportion to said fund a small fraction of one per cent. of said revenues."

[4] Notwithstanding the mandate of the statute the respondents could thus entirely defeat the purpose of the law by failing and refusing to establish a general road fund or by establishing such fund and reducing the moneys payable to the fund to a negligible quantity. True, as respondents contend, the question of whether or not and how much of said tax moneys is to be paid to a new city is a political question to be decided in the first instance by the Legislature. But, when the Legislature has acted, the question whether it has accomplished the intended purpose by the particular phraseology employed is a judicial question. In the determination of that question as applied to the present case we find no difficulty in concluding that it was, and is, the duty of the respondents to ascertain without delay the amount of general road tax moneys derived from the property and persons in the territory in question and unexpended at the time of the incorporation of the new city, and the amount of highway taxes then levied and in course of collection and so derived and to pay the same to the proper officer of the petitioner as soon as practicable. The respondents do not question the correctness of the amount alleged in the petition to have been ascertained by them. They simply take the position that under the law and the facts above set forth they are not required to make any payment whatsoever. They cannot be justified in their refusal to comply with the statute.

Let a peremptory writ issue, requiring the respondents to ascertain and pay to the treasurer, or other proper officer of the petitioner, the amount of unexpended highway tax moneys under their control on April 7, 1924, derived from property situate and persons residing in the territory of the petitioner, and also to ascertain and pay to the petitioner the amount of highway tax moneys of all kinds levied for the fiscal year 1923-24, and collected or to be collected since April 7, 1924, and likewise derived, such amounts to be ascertained without delay, and such payments to be made as soon as practicable after the amounts thereof are ascertained.

GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. CITY OF OAKLAND.
(S. F. 10925.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1925.)

1. Taxation ☞373—Mimeographed copy of report of operative properties held substantial compliance with statute requiring "duplicate."

Report of its operative properties, sent by public utilities corporation to local assessor, pursuant to Const. art. 13, § 14, and Pol. Code, §§ 3665(c), and 3666, which was a mimeographed copy of report sent to state board of equalization, and which particularly specified and classified property as operative and non-operative, held a substantial compliance with section 3665(c), requiring company to furnish a "duplicate" of report to assessor of city in which property is located.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Duplicate.]

2. Taxation ☞373—Information given to local assessor as to nonoperative property of public utility company need only apprise assessor of intention of company to claim property as operative.

In matter of taxing property of a public utility company, under Const. art. 13, § 14, and

Pol. Code, §§ 3665(c) and 3666, no further information is required to be given a local assessor than as will apprise him of intention of company to claim that such property or some part of it is operative, and to give him opportunity to make claim before state board of equalization that property is nonoperative, and therefore within his jurisdiction for assessing purposes.

3. Taxation ☞373—Local assessor held charged with notice that public utility company was claiming described property as operative property.

Where communication sent by public utility company to local assessor as to its operative property, pursuant to Const. art. 13, § 14, and Pol. Code, §§ 3665(c) and 3666, was accompanied by maps and other papers showing location of property, and informing assessor that it was identical with that sent to state board of equalization, it was sufficient to charge assessor with notice that company was attempting to comply with section 3665(c), and was actually claiming that property described was operative property.

4. Taxation ☞373—Assessor failing to comply with statutory requirements on claim as to operative property held without jurisdiction to assess it as nonoperative property.

Where communication sent by public utility company to local assessor as to its operative property, pursuant to Const. art. 13, § 14, and Pol. Code, §§ 3665(c) and 3666, was sufficient to charge assessor with notice that company was claiming such property as operative property, but assessor did not, as required by section 3666, take steps to have correctness of claim heard and determined, he thereby acquiesced in claim that such property was in fact operative property, and hence was without jurisdiction to assess it as nonoperative property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by the Great Western Power Company of California against the City of Oakland to recover taxes paid under protest. Judgment for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 189 Cal. 649, 209 P. 553.

Guy C. Earl, W. H. Spaulding, and Chaffee E. Hall, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The appellant brought an action against the city of Oakland to recover taxes alleged to have been illegally levied and collected, and paid under protest. A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed by the respondent city, and sustained. Plaintiff did not amend. Judgment was entered against it, and reversed on appeal, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer. Great Western Power Co. v. City of Oakland, 189 Cal. 649, 209 P. 553. Thereupon the city answered. After trial by the court, sitting without a jury, judgment was rendered for the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the sale and transmission of electricity, and belongs to the class of corporations set apart by the Constitution (section 14 of article 13) for taxation solely by the state upon their operative properties, on the basis of a percentage of gross receipts. The tax by the state on the property of such companies, used exclusively in the operation of their business in this state, is in lieu of all other taxes, state, county, and municipal, except as provided in the section noted. During the month of March, 1920, appellant filed with the state board of equalization the report required by section 3665 (c) of the Political Code, showing all of its property in the state which came under the definition of operative property. The report specified, among other things, all the property owned by appellant in the city of Oakland, and particularly specified and classified such property as operative and nonoperative. In the list of operative property, appellant included two steam generating plants and their equipment.

At the time of filing the report with the state board of equalization, appellant mailed to the assessor of the city of Oakland, and the assessor received, several sheets of paper upon which had been mimeographed the same description of property that was included in the report of appellant to the state board of equalization. With these papers were certain maps descriptive of and showing the location of appellant's real property described in its report, among other property being the two steam generating plants and equipment referred to. The maps and papers were in the same inclosure with a letter, directed to the assessor, signed by the appellant by its tax agent, and reading as follows:

"Herewith please find statement of operative property of Great Western Power Company of California and California Electric Generating Company, within your jurisdiction. You will also find maps enclosed showing in red the operative property of said companies within your jurisdiction. The said statement of property and said maps are identical with the statement and maps sent by us to the state board of equalization, covering your district, and we are sending the enclosed statement and maps to you at the request of the state board of equalization."

Notwithstanding the receipt by him of the papers, maps, and communication from the Power Company, the Oakland city assessor assessed the two steam generating plants as nonoperative property, and on the assessment thus made the tax was levied and collected by the city over the protest of the appellant. The question on the appeal arises as to the proper construction of the requirement of section 3665 (c) of the Political Code, which directs that a public utility company, making an annual report, shall, at the same time that it files its report with the state board of equalization, "furnish a duplicate of the report covering so much of said property as is located in any * * * municipality * * * to the assessor of the * * * city * * * in which such property is located." The board of equalization may require the filing in its office of maps descriptive of all the operative property of the company making the report, and may require that similar maps descriptive of the operative property within a municipality shall be filed in the assessor's office of the city in which the property is located. The contention in the court below hinged upon the proper construction to be given to the word "duplicate" found in the requirement that, at the time the company files its annual report with the board of equalization, it shall also furnish a "duplicate" of the report covering so much of the property as is located in a municipality to the assessor of the city in which the property is located.

The trial court found that the matter set forth on the sheets of paper comprising the "statement of property," sent by appellant to the assessor, did not identify the property or state the purpose for which the papers were sent. It further found that they were not signed or sworn to by any person or officer connected with the plaintiff, or any person at all, and contained no information advising the assessor that the matter sent was a "duplicate" of the report required by the section of the Code, and contained no information or statements charging the assessor with notice that the Company was attempting to comply with the provisions of the Code, or was claiming before the state board of equalization that the property described was operative property. The court therefore held that it was within the province of the city assessor to assess the property as "nonoperative," and that the tax levied in pursuance of the assessment was property levied and collected.

The reason for the provision in section 3665 (c), supra, that the utility company must furnish the local assessor with information concerning the property within the jurisdiction of that official, is to be found in the succeeding section of the Code (section 3666), which provides that if the assessor finds in the report of property in his municipality, claimed to be operative, any piece or parcel of property which he regards as nonoperative property, or partially operative and partially nonoperative, he shall, within 30 days after receiving such report, notify the state board of equalization thereof, and give the reasons for his opinion. A copy of the notice must be mailed to the company whose property is involved. The state board of equalization, upon an investigation of the property and its use, and providing an agreement between the board or assessor and company as to the proper classification of the property cannot be reached, must provide for a hearing before it, at which hearing it must determine whether such property is operative or nonoperative. The decision of the board in such matters is binding upon all parties, the state, the municipality, and the company, unless set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the assessor must assess the property according to such decision.

The report required by section 3665 (c), supra, must show in detail many matters which cannot, under any possible contention, interest the local assessor, or in any way relate to his action in determining whether or not he will assess property claimed by the company to be operative. Counsel for the respondent say in the city's brief that they do not contend that a complete duplicate of the entire report sent to the state board of equalization must be furnished to each local assessor, but that the duplicate of the report which is required shall be in all material respects like the original, but covering only so much of the property as is located in the municipality to which the duplicate is furnished. It should contain, it goes on to say, "at least so much of the information as will identify its purpose, disclose the names of the companies and its subsidiaries, the nature of their business, accurately describe the property in detail located in his jurisdiction, inform the assessor as to the claims of the taxpayer in respect to local property, and particularly charge him with the notice which the statute intends to give. It must be sufficient, in any event, to furnish the basis for an intelligent protest by him and hearing before the board as provided in section 3666 of said Code."

The word "duplicate," as used by the Legislature, respondent argues, must be given a strict and technical meaning, and, thus construed, it means neither a "copy," nor an "abstract," nor a "mimeographed copy," nor "excerpts from the report." Had the Legislature, it says, intended to permit the use of a "copy," or an "abstract," or a "mimeographed copy," or "excerpts from the report," it could readily have said so. But, by the use of the words "duplicate of the report," it meant "something of much greater dignity and solemnity than the unidentified mimeograph copies of a mere part thereof sent to the assessor."

[1] The word "duplicate," it has been held, construing certain written instruments, means "that which is double, or twice made; an original instrument repeated. A document which is defined to be the copy of a thing; but, though generally a copy, a duplicate differs from a mere copy in having all the validity of an original." Burrill's Law Dict., 1859 Ed., p. 526. "The double of anything. A document which is essentially the same as some other instrument." Bouvier's Law Dict. See, also, Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. McFadden, 213 Mo. 269, 287, 111 S. W. 1172; Grant v. Griffith, 40 App. Div. 18, 56 N. Y. S. 791; Lorch v. Page, 24 A. L. R. 1209; 19 Cor. Jur. p. 836, cited by respondent. Respondent argues that the statement sent to the Oakland city assessor was not a "duplicate" within the definition of these authorities, and, not being sworn to, or in any way verified, the assessor could not be expected to give serious consideration to any claim that certain property of the corporation described therein was operative property, and no duty was cast upon him by the law to investigate a frivolous unverified claim, or to ascertain its purpose. Of course, if the claim was frivolous, no duty would be cast upon the assessor thereby; but we are not persuaded that such was the effect of the appellant's action in this case. The trial court does not find that the claim made by appellant was not made in good faith, or that it was frivolous. No authorities, based on facts like those here considered, have been cited. There can, of course, be no quarrel with the "summing up" of the rule that "where the law requires the taxpayer's list to be verified by oath or affidavit, an unverified list is of no effect—it does not bind the assessors, and does not benefit the property owner." 37 Cyc. p. 994, g. The cases cited by respondent (Bessolo v. City of Los Angeles, 176 Cal. 597, 169 P. 372; Henne v. Los Angeles County, 129 Cal. 297, 61 P. 1081; Weyse v. Crawford, 85 Cal. 196, 24 P. 735), merely hold, on the point to which they are cited, that when the law requires certain demands or statements under oath, the law must be complied with. Unless respondent is correct in its contention regarding the proper construction to be given the phrase "duplicate of the report," as used in the section, there is nothing in the law governing this matter that requires a sworn or verified statement to be furnished to the local assessor. It was shown at the trial that the matter appearing on the eleven sheets of paper sent to the Oakland city assessor, descriptive of the appellant's operative property within the state, was first "typewritten on stencil sheets and run off on the mimeograph, * * * many copies run off from each sheet, including one for the state board of education and one for each local assessor," and that the mimeograph copies so made are duplicates of the same respective pages actually sent to the state board.

Substantially, if not literally, the appellant furnished the city assessor with a duplicate of the report covering so much of said property as was located in the city of Oakland. It was stipulated by the city that the sheets were a copy of the report of appellant's operative properties sent to the state board for the year 1920, and were attached to the letter received by the assessor, and the trial court found that the report filed with the state board "particularly specified and classified" the property described as operative and nonoperative, "and included the property which it claimed was operative in said county of Alameda, and described the same as follows, to wit: Great Western Power Company of California Operative Property Generating Plants—Electric March 12, 1920. County or City—Description of the water sources, water rights, canals, ditches, flumes, aqueducts, conduits, rights of way, dams, reservoirs, power plants, land, buildings and other property constituting part of the generating or central plant." Then follows a description of various properties in Plumas and Butte counties. On page 2, the property in Alameda county is set forth, and this item occurs:

"Two steam generating plants of Great Western Power Company of California and equipment, including oil tanks, being all of the personal property of Great Western Power Company of California at its plant in Realty Syndicate Building, Oakland, Alameda county, California, and at its plant in St. Marks Hotel, Oakland, Alameda county, California."

That is the property which appellant contends was illegally assessed.

[2] It does not appear to us that any further information is required to be given to a local assessor, in the matter of taxing the property of a public utility company, than such information as will apprise him of the intention of the company to claim that such property, or some part of it, is operative, and to give him opportunity to make a claim before the state board of equalization that, as a fact, the property is nonoperative, and therefore within his jurisdiction for assessing purposes.

[3, 4] From the evidence in the record, we are convinced that the assessor of the respondent city was in position to, and must have derived sufficient information from the communication sent him by the appellant, accompanied as it was with the maps and other papers, to charge him with notice that the appellant was not only attempting to comply with the section of the Code, but was actually claiming before the state board of equalization that the property described was operative property. The contrary view of the trial court, reflected in its findings, is not supported by the evidence. The assessor was expressly told that the maps and papers were sent to him as a statement of operative property of the appellant within his jurisdiction, and that the maps showed the location of such property. He was also informed that the statement of property and the maps were identical with the statement and maps sent by the Company to the state board of equalization covering his district, and that the statement and maps were sent to him at the request of the state board. It therefore became his duty, under section 3666 of the Code, supra, to take steps to have the correctness of the claim made by the appellant heard and determined in the manner provided by the statute. Failing to do that, he must be held to have acquiesced in the claim of appellant that the two steam generating plants in the city of Oakland were, in fact, operative property. As he did not take the steps provided by law whereby he might have subjected the property in question to assessment for local purposes, if it were in fact not operative property of the appellant, he was without jurisdiction to make an assessment thereon. Pacific Electric Ry. Co. v. Rolkin, 164 Cal. 154, 128 P. 20. It follows, therefore, that the city was without jurisdiction to levy and collect any tax based upon such invalid assessment. This last conclusion we take now to be the law of the case, for it was in effect held on the former appeal in this case (Great Western Power Co. v. City of Oakland, supra, at pages 657, 658 [209 P. 553]), that the procedure prescribed by the Code not having been followed, the attempt of the assessor to subject the property to local taxation was utterly void.

In view of the conclusion we have reached that the city assessor had no jurisdiction to make any assessment in the premises, the question whether the two steam heating plants maintained by appellant in the city of Oakland in 1920 were, or were not, operative property within the meaning of the Constitution becomes immaterial.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed.

We concur: MYERS, C. J.; RICHARDS, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

SHENK, J. I dissent. It is not disputed that the report to be filed with the state board of equalization must be signed and sworn to in accordance with the requirements of section 3665 (c) of the Political Code. It seems to me that unless the report be under oath it does not constitute a report as required. When a duplicate of the report covering so much of the appellant's property as is located in the city is required to be filed with the local assessor, it was undoubtedly the intention of the Legislature that such report be attended with the same formality as the report filed with the state board of equalization. In other words, it was intended that the report to be filed with the city assessor should be the same in all respects, that is, a duplicate, as the report filed with the state board, except that it should include only such property as was located within the city. This construction is entirely in line with other provisions of our tax laws, which require individuals to file statements of their property under oath with the local assessor such as is provided in section 3633 of the Political Code. The purpose of requiring a statement under oath is, of course, plain, as affording assurance to the assessor that the taxpayer has included in his statement all of the property owned by him in the locality in which the particular assessor has jurisdiction.

It is alleged in the complaint that on the 9th day of March, 1920, the plaintiff filed with the state board of equalization a report as required by the statute, setting forth, among other things, the description of the property operative and nonoperative located in the city of Oakland, and owned by the plaintiff at the time designated. It is further alleged that on the 10th day of March, 1920, "a full, true, and correct duplicate of said report so made to, and filed with, the said state board of equalization was furnished to the assessor of said city of Oakland." The latter allegation was properly traversed in the answer, and the court found said allegation to be untrue. The evidence was undisputed to the effect that the only documents submitted to the assessor of the city of Oakland were mimeographed copies of descriptions of property located in the said city, and maps showing in red the location of said property. These documents were submitted to the city assessor with an ordinary letter of transmittal. The appellant does not claim, and it is not the fact, that the mimeographed sheets and maps were authenticated by the oath of any person whatsoever. Under these circumstances I think that the finding of the trial court to the effect that a duplicate of the report of appellant to the state board of equalization was not filed with the city assessor was not only justified, but compelled by the evidence. In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. POWELL et al. (Cr. 814.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 4, 1925.)

1. Insurrection and sedition ⚡2—Membership cards and credentials, taken from accused on arrest, sufficient to show membership in organization.

In prosecution for violation of Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 1 and section 2, subd. 4, membership cards and delegate credentials, bearing names and signatures of accused, and signed by general secretary of I. W. W., taken from persons of accused on arrest, held sufficient evidence to warrant conclusion that they were members of organization, notwithstanding officers who arrested them could not identify each by name.

2. Insurrection and sedition ⚡2 — Evidence that accused was I. W. W. member sufficient.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, where accused was arrested at local headquarters of I. W. W. organization with other defendants while sitting around a table with documents, purporting to be minutes of meeting of organization, and which referred to accused by name, evidence held sufficient to show membership in organization, notwithstanding no membership card was taken from him.

3. Criminal law ⚡444—Papers, purporting to be minutes of I. W. W. meeting, competent in criminal syndicalism prosecution.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, papers purporting to be minutes of I. W. W. meeting, signed by secretary, whose signature was proven, and who was one of those arrested, held sufficiently proved to be official minutes, in absence of countervailing showing, to be competent to identify accused, who was mentioned therein, as member.

4. Insurrection and sedition ⚡2 — Evidence sufficient to support finding that I. W. W. advocated and practiced acts of criminal syndicalism.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism against members of the I. W. W. organization, evidence held sufficient to support implied finding of jury that organization taught, advocated, and practiced acts of criminal syndicalism to further its purpose.

5. Insurrection and sedition ⚡2—Evidence of practices of organization before Criminal Syndicalism Act held competent to show unlawful character of organization.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism of members of the I. W. W. organization, evidence showing teachings and practices of organization before passage of Criminal Syndicalism Act held competent to show unlawful character of organization.

6. Criminal law ⚡1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting testimony cannot be superseded by that of appellate court.

Verdict of jury on issue on which evidence is conflicting cannot legally be superseded by that of appellate court.

7. Insurrection and sedition ⚡2—Declaration of I. W. W. officer implying incendiary work properly admitted.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism against members of the I. W. W. organization, declarations of the secretary and delegate of a branch organization, who was invested with full authority to secure recruits and to declare, interpret, and advocate adjective and substantive laws and principles of organization, implying that certain fire was incendiary work of organization, and sanctioning that work, held properly admitted as tending to show unlawful character of organization.

8. Criminal law §402(2)—Parol proof of contents of letters written to branch of I. W. W. organization proper.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, contents of letters, written to branch organization of I. W. W., which prosecution had requested of counsel for defendants, and which they denied having, could be shown by parol, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, allowing parol proof on failure of opponent to produce writings in his possession after notice, which in instant case would have been futile, especially since production could not be required under subpoena duces tecum as incriminating persons subpoenaed as coconspirators.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Henry Powell and others were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and they appeal. Affirmed.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants were jointly charged with and tried for and convicted of the crime of criminal syndicalism in the superior court of Humboldt county. Each made a motion for a new trial, and the same was denied, and each appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

The offense with which the accused are charged and of which they were convicted is that so denounced by subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act (St. 1919, p. 281), which makes it a felony for any person to inaugurate or assist in inaugurating, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons, organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, as that crime is defined by section 1 of that act.

Seven of the defendants were, on the 14th day of October, 1923, arrested by the sheriff of Humboldt county, assisted by several deputies, in a room in a building designated and known as "218 D street," in the city of Eureka, in said county. The defendants so arrested were Powell, Bryan, McRae, Allen, French, Taylor, and Beavert. The defendant Nicholson was arrested at a subsequent time at some other place in Humboldt county. Longstrath was arrested in the latter part of October, 1923, on a date subsequent to the day on which the seven defendants above named were arrested. He was found by the officers with another man, who was not arrested, temporarily camping on Trinidad beach, in Humboldt county.

The seven defendants first above named, upon being arrested, were taken to the county jail in Eureka, there searched by the officers, and from the person of each, with the exception of Beavert, was taken a membership card of the Industrial Workers of the World, and from the possession of some of them there were also taken certain "credentials" purporting to have been issued by said organization and to confer upon them the authority to discharge certain duties in connection with the promotion of the aims of the organization.

[1] In the opening brief of counsel for the defendants it is expressly conceded that the evidence sufficiently shows that the defendants Powell, Nicholson, and Longstrath were members of the Industrial Workers of the World. As to the defendants Bryan, Taylor, Allen, French, McRae, and Beavert, however, it is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the jury that they were members of said organization. This contention as to all these defendants, except Beavert, is predicated upon the proposition that, while membership cards and (from some) delegate credentials bearing the names and signatures of said defendants and signed and issued by the general secretary of the I. W. W. were taken from their persons by the officers at the county jail, at the time of their arrest, the officers, when testifying, were unable to name the particular defendant from whom a particular card or particular credentials were taken. To be more explicit: A membership card was taken from the possession of each of the defendants, bearing his name and signature, but the officers, save in one or two instances, were not able to state on the witness stand, from their own independent recollection, from which of the defendants the particular card or credentials were taken. The objection is without substantial merit. The names on the several cards and credentials, as seen, corresponded with the names of the defendants, and it was for the jury to determine whether the cards, etc., were issued respectively to the defendants whose names they bore. It was but a natural inference, under the circumstances, that a card bearing the name of any one of the defendants was taken from the possession of that particular defendant and not from that of some other defendant of a different name. The cards and credentials constituted sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in concluding that the five defendants referred to were members of the organization, and further in finding that said defendants had knowledge of the principles, the doctrines, the purposes, and the policies of the organization. People v. Flanagan (Cal. App.) 223 P. 1014.

[2, 3] Upon the person of the defendant Beavert a membership card was not found, but it was shown that he was arrested at the local headquarters of the organization in Eureka with the other defendants while they were sitting at a table upon which there were at the time certain documents or writings, purporting to be the minutes of a meeting of the local branch and a record of the activities of certain members of the organization. In the writings purporting to be the minutes or record of the proceedings of certain meetings of the local branch, the name of the defendant, Beavert, appeared in connection with his appointment to the membership of the "committee on resolutions," and also as a member of the "Leaflet committee"; that he was a duly appointed traveling delegate of the organization or the local branch thereof, and had issued credentials to another member authorizing him to accept applications for membership of the local branch and to collect dues, etc. To these significant circumstances may be added these considerations: That there was no denial, at the time of the arrest of the defendants at No. 218 D street, that said place, if not the permanent, was the temporary, headquarters or office of the local wing of the I. W. W. organization. Moreover, it was conceded that the literature in various forms found at the said place at the time of the arrest of several of the defendants, including Beavert, was printed and published by and under the authority of the I. W. W. There was no denial at any time that the book or the writing or document containing the name of Beavert and reciting that he had been appointed as a member of a committee of the organization of the local branch thereof was not what it purported to be, to wit, the minutes or record of the proceedings of some meeting of the local branch of the organization. It was proved, if, indeed, not virtually conceded, that Henry Powell, who was in charge of the place when Beavert and certain other defendants were arrested, was the secretary of the local branch of the organization. There was no attempt to deny that the defendants, other than Beavert, arrested at 218 D street, were members of the I. W. W. Thus it is clear that there were brought before the jury circumstances and other considerations from which the jury were well justified in drawing the conclusion that Beavert was a member of the organization in question. It is argued, however, that, to constitute the writings referred to as competent evidence of Beavert's membership of the organization proof must first be made that said writings were the official minutes of any meeting the proceedings of which they purported to contain the record of. These writings or minutes were signed by "Henry Powell, Sec'y Br.," and it is admitted that that was shown to be the signature of Powell, one of the defendants and secretary of the Eureka branch of the organization. This was a sufficient showing that said writings were the official minutes or record of certain meetings of the local branch of the organization to make them prima facie proof of their authenticity or of their official character, and sufficient to warrant an inference to that effect until their probative force was overcome by a countervailing showing, and it was for the jury to say whether such a showing had been made.

[4] It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the organization taught, advocated, and practiced acts of criminal syndicalism to further its purposes.

At the time the seven defendants were placed under arrest at 218 D street the officers found and took possession of a quantity of the literature of the organization, consisting of books, booklets, pamphlets, magazines, newspapers, and other periodicals. These contained the platform of principles of the organization, and also addresses, lectures, and writings, published in the official organs of the Industrial Workers of the World, setting forth and expounding the principles and ultimate purposes of said organization. Extracts from these publications and also from other literature of the organization were introduced in evidence. In fact, substantially the same character of literature was introduced in the present case as was presented in the numerous other like cases hitherto appealed to and decided by the Supreme and Appellate Courts. See People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 P. 78; People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 P. 85; People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 P. 381; People v. La Rue et al., 62 Cal. App. 276, 216 P. 627. In fact, counsel for the defendants in his brief states that the evidence thus introduced in this case and addressed to the proof of the character of the organization, or for the purpose of showing that said organization teaches and advocates the employment of criminal means and measures for accomplishing its aims, was "practically identical with evidence received and considered in the other cases heretofore considered and decided by the courts of appeal," but protests that the evidence introduced herein to establish that element of the offense charged "was insufficient to bring the guilt of the organization down to the time covered by the information." The basis of the latter contention is that much of the literature introduced in the case, and in which acts of violence and sabotage, if not openly, were covertly but understandably, advocated as means for achieving the aims of the organization, were published and distributed prior to the passage of the Syndicalism Act in the year 1919. But, as will be shown, there was testimony, oral and documentary, other than that afforded by said literature, which showed or tended to show that the organization, after the passage of the Syndicalism Act, did not cease teaching and advocating its radical doctrines and continued after that time to advocate a resort to unlawful means for accomplishing its ultimate objects. Some of the witnesses for the people in this case had testified in other cases previously tried in the courts of different counties of this state. Those witnesses were Albert Coutts, Joe Arada, and the deputy sheriff of Stanislaus county in the years 1917 and 1918, during which years numerous criminal acts of the most diabolical character were committed in said county and the responsibility therefor traced to members of the I. W. W. while prosecuting the activities of said organization in furtherance of its purposes.

Coutts, a member of the I. W. W. from the year 1913 to and including a part of the year 1918, as in the other previously tried cases, gave in this case an extended résumé and explanation of the principles, purposes, and activities of the I. W. W. while he was a member thereof, and told of innumerable instances of the commission of criminal acts by the members of the organization in avowed furtherance of its ultimate aim. His recital of the atrocities perpetrated by the members of the organization during the period of his affiliation therewith is in all respects substantially the same as he gave it in every case previously arising and tried under the syndicalism law and in which he was a witness. His story as he told it in this case may be found in many of the cases above named, and there is therefore no necessity for repeating it herein.

Joe Arada repeated in this case his testimony as given in the case of People v. Roe, supra, and other cases named above to the effect that, while he was employed in digging potatoes on a ranch in San Joaquin county in the year 1917, certain members of the I. W. W. applied to the owner of the ranch for like employment, and that in the nighttime, while he and other workmen were asleep in a bunkhouse on the ranch, the aforesaid members of the I. W. W. deposited in his (Arada's) shoes a certain chemical combination which, after he had worn the shoes for a few hours the following day, so burned and injured his feet as to compel him to cease working and to remain in a hospital for many months under medical treatment. As stated, the details of Arada's story as he told it in this case may be found briefly recapitulated in the cases above named, particularly in the case of People v. Roe, supra, and for that reason a repetition herein of the details thereof is uncalled for.

R. G. Davis, a deputy in the office of the sheriff of Stanislaus county in the year 1917, repeated in this case the testimony given by him in the other cases mentioned as to a number of incendiary fires in Stanislaus county in the year just named, resulting in the destruction of valuable property—barns, large stacks of hay, etc.—in various parts of said county, and which, he stated, was satisfactorily shown to be the work of certain members of the I. W. W. Davis' testimony as given in this case is, as before stated, substantially the same as that given by him in the other cases above referred to, and for that reason it need not be reproduced herein.

[5] The testimony of Coutts, Arada, and Davis, although relating to the teachings and practices of the organization before the passage of the syndicalism statute, was, nevertheless, competent for the purpose of showing the unlawful character of the organization. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 376, 203 P. 78. In that case it is said that, for the purpose of showing that an organization or assemblage of persons is one that falls within the condemnation of the statute denouncing certain acts as "criminal syndicalism," it is proper to receive and consider evidence of its conduct and activities before as well as after the passage of the statute. See, also, People v. Taylor, supra; People v. Roe, supra; People v. La Rue, supra; People v. Flanagan, supra; People v. Bailey (Cal. App.) 225 P. 752; People v. Wagner (Cal. App.) 225 P. 464.

L. Babcock testified that, as a detective connected with the office of district attorney of Sacramento county, and at the request of said district attorney, and for the purpose of securing evidence as to the methods taught, advocated, and practiced by the I. W. W. to accomplish the general scheme of government to which it has committed itself, he joined said organization, at Sacramento, under the name of "L. A. Munson," in September, 1922, and retained his membership thereof until the 1st day of March, 1924; that in the month of May, 1923, he "took out delegate's credentials," and continued ostensibly to act in that capacity as a representative of the organization during the remainder of the year 1923. He stated that, while a member, he attended meetings of the organization held at various places in California, and thereat heard the discussions by the members of what they conceived to be the more effectual course to be pursued to press to fruition the great central purpose of the organization. He testified that the members, at certain meetings held at different places, advocated "direct action" and "the strike on the job." By "direct action," both Coutts and Babcock explained, was and is meant, as the phrase is clearly so understood by all the members, that, where necessary to carry out a particular scheme, the members were (in effect) to take the law into their own hands and commit criminal acts upon property or the persons of the employing class, or, where any of their fellow members are in the toils of the law for offenses denounced by the Syndicalism Act, to resort to similar methods against the officers of the law and so prevent the infliction upon such members of the punishment prescribed by said act for a violation of its provisions. One of the meetings at which Babcock heard the latter proposition discussed and indorsed was held at a certain place in Yolo county, immediately across the Sacramento river from the city of Sacramento, in October, 1922. The "strike on the job," so Babcock further explained, is where the members of the organization, being employed by the employing class for the performance of certain labor, are to "shirk" on their work—that is, purposely do as little work as possible—and thereby cause the employer to lose money in operating his enterprise, whatever the nature thereof may be, and so make it unprofitable for the "capitalistic" class, as the organization characterizes all employers of labor, to engage in business and carry it on profitably. Babcock further testified that, either in September or October, 1923, he saw and read a letter which, at the time, was lying on the desk of the "supply clerk" of the Stockton branch of the I. W. W. organization, in the I. W. W. hall of said city, purporting to be from the "stationary delegate" at Portola, Plumas county, being signed with the stamp of said delegate, and requesting the secretary of the Stockton branch of the I. W. W. "to have all 'cats' to proceed to Quincy (Plumas county) at once to turn the 'cats' loose upon the lumber barons." He also testified that at some time in 1923 he saw and read two letters, one of which was posted on the wall and the other lying on the secretary's desk in the hall of the I. W. W. in Stockton, one bearing the signature of a delegate named William Dawson and the other over the name of a delegate named John Deady. The letter from the first named requested the secretary of the Stockton branch to send all men possible to the rice fields so that the strike they had started or were about to start could be made a success; that such a course "would improve conditions" in the rice fields. The Deady letter requested "the secretary of the Stockton branch to send 110 cats to Colusa—I think Colusa," said Babcock, "but I am not sure about the town." This witness explained that the number "110" is the designation of the "agricultural branch" of the organization. He further explained, as Coutts and others testified in this and former cases, that the term "cats" was used by the organization for the purpose of designating those members to whom the business of committing acts of sabotage and violence to physical property was assigned by the organization. The witness further testified, against the objection of defendants that the testimony was hearsay, that in the year 1923, on a street corner in the city of Los Angeles, one Barney Brooks, then "branch secretary or stationary delegate" of the Los Angeles wing of the organization, referring, in the presence of the witness and several other members of the I. W. W., to a fire which but a few days before had partially destroyed the Edison electric plant at Eagle Rock, Los Angeles county, declared that "we ought to burn the whole damned works." Babcock testified to other happenings in I. W. W. halls and the declarations by the members of the organization in the course of discussions at the meetings thereof in various places in the state in 1923 and 1924 which clearly indicated that, since the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Law, the organization has continued to advocate and indorse employment by its members of unlawful means in furthering the accomplishment of the radical and, indeed, revolutionary plan for overthrowing our existing systems of government. The testimony thus referred to need not be gone into in detail herein. Enough of the details of his testimony have been given above to show that there is evidence to support the implied findings of the jury that both before and subsequent to the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Law the organization has stood for the commission of criminal acts to push forward its movement to revolutionize the present forms of government of the states and the United States and introduce in lieu thereof what the members are pleased to call an industrial government, whatever that may mean.

[6] The defendants did not take the witness stand in their own behalf. Other members of the organization, however, testifying for the accused, stated that the policy of the organization as to the means by which it had always endeavored to carry out its central object was to do so by peaceable and lawful methods; that, since the Criminal Syndicalism Act became a law, the organization had repeatedly, through its official publications and its lecturers, vigorously condemned the employment of violence or the resort to criminal acts or instrumentalities for effectuating its ultimate purposes and had strictly enjoined its members against the commission of crime or acts of lawlessness for any purpose. Extracts from articles appearing in their official publications issued and circulated by authority of the organization and from lectures delivered by its members since the passage of the statute, emphatically admonishing its members to refrain from committing unlawful acts in prosecuting their activities in behalf of the organization, were admitted in evidence and read to the jury. In a word, the defendants were by the trial court accorded unrestricted latitude, consistently, of course, with the law of evidence, in the matter of making their defense along the lines just indicated. The effect of this showing, though, is only to create a substantial conflict upon the question of the character of the organization—whether its methods of prosecuting its scheme to success are unlawful or such as are denounced by the Criminal Syndicalism

Law. Hence the judgment of the jury upon that issue, as evidenced by their verdict, cannot legally be superseded by that of this court.

[7] There are a few of the rulings which merit special attention herein. It is contended that the testimony of Babcock as to the conversation he had with Barney Brooks on a street of Los Angeles relative to the partial destruction by fire of the Edison electric plant at Eagle Rock involved a narrative of a past event, and was therefore incompetent. People v. La Rue, 62 Cal. App. 276, 283, 216 P. 627, 630. It must be conceded that the statement imputed to Brooks is reasonably subject to the construction that it implied that the fire was the incendiary work of persons affiliated with the organization, and that the act was instigated and sanctioned by the organization itself. But we think that the testimony was, nevertheless, properly received. It will not be doubted that it was relevant to the issues of the case. The objection to it is addressed to the question of its competency, and as to this proposition it was only necessary, to render it competent, that it be made to appear, as we think it was made to appear, that the declaration to which the testimony related was made by one authorized to speak for the organization. Brooks, at the time of making the statement, was an officer of the Los Angeles branch of the organization. He was secretary and a delegate of the branch organization, and it is a reasonable inference, from the nature of his official relation to the organization, that in his capacity as delegate, if not in both his official capacities, he was invested with full authority, not only to secure recruits to the ranks of the organization, but to declare, interpret, and advocate the adjective as well as the substantive laws and principles constituting its general political platform or propaganda, and that, upon all matters pertaining to its purposes and activities, his voice was its voice. In this view, testimony of his extrajudicial admissions of atrocities committed in the past by members of the organization in pursuance of its teachings and with its indorsement would be competent testimony as in proof of the unlawful character of the organization.

In his opinion in the case of People v. Flanagan, supra, Presiding Justice Finch, while not expressly stating that testimony of the extrajudicial declaration of an officer of the organization implying or directly admitting that certain acts of lawlessness had at some time in the past been committed by certain members to further its ultimate aims, at least intimates that such testimony is admissible, particularly where, as here, all the circumstances and the nature of the official duties of such officer reasonably justify the inference that the declarant is or was authorized to speak for the organization. But Brooks' declaration amounted to more than an implied reference to a past event. It involved an expression of the then present attitude of the organization as to the methods it believed in and advocated to accomplish its aims; that is to say, the declaration constituted some evidence that the organization, notwithstanding that the Criminal Syndicalism Act was then in existence, believed in, advocated, and would employ, criminal means for establishing its scheme of government.

[8] The next and the last point of which special notice will herein be given involves the rulings of the court permitting the prosecution to prove by parol the contents of the letters which Babcock stated that he saw and read in the hall of the Stockton branch of the organization and to which we have above referred. When objection to said testimony was made, the district attorney stated that he did not have the letters in his possession, and asked the attorney for the defendants if he had possession of them, to which the latter with some show of indignation responded that he did not have any such letters, but that, if he had them in his possession, he would not deliver them to the district attorney. The testimony of Babcock was that the last time he saw the letters they were still in the hall of the Stockton wing of the organization.

The rule of our Code with regard to the proof of a writing is that there can be allowed no evidence of the contents thereof, other than the writing itself, except in certain specified cases, among which are the following:

"1. When the original has been lost or destroyed; in which case proof of the loss or destruction must first be made. 2. When the original is in the possession of the party against whom the evidence is offered, and he fails to produce it after reasonable notice." Code Civ. Proc. § 1855.

In the instant case the letters were not shown to be in the actual possession of the defendants. The reasonable inference from Babcock's testimony was that they were still in the possession of the officers of the local branch of the organization at Stockton. Notice to the defendants to produce them would obviously have been futile. It is equally obvious that a subpoena duces tecum directed to the officer or officers having official possession and control of the writings, commanding them to produce them in court, would have been futile, since those officers were coconspirators of the defendants, and could not have been compelled to produce and expose in court the contents of any written document which would tend, as the letters in question would certainly tend, to connect the officer producing them with the commission of the same or like crime for which the defendants were on trial. Thus it is clear that it would have been, and presumably the trial court so viewed the situation, an idle act—indeed, a nonsensical act—to have ordered a duces tecum subpoena to issue and to be served with the view of procuring, for the purpose of fortifying the people's case, the production of those letters. There was then no other conceivable way in which the contents of the letters could be presented to the jury than by means of parol testimony, and the question now is whether, under such circumstances, such testimony is legally available for that purpose. The character or quality of the evidence thus brought into the case is, manifestly, no different from that which is declared by the Code to be competent, and, consequently, proper in certain enumerated instances, where the specified conditions upon which such testimony is receivable have been met. If, therefore, there be any difference between the situation where secondary evidence of the contents of a writing is, by express provisions of the law, allowable, and the situation presented here, it is not in the fact that the parol testimony in the case first mentioned is abstractly superior in evidentiary value to such testimony in the other, but in the fact that in the one case the Legislature has expressly declared that, when circumstances arise which will authorize its reception, it is proper testimony, while in the other case there is no express authority in law for allowing it. We are of the opinion, however, that, under the circumstances of this case, parol testimony of the contents of the letters referred to is admissible upon the theory that, in legal effect, the letters are as much lost to the people as though they were actually lost or their whereabouts unknown and cannot be traced. Indeed, we feel safe in saying, as a result of our investigation of the question, that the consensus of judicial opinion, as well as that of the text-writers, is that, under circumstances such as are present in this case, parol testimony is admissible for the purpose of proving the contents of written documents upon the theory above suggested. It may be true that there is an apparent difference of opinion as to the particular ground upon which such testimony is admissible under circumstances similar to those existing in this case, but, in our opinion, the difference is only apparent and is due to the nature of the verbal statement of the rule or the form in which it is expressed in some of the cases and by some of the text-writers. However, it is not a matter of any consequence as to the particular theory upon which the testimony is admissible so long as it is admissible upon any reasonable theory within the spirit or contemplation of the code section.

In U. S. v. Reyburn, 6 Pet. 352, 8 L. Ed. 424, the prisoner was indicted for unlawfully issuing a commission in writing for a certain vessel "to the intent that such vessel might be employed in the service of a foreign people, that is to say, in the service of the United Province of Rio de la Plata, to cruise and commit hostilities against the subjects and property of a foreign prince, * * * with whom the United States were at peace." The proof of the contents of the commission was necessary to the establishment of the crime against the accused, and the commission was in the possession of one Chase, who was also connected with and criminally culpable in the transaction. The question arose at the trial whether it was proper, under the indicated circumstances, to prove the contents of the commission by parol. The court, holding that parol evidence of the contents of the commission was admissible, said, among other things:

"A subpoena to compel his [Chase's] attendance * * * would have availed nothing, and the law does not require the performance of an act perfectly nugatory. But suppose Chase had been within the reach of a subpoena, and had actually attended court, he could not have been compelled to produce the commission, and thereby furnish evidence against himself. * * * Rules of evidence are adopted for practical purposes in the administration of justice; and must be so applied as to promote the ends for which they are designed."

The foregoing statement of the rule in such instances as the present is approved by the authors of Encyclopedia of Evidence, vol. 2, pp. 346, 347, where it is said:

"Tracing the primary evidence to the possession of one interested in its retention and who, although called, could not be compelled to produce it because it would tend to incriminate him, is enough to let in secondary evidence," citing a number of cases in the footnotes.

In State v. Dreany, 65 Kan. 292, 69 P. 182, the defendants were accused of and tried upon a charge of combining and entering into an unlawful agreement with other named parties to pool and fix the price to be paid for grain at a certain named place. The contents of the agreement, which was in writing, were necessary to be proved to make out a case. It was not shown that the writing was in the possession of the defendants, but it was made to appear that it was not in the possession of and under the control of the prosecuting attorney. That officer served notice upon the defendants to produce the written agreement at the trial. The document was not produced by the accused, and the court allowed the prosecuting attorney to prove its contents by parol evidence. Upon appeal, the point was urged that the reception of parol evidence for that purpose was error. The Supreme Court held otherwise, and said:

"It is clear that, if such writing is shown to be in the possession of the defendants, they could not be compelled, by notice or otherwise, to produce it as evidence to be used in a prosecution against them. It is further apparent that, if such writing were shown to be in the possession of defendants, it would be as completely lost to the prosecution, so far as any power existed to procure it as evidence upon the trial, as though it were lost or destroyed altogether. And in such case parol evidence of its contents has been held admissible by this court. State v. Gurnee, 14 Kan. 111. As the writing in question was not in the possession of nor under the control of the prosecution, and as it was not within the power of the state to produce it at the trial, we are inclined to the opinion that it was not error to receive secondary evidence of its contents after proof duly made of its existence and execution."

The same general principle underlies the following rule as stated in 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1212:

"It is also often said that where the third person is hostile and fraudulently detains the document, this fact of itself suffices to excuse nonproduction."

See, also, Stark v. Burke, 131 Iowa, 684, 109 N. W. 206.

We conclude that, under the circumstances as shown, the ruling permitting secondary evidence of the letters in question was legal and proper.

There are no other points which it is deemed necessary to consider herein.

The judgment and the order as to each of the defendants are affirmed.

JACKSON v. DOLAN et al. (Civ. 5130.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 27, 1925.)

Courts 116(3)—May amend minutes to show true date of order.

There is no merit in an appeal from an order correcting the minutes of the trial court to show, in accordance with the uncontroverted testimony, that an order granting new trial, from which appeal had been taken, was made on a certain day, later than the day recited on the minutes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Phil. D. Swing, Judge.

Action by L. A. Jackson against E. J. Dolan and another. From an order correcting the minutes of the trial court, defendant Gregory Ashe appeals. Affirmed.

Randall, Bartlett & White, Vincent C. Hickson, and A. P. G. Steffes, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order of the trial court, made in conformity to the direction of this court in Jackson v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315, correcting the minutes of the trial court so as to show the true date of an order granting a new trial to defendant and appellant Ashe.

The action in which the new trial was granted was one instituted by plaintiff Jackson to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him which were alleged to have been caused through the negligent operation of an automobile. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict in the sum of $4,000 was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered thereon on December 15, 1920. Thereafter, on the 17th day of December, defendants made a motion for a new trial, and the motion was taken under advisement by the court. This motion was grounded upon excessive damages claimed to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice, insufficiency of the evidence, that the verdict was against law, and errors of law occurring at the trial. No action was had thereon until December 31, 1920, when the minutes of the court show that the motion was granted as to defendant Ashe.

After perfecting his appeal from this order, and on the 22d day of April, 1921, the plaintiff moved the trial court to vacate and set aside its order granting a new trial and to correct the minutes of the court so as to show that the order was made on Sunday, January 2, 1921, and not Friday, December 31, 1920. Both motions were denied, and the validity of this order was before us on a former appeal. Jackson v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315.

It appeared in that appeal that the term of office of Hon. Phil. D. Swing, the judge who tried the case and who made the order, expired on January 3, 1921. January 1 and 2 were both legal holidays, so that, for all judicial purposes, the term of office of the trial judge expired on December 31, 1920, the day the order bore date. The motion to vacate the order granting a new trial and to correct the minutes of the court was made on affidavits. The affidavit of the clerk of the court who made the entry in the minutes was to the effect that the order was in fact made on Sunday, January 2, 1921, a legal holiday, and that no other order was ever made. This affidavit was not controverted. It was held on said appeal that, so far as the motion was directed to the vacation of the order granting a new trial, it was properly denied, for the reason that the court had lost jurisdiction to afford any relief, as the effect of the appeal from its order was to remove from its jurisdiction the subject-matter appealed from, including all questions going to the validity or correctness of such judgment or order. It was further held, however, that, as to the motion to correct the minutes of the court, the same was improperly denied, for the reason that the records of a court remain within its physical custody and control, and an appeal does not prevent the court from correcting mistakes appearing on the face of the record, as courts have at all times power to allow amendments to judgments for the purpose of having them express what was rendered so that the record will speak the truth. It was therefore ordered that the trial court determine the true facts with relation to the entry of the order and take action accordingly.

In conformity with this direction, the trial court proceeded to determine the truth as to the time when the order granting the new trial was made. It found upon uncontroverted testimony that the order vacating the judgment as to Gregory Ashe and granting him a new trial was given, ordered, and made by the court on Sunday, January 2, 1921, and not on December 31, 1920, as recited, and the minutes were accordingly corrected so as to state the true facts.

This is an appeal from such order. From what we have said it is manifest that there is no merit in the appeal.

The order is affirmed.

JACKSON v. DOLAN et al. (Civ. 4144.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 27, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⇨112—New trial ⇨155— Motion denied by lapse of time, and so no appeal, where only action is order after expiration of judge's term.

An order granting a new trial made when, for all judicial purposes, the judge's term has expired, is of no effect, so that time for action on the motion having expired, it is under Code Civ. Proc. § 660, deemed denied by lapse of time, from which denial no appeal lies.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Phil D. Swing, Judge.

Action by L. A. Jackson against E. J. Dolan and another. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for appellant.

Randall, Bartlett & White, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The facts are stated in an opinion filed by us this day on an appeal from an order correcting the minutes of the court in the above-entitled action. 236 P. 318. It appears therefrom that the order granting a new trial was made at a time when for all judicial purposes the office of the judge making the order has expired. His act in granting the motion was therefore functus officio and of no effect, and the case is left in the same condition, in legal contemplation, as though no order disposing of the motion had ever been made, the consequence of which is that it is deemed denied by lapse of time (Code Civ. Proc. § 660), and from which no appeal lies. This being so, the question as to whether the motion was rightfully or wrongfully decided on the merits is one that is not properly before us.

For the reasons given, the order granting the new trial is reversed.

AUBEL v. SOSSO et al. (Civ. 5090.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 30, 1925. Rehearing Denied April 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 25, 1925.)

1. Infants ⇨50—Minor may contract for necessary medical treatment while living under care of parent or guardian.

Civ. Code, §§ 35-37, 207, prohibiting minor from disaffirming a contract for necessities, when not living under care of parent or guardian, does not prohibit a minor from making a contract for necessary medical treatment, while living under care of his parent or guardian.

2. Damages ⇨46—Infant entitled to recover special damages for medical treatment necessitated by injury, though expenses paid by parent prior to trial.

A contract by infant living under care of his parent for medical treatment, necessitated by injury alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence, being valid, fact that obligation has been met by advancements on part of parent prior to trial is no defense to recovery of special damages therefor arising out of defendant's negligence.

3. Appeal and error ⇨766—Proper to affirm judgment, where appellant stated that it set out all evidence on certain question but in fact failed to do so.

Where appellants in their brief printed extracts from testimony on matter of ownership of automobile, and whether or not driver was on errand for defendants at time of injury to plaintiff, and followed it by a statement that they quoted all testimony covering such subject, thus leading appellate court to believe that no other testimony was received, but it appears that other evidence was introduced which appellants did not print in their brief, held that court could properly affirm judgment without further consideration of appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⇨930(1)—Evidence taken in light most favorable to prevailing party.

The jury having found against defendants on appeal, court must take evidence in light most favorable to plaintiff.

5. Master and servant ⇨330(3)—Evidence held to show automobile driver engaged in employer's business.

In action for injuries from automobile, evidence held to sustain finding that driver, a minor, was engaged in business of defendant partnership at time of accident.

6. Master and servant ⇨302(1)—Principal, allowing agent to combine his own business with that of principal, liable for agent's negligence.

The liability of a partnership for negligence of minor agent, who injured plaintiff while on errand for partnership, and taking a joy ride at same time, rests on general rule of liability of principal and agent, where principal allows his agent to combine his own business with that of principal or to attend to both at substantially same time.

7. Trial ⇨229, 295(1)—Instructions must be read as a whole and each need not be complete in itself.

It being rule that instructions must be read as a whole and that each instruction need not be complete in itself, where expression "through the negligence of the defendants" is used, it was not necessary to repeat in every paragraph of instructions, that such negligence must be "proximate cause of injury sustained."

8. Trial ⇨242—Use of expression "and/or," in instruction in reference to liability of partners for negligence of agent, held not misleading.

In action for injury from automobile, driven by one alleged to be engaged in business of defendant partners at time of injury, where it was shown that driver alone was operating automobile at time of accident, and there was no conflict over theory on which claim of negligence of partners was based, use of expression "and/or" in instruction as to liability of partners could not have misled jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, And/Or.]

9. Trial ⇨203(3)—Instruction as to inference of agency from fact that automobile owner permits another to drive it, though not good law, held not prejudicial in view of instructions.

In action for injuries from automobile in which it was alleged that defendant driver was engaged in business of defendant partners at time of injury, instruction that inference of agency might arise from fact that owner of automobile permits another to drive it, unless shown that driver was not owner's agent, though not good law, held not prejudicial, where undisputed evidence showed that automobile had been used in partnership business, and that it was owned by one or both of such partners, and positive evidence was offered showing that driver was engaged in business of partnership at time of accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Willie Aubel, by his guardian ad litem, Joseph Aubel, against August Sosso, also known as Eddie Luciani, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Lennon, J., disqualified.

Chas. W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Bradford M. Melvin and Thomas L. Lennon, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, sued for damages for injuries caused by being struck by an automobile driven by the defendant Sosso while the plaintiff was walking along a public highway. The defendants Edith Luciani and Sal Carlo were partners jointly operating a summer resort, known as Carlo's Resort, at Agua Caliente. The automobile was owned at the time by the defendant Luciani, who was also the mother of the defendant Sosso, who was a minor. She is sued because of her ownership of the automobile, as well as her interest as a partner with Carlo in the management of the resort, upon the theory that the automobile was at the time of the accident being used in the operation of that business. The cause was tried before the court, sitting with a jury, and a general verdict in the sum of $1,350 was returned. From the judgment which followed, the defendants have appealed under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The injuries occurred while the defendant Sosso, the minor child of the defendant Luciani, was operating the automobile on a public highway of Agua Caliente in company with some of his boy friends on what they frequently termed a "joy ride." The negligence of this defendant is not questioned and it is unnecessary, therefore, to detail the evidence of the accident. It appears that the defendant Luciani authorized the boy to take the car to carry a guest of their resort to Boyes Springs; that he left the guest at the latter place and returned along the highway and picked up three other boys about his own age, to wit, 15 years, for the purpose of taking a ride, as he was to call at a later hour at Boyes Springs in order to return the guest to the defendants' resort. This part of the evidence is not controverted. It was shown on the part of the plaintiff that, in addition to the errand above mentioned, the defendant Sosso was directed by the defendant Carlo to procure some bread for the resort and that he was engaged upon this errand as the agent of the partnership at the time the accident oc-surred. This evidence is controverted by the defendants. Evidence was also offered covering the subject of special damages arising out of the medical treatment necessitated by the accident, which expenses it appears were paid by the father of the plaintiff prior to the trial of the case.

[1] On this appeal the appellants attack the ruling of the trial court in allowing the question of special damages to be submitted to the jury, insist that there is no evidence showing any liability on the part of either Edith Luciani or Sal Carlo, and criticize the instructions given by the trial judge.

[2] The attack on the subject of special damages is based upon the theory that the father, being legally liable to furnish his son with necessary medical attendance, no obligation attached to the son for these expenses and he was not, therefore, entitled to recover for the outlay in this action. It is also argued that if any recovery could be had for the medical attendance furnished to the son, it must be on the suit of the father alone. In support of their position the appellants cite sections 35, 36, 37, and 207 of the Civil Code, and from these argue that a minor living with his parents is incapable of entering into a contract even for medical services. No authorities are cited in support of the position taken by the appellants, and from our reading of the sections we are satisfied that the Civil Code did not intend to place such limitations on the power of a minor. We can see no reason to hold that merely because these sections of the Code prohibit a minor from disaffirming a contract for necessities when not living under the care of parent or guardian that he is thereby disabled from entering into a valid, though voidable, contract for such necessities while living under the care of a parent or guardian. On the other hand, section 207 indicates an intention contrary to that suggested by the appellants, because if a third person may, under that section, supply such necessities, and recover the reasonable value thereof from the parent, it is because the minor is legally qualified to contract for such necessities with the third person. Therefore, without being cited to any authorities which support the propositions, we are not prepared to hold that a minor may not make such a contract while living under the care of his parent or guardian. If the contract for such necessities on the part of the minor is valid the fact that the obligation has been met by advancements on the part of the parent prior to the trial of the case is no defense to the recovery of special damages arising out of the appellants' negligence. Kimball v. Northern Elec. Co., etc., 159 Cal. 225, 231, 113 P. 156.

[3-6] The second point raised by appellants is that there is no evidence in the record showing any liability on the part of Edith Luciani or Sal Carlo. In support of their position on this appeal the appellants have printed in their brief short extracts from the testimony on the matter of the ownership of the car, and to the question whether or not the boy was on an errand for the partnership. This testimony is followed by appellants' statements that they have quoted all the testimony covering the subject, and we are led to believe that no other testimony was received touching the matter of the liability of the appellants Luciani and Carlo. A brief examination of the transcript discloses that a great deal of testimony, not printed by the appellants, was offered and received upon this issue. It appears that Carlo and Luciani were partners conducting the resort; that the automobile had been originally purchased by Luciani and was used generally by the partnership in the conduct of its business; and that at the time of the accident the boy was actually engaged in an errand for the partnership at the specific direction of appellant Carlo. The failure of the appellants to print this evidence in their brief, so that it might be examined by the court on this appeal, is sufficient in itself to warrant an affirmance upon that ground. Estate of Berry (Cal. Sup.) 233 P. 330. But, even so, the jury having found against all three appellants, we must take the evidence in the light most favorable to the respondent (Palladine v. Imperial Farm Lands Ass'n, 65 Cal. App. 727, 225 P. 291, 294), and though there is a direct denial on the part of the appellant Carlo that the boy was engaged on the errand mentioned, there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury that at the time of the accident he was engaged in the business of the partnership. The liability of the appellants Luciani and Carlo for the negligence of their agent rests upon the general rule of liability of principal and agent where a principal allows his agent to combine his own business with that of the principal or to attend to both at substantially the same time. Brimberry v. Dudfield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 454, 462, 191 P. 894.

[7, 8] The appellants make the general statement that "there is hardly an instruction which is not subject to criticism." Specific reference is made to some of the instructions give on request of respondent, and these are discussed by number. The record before us does not number these instructions as referred to in appellants' brief. No citation of authority is needed to the point that these instructions must be read as a whole and that each instruction need not be complete in itself. Thus, where the expression "through the negligence of the defendants" is used it is not necessary to repeat in every paragraph of the instructions that such negligence must be "the proximate cause of the injury sustained." We find no error in the use of the expression "and/or" in reference to the liability of the appellants Luciani and Carlo on the theory that Sosso was the agent of both or of either one of these appellants. The facts were clearly before the jury showing that Sosso alone was operating the automobile at the time of the accident; there was no conflict over the theory upon which the claim of negligence of the other appellants was based; and the jury could not have been misled by these instructions.

[9] Appellants criticize the portion of the instructions which informed the jury that an inference of agency might arise from the fact that the owner of an automobile permits another to drive it, unless it was shown by the owner that the driver of the car was not his agent. We are satisfied that the instruction is not, generally speaking, good law, but when viewed in the light of the facts of this case we cannot say that it was prejudicial. The undisputed facts were that the auto had been used in the business conducted by Luciani and Carlo, and that it was owned by one or both of them. Being an instrument of the business of the partnership and not merely a pleasure car, facts may have appeared which would have justified an inference of agency from the use of the partnership car. Positive evidence was offered showing that the boy was engaged in the business of the partnership when delivering a guest to another resort, and that he had been directed to return with bread for the partnership. The jury could draw its inferences from these facts without instructions, and was not required to make the fine distinction between the period of agency and the period when the boy was engaged in his own pleasure. Brimberry v. Dudfield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 454, 462, 191 P. 894.

Reading them as a whole, we are satisfied that the appellants were not prejudiced by the instructions given, and that there was no error in the refusal to give those designated.

Judgment affirmed.

ADAMS-CAMPBELL CO. v. JONES et al.
(Civ. 4222.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1925.)

1. Trial ⚡404(2)—Court's finding held a conclusion of law and not to support judgment denying defendants relief on counterclaim.

In suit to recover contract price of razor-stropping machines, in which defendants counterclaimed for damages for breach of contract, finding that "plaintiff owes defendants no further sums," held a conclusion of law, though stated as a finding of fact, and cannot be considered a supporting judgment denying defendants relief.

2. Trial ⚡404(2)—Finding held a conclusion of law and not to support judgment denying defendants relief on counterclaim.

In suit to recover contract price of razor-stropping machines, in which defendant counterclaimed for damages for breach of contract, finding that "defendants were not entitled to payment of $2,000 from plaintiff," held a conclusion of law, and cannot be considered as finding of fact, supporting judgment denying defendants relief on their counterclaim.

3. Trial ⚡404(2)—Findings must be construed to support judgment, but rejection of specific facts found by court and acceptance of conclusions of law, not permitted.

While findings must be construed, if possible, so as to support judgment, rejection of specific facts found by court, and acceptance of mere conclusions of law in direct conflict with such facts to sustain judgment, is not permitted.

4. Sales ⚡347(6)—Unnecessary for defendants, counterclaiming for damages for breach of contract, to prove a rescission of contract.

In suit to recover contract price of razor-stropping machines, in which defendants counterclaimed for damages for breach of contract, defendants were not required to allege or prove a rescission of the contract.

5. Sales ⚡365 — Findings in suit to recover contract price of razor-stropping machines construed.

In suit to recover contract price of razor-stropping machines manufactured by plaintiff, findings construed to mean that defect in machines manufactured was not due to any imperfect dies furnished by defendants, but was caused by improper substitution by plaintiff of brass instead of steel in manufacture of certain parts thereof as provided by contract.

6. Sales ⚡391(7)—Purchasers held entitled to recover payments made on contract for manufacture of razor-stropping machines.

Purchasers held entitled to recover payments made on contract for manufacture of razor-stropping machines, where contract called for machines to be made in accordance with knocked-down model furnished by purchasers, and manufacturer wholly failed to manufacture such machines in accordance with contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by the Adams-Campbell Company against H. R. Jones and another, individually and as copartners doing business as the Mitchell Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and against defendants on their counterclaim, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Lloyd Wright, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Pierce, Critchlow & Barrette and Benj. M. Stansbury, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff and defendants entered into a written contract on the 17th day of March, 1920, whereby plaintiff agreed to furnish the material and manufacture for the defendants 5,000 razor-stropping machines at the price of 77 cents each, or $3,850 for the whole number. Said machines were to be made in accordance with the model furnished plaintiff by defendants, and were to be paid for, one-fourth of the purchase price at the date of the agreement, one-fourth thereof when plaintiff had the material for the manufacture of said machines in its shop, and had actually commenced work on their manufacture, and the balance of the purchase price to be paid pro rata on the delivery of the machines. Upon the signing of the contract, defendants paid to plaintiff the sum of $1,000, which amount was slightly in excess of the first payment called for in the agreement. On June 11th following, upon the statement of plaintiff that it had on hand in its shop the materials for the machines and had actually begun work upon their manufacture, defendants paid to plaintiff a further sum of $1,000 as the second payment under said agreement. At various times thereafter and beginning about July 1, 1920, the plaintiff delivered to defendants a number of said machines as manufactured by it, and in each case the machines were entirely unsatisfactory and not in accordance with the written contract between the parties, and were not fit for sharpening razors or razor blades. On each of said occasions defendants returned said machines to plaintiff, and called the attention of plaintiff to the defects therein, and on each of said occasions plaintiff admitted that said machines were not properly made and did not meet the requirements of said contract, and promised and represented to defendants that it would produce and manufacture perfect machines. However, plaintiff never did deliver to the defendants any machines that met the requirements of said contract. None of the machines manufactured by plaintiff under said contract for the defendants, was efficient or fit for the purpose or work for which they were intended, and all of said machines so manufactured were useless. On about September 15, 1920, plaintiff verbally offered to deliver to defendants 5,000 machines, but plaintiff was not then, nor at any other time, able to tender, nor did it tender, said 5,000 machines or any substantial number of machines which met the requirements of the contract under which they were to be manufactured and delivered.

The court found all the above facts to be true, and also that defendants demanded payment of said sum of $2,000, but that plaintiff failed and refused to pay the same or any part thereof. It further appears that upon defendants' refusal to accept the machines which plaintiff attempted to tender them, plaintiff instituted this action to recover of defendants the contract price of said 5,000 machines, less the sum of $2,000 paid thereon. The defendants in said action filed an answer denying certain allegations of the complaint, and also filed a counterclaim setting forth in effect all the above-stated facts, which the court found to be true. The court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $120.26 for certain articles not connected with the above-mentioned contract, but denied any recovery in favor of plaintiff on said contract, and also denied defendants' right to recover from plaintiff the $2,000 paid plaintiff on said contract. From this judgment defendants appeal on the judgment roll, and contend that, upon the facts found by the court, they are entitled to judgment against plaintiff for the amount paid by them on the contract, to wit, said sum of $2,000.

[1-3] In defense of the judgment respondent calls our attention to the fact that in addition to the facts above stated there is a finding as follows:

"It is true that by reason of the nonpayment of said sums and in accordance with the foregoing findings, the plaintiff owes defendants the sum of $223 for springs, the sum of $32.48 for the name plate, and $250 for the dies, but plaintiff owes defendants no further sums."

Upon this appeal we are not concerned with the three items of $223, $32.48, and $250 mentioned in the foregoing finding, but only with the following portion thereof: "But plaintiff owes defendants no further sums." It is contended by respondent that this is a finding of fact, and that the same supports the judgment denying any relief to defendants. If the specific facts found by the court entitle appellants to a judgment in their favor, the further so-called finding that "plaintiff owes defendants no further sums" would not justify the court in refusing such a judgment. This was not a finding of fact at all, but in view of the other facts found, was a mere conclusion of law, although stated as a finding of fact. Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125. It could not, therefore, in any sense be relied upon to support the judgment. The court also found as a conclusion of law that "defendants are not entitled to payment of the $2,000 from plaintiff." Respondent claims that this is a finding of fact although "the court inadvertently called it a conclusion of law." We agree with the trial court in designating this as a conclusion of law. As such, like the other conclusion of law we have already discussed it cannot be considered in determining whether the judgment is supported by the findings. It is true that the rule is well established that findings must be construed if possible so as to support the judgment but this rule does not go to the extent of permitting the rejection of specific facts found by the court and the acceptance of mere conclusions of law in direct conflict with these facts in order to sustain the judgment.

[4] Respondent further argues that the judgment denying any recovery to appellants, in so far as said sum of $2,000 is concerned, must stand, for the reason that there is no finding that appellants ever rescinded the contract. There is no merit in this contention for the reason that the counterclaim of appellants was not based upon any rescission of the contract. On the other hand, it stated a cause of action for damages for breach of the contract. Upon the breach of the contract by respondent, appellants had the election of at least two remedies. They could rescind the contract and sue for the money paid thereon, or they could sue for damages for breach of the contract. They pursued the latter remedy and it was not necessary for them in such an action to allege or prove a rescission of the contract.

The contract contains a provision that the appellants were "to furnish all the dies necessary for the manufacture of the above (machines), which dies we (respondent) are to keep in repair at your expense." The court found:

"That after the execution of said contract difficulty arose in securing materials, and plaintiff contended it could not procure steel for the side or end plates of the razor-stropping machines and a portion of the razor-holding unit; that thereupon plaintiff represented to defendants that hard brass was as efficient and suitable as steel for said parts of said razor-stropping machines, whereupon the defendants disclaimed any knowledge of the suitability of brass for said parts, and stated to plaintiff they did not have any knowledge whatever as to the quality or properties of such brass, or as to whether it would do as well or better than steel; that thereupon plaintiff substituted half hard brass for steel. * * *

"That the dies so furnished by defendants to plaintiff for the manufacture of said razor-stropping machines had been previously used in the manufacture of a considerable number of said machines, which said machines were in all respects successful in their operation, although there was a slight mathematical variation in a few of the dies. The court finds that none of the razor-stropping machines manufactured by plaintiff under said contract for defendants were efficient or fit for the purpose or work for which they were intended, only about 25 per cent of them worked at all even to start with, and those that did work became out of alignment and useless in a very short time. The court further finds that all of said razor-stropping machines were useless, some to start with, because they were not made in proper alignment, the others, in cases where they were made in proper alignment, became useless and worthless after a short use, due to the fact that plaintiff substituted half hard brass for steel in the side or end plates of the razor-stropping machines it undertook to manufacture under the contract; that the brass plaintiff used for said side plates was not sufficiently rigid to withstand the use and work for which the machines were intended; that said brass was too soft, or so soft that the places where it was joined together to other parts of the machines developed play upon use, thus causing the machines to become out of alignment upon use so that a razor could not be sharpened uniformly or smoothly throughout the length of its blade."

[5] It is now contended by respondent in support of the judgment that the findings of the court indicate that the imperfections in the dies were partly responsible for the improper alignment in the machines manufactured by respondent. We do not so construe the findings. While the court found that there was a "slight mathematical variation in a few of the dies," it does not find that this defect in the dies was responsible for the imperfect machines. The court, however, does find that all of the machines manufactured by the respondent were useless.

"Some to start with, because they were not made in proper alignment; the others, in cases where they were made in proper alignment, became useless and worthless after a short use, due to the fact that plaintiff substituted half hard brass for steel in the side or end plates of the razor-stropping machines it undertook to manufacture under the contract."

It is apparent from these findings that the imperfection in the machines manufactured was due not so much to any variation in the dies furnished by appellants, as it was to the substitution by respondent of brass for steel in the sides or end plates of the machines. Even if we assume that the cause of the defective alignment in those machines which were useless "to start with" was due to the imperfection in the dies furnished by appellants, an assumption not warranted by the findings however, yet it also appears from the findings that in the manufacture of all the machines made by respondent, the latter used brass instead of steel and that machines so made soon became out of alignment, because the rigidity of the brass was not sufficient to withstand the use and work for which the machines were intended. The only conclusion therefore that can be drawn from these findings is that had all the machines when manufactured been in proper alignment, they would by the use for which they were intended soon have become out of alignment on account of the defective material used by respondent in their manufacture. As we construe the findings therefore the defect in the machines manufactured was not due to any imperfect dies furnished by appellants, but was caused by the improper substitution by respondent of brass instead of steel in the manufacture of certain parts thereof as provided by the contract.

[6] Finally, respondent contends that, as the machines were manufactured according to specifications or instructions furnished by appellants, there was no implied warranty that they would answer the particular purpose for which appellants intended to use them. In support of this proposition respondent cites the following authorities: Bancroft v. San Francisco Tool Co., 120 Cal. 228, 52 P. 496; Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 40, 91 P. 983; Stevens v. Parkford, 48 Cal. App. 131, 191 P. 699. There is no question of the soundness of the legal principle advanced by respondent and supported by these authorities, but we do not think that this principle has any application to the case before us. According to the contract between the parties to the action the machines, which respondent agreed to manufacture for appellants were to be made in accordance with the knocked-down model furnished by appellants. This model as we understand the findings, called for the use of steel in the manufacture of certain parts of the machines. Had respondent, in the manufacture of the machines, complied with all the terms of the contract, including that providing for the use of steel in those parts as shown by the model, then it would not have been responsible to appellant had the machines failed to properly do the work for which they were intended by appellants. For in such a case appellants would have received precisely what they contracted for, and there would have been no warranty, express or implied, on respondent's part that the machines would answer the particular purpose for which appellants intended to use them. The above cases cited by respondent amply support this proposition, but the trouble with respondent's position is that the findings of the court show that it failed to manufacture the machines as called for by its contract with appellants. The right to recover on their counterclaim was not based by appellants on any warranty that the machines, if properly made, would be fit for the purpose intended, but upon respondent's total failure to manufacture the machines in accordance with the terms of the contract. The court found in appellants' favor upon this issue, and very properly, we think, held that respondent was not entitled to recover the balance unpaid on the contract. We think, however, that the court should have gone farther and rendered judgment upon these findings in favor of appellants for the repayment of the amounts paid by them on the contract.

Judgment is reversed with direction to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of appellants for the sum of $2,000, together with legal interest on $1,000 of said sum from March 18, 1920, and on $1,000 of said sum from June 11, 1920, less the sum of $47.86, being the difference between the said sum of $120.26 found by said court to be due respondent from appellants, and defendants' costs as taxed by the trial court.

Where a husband's conveyance to wife of lots, as to which a mortgagee released his mortgage lien, was void within Civ. Code, § 3442, as having been made during husband's insolvency, without a valuable consideration, fact that, if the mortgagee had not released its lien, judgment creditor could not have secured a satisfaction of its judgment because the husband owned no other property, held not to affect the fraudulent character of the conveyance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Suit by Hanscome-James-Winship, a corporation, against D. N. Ainger and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Atran & Sheets, of Colusa, for appellants.
Hudson Grant and A. G. Bailey, both of Woodland, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action by the plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of the defendant D. N. Ainger, to secure a decree setting aside a deed from the said D. N. Ainger to his wife, Mary Ainger, on the ground that said conveyance was fraudulent as to the plaintiff.

Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal therefrom.

In their brief counsel for the plaintiff state that "the facts of the case are substantially as set forth in appellants' brief." In view of this statement, in setting out the facts herein we will appropriate in part the statement thereof in the opening brief of the appellants:

"On April 5, 1920, the defendant D. N. Ainger became indebted to the plaintiff in the approximate sum of $6,000, and on December 2, 1920, $3,000 thereof being in default, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant D. N. Ainger, and on the 5th day of April, 1922, recovered judgment in the sum of $3,000, interest, and costs in that action.

"On January 3, 1922, and for a long time prior thereto, the defendant D. N. Ainger was and had been the legal owner of lots 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72 of a subdivision of blocks 33, 34, and 35 of Ashley's subdivision of the Grimes Ranch, situated in Colusa county, and hereinafter referred to as the 'lots.'

"While such owner of the lots, and on the 7th day of August, 1920, the defendants made and executed, in favor of the First Savings Bank of Colusa, a real estate mortgage upon the lots and other real estate to secure their note in the sum of $5,000, and which mortgage was recorded on the 9th day of August, 1920, in Volume 53 of Mortgages, at page 29, Records of Colusa County. Ainger, during all of the time concerned with this action, was engaged in large farming operations and especially in the rice business. On January 3, 1922, D. N. Ainger was loaned up to the legal limit with the First Savings Bank, which was a coordinate institution operated jointly with the First National Bank. On that day for the purpose of giving to D. N. Ainger additional funds to carry on his farming operations, it was agreed between D. N. Ainger, Mary Ainger, the First Savings Bank, and the First National Bank, that the First Savings Bank should release the lots from the terms of its mortgage. In furtherance of this agreement and on January 3, 1922, the First Savings Bank executed a satisfaction of its mortgage for $5,000 on the lots, and at the same time the defendant D. N. Ainger deeded the lots to his wife, the defendant Mary Ainger. This deed states the consideration to be 'love and affection which the first party has and bears toward the second party. * * *'

"Thereafter, and on January 10, 1922, in conformity with this arrangement for loaning against the lots, Mary Ainger gave her promissory note in the sum of $300, dated on that day, to the First National Bank of Colusa, which note was the first of a series of notes, which aggregated $1,082.17, and the last of which was given by Mary Ainger on the 26th day of June, 1922. The $300 received for the first note by Mary Ainger and the entire sum of $1,082.17 received from the bank under this transaction was placed to the credit of the defendant Ainger and used by him in his farming operations, and constituted 'full value for the property.' At the time these loans were being made, and at all of the times afterwards, the defendant D. N. Ainger had property not sufficient to cover his liabilities and was insolvent.

"On the 28th day of April, 1922, an execution issued to satisfy the $3,000 judgment previously described was returned by the sheriff unsatisfied because of his inability to find any property belonging to the defendant D. N. Ainger. On July 26, 1922, after having received an extension of credit as stated by the series of notes in the sum of $1,082.17 the defendant Mary Ainger gave to the First National Bank of Colusa her mortgage on the lots, dated on that day to secure that sum, which mortgage was recorded on the 28th day of July, in volume 53 of Mortgages, at page 74, Records of Colusa County."

After setting forth the fact of the indebtedness of D. N. Ainger to plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, the bringing of an action by plaintiff to recover said sum and accrued interest from said Ainger, the securing of judgment by plaintiff against said Ainger for said principal debt and interest, the issuance of a writ of execution on said judgment, the placing of said writ in the hands of the sheriff, and the return of that officer of said execution wholly unsatisfied, the complaint avers, in paragraph 4 thereof:

"That on or about the 3d day of January, 1922, and while said D. N. Ainger was insolvent, and so indebted to plaintiff, as aforesaid, he, said D. N. Ainger, without any consideration, and with the intent and purpose to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, made, executed, and delivered to his said wife, Mary Ainger, a deed of conveyance to that certain real property situate, lying and being in the county of Colusa, state of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit, (then follows a specific description of the lots). * * *

"That said Mary Ainger at said time, and at all times, well knew that the said D. N. Ainger transferred said property and executed said conveyance to her with the intent and purpose to cheat and defraud his said creditors."

The findings are general and follow the averments of the complaint. The defendants admit that D. N. Ainger, at the time of the conveyance of the "lots" by him to his wife, his codefendant, was insolvent, and that the allegation of the complaint to that effect "may be considered true."

The sole contention of the defendants is that the findings, in so far as they embrace the allegations of paragraph 4 of the complaint, are not supported by the evidence or any evidence adduced at the trial and embodied in the record on this appeal. In other terms, the contention is that there is no evidence which supports the finding that the conveyance of the real property concerned herein by D. N. Ainger to his wife was made with the intent and purpose to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the grantor, and that the evidence without conflict shows that there was a valuable consideration for the transfer.

The allegations of the complaint are sufficiently scopeful to cover cases of fraudulent conveyances of property provided by both section 3439 and section 3442 of the Civil Code. The first-named section provides:

"Every transfer of property or charge thereon made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken, with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors in interest, and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor."

So much of section 3442 of said code as is apposite to the present inquiry reads:

"Any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

[1, 2] To make out a case under section 3439 it is necessary that it be affirmatively shown by sufficient evidence that the transfer was made by the transferor with the intent to delay or defraud his creditors or other persons owning and holding demands against him. Atkinson v. Western Development Syndicate, 170 Cal. 503, 506, 150 P. 360. Proof that D. N. Ainger did convey the "lots" to his wife with the intent to delay and defraud his creditors would respond to the allegations of paragraph 4 of the complaint that such was his purpose and intent in making the conveyance. On the other hand, if as said paragraph of the complaint also avers, the conveyance was made by D. N. Ainger voluntarily or without a valuable consideration, while said Ainger was insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, his "intent * * * is immaterial, and the transfer, regardless of the actual intent, is void as to his creditors." Atkinson v. Western Development Syndicate, supra; Benson v. Harriman, 55 Cal. App. 483, 486, 204 P. 255.

[3-5] The insolvency of D. N. Ainger at the time he made the transfer to his wife is expressly admitted by the appellants, and the expressed consideration for the transfer is "love and affection," which, while a good, is not a valuable consideration. Upon this showing the presumption arose that the conveyance was fraudulent as against the creditors of the grantor. Civil Code, § 3442; Benson v. Harriman, 55 Cal. App. 483, 204 P. 259; Borgfeldt v. Curry, 25 Cal. App. 624, 144 P. 976; Southwick v. Moore, 61 Cal. App. 585, 215 P. 704; R. C. L. 476 et seq. Hence the burden was cast upon defendants to prove that the deed of conveyance was supported by a valuable consideration. Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 54 Cal. App. 691, 202 P. 929; Com. Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 49 Cal. App. 764, 769, 194 P. 751; Ross v. Wellman, 102 Cal. 2, 36 P. 402.

[6, 7] The real question presented here for decision is whether the defendants sustained that burden, and as to this proposition the defendants contend that the receipt by D. N. Ainger for his own use of the money borrowed from the bank by his wife on the "lots" constituted a valuable consideration for the conveyance of the "lots" by said Ainger to his wife. We are unable to assent to that proposition. The sole purpose of the conveyance, as all the parties testified was true, was merely to enable the defendant D. N. Ainger to secure additional loans on his own or the community property, if such it was. The grantee herself, in the transaction, parted with nothing of value. She merely acted as the conduit through which D. N. Ainger might himself obtain loans on his own property or that of the community. In other terms, according to the admissions of the defendants, she merely acted as his agent or trustee, and as such was vested by him with the legal title to the "lots" for the purpose of negotiating for her grantor and for his benefit loans of money on the property granted. If D. N. Ainger had voluntarily conveyed the property in question to his wife or to any other person with a secret understanding or reservation that the grantee should sell the property so conveyed and thereupon turn over to the grantor the full amount of the purchase price, it would hardly be contended that the money thus received by the grantor constituted the consideration to him from his grantee for the conveyance. The case here cannot be differentiated from the supposititious case. Both cases involve nothing more nor less than conveyances with secret reservations for the benefit of the grantor, and such transfers of property cannot be upheld as against the rights of the creditors of the grantor. See 12 R. C. L. p. 545 et seq.; 27 C. J. p. 606, par. 355; Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 509, 24 P. 286; Salisbury v. Burr, 114 Cal. 451, 454, 46 P. 270; McKey v. Cochran, 262 Ill. 376, 104 N. E. 693; Adams v. Dempsey, 35 Wash. 80, 76 P. 538, 539.

[8] But much importance seems to be attached by the defendants to the fact that the evidence indisputably shows, as they contend, that the motive in the transaction, rather than involving any purpose or intent in them thereby to defraud the creditors of D. N. Ainger, was to enable him to proceed with his farming operations so that, if successful therein, he would be able to realize from his crops sufficient financial means with which to satisfy the obligations and demands held against him by his creditors, at least in part if not in whole. Granting that such was the motive prompting the transaction, still that consideration is one which is of no materiality in a case falling within the category of fraudulent conveyances to which the instant case belongs, nor, except in so far as it might have relation to the intent with which a conveyance may be made by a debtor, would the motive therefor be a material consideration in any case of an alleged fraudulent conveyance of property. The character of the transaction must be judged or determined by the intent with which the conveyance is made in those cases in which the intent of the parties to the conveyance is a material element to be considered. In this case, however, as in all cases where it is made to appear that the conveyance is not supported by a valuable consideration, and is made while the grantor or vendor is insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, the transfer, as seen, is fraudulent per se as against the existing creditors of the grantor or vendor, and in such cases neither the intent nor the motive with which the transfer might have been made is material or of any consequence. In other words, as by the very terms of the statute itself a conveyance of property voluntarily made, while the grantor or vendor is insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, is absolutely void as against the creditors of the grantor or vendor, any attempt by such grantor or vendor to sustain the legality of the transfer on the ground that it was made with good motives or an honest intent will not be listened to by a court in a suit by the creditors of the grantor or vendor to nullify and set aside the conveyance.

[9] The fact, as is intimated in the briefs, that, if the "lots" had remained subject to the mortgage from the lien of which they were released by the Savings Bank, the plaintiff could not have secured satisfaction of its judgment, either in whole or in part, because D. N. Ainger then owned no other property than that covered by said mortgage, is obviously of no importance here in view of the theory upon which we have deemed it sufficient to consider this appeal for the purposes of the determination thereof. If the case made by the pleadings and the proof were one in which the intent of the grantor was an essential element, and which intent it would be necessary to prove to vitiate the force of the conveyance—that is, a conveyance supported by a valuable consideration, or the grantor was not at the time of making the conveyance insolvent, or made so by the act of making the conveyance or in contemplation of insolvency—then the fact referred to, as it well may be conceived, would be relevant and important as tending to show that the conveyance was not made with the intent to defraud the creditors of the grantor.

There is no question here as to the rights of innocent incumbrancers. The First National Bank of Colusa, from which the loans on the "lots" were obtained, is not a party to this action, and hence, assuming that it was an innocent mortgagee of the premises in question, it is not here to assert any rights which it might have thus acquired in the property as a result of the transaction giving rise to this action. It is, therefore, not necessary to consider (the president of the said Bank having testified that he suggested and that both banks consented to the plan adopted by the defendants to secure further loans to be used in further prosecuting their farming operations) whether the First National Bank was less culpable, constructively, or as a matter of law, in the inauguration and consummation of the transaction eventuating in the execution of the deed in dispute than were the defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

BISCONER v. BILLING et al. (Civ. 2863.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 23, 1925.)

1. Estoppel ⇨54—Estoppel in pais does not apply to party who does not know full truth of facts to which conduct or declarations relate.

There can be no estoppel in pais against party who does not know full truth of facts to which his conduct, declarations, or representations constituting basis of alleged estoppel relate.

2. Replevin ⇨134—Finding that plaintiff took possession of property taken from him in replevin action not sustained by evidence.

In action on replevin bond, where tractor replevied had been attached, sold, and plaintiff had assisted purchaser in securing it, finding that plaintiff took possession and assumed control over it so as to estop his action against sureties, held not sustained, in absence of any evidence tending to show he knew tractor he was handling was same as that taken from him in replevin action.

3. Replevin ⇨46—Article replevied not subject to process.

Property acquired by a plaintiff in replevin action was in custodia legis as much as when in possession of sheriff by virtue of writ, and was not subject to process.

4. Attachment ⇨64—Deprivation of possession under writ of attachment was wrongful trespass.

Attachment of property, acquired in action of claim and delivery, accompanied by affidavit required by Code Civ. Proc. § 510, and which had not been finally determined, constituted wrongful dispossession and a trespass which should have been resisted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Raymond Bisconer against F. T. Billing and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for appellant. Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants as sureties on an undertaking executed by them in an action in replevin, in which one J. Tolosano was plaintiff, and the plaintiff herein was defendant.

On the 1st day of March, 1921, said J. Tolosano brought an action in claim and delivery against Raymond Bisconer, the plaintiff herein, for the purpose of recovering the possession of a 25-Sampson sieve grip tractor and a No. 4 12-inch disc plow—said Tolosano claiming and alleging in his complaint that he was the owner of said property, and that it was of the value of $2,000; that in said action of claim and delivery or replevin said Tolosano filed the affidavit required by section 510 of the Code of Civil Procedure, setting forth all the facts required by said section to be contained therein, and also a notice and demand upon the sheriff of the county of Tulare to take from said Raymond Bisconer, defendant in said action, the property above described; that, at the same time, said Tolosano executed an undertaking, with F. T. Billing and C. M. Meador, defendants herein, as sureties, in the sum of $4,000, conditioned for the return of said property or the payment of its value, to said Bisconer in case it cannot be returned, if a return thereof to Bisconer be adjudged in said action; that said sheriff, in pursuance of said demand, took from said Bisconer said property, and, after retaining possession of the same for 5 days, no demand by Bisconer that possession of said property be restored to him within that time having been made, the sheriff turned the tractor over to the plaintiff, who thereupon took it to the "Meador ranch," where Tolosano then resided; that, in the month of December, 1921, the action in claim and delivery was tried, and on the 20th day of February, 1922, the court rendered judgment in favor of Bisconer, the defendant therein and plaintiff herein, for the return to him of said tractor and plow, or, in case said property was not returned, for the sum of $2,000, the value thereof. These facts are, with greater amplification, of course, alleged in the complaint herein, and are admitted by the answer, but the defendants, as in avoidance of the legal effect thereof, set up a special defense by way of a plea in estoppel, as follows:

"* * * That defendants are informed and believe and therefore allege the fact to be that, during the pendency of the action in replevin, mentioned and alleged in said complaint, and before the entry of judgment therein in favor of the plaintiff and against these defendants, as alleged in said complaint, the said plaintiff, Raymond Bisconer, took possession of the personal property mentioned in paragraph 1 of plaintiff's complaint, to wit, the said No. 25 Sampson sieve grip tractor and one No. 4 twelve-inch disc plow, and ever since has retained and does now retain the possession thereof; that, by reason of the taking possession of said property by plaintiff as aforesaid, the defendants have been relieved of the obligation of returning said property as provided in the undertaking mentioned and referred to in plaintiff's complaint; and that by reason of such taking possession by plaintiff the obligation of said undertaking has been fully discharged."

In response to the special defense or the plea in estoppel so set up, the defendants brought out these facts: That subsequent to the time at which the tractor concerned here was delivered by the sheriff to the possession of Tolosano, and prior to the trial of and the rendition of judgment in the claim and delivery action, one Harry Crowe, through his attorney, J. W. Wright, who was also attorney for Tolosano in the action in replevin against the plaintiff herein, brought an action against Tolosano, and in said action caused a writ of attachment to issue and the same to be levied on said tractor, which was thereupon stored by the sheriff in the warehouse of the Crowe Hardware Company at Tulare; that a short time thereafter said attorney, J. W. Wright, brought in his own behalf an action against Tolosano, and obtained judgment therein and caused execution to be issued thereon and levied on the tractor in dispute; that, at the sale of the tractor under the said writ of execution, said J. W. Wright, first satisfying the judgment in the attachment suit of said Harry Crowe against Tolosano, bought the tractor; that subsequently Wright sold the tractor to one Hugh Pennybaker and gave the latter a bill of sale therefor; that before, but on the day the sale of the tractor was completed, Bisconer, at Pennybaker's request, examined the machine to ascertain whether it was in good condition, and, after the sale was effected, assisted Pennybaker in the removal thereof to the latter's ranch. As to this circumstance, plaintiff herein testified that in the month of October, 1921, while Pennybaker was negotiating with Wright for the purchase of the tractor, he, at the request of the former, went to the Crowe warehouse, where the tractor was then stored, to "look over the tractor and examine it as to its condition; that Mr. Pennybaker bought the tractor that day," paying Wright the sum of $500 therefor; that Pennybaker then requested plaintiff, Bisconer, to employ some one for him to move the machine to his (Pennybaker's) farm at Exeter; that Pennybaker gave him (plaintiff herein) $20 to pay the party employed by him for that purpose; that he employed one Al Bearce "to haul it, and saw to the loading of it, and paid Al Bearce the $20 given me by Pennybaker for that purpose." This testimony by plaintiff was corroborated by Pennybaker. Plaintiff further testified that he bought the tractor at an auction sale conducted by one Pete Robinson, and had it in his possession but a few days when it was taken possession of by the sheriff in the replevin suit brought against him by Tolosano; that he had never used it; that, when he examined the tractor at the Crowe warehouse at the request of Pennybaker, it was covered with dirt; that he had not seen it from about the 10th day of March, 1921, until he saw it at the Crowe warehouse in October, 1921; that he did not recognize the tractor at the Crowe warehouse on the last-named date as the one which he had purchased at the auction sale; that, inasmuch as the claim and delivery suit had not then been tried, he supposed or assumed that the tractor so purchased by him, and which was taken from his possession by the sheriff under the writ of replevin issued in said action, was still in the possession of Tolosano, to whom, as seen, the possession thereof was delivered by the sheriff; that no one had ever informed him that the tractor on sale at the Crowe warehouse, and which Pennybaker bought, was the tractor, the right to the possession of which was still bound up in the then untried action of claim and delivery by Tolosano against him.

There was received at the trial other testimony than that above referred to, but it was directed only to the identification of the tractor sold by Wright to Pennybaker as the tractor involved in this dispute, as to which, however, there is no serious, if any, controversy between the parties hereto.

Upon the special defense the court found as follows:

"That it is true that during the pendency of the action mentioned and alleged in plaintiff's complaint herein, and before the entry of judgment therein, the plaintiff in this action, Raymond Bisconer, took possession and assumed control of the Sampson sieve grip tractor mentioned and described in plaintiff's complaint, for the purpose of effecting a sale and delivery thereof, and did, while so having possession and control of said tractor, assist and co-operate in effecting a sale and delivery thereof, to one Hugh Pennybaker."

The theory of the decision of the trial court, as is readily to be seen, is in accord with that of the special plea in bar set up by the defendants, to wit: That Bisconer was a party to the transaction resulting in the sale of the tractor by Wright to Pennybaker, and assisted in delivering it to the possession of the latter; that, being a party to the act of removing the tractor from the possession of Tolosano, so that it was placed beyond the power of the latter to comply with the terms of his undertaking in the claim and delivery action requiring a return of the tractor to Bisconer in case judgment passed in said action in his favor, he (Bisconer) is estopped from maintaining the present action against the sureties on Tolosano's undertaking.

[1, 2] Assuming that the findings support the judgment, as to which there is serious doubt, it is clear that the evidence does not support said findings. It is a general rule, within which the case here obviously falls, that there can be no estoppel in pais where the party against whom the attempt is made to invoke such estoppel does not know the full truth of the facts to which his conduct, declarations, or representations constituting the basis of the alleged estoppel relate. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 632, § 17; Eaton v. Wilkins, 163 Cal. 742, 127 P. 71; Puterbaugh v. Wadham, 162 Cal. 611, 123 P. 804; Bashore v. Parker, 146 Cal. 525, 80 P. 707; Davis v. Blaney, 107 Cal. 291, 40 P. 428.

There is not a particle of evidence to be found in the record before us showing or tending to show that, when he examined the tractor for Pennybaker before the latter completed the negotiations with Wright for the purchase thereof, or later, when he assisted in the removal of the tractor to Pennybaker's ranch, Bisconer recognized the machine as the one which had been taken from his possession by the sheriff under the writ of replevin, and by that officer delivered into the possession of Tolosano, or knew that it was the same tractor. As seen, Bisconer testified that when he examined the tractor for Pennybaker, or when assisting in taking it to the latter's ranch, he did not recognize or identify it as the tractor concerned in the replevin suit. He supposed, he said, that the tractor taken from him by the sheriff was still in the possession of Tolosano. This testimony of Bisconer was not contradicted. One Curtis, a witness for the defendants—a mechanic, and, as he called himself, a "tractor repair man"—testified that, on June 13, 1923, the day on which the trial of this action was begun, he went to the Pennybaker ranch and there inspected the Sampson tractor "that had been purchased by Mr. Pennybaker. Upon examination," he continued, "I found it to be the identical type of tractor that I had seen at the Crowe warehouse in the fall of 1921, and the same type and character of tractor which I repaired 3 years ago on the Tolosano ranch. I observed the number of the tractor, and it was 30x420." Undoubtedly, the purpose of this testimony was to show by inference that the tractor purchased by Pennybaker from Wright could be identified by one familiar with it as the tractor taken from Bisconer under the writ of replevin, and that therefore Bisconer, when inspecting it for Pennybaker, must have recognized it as the tractor involved in the replevin action. But it will be noted that Curtis did not say that the tractor he saw at the Pennybaker ranch was the same tractor he had previously seen at the Crowe warehouse or had worked on at the Tolosano ranch. His statement was that the tractor at Pennybaker's was the "same type and character" of tractor that he had previously seen or had previously done repair work on at the Tolosano ranch. Thus it is to be noted that, if the purpose of Curtis' testimony was such as it is above suggested that it was, it falls far short of reaching the mark. In other words, it does not justify the inference that Bisconer, on examining the tractor for Pennybaker, or when assisting in its removal to the latter's ranch, must have known that the tractor was the one taken from him by the sheriff in the claim and delivery action. To the contrary, the most reasonable view of that testimony is that, since Curtis, himself a mechanic, who had worked on the tractor, could go no further than to say that the tractor he saw at the Pennybaker ranch was of the same type of tractor as the one he had previously worked on at the Tolosano ranch, it is hardly reasonable to assume or infer that Bisconer, who had had possession of the replevied tractor but 4 or 5 days, and had never worked or used it before it was seized by the sheriff in the replevin suit, could have said any more than that upon the question whether the tractor bought by Pennybaker from Wright was the same tractor which the sheriff had taken from him. Unquestionably, it was true then, as doubtless it is true now, that there are many Sampson tractors of the same type and character as the one with which this controversy is concerned. Moreover, Bisconer, as was perhaps true of Curtis, did not inspect or examine the tractor at the time of its sale to Pennybaker, with his mind charged with any thought or supposition that the tractor sold by Wright to Pennybaker was the identical engine that was taken from him by the sheriff in the replevin action. He examined the tractor on the occasion of the sale thereof to Pennybaker with his mind free from any reason or motive for identifying it with the tractor involved in the replevin suit. Curtis, as may well be supposed, examined the Pennybaker tractor with the special view and purpose of giving testimony for the defendants in the present case tending to prove that the tractor sold to Pennybaker was the tractor seized in the replevin suit. At any rate, it is quite manifest, as before declared, that, while Curtis' testimony no doubt tended to show that the Pennybaker tractor was the tractor involved in the claim and delivery action, it did not tend to show that Bisconer so recognized or identified it at the time of his inspection of it for Pennybaker.

The above is decisive of this appeal in favor of the plaintiff herein. But the record here discloses what well may be characterized as an anomalous situation, and it will do no harm to consider whether, instead of Bisconer, Tolosano and his attorney in the action in claim and delivery were not themselves responsible for the loss by Tolosano of the physical possession of the tractor. As shown above, J. W. Wright, according to his own testimony, was the attorney for Tolosano in the claim and delivery action. In that action Tolosano secured possession of the tractor from the sheriff upon the undertaking which is the basis of the present action. Tolosano was at that time residing on the ranch of one Meador, whether the party of that name who became, was, and is one of the sureties on his (Tolosano's) undertaking, the record does not show. Tolosano, so his wife and son testified, upon being given possession of the tractor by the sheriff, took the machine to the ranch of said Meador, where it remained until his (Tolosano's) attorney, J. W. Wright, brought suit against his client (Tolosano) in behalf of Harry Crowe, in which action a writ of attachment was issued and by the sheriff or some other officer legally authorized to execute the writ levied upon the tractor, which was thereupon and thereunder taken possession of by the officer and removed from the Meador ranch to the Crowe warehouse at Tulare. Thereafter said J. W. Wright, for and in behalf of himself, brought an action against his client in the replevin suit, J. Tolosano, and therein obtained judgment upon which an execution was issued and levied on the tractor, the same sold under said execution to said J. W. Wright, the judgment creditor in said action; he having satisfied the judgment in favor of Harry Crowe against Tolosano, and so removed the lien of Crowe's attachment on the tractor, if any such lien ever legally attached or could so attach to the tractor under the circumstances then existing as to said property. Thereafter, as seen, Wright sold, or attempted to sell, the tractor to Pennybaker. This proceeding from beginning to end was peculiar to say the least of it.

[3, 4] Although not necessary to the decision of this appeal, as we have above pointed out, nevertheless these considerations may well be suggested as being worthy of thought in the event of a retrial of this case. Tolosano, upon obtaining possession of the tractor from the sheriff, by virtue of his undertaking, acquired the right to the possession thereof and nothing more, and the property, while in his possession under his undertaking, no less than when in the possession of the sheriff by virtue of the writ of replevin, was in custodia legis. The plaintiff's custody was "substituted for the custody of the sheriff. The property is not withdrawn from the custody of the law. In the hands of the claimant, under the bond for its delivery to the sheriff, the property is as free from the reach of other processes as it would have been in the hands of the sheriff." Hagan v. Lucas, 10 Pet. 400, 9 L. Ed. 470; Hunt v. Robinson, 11 Cal. 262, citing Hagan v. Lucas, supra; Riverside Portland Cement Co. v. Taft et al., 192 Cal. 643, 221 P. 357. It was therefore the duty of Tolosano to keep the tractor in his custody and to allow no one to divest him of the possession thereof upon any pretense or pretext whatsoever. This is what his sureties promised and undertook that he would do, so that, if he was cast in the replevin action, the return of the tractor to Bisconer would be forthcoming, or further, if they (the sureties) were compelled to pay the value of the property because of its not being in the same condition in which it was when seized and, for that reason, well grounded, Bisconer refused to retake it, they could be awarded possession thereof as in recoupment, at least, of the money paid by them to Bisconer in satisfaction of the judgment. It follows that, in surrendering his possession of the tractor in response to the exactions of the writ of attachment in the Crowe Case against him, Tolosano, under the circumstances here appearing, was guilty of a flagrant violation of his engagement, not only to Bisconer, but to the sureties on his undertaking, to retain possession of the tractor. Indeed, the deprivation of that possession, even under or by virtue of the writ of attachment, constituted a wrongful dispossession and a trespass, and Tolosano or his sureties, by proper process in the replevin suit, could have retaken the tractor from the officer seizing it under the writ of attachment or from any other person having its possession by virtue of said writ. See cases above cited, and also Rhines v. Phelps, 3 Gilman (8 Ill.) 455; Pipher v. Fordyce, 88 Ind. 436; McKinney v. Purcell, 28 Kan. 446; Acker v. White, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 614; 34 Cyc. p. 1458. Of course, it would be idle to maintain that Tolosano did not know that the tractor had not been taken from him under the writ of attachment. And there is some evidence that his sureties, the defendants herein, had knowledge of the dispossession. Certainly, Tolosano's attorney in the replevin suit, J. W. Wright, not only knew that the tractor had been removed from the possession of Tolosano, but knew that such taking was wrongful and without legal force. It may be that Wright, before instituting actions against Tolosano in which the processes referred to were issued and used as the pretexts for depriving Tolosano of possession of the tractor, might have withdrawn as attorney for the latter in the claim and delivery action. His testimony does not show whether such was the case, nor does the record anywhere show it. But, assuming that he did, the situation is in no sense changed. The wrongfulness or illegality of the act of taking the tractor under the indicated circumstances is not removed from the transaction.

For the reasons first above given, the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

There is no right of appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. Also there is no right of appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment and on the findings enter another and different judgment. Section 663a, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an order of the court granting such motion may be reviewed on appeal. By implication it was intended that there be no appeal where such motion is denied. This is in accordance with the decisions to the same effect, which are based upon the reason that the same questions may with equal effect be reviewed on appeal from the judgment. *Eureka, etc., R. The appeal from the judgment comes before us on the judgment roll alone. The facts as found by the court are as follows: On November 27, 1920, the plaintiff and the defendant Hodge, appellant herein, entered into a contract in writing whereby the plaintiff agreed to buy from said defendant, and the defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff a certain 40-acre tract of land for the agreed sum of $4,500, payable $500 then and $1,500 on January 1, 1921. These moneys were to be placed in escrow with the People's Abstract and Title Company. Hodge was to execute a deed to the plaintiff, and plaintiff was to execute, in favor of Hodge, a note payable $1,000 on January 31, 1922, and $1,500 on January 1, 1924, said note to bear interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the date of giving possession of said property; said deferred payments to be secured by trust deed. It was also provided in the contract as follows:

"Hodge agrees to properly level for alfalfa all of said land, and to deliver same to Andreoli not later than February 1, 1921, clear of all incumbrances."

On January 1, 1921, defendant extended the time for payment of the $1,500 agreed to be paid into escrow on that day, to February 1, 1921. On November 29, 1920, plaintiff paid into escrow said sum of $500, but he paid no further sum, and did not execute said note and trust deed. On December 11, 1920, Hodge executed and deposited in escrow a deed to plaintiff of said property free of incumbrance. On December 26, 1920, defendant started with the work of leveling said property by leveling the same into two fields with lands for irrigation 660 feet in length. Tracts either 660 feet or 1,320 feet are proper length for alfalfa. Plaintiff, after defendant Hodge had started leveling said land, suggested that defendant Hodge level the land in one field "in lands of 1,320 feet in length." To do this required more time and expense, and defendant Hodge so advised plaintiff. Nevertheless at plaintiff's suggestion, defendant Hodge proceeded with the work of so leveling said property in 1,320-foot lengths.

On January 31, 1921, with full knowledge of the then extent of the work yet required to be done to complete the leveling of the property and the condition of the property in that respect at that time, the parties jointly ordered the application and payment to one Sharp of $100 out of the said $500 then on deposit in escrow. Thereafter, on February 16, 1921, without any previous written notice or request that said leveling be completed within any time, plaintiff served written notice on defendant Hodge that plaintiff then withdrew from said contract to purchase said land and rescinded the same, because the said land was not then properly leveled for alfalfa, and because possession of said land was not given. Thereafter, on March 19, 1921, this action was commenced.

On February 1, 1921, said land was not properly leveled for alfalfa. Defendant Hodge, with plaintiff's consent, continued with the leveling of same until February 16th. On said February 16th defendant Hodge was ready, able, and willing to complete the leveling of said land for alfalfa, and was then engaged in the completion and could and would have had the same so completed for alfalfa within from two to three weeks thereafter, "within time for the planting of alfalfa on said land without ordinary material difference in such delay, but with material difference for plaintiff's purposes."

On February 1, 1921, plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to pay into escrow the sum then due and to execute said note and said trust deed, but did not perform any of the things called for by the contract then by him to be performed because of defendant Hodge's failure to perform according to contract, and on February 16, 1921, was unwilling to perform any of the terms of said contract because of the failure of defendant Hodge to properly level said land for alfalfa or to give possession thereof. Defendant Hodge did not continually level said land after commencing work thereon. Said land could have been properly leveled for alfalfa not later than February 1, 1921, had defendant Hodge continually worked thereon. On February 16, 1921, plaintiff demanded of defendant Hodge the return of said $100 so jointly ordered paid from the money in escrow, and the release of the $400 still in escrow, and demanded of said company the return of said balance of $400. Said demand was refused, and said moneys have not been paid. On February 16, 1921, only 20 acres of said 40-acre piece of land was properly leveled for alfalfa.

On the foregoing facts the court determined that the plaintiff was entitled to rescind, and was entitled to recover said sum of $400. Accordingly, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $400 and costs. It is from this judgment that the defendant appeals.

[2] Appellant contends first that the covenant to level the land was an independent covenant, purely incidental to the principal purpose of the sale; that this covenant was not an essential part of the consideration or a condition precedent or dependent in its relation to the main contract. But we think that the covenant in question was an integral and material part of the consideration for the contract. It has been so held in analogous cases, where the vendor, in addition to his agreement to convey, agreed to construct and complete roads or street improvements on the property sold. Blahnik v. Small Farms Improvement Co., 181 Cal. 379, 184 P. 661; Walker v. Harbor Business Blocks Co., 181 Cal. 773, 186 P. 356; Civ. Code, § 1689. We perceive no reason why the same principle does not apply in the instant case.

[3] Appellant contends next that time was not of the essence of the contract; or that if time was of the essence thereof, and, if, therefore, the time limited for completion of the leveling of the land was February 1, 1921, nevertheless, the right of plaintiff to insist on absolute performance by that date was waived, and therefore could not be revived except upon notice and demand, and a reasonable time allowed for performance. This last contention, in our opinion, must be sustained. The facts found by the court, whereby the time within which the leveling of the land could be done was necessarily extended at plaintiff's request, constituted a waiver of the right to have the work completed on that date, and thereby granted a reasonable additional time. Whenever such waiver has occurred, the party from whom performance is due cannot, for the same delinquency, again be placed in default, until he has first been allowed a reasonable time to perform his obligation. Newell v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 181 Cal. 385, 388, 184 P. 659, 9 A. L. R. 993. On the facts as they appear by the record, no right of rescission had accrued.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter judgment in favor of the defendant. The appeals from the orders are dismissed.

Amendment to Opinion.

PER CURIAM. [4] Since the decision herein was filed, our attention has been called to the fact that since the time of the decisions to which we referred as indicating that there is no right of appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment and on the findings enter another and different judgment, later decisions have determined that there is such right of appeal. Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 750, 118 P. 113; Westervelt v. McCullough, 64 Cal. App. 362, 221 P. 661. But inasmuch as on appeal from the judgment the judgment was reversed, and the defendant has obtained the same relief which was sought by the motion, he has suffered no injury by the dismissal of his appeal from the order.

SECURITY INS. CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR MARIN COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5169.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 17, 1925.)

1. Insurance ⇨624(2)—Persons to whom insurance policy is payable must be joined as parties in action at law.

Where a policy of insurance is payable to several persons as their interest may appear, they must join as plaintiffs in an action at law, or, in event of refusal to join, must be made parties defendant.

2. Parties ⇨79, 86—Misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties does not deprive court of "jurisdiction."

In suit on insurance policy, that there was a misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties would not deprive court of jurisdiction to determine the matter; "jurisdiction" being power to hear and determine, and not depending on rightfulness of decision made.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Jurisdiction (of Courts).]

3. Certiorari ⇨29—Writ to review will not lie, where there is no excess of jurisdiction.

Certiorari to review action of superior court will not lie, where there is no excess of jurisdiction, although there may be error in decision of court sought to be reviewed.

4. Certiorari ⇨29—Would not lie to review judgments of superior and justice's court, where they acted within their jurisdiction.

Certiorari will not lie to review judgments of superior and justice's courts in action on indemnity bond, though they may have had no power to determine rights of other parties beneficially interested in bond because not parties to action, since determination, that plaintiff having succeeded to entire interest under bond was entitled to judgment for full amount, even if incorrect, was binding on parties to action as being within jurisdiction of such courts.

Certiorari to Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Original application for certiorari by the Security Insurance Company, a corporation, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the county of Marin and Hon. Edward I. Butler, Judge. Writ denied.

Edward J. Jose, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

TYLER, P. J. The petition shows that on or about the 28th day of August, 1923, one A. M. Winstead commenced an action in the justice's court of San Rafael township, county of Marin, state of California, to recover the sum of $238.50. Said complaint contained the following allegations:

"That at the time of the injury hereinafter mentioned this plaintiff, as vendee, was in possession of the said automobile under contract of sale from H. G. Sirard, as vendor, and the Fairfax Bank was the holder by assignment of the contract of sale covering said automobile, all of which facts are set forth and appear by a rider attached to the policy of insurance hereinafter mentioned; that the amount of interest of said Fairfax Bank hereinabove mentioned in said assigned contract of sale is now $191.50."

That there was attached to said complaint and made a part thereof the policy of insurance in suit, which contained the following clause:

"It is understood that A. M. Winstead, as vendee, is in possession of the herein described automobile under contract of sale from H. G. Sirard, as vendor, and that the Fairfax Bank is the holder of a mortgage, or is assignee of the contract of sale covering the said automobile. It is agreed that, subject to all the terms and conditions of this policy, loss, if any, thereunder shall be payable as follows, to wit, first, to Fairfax Bank, mortgagee or assignee, to an amount not exceeding the indebtedness secured by said automobile at the time of loss; second, to H. G. Sirard, vendor, to an amount not exceeding the balance due at the time of loss upon the contract of sale above referred to; third, to A. M. Winstead, vendee."

The prayer of said complaint reads as follows:

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $238.50 and demands that said judgment when recovered be prorated between the plaintiff in the sum of $47, and the Fairfax Bank in the sum of $191.50, or such other sum as the court may find to be due to said Fairfax Bank at the time of said judgment, and for its costs of suit."

It is further alleged in the petition that thereafter the defendant (petitioner herein) filed a demurrer to said complaint, specifying as a ground of demurrer that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said action, which demurrer was overruled by the justice of said court; that the defendant (petitioner herein) thereupon filed an answer in said action, and as a defense thereto averred that said court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof; that the court thereupon proceeded to try the cause, and that at said trial evidence was introduced tending to prove that plaintiff therein had succeeded to the interests of the other parties to the indemnity bond; that petitioner (defendant therein) refused to put in any evidence, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $238.50 and costs. That within the time and in the manner provided by law defendant took an appeal from said judgment to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Marin upon questions of law and fact; that the action came on regularly for trial, at which time petitioner herein objected to proceeding therewith, and moved for a dismissal upon the following grounds: That the justice's court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of said action; and that said superior court had no jurisdiction on appeal therefrom. The court overruled the objection and denied said motion, and permitted plaintiff to file a supplemental complaint containing an allegation that plaintiff, as vendee under the contract of sale mentioned in the complaint, had paid in full to H. G. Sirard, vendor, and to the Fairfax Bank, as holder by assignment of said contract, all moneys due and owing to them, and that neither H. G. Sirard nor said bank had any interest in or to the insurance policy, the subject-matter of the action.

Judgment was thereafter entered in favor of the plaintiff in said action and against the defendant therein (petitioner herein) for the sum of $238.50 and costs, upon the verdict of a jury. Defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied.

It is here claimed that the action of the superior court in proceeding to said trial and in denying said motion to dismiss was in excess of its jurisdiction sitting on appeal from the justice's court; that said action was one in equity, and the judgment attempts to conclude the rights of persons not parties to the action; and that the prayer thereof seeks an adjudication that the parties to the contract of insurance have no rights therein.

[1-4] Where a policy of insurance is payable to several persons as their interests may appear, there is no question that in an action at law they must join as plaintiffs or, in the event of the refusal of one or more of them so to join, he or they must be made parties defendant. The fact, however, that there is a misjoinder or nonjoinder will not deprive the court of jurisdiction to determine the matter. Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, and does not depend upon the rightfulness of the decision made (Sherer v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 653, 31 P. 565). The writ of review will not lie where there is no excess of jurisdiction, although there may be error in the decision of the court sought to be reviewed (Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 589, 39 P. 936). The office of the writ here sought is not to correct errors, but is issued only where a court has acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction (Goodman v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 233, 96 P. 395). In the matter before us, while both the justice and the superior courts may have had no power to determine the respective rights of the different parties under the indemnity bond for the reason that the complaint as originally drawn did not make them all parties to the action, still their subsequent determination that plaintiff, having succeeded to the entire interest under the bond, was entitled to a judgment for the full amount, even if incorrect, is binding upon the parties to the action, as the conclusion, whether right or wrong, was one within the jurisdiction of those courts to determine.

The writ is denied.

JONES v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Civ. 2879.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 23, 1925.)

1. Exceptions, bill of $\S$ 43(2)—Failure to serve bill of exceptions mentioned in motion to set aside default not grounds for refusing to hear motion.

Where affidavit, supporting motion to set aside default for not filing bill of exceptions within time required, mentioned bill among papers relied on, failure to serve bill with notice of motion held not to warrant refusal to hear motion, although under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1010, bill might not be properly admitted to support motion.

2. Exceptions, bill of $\S$ 43(2)—Affidavit of merits by attorney, accompanying motion to set aside default, proper.

Affidavit of merits, to effect that attorney and party believed latter had meritorious grounds of appeal, accompanying motion for relief from default in not filing bill of exceptions within required time, could properly be made by attorney, who would probably know more about meritorious grounds for appeal than client.

3. Appeal and error ☞985—Exceptions, bill of ☞43(2)—Granting of application to be relieved from default in failing to file bill of exceptions within required time discretionary.

Application to be relieved from default, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, in failing to file bill of exceptions within required time, is discretionary, and court's action will not be set aside on appeal, except for clear abuse thereof.

4. Appeal and error ☞938(2)—Any doubt as to propriety of action on application to set aside default resolved in favor of application.

Any doubt as to propriety of action on application to be relieved of default in failing to file bill of exceptions within required time will be resolved in favor of application, to the end of securing trial upon merits, and therefore appellate court will be less inclined to reverse an order granting application than refusing it.

5. Exceptions, bill of ☞43(2)—Application to be relieved of default in failing to file bill of exceptions within required time properly granted.

Where party used due diligence in preparing bill of exceptions and could not reasonably have completed them within required time, but failed to secure extension therefor, alleged to be because of mistaken belief that notice of intention to move for a new trial had been served and filed, application to be relieved of failure to file bill of exceptions within required time held properly granted, especially where other party had not been prejudiced by delay, notwithstanding right to apply for new trial was not reserved at time of motion, notwithstanding verdict, under Code Civ. Proc. § 629.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ruth Jones against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order relieving defendant of default in failing to file exceptions within required time, and allowing an appeal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley & Crowley and Lasher B. Gallagher, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from an order of the trial court relieving the defendant from its default in preparing and serving its draft of a bill of exceptions within the time allowed by law.

From the affidavit of Arthur L. Levinsky, one of the attorneys for defendant, it appears that judgment in the action was entered on the 8th day of November, 1923; that on the next day affiant requested the official court reporter to prepare a transcript of all the testimony taken at the trial, and that the reporter agreed to do so; that such transcript was delivered on the 14th day of December, 1923, and "immediately upon receipt of the aforesaid transcript * * * affiant began dictating * * * the proposed bill of exceptions, * * * and ever since the 14th day of December, 1923, save and except on Sundays and legal holidays," affiant's stenographer "has been actively and continuously engaged in preparing said proposed bill of exceptions"; that such transcript contains 351 pages of typewritten matter, without including the instructions or special findings of the jury, "and that by reason thereof it would have been impossible to prepare said proposed bill of exceptions within a shorter period of time than has been already occupied in the preparation thereof; that affiant has had charge of the preparation of said proposed bill of exceptions, and he has continuously, zealously, and diligently dictated the same, and has used every effort, together with the aforesaid stenographer, * * * to complete said proposed bill of exceptions; * * * that the appeal from the judgment * * * which is about to be taken by said defendant is not taken by said defendant for mere purposes of delay, but for the reason that said defendant believes, and its counsel believes, that said defendant has meritorious grounds of appeal, and said appeal will be diligently prosecuted."

The affidavit further states that affiant "believed that a notice of intention to move for a new trial on the part of the defendant * * * had been given, served, and filed herein, and by reason of the said belief * * * your affiant did not, neither did his partner, Gilbert L. Jones, preserve the time within which to prepare and serve the aforesaid bill of exceptions, and it was first discovered by affiant on the 3d day of January, 1924, when affiant was examining the records and files in the above-entitled action in the office of the clerk of the above court, that no notice of intention to move for a new trial in the above-entitled action had been served or filed by defendant; * * * that, if a notice of intention to move for a new trial had been served and filed by the defendant, * * * the time within which said defendant would have been required to serve its proposed bill of exceptions herein would have been extended to at least the 26th day of January, 1924; that plaintiff herein therefore has suffered no injury in point of time, or otherwise, by reason of the failure of said defendant herein failing to preserve its time within which to serve said proposed bill of exceptions, and will not be injured, especially by the reason of the fact that said proposed bill of exceptions is virtually completed, and can be completed by the 7th day of January, 1924, and that the same will be ready to be served on the 14th day of January, 1924, on the hearing of the motions that will be made by the defendant * * * for the purpose of opening the said default." The motion was heard and granted on the 14th day of January, 1924. The proposed bill of exceptions was admitted in evidence on the hearing of the motion. The notice of motion and the foregoing affidavit are dated January 4, 1924. It does not appear when they were served.

[1] The notice stated that the motion would be made "upon this notice, and upon the records, pleading, files, and minutes of the court, in the above-entitled action, upon the affidavit of Arthur L. Levinsky, served and filed herewith, and upon such other evidence, either oral or documentary, as may be produced on the hearing of the motion, and upon the said proposed bill of exceptions, which will be there and then ready for service." The proposed bill of exceptions was not served with the notice. Plaintiff objected to the hearing of the motion upon the ground of such failure of service of the proposed bill. The draft of the bill of exceptions was not admitted in evidence for the purpose of proving anything contained therein, but "for the purpose of showing that the defendant Southern Pacific Company in pursuing the preparation of said proposed bill of exceptions had acted in good faith, and that said proposed bill of exceptions was ready for service at said time, and it was and is stipulated that said proposed bill of exceptions may be omitted from this bill of exceptions on behalf of the plaintiff Ruth Jones." No objection was made to the admission of the proposed bill for the purposes stated, but plaintiff's objection was "to the hearing of said motion." Section 1010 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the notice must state "the papers, if any, upon which it is to be based. If any such paper has not previously been served upon the party to be notified, and was not filed by him, a copy of such paper must accompany the notice." It may be true that a paper referred to in the notice and not served therewith cannot be admitted in evidence at the hearing, but failure to serve such paper is not made a ground for refusing to hear the motion or to admit in evidence other papers properly served.

[2] It is contended that no affidavit of merits accompanied the application for relief. The affidavit states "that said defendant believes, and its counsel believes, that said defendant has meritorious grounds of appeal." It is urged that the affidavit of merits "should have shown that the prospective appellant had consulted counsel and had been advised by them that in their opinion it had reasonable grounds to expect a reversal of the judgment appealed from, if the appeal were considered on the merits." It is a general rule that an affidavit of merits should be made by a party to the action, because ordinarily he is more familiar with the facts than is his attorney, but in this case the attorney who conducted the litigation is doubtless more familiar than the defendant with the grounds of appeal, and the belief, or opinion, of such attorney that there are meritorious grounds of appeal contained in a record which he himself prepared ought to be considered a sufficient showing of merits.

[3, 4] The affidavit does not state that defendant had intended to move for a new trial, but only that affiant believed that such a notice had been served and filed. The showing of mistake is not strong and, as said in Harbaugh v. Land & Water Co., 109 Cal. 70, 72, 41 P. 792, "the action of the court came very near the border line which divides the exercise of discretion from the abuse of such discretion." The showing in that case was not stronger than in this, and the order granting relief was affirmed. A similar order was affirmed in Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 P. 332, on slight evidence of mistake. "An application to be relieved from a default under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the action of that court will not be set aside on appeal, unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. Any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end of securing a trial upon the merits. The appellate court will therefore be less inclined to reverse an order granting, than one refusing, an application to open a default. Indeed, the cases in which this court has held that such relief was improperly granted are very rare." Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 748, 124 P. 426. See, also, Waite v. Southern Pacific Co., 192 Cal. 467, 221 P. 204; In re Barney, 191 Cal. 18, 214 P. 853; Jones v. Title Guaranty etc., Co., 178 Cal. 375, 173 P. 586; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353; Downing v. Klondike, Min., etc., Co., 165 Cal. 786, 134 P. 970; Mitchell v. California, etc., S. S. Co., 156 Cal. 576, 105 P. 590; O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 P. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105; Langford v. Langford, 136 Cal. 507, 69 P. 235; Miller v. Carr, 116 Cal. 378, 48 P. 324, 58 Am. St. Rep. 180; Staley v. O'Day, 22 Cal. App. 149, 133 P. 620; Pelegrianni v. McCloud River, etc., Co., 1 Cal. App. 593, 82 P. 695.

[5] In this case it appears without contradiction that the defendant proceeded promptly and with due diligence to prepare its draft of a bill of exceptions, and that it could not reasonably have completed the same at an earlier time than it did. Undoubtedly the court would have extended the time for such preparation, if application therefor had been made. No prejudice has been suffered by the plaintiff in the action, except its asserted right to prevent a hearing on the merits by reason of the defendant's default. The only delay in the determination of the appeal from the judgment has been caused by the opposition of the plaintiff to defendant's application for relief from its default, and this appeal from the order granting such relief. Under such circumstances the ends of justice will be best served by upholding the action of the trial court.

Immediately after the return of the verdict the defendant, under the provisions of section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure, made a motion for judgment in favor of defendant, notwithstanding the verdict. The defendant did not, in the motion, reserve "the right to apply for a new trial" in the event of the denial of the motion. Appellant contends that the defendant thereby forfeited its right to move for a new trial, and that therefore defendant's counsel could not have believed that a motion for a new trial had been made. It is not necessary to construe section 629, because, if it be conceded that appellant's construction thereof is correct, it would only go to the weight of affiant's statement in the affidavit that he believed the notice of intention to move for a new trial had been given, a question for the trial court's determination.

The order is affirmed.

CRONIN v. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 4368.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 10, 1925.)

1. Sheriffs and constables — 18, 21—Sheriff had absolute right to appoint and discharge deputies and other employees in his office before civil service provisions of county.

Sheriff of county of Los Angeles had absolute right to appoint and discharge all deputies and other employees in his office before adoption of civil service provisions of charter of Los Angeles county, and therefore any limitations must be found within provisions of charter.

2. Prisons — 7—Appointing power of Los Angeles county sheriff limited in two ways by civil service provisions of charter.

Under civil service provisions of charter of Los Angeles county, power of sheriff to appoint to position in his office within classified service, including jailer, is limited to appointments from list of three persons certified to him by civil service commission, and by provision that no appointment shall be made because of religious or political opinions or affiliations.

3. Sheriffs and constables — 21 — Effect of charter of Los Angeles county on absolute power of sheriff to discharge deputies and employees determined.

The charter of county of Los Angeles did not divest sheriff of power of discharging deputies and employees in his office and vest it in civil service commission, but merely granted commission power to dismiss those falling below standard of efficiency under section 34, and limited power of sheriff to discharge appointees during period of probation without consent of commission, under section 34 of charter and rule 5, § 5, of the commission.

4. Prisons — 7—Sheriff could discharge jailer without hearing before civil service commission.

Sheriff of county of Los Angeles could discharge jailer without hearing before civil service commission; there being nothing in charter of Los Angeles county requiring hearing, notwithstanding section 34, subd. 13, requiring reasons for discharge to be specifically stated and filed with commission, allowing reasonable time for reply, since requirement of hearing in section 34, subd. 15, and in rule 7, § 4, would have been extended to other cases of discharge, had Legislature so intended.

5. Constitutional law — 70(1) — Courts cannot supply provisions making enactment effective.

Courts are powerless to read into and supply a charter with provisions which might be deemed to better effectuate its aims.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Bertin A. Weyl, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate to compel issuance of salary warrant by Robert E. Cronin against the Civil Service Commission of the County of Los Angeles and S. J. Chappel and others, as members of the Civil Service Commission. Judgment denying writ, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, D. De Coster, Deputy County Counsel, and Phil C. Sterry, Deputy County Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff, Robert E. Cronin, was, on the 11th day of October, 1922, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting jailer of the county of Los Angeles. On said day William I. Traeger, the sheriff of said county, served written notice upon plaintiff, suspending him from his position as a jailer, and notifying him that on the 20th day of said month he would discharge him from his position. With said notice said sheriff presented in writing to plaintiff his reasons for his intended discharge of plaintiff, and on the same day filed with the civil service commission of said county a written copy of said reasons. The plaintiff, on October 17, 1922, filed with said commission his written reply to said reasons. On the 27th of said month said sheriff served a second written notice upon plaintiff in which he notified plaintiff that he was discharged from his position as jailer. The plaintiff, in the belief that said discharge was illegal, made demand upon said commission for a warrant covering his salary for the month of October, 1922, and upon the refusal of said commission to certify said warrant plaintiff instituted this action for a writ of mandate against said commission and the members thereof to compel them to certify a warrant in plaintiff's favor for his salary as such jailer for the month of October, 1922. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of defendants, and from this judgment plaintiff has appealed.

The position taken by appellant is that under the provisions of the charter adopted by the county of Los Angeles, creating a civil service commission, and in force in said county at the time of his attempted discharge, the power to discharge an employee belonging to the classified service of said county was vested solely in the civil service commission, and the principal under whom said employee was serving as a deputy was without any right to remove said employee from such position, and, furthermore, that no such employee or deputy could be discharged in any instance except after a hearing had been had before said commission upon the reasons or charges preferred against him and his reply thereto.

[1] We think it will be conceded, at least it is so well settled in this state that a citation of authorities in support thereof is unnecessary, that prior to the adoption of the civil service provisions of the charter of the county of Los Angeles the sheriff of said county, and, for that matter, all county officers thereof, had the absolute right to appoint and discharge any and all deputies and other employees required for the conduct of the office to which the principal had been appointed or elected. No claim is made by appellant that this power, originally possessed by county officers, has been limited in any way except by the provisions of said county charter. It follows, therefore, that at the time said sheriff discharged appellant, or attempted to discharge him, the only limitation, if any existed, upon his absolute power to appoint and discharge deputies and employees was to be found in the charter adopted by the county of Los Angeles and in force at said time. With regard to the power of the sheriff under said charter to appoint his deputies we are not concerned in this action, but the better to understand the whole scheme provided by the charter in the adoption of the civil service provisions thereof it might be well to briefly refer to certain of its provisions governing the appointment, as well as those providing for the discharge, of deputies and employees.

Section 30 of the charter provides for the appointment, by the board of supervisors of the county, of a civil service commission to consist of three members.

Section 33 divides the officers, deputies, and employees of the county into two classes; namely, the unclassified and the classified service. The unclassified service comprises all officers elected by the people and members of certain boards, also certain deputies among which is one deputy in the office of the sheriff, known as under sheriff or chief deputy. The classified service includes all other positions.

Section 41 provides that—

"No person in the classified service or seeking admission thereto shall be appointed, reduced or removed, or in any way favored or discriminated against because of his political or religious opinions or affiliations."

Section 51 provides that—

"Each county or township officer, board or commission, shall appoint, from the eligible civil service list, for either permanent or temporary service, all assistants, librarians, deputies, clerks, attachés and other persons in the office or department of such officer, board or commission, as the number thereof is fixed and from time to time changed by the board of supervisors."

Section 34 provides:

"The commission shall prescribe, amend, and enforce rules for the classified service, which shall have the force and effect of law. * * * The rules shall provide: * * *

"(2) For open, competitive examinations to test the relative fitness of applicants for such positions."

"(6) For the appointment of one of the three persons standing highest on the appropriate list.

"(7) For a period of probation not to exceed six months before appointment or promotion is made complete, during which period a probationer may be discharged or reduced with the consent of the commission."

"(13) For discharge or reduction in rank or compensation after appointment or promotion is complete, only after the person to be discharged or reduced has been presented with the reasons for such discharge or reduction specifically stated, and has been allowed a reasonable time to reply thereto in writing. The reasons and the reply must be filed as a record with the commission."

"(15) * * * The commission shall ascertain and record the comparative efficiency of employees in the classified service and shall have power, after hearing, to dismiss from the service those who fall below the standard of efficiency established."

We have only mentioned above those subjects over which the commission is authorized to prescribe rules and which are pertinent to this proceeding.

In pursuance of the power given it by said section 34 the commission prescribed a set of rules. These rules, in so far as they are material to the question involved herein, provide for the holding of competitive examinations to test the relative fitness of applicants for county positions in the classified service:

Rule 5, § 1: "Whenever a vacancy in the classified service is to be filled, the appointing officer shall make requisition upon the civil service commission for certification of three names of persons eligible for the position.

* * *

Section 2: "Upon receipt of requisition for certification of names to fill a vacancy, the commission * * * shall certify to the appointing officer, from the register of eligibles appropriate for the group in which the position to be filled is classified, the three names at the head thereof, of persons eligible and willing to accept the place."

Section 5: "Appointment from original eligible lists shall be on probation for a specified period of not less than two months, nor more than six months. The appointing officer shall, when giving notice of appointment, state the length of the probationary period established by him for such appointment. Otherwise, the probationary period shall be six months. If, at the close of the designated probationary period, the conduct or capacity of the probationer has not been satisfactory, he shall be notified in writing by the appointing officer that he will not receive absolute appointment. Otherwise, his retention in the service shall be equivalent to a final and absolute appointment. The appointing officer shall not discharge or reduce the probationer to take effect before the expiration of the specified probationary period, without the consent of the commission."

Rule 7, § 4: "The commission shall ascertain and record the comparative efficiency of the employees in the classified service, and shall have the power, after hearing, to dismiss from the service those who fall below the standard of efficiency established."

Rule 11, § 1: "Discharge or reduction in rank or compensation after appointment or promotion is complete, of a person in the classified service, shall be made only after such person has been presented with the reasons for such discharge or reduction specifically stated, and has been allowed a reasonable time, to be stated in the communication setting forth said reasons, to reply thereto in writing. The statement of reasons and the reply must be filed as public records with the commission."

[2] As to the power of the sheriff of Los Angeles county, under the civil service provisions of the charter, to appoint to positions in his office belonging to the classified service (and this includes all deputies in his office, with the exception of the under sheriff or chief deputy, and, therefore, the office of jailer is included therein), it is apparent, from the provisions of the charter and the rules of the civil service commission above referred to, that this power is still lodged in said officer, but with such limitations as are prescribed by said charter and the rules of the commission. While before the adoption of the charter he had the absolute power to appoint all deputies in his office and to fill their positions with persons of his choice, after the adoption of the charter, and under its provisions, he still has the right to appoint all such deputies, but there are two limitations placed upon this power of appointment. These are: First, all appointments to positions in the classified service must be made from the list of three persons certified to him by the civil service commission; and, secondly, no appointment to positions in the classified service shall be made because of the religious or political opinions or affiliations of the appointee.

[3] Having thus determined the power of the sheriff regarding appointment of his deputies, what, if any, changes have been made by the charter regarding the power of this officer to discharge such deputies and employees? In his brief, appellant says, "It will be noted from the reading of the sections relating to removal and discharge that nothing is said by either the charter or the rules as to who is authorized to make such discharge or removal." With this concession on the part of appellant, it would hardly seem necessary to further pursue the question as to the power of the sheriff to discharge or remove any deputy or employee in his office. For, as we have already seen, the sheriff, prior to the adoption of the charter, had the absolute right to discharge and remove any deputy in his office, and according to appellant's brief, as nothing is said in either the charter or the rules of the commission upon this subject, it necessarily follows that said officer still possesses the power vested in him prior to the adoption of the charter.

We, however, feel that the concession made by appellant in his brief and quoted above is somewhat stronger against him than the facts really warrant. Section 34 of the charter provides that the commission shall ascertain and keep a record of the efficiency of employees in the classified service, and shall, after hearing, have power to dismiss from service those who fall below the standard of efficiency established by the commission. While the commission is given power to dismiss employees in the classified service in this one instance, we fail to find in this regulation of the commission any intention to divest the principal of his general power to remove and discharge deputies and employees whom he considers inefficient or out of harmony with his administration of his office. It may be in some instances, on account of friendship, or other reasons, the principal may desire to retain an inefficient deputy in his office. In such a case the commission, under the rule last referred to, would have the right to remove such employee if he fell below the standard of efficiency, even against the will and without the consent of the principal. This rule or regulation would not in any way conflict with the provisions of law vesting in the principal a general power to discharge deputies and employees.

There is a further limitation in our opinion upon the absolute power of the principal to discharge deputies and employees, found in section 34 of the charter and in section 5, rule 5, of the commission. This rule provides, first, that all appointments shall be on probation, and, second, that during the probationary period the appointee shall not be discharged by the appointing officer without the consent of the commission. In view of this rule and the provision of the charter authorizing its adoption by the commission, it is argued by appellant, if it be held that the principal has the absolute right to discharge deputies under regular appointment, that the lot of the regular employee is more uncertain and precarious than that of a probationer. This may be true. There may have been some good reason in the minds of the framers of the charter for placing a check on the power of the principal to discharge a probationer before the expiration of his probationary period. Just what this reason was may or may not be apparent, but it is evident that the provisions of the charter providing for such a rule and the rule itself only refer to appointments during the time the appointee is serving his probationary term, and cannot by any manner of construction known to us be extended so as to apply to deputies or employees serving under final and absolute appointment. The contention, therefore, of appellant that the power of discharge and removal is vested in the civil service commission, or that the principal can only make such discharge or removal with the consent of said commission, finds no support either in the provisions of the charter or in the rules prescribed by the commission.

[4] As to appellant's contention that the sheriff, even if authorized to discharge him, can do so only after a hearing before the civil service commission, he relies upon subdivision 13 of section 34 of the charter and the rule of the commission, based upon said subdivision, which we have already quoted in full. This provision of the charter provides that a deputy in the classified list can only be discharged after he has been presented with the reasons for such discharge and has been allowed a reasonable time to reply thereto in writing. Appellant argues that, as the charter here provides that no deputy can be discharged until written charges are preferred against him and an opportunity given him to reply thereto, it was contemplated by the framers of the charter that a hearing must be had by the commission on said charges and reply before any discharge can be made. To so construe the charter would be to read something into it which was not placed therein by those who framed it. We find that in subdivision 15 of said section of the charter and in section 4 of rule 7, when the commission seeks to dismiss an employee in the classified list, on account of his falling below the standard of efficiency established by the commission, it can do so only after a hearing. It will thus be seen that the freeholders, in whom the law vested the sole power of framing the charter, had in mind at least one instance when they thought a hearing should be had, and that by design they provided for a hearing in that instance, and in another instance they made no such provision. For this court now to hold that a hearing should be had by the commission before a principal could discharge a deputy when none had been provided for in the charter would be for this court to usurp the functions of the freeholders and to change their work in a material respect. This it has neither the right nor the inclination to do. We must accept the charter as framed by the freeholders and not attempt to enlarge its scope under the guise of judicial interpretation. Neither subdivision 13 of said section 34 of the charter nor rule 11, as prescribed by the commission, provides for any hearing upon the charges preferred against a deputy before the principal may discharge him. All that is required by the charter and the rules of the commission is that the officer discharging the deputy shall serve upon him, a reasonable time before his discharge, and file with the commission, a statement of the reasons for the discharge. This procedure was observed by the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles in his discharge of appellant, and it follows, therefore, that said discharge was legal and effectual.

Great stress is laid by appellant upon the case of Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 P. 732, in support of his contention that he can only be removed after hearing before the civil service commission upon the charges preferred against him by the sheriff and his reply thereto. In this action it was held that the attempted removal by the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco of a member of the board of education of said city and county during the term of office for which he had been regularly appointed, without any notice to him or any opportunity to make a defense, was void. The decision was based upon the rule supported by the great weight of authority that, where an officer is appointed for a fixed term, and it is provided that he may be removed during the term for cause, without other qualifying words, such removal cannot be made except after notice and a hearing. It is quite apparent that this case differs in two material respects from the case before us. In that case the officer was appointed for a fixed term of office, and the charter provided that he could only be removed for cause. In the case before us, the appellant, as jailer, was not appointed for any fixed term, and there is nothing in the charter of the county of Los Angeles providing that the principal might discharge him only for cause. Under these circumstances we do not consider the case of Bannerman v. Boyle an authority which could be followed in the present action.

[5] Appellant suggests, however, that a construction of the civil service provisions of the charter of the county of Los Angeles that will permit the discharge of deputies and employees belonging to the classified service by the principal, without a hearing before the civil service commission, will render the whole scheme of civil service, so far as it is made applicable to said county, a sham and a farce, and will utterly destroy the purposes of this wise and important part of the county charter. Assuming that appellant is correct in this criticism, we are unable to perceive how it can effect the determination of the question before us. It may be that a hearing by the commission, before a principal can discharge a deputy, is most desirable. In fact, it may be absolutely essential to the proper and adequate functioning of the system of civil service as applied to employees in the county offices. Yet, if the freeholders, elected by the voters of said county, failed to provide for such a hearing, the courts are powerless to supply what they neglected to incorporate in the charter. We are, however, not entirely satisfied that appellant is correct in his conclusion that without such a provision in the charter the attempt by the freeholders to enact adequate civil service regulations was futile and ineffectual. Under the law, as we have already seen, prior to the adoption of civil service, the principal in office had the absolute right to appoint and discharge all deputies and employees required in the conduct of his office. It was claimed that this power was greatly abused by the principal to the detriment of the public service and often resulted in the displacement of experienced and efficient persons to make room for the personal and political friends of the appointing officer. To remove this condition the legislation known as "civil service" was proposed, and its purpose was not so much to deprive the principal of the power vested in him to remove deputies as it was to limit his power of appointment and to provide that all appointments by him should be made from lists of names of persons furnished him by the civil service commission and who had satisfactorily passed the examination held by the commission. With this restriction placed upon his power of appointment, the principal was unable to select for his deputies his personal and political friends. Deprived of this power to appoint his favorites, there was but slight excuse or temptation on his part to discharge efficient employees in his office for the reason that he must fill their places by men whose names appear on the list certified to him by the commission. But his right to make such discharge has seldom been interfered with by civil service legislation. As head of the office and responsible for its successful administration he must have, and all civil service legislation has recognized this principle, the right to control his subordinates, even to the extent of removing them whenever in his judgment the public interest demanded their removal. His right to discharge, however, under civil service regulation, is not absolute as it was under the old system. He cannot, as a rule, now discharge a person in the classified service on account of the latter's political or religious opinions or affiliation, and before he can discharge a person in this class he must present such person with the reason for his discharge and give him a reasonable time to reply thereto. Both the reasons for the discharge and the reply of the employee must be in writing and filed as public records in the office of the commission.

At the oral argument of this case counsel for respondent cited a number of excerpts from reports of civil service organizations, addresses by advocates of civil service reform, and standard works upon the principles of civil service legislation, as indicating that the provisions of the charter of the county of Los Angeles are in harmony with the well-established and well-recognized principles of civil service. We will refer to only one of these citations, and that from Proctor on Principles of Public Personnel Administration, which is in the following language:

"Few civil service commissions, however, have the power of deciding cases of dismissal. In perhaps 80 per cent. of the civil service jurisdictions throughout the country, administrative officers have the power to remove their subordinate employees, either absolutely or subject to certain restrictions. The appointing officer should have the power to remove, suspend, or lay off his subordinates. If he does not have this power, it is difficult to see how he can enforce discipline and maintain a high standard of efficiency in the organization for which he is responsible. At the same time an administrative officer in making removals should be subject to definite restrictions. Civil service laws commonly provide that he shall not remove public employees because of religious or political affiliations, but only for bona fide reasons of misconduct or incompetency. In order to make effective this provision, the administrative officer should be required to furnish the employee whom he wishes to remove, a written statement of the reasons for his action, and to give the employee an opportunity to reply in writing. He should also be required to file with the civil service commission a copy of the reasons for his action and a copy of the reply of the employee. Experience shows that where the civil service system is once well established, administrative officers do not ordinarily abuse the power of removal. The motive for making an unjust removal would be in most cases the desire to put in the place of the employee removed a person more acceptable on political or similar grounds. But an administrative officer has little incentive for making an unjust removal if entrance to the civil service is safeguarded by a careful enforcement of the merit principle."

The Supreme Court of this state has, in the case of Cahen v. Wells, 132 Cal. 447, 64 P. 699, expressed its views upon the subject in similar language. On page 452 (64 P. 701), the court says:

"Since the head of an office could not, under the merit system, fill a vacancy with a person of his own choice, but must do so, with the person, or one of the two or three persons, certified by the commission, the incentive to make removals, except for actual incompetency, would be very slight. One of the reformers quoted in the brief, after pointing out that removals are rarely asked for except to make a vacancy for a particular man, says, 'Under the merit system of appointment, the question of removals would be solved without legislation.'"

It is apparent, therefore, from these quotations, and many more of the same general character could be cited if deemed necessary, that the provisions of the charter of the county of Los Angeles providing for civil service regulation of certain of its employees are in harmony with the general principles of civil service legislation as understood and explained by writers upon the subject of unquestioned authority, as well as by our own Supreme Court.

In accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Theodore Zolkoske against the United States Farm & Land Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Murphy, Charles S. Wheeler, and Charles S. Wheeler, Jr., all of San Francisco (Henry F. May, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

E. T. Young, of Los Angeles, and Butler & Van Dyke, of Sacramento, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for damages for fraud involved in the purchase of land owned by the defendant in Madera county and being a part of the Chowchilla ranch. The cause was tried before the court sitting with a jury, which, by a vote of nine to three, returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff moved for a new trial. The motion was denied, and from the judgment which followed the plaintiff has appealed on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

A brief statement of the facts will suffice, as the only errors alleged and relied on by appellant arise from the instructions given the jury. The defendant corporation purchased the Chowchilla ranch, consisting of about 107,000 acres, and subdivided it into lots of about 20 acres each for the purpose of sale to the public. The defendant, either directly or through its agents, sold the greater portion of the tract prior to the year 1918, at which time it had about 11,000 acres left unsold in scattered tracts. These remaining lands were very much inferior to the lands which had been sold, containing large quantities of alkali and hardpan, which made them difficult to sell, a condition which was well known to the defendant. In March, 1918, through the aid of an agent of the defendant, a Mr. Hollister was presented to Mr. Robertson, the president and acting head of the defendant corporation, as a representative of the Daniel Hays Company of Chicago, a corporation engaged in the real estate brokerage business. Arrangements were made between Robertson and Hollister by which the latter was authorized to sell the remaining lands owned by the defendant corporation, and these were confirmed by the letter of March 22, 1918, addressed to Hollister and signed by Robertson, as president of the defendant corporation. Basing its authority upon this letter, the Daniel Hays Company immediately commenced an active campaign for the sale of these lands, during which a large number of books and pamphlets were issued to its agents advertising the lands in glowing terms. The material for this advertising was taken from booklets, maps, and photographs furnished the Hays Company directly by the defendant. Through the use of this advertising matter the plaintiff was induced to purchase some of the lands at a grossly exorbitant price, and he bases his suit for damages upon the fraudulent misrepresentations which induced the purchase.

On this appeal the respondent frankly concedes the fraud and the misrepresentations on the part of the Hays Company and its agents; but the respondent insists that it is not responsible, as the Hays Company was not its duly authorized agent. The fact of this agency thus became an important issue of fact in the trial. The appellant, however, does not rest on the proof of agency alone, but urges that the liability of the respondent also rests upon the proven fact that the respondent knew that false representations were being made by selling agents of the Hays Company, which was holding itself out as the authorized agent of the respondent; that these representations were based partly on information furnished the Hays Company by the respondent; and that the respondent, while fully cognizant of the fraud perpetrated on the appellant, obtained the fruits thereof and thereby ratified the acts of the salesmen.

In both of these instances the competent evidence is overwhelmingly in support of appellant's contentions. At times the respondent seems to agree with the appellant in this respect, and states that the only dispute in the evidence was on the value of the land sold to the appellant—a question which is not involved in this appeal as the fraud is conceded. Then we find in respondent's brief the statement that the claim of agency on the part of the Hays Company is "utterly without supporting evidence," and similar expressions are used regarding the issues of "scienter" and ratification. But these assertions are frightfully in disregard of the printed record. Proof was offered and not controverted that in July, 1918, just prior to the sale to the appellant, the Hays Company was selling other lands in the same tract for the respondent; that, throughout the entire period, the respondent dealt with the Hays Company as its authorized selling agent, furnished it information for its advertising campaign, received copies of all literature issued by the Hays Company, in which it held itself out as respondent's agent, and permitted that company to circulate this literature containing false and fraudulent representations about the land without objection on its part. In addition to this we find in the telegram of September 6, 1918, sent to the Hays Company by the respondent, that the respondent canceled the contractual relations then existing with the Hays Company, specifically withdrawing "all propositions made to you but particularly those contained in our letters of March twenty-second, May tenth, and June third written to your Mr. H. L. Hollister." Now, the letter of March 22, referred to in this telegram, was the letter addressed to Hollister upon which Hays Company based its authority to act as agent for the respondent. That the respondent treated this letter as conferring such authority is apparent from the use of the expression "propositions made to you" in referring to the letter "written to your Mr. H. L. Hollister."

Evidence was offered that all the literature containing the false representations regarding the lands was sent to the respondent in proof of the issue that respondent had knowledge of the fraud which was being committed in its name and for its benefit. It was also shown that the proceeds of the sale went to the respondent upon the execution of its deed of conveyance. The sufficiency of this evidence is not involved in this appeal. What we have endeavored to point out is that evidence was before the jury in support of these issues of fact which required the submission of the issues to the jury. Appellant's position on the appeal is that the jury was not properly instructed. Respondent does not argue the points raised by appellant, but devotes its brief to a discussion of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. This may be true, but, on the other hand, we are satisfied that, if the jury had rendered its verdict in favor of the appellant, that verdict would have also been supported by the evidence. Thus the errors in the instructions become vital.

[1-3] We do not deem it necessary to discuss these instructions in detail. The main error arises from the fact that the trial judge adopted the instructions proposed by both parties, and thus, on the material issues, the instructions given were hopelessly contradictory. For illustration, the trial judge, on the request of appellant, instructed the jury as to the legal responsibility of the respondent for false representations made by persons acting as agents of the respondent within the scope of their authority; but this was accompanied by three instructions requested by the respondent to the effect that the false representations to be actionable must have been made by the respondent itself and "must be traced directly to the" respondent. These instructions were not only contradictory, but those given at respondent's request was incorrect statements of the law, because if an agency existed—a fact which the jury was to determine—the respondent may have been liable for the fraud of its agents without having "directly" instigated it. The giving of a correct instruction upon a material issue will not relieve the vice of an incorrect one where they are contradictory and serve to confuse the minds of the jury. People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 261, 86 P. 187; Pierce v. United Gas & Elec. Co., 161 Cal. 176, 185, 118 P. 700; Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 272, 280, 201 P. 599; O'Meara v. Swortfiguer, 191 Cal. 12, 15, 214 P. 975.

[4] The instructions on the subject of respondent's liability, if the jury should find that it was responsible for the false representations being made, or had knowledge that they were being made and countenanced the fraud to its own financial benefit, are of like tenor. At the request of the appellant the trial judge correctly stated the law on that subject, and then, at the request of the respondent, told the jury, in effect, that there was no responsibility and no ratification. In addition to charging the jury in respect to matters of fact the instructions on this subject are contradictory and misleading.

If we were to find that the error in these instructions was insignificant, the fact that the same error was repeated time and again throughout the charge to the jury so that the error was constantly emphasized, while the correct instruction was given but once, is sufficient to demonstrate the prejudice to appellant's cause arising from the error.

Judgment reversed.

C. O. BASHAW CO. v. WOOD & STEVENS, Inc. (Civ. 5083; S. F. 10954.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 1, 1925. Rehearing Denied April 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 28, 1925.)

1. Principal and agent §89(8)—Evidence held to warrant finding that consignee of prunes was authorized to use its own judgment in settling with buyer.

In action for money expended by plaintiff's assignor for prunes consigned to it by defendant, evidence held to warrant finding that plaintiff's assignor was authorized to use its own judgment in settling with buyer, or accepting buyer's rejection of prunes, and in otherwise disposing thereof.

2. Principal and agent §63(1)—Consignee, having authority to ship goods in own name, has same authority to discharge or modify contract with buyer as to make it.

Authority, given consignee to ship prunes in its own name, gave it same rights to discharge, modify, or control obligation of contract with buyer as to make contract.

3. Principal and agent §63(1)—Consignee held authorized to accept buyer's rejection of prunes, to return price paid, and to dispose of prunes elsewhere.

Authority given consignee to use his own judgment in settling with buyer, to accept buyer's rejection of prunes, or to otherwise dispose thereof, gave it full authority to accept buyer's rejection of prunes, return purchase price, and to endeavor to sell them elsewhere.

4. Principal and agent §89(9)—Consignee's authority to accept buyer's rejection of prunes, and to return price received, held to present questions of fact for court.

In action for money expended by consignee of prunes as agent to sell, consignee's authority to accept buyer's rejection of prunes, to return price paid, etc., held to present questions of law for court.

5. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Finding of trial court, supported by evidence, binding on appellate court.

Finding of trial court, supported by evidence, and not contradicted by contrary evidence, is binding on appellate court.

6. Principal and agent §89(7)—Condition of prunes rejected by buyer held material, merely to show consignee's good or bad faith in accepting buyer's rejection.

Where principal issue in action for money expended by consignee in seller's behalf was whether consignee exercised undue authority in accepting buyer's rejection of prunes, condition of prunes was material, merely to show consignee's good or bad faith.

7. Appeal and error §1071(1) — Judgment, supported by one count of complaint and findings thereon, against which no attack was made, not disturbed on appeal.

Judgment, supported by one count of complaint and findings made thereon, against which no attack was made by defendant, cannot be disturbed because some of findings addressed to another count were vulnerable to attacks made thereon.

8. Appeal and error §527(2)—Appellant's incorporation in record of findings, refused by court, and assigning error to trial court's ruling thereon, held improper practice.

Where trial court refused to incorporate certain paragraphs in its findings, it was improper practice for appellant to cause proposed findings to be incorporated in record, and assign rulings of trial court as error, effect of which was attempt to convert findings into bill of exceptions or statement of case.

STURTEVANT, J. The trial court, sitting without a jury, awarded the plaintiff a judgment as for moneys laid out and expended by plaintiff's assignor in behalf of defendant. The defendant has appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The story, as recited in the findings, is told first by affirmative allegations in response to the first count contained in plaintiff's complaint, which is a common count as for moneys laid out and expended. The story is told again by affirmative findings in response to the second count pleaded in the complaint which purports to plead the facts. The latter findings are (1) that the plaintiff is a corporation; (2) that the defendant is a corporation; (3) that Herbert E. Gray Company is a corporation; (4) that on August 7, 1919, the defendant requested Herbert E. Gray Company to accept from defendant 574, 50-pound boxes 100/120 prunes and consigned the same to Gray's correspondents in London, and that Gray consented to do so without making any charge for his services; (5) that Gray thereupon consigned the prunes to Crichton, London; (6) and that the defendant furnished to Gray a description of the goods, which Gray accepted, and on which Gray offered the goods for sale in London, and, acting on that description, Crichton sold the prunes and remitted to Gray as the net amount of the cash sales $3,281.98; (7) that on the arrival of said prunes in London, England, the purchaser thereof rejected the same because of the condition of said prunes and demanded back the purchase price that had been paid therefor; that said Alexander Crichton & Co. notified said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, and said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, notified said defendant of the fact of said rejection; that said defendant did thereupon authorize said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, to use its own judgment in settling with said purchaser or in accepting said rejection, and in otherwise disposing of said prunes; that said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, acted in good faith, with diligence and care, and accepted said rejection, and instructed said Alexander Crichton & Co. to return said purchase price and to endeavor to sell said prunes elsewhere; that said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, instructed said Alexander Crichton & Co. to advance the money to repay said purchase price and promised to repay to said Alexander Crichton & Co. any deficit that might remain upon the resale of said prunes; that the acceptance of said rejection was for the best interests of said defendant; that the market value of prunes of the character offered for sale and according to the description furnished by said defendant had risen since the time of said sale in London, England, and that, if said rejection had not been accepted, the said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, might have been rendered liable for substantial damages; that Herbert E. Gray, the president of Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, went personally from New York to London, inspected the prunes and acted for Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, with reference thereto; that the condition of said prunes on the arrival of said Herbert E. Gray in London was such as to require immediate and prompt attention if same were to be resold; that it was necessary for Herbert E. Gray, representing said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, to act immediately; that a case of necessity existed for prompt and immediate action in the interests of said defendant; that said Herbert E. Gray acted reasonably, in good faith, and without negligence, in authorizing said Alexander Crichton & Co. to return said purchase price and to endeavor to resell said prunes; that said defendant was promptly notified by said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, of the acceptance of said rejection, the return of said purchase price and the instructions given to said Alexander Crichton & Co. to resell said prunes, and that, upon the return of said Herbert E. Gray, the president of Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, to New York, from London, England, where he had inspected said prunes, and had acted for and on behalf of said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, said defendant did not repudiate or object to said action, but approved and ratified the same with full knowledge of all of the facts, and promised that it would take care of any amounts owing to said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, as soon as the net proceeds of said resales of said prunes were ascertained; (8) that Crichton accepted the return of the prunes, repaid the purchase price, and thereafter made diligent efforts to resell the prunes and later returned to Gray a bill for $2,265.28 for the difference between the amounts received from the sale of the prunes and the expenses incurred; that Gray paid Crichton and thereafter assigned his claim to this plaintiff; (9) that Gray acted gratuitously and in accordance with the instructions of the defendant, and with diligence and in good faith; (10) that the defendant did not at any time sell the prunes to Gray; (11) that, when the prunes arrived in London, the same were in bad condition; and that Gray "acted reasonably and in the interest of said defendant in authorizing the acceptance of said rejection, and the return of said purchase price, and the immediate resale of said prunes, and in not submitting the claim of the purchaser to arbitration or litigation. The court further finds that the condition of said prunes on their arrival in London, England, was not due solely or at all to the negligence or want of care of the purchaser of the prunes subsequent to his securing title to the same. The court does not find the particular time or place the said prunes became or were bad, but does find that said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, acted reasonably and in the best interest of said defendant in all that it did respecting said prunes."

The evidence showed without conflict that before the prunes arrived in London that Crichton, on August 25, 1919, sold to Badcock, Bishop & Co., London, under a c. i. f. contract representing them to be "Rosenberg Bros. & Co. pack average of the season of 1918," that contract contained a covenant "all questions or disputes arising under this contract shall be referred to two arbitrators, one to be appointed by each party. In case such question or dispute arises respecting quality or condition, the buyer shall accept the goods and the arbitrators shall decide only the question of allowance (if any) to be made to the buyer. The arbitration shall be held in London and shall be claimed within seven days of the first arrival of the goods at the wharf at London or before removal from the quay in Liverpool or other ports." The evidence introduced at the trial consisted of the oral testimony given by Herbert E. Gray and the deposition of H. W. Brown, one of the agents of Alexander Crichton & Co. The testimony of those two witnesses was to the effect that the prunes were "fermenting," "full of life," and "in very bad condition." The evidence showed affirmatively that neither the purchaser nor the seller demanded an arbitration.

[1] We now take up the points made by the appellant. For reasons which will presently appear, we do not take them up in the order made by the appellant. The fifth point made by the appellant is a claim that plaintiff's assignor exceeded his authority in accepting the rescission. The appellant states the point in five different ways. The burden of these attacks is that, assuming that Gray was an agent to sell, he had no authority to rescind, or authorize the rescinding of an executed sale. If the record showed nothing more than that Herbert E. Gray Company was an agent to sell, of course, there might be something in the point. However, the record, shows affirmatively that when the purchaser inspected the goods and reported his rejection that that report was communicated to the defendant and, as found by the trial court, the "said defendant did thereupon authorize said Herbert E. Gray Company, Incorporated, to use its own judgment in settling with said purchaser, or in accepting said rejection and in otherwise disposing of said prunes." That finding was fully supported by the evidence. Mr. Gray so testified. In an earlier part of his testimony he also testified that Crichton had advised him and, in turn, he had advised Wood, that, if the dispute went to arbitration, the purchaser could claim loss of profits as an element of his damage, and, as the price of prunes on the London market had risen, that the item of damage would be a substantial one.

[2, 3] In doing what he did regarding the rescission, Mr. Gray did not exceed his authority. His authority was two-fold and rested upon two separate principles of law. In the first place, he had been authorized by the defendant to send the prunes in his own name to London. Under those circumstances he would have the same rights to discharge, modify, or control the obligation of the contract as he had to make it. 2 C. J. "Agency," § 289; Ricketson v. Richardson, 19 Cal. 330; Hayes v. Campbell, 55 Cal. 421, 36 Am. Rep. 43; Hoskins v. Swain, 61 Cal. 338. In the second place after the goods had arrived in London, after they had been examined and rejected, and after these facts were reported to the defendant, Herbert E. Gray Company received from the defendant a second authorization (finding 7, supra), to act in the matter. Under that second authorization Mr. Gray had full authority to do everything that he did. 2 C. J. "Agency," § 243; Goldtree v. Swinford, 74 Cal. 586, 589, 16 P. 493; Kuhlman v. E. J. Hart Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 59 S. W. 455, 461; Garnett v. Parry Mfg. Co., 185 Ala. 326, 64 So. 559, 561; Cole Carriage Co. v. Hacker, 45 Ind. App. 368, 90 N. E. 923; Washington Cedar & Fir Products Co. v. Elliott, 91 Conn. 350, 100 A. 29, 30; International Harvester Co. v. Swenson, 135 Minn. 141, 160 N. W. 255.

[4, 5] As no question is presented regarding the power of Mr. Gray to talk or act for his company, as no question of power is presented as to the authority of Mr. Wood to speak and act for his company, and as nothing was done orally which under the statute of frauds should have been in writing, it becomes patent that the whole case becomes a question for the jury. In this respect the case is parallel with and we call attention to the ruling of the court in Garnett v. Parry Mfg. Co., supra. The various questions involved were therefore solely questions of fact for the determination of the trial court. As that court has found that the Herbert E. Gray Company did not exceed its authority, and as there is no conflict in the testimony in that behalf, the finding is supported by the evidence, and is binding on this court.

[6] Points 1, 2, 3, and 4 are all concerned with the actual condition of the prunes and as to whether that condition was good or bad, and, if bad, what caused it and when did it happen. If this case were one between the buyer and seller, those points would be of interest, however as between the Herbert E. Gray Company, as agent, and the defendant, as principal, the gravaman of the case is whether there was exercised by the former undue authority. The condition of the prunes became material merely to show good faith or bad faith on the part of the agent.

Under point 6 the appellant makes 20 separate attacks on the admission or rejection of evidence. We have examined each one and we find no substantial merit in any one of the attacks. It may be conceded that some immaterial testimony was admitted, but, as the trial was before the court and not before a jury, it is patent that immaterial testimony could do no harm. The judgment of the trial court can be sustained only as the same is supported by material testimony and not by any quantity of immaterial testimony. But in this behalf it should be remarked that we find very little immaterial testimony creeping into the record through any one of the rulings complained of.

[7] In the seventh point the appellant claims that certain findings are not supported by the evidence. We have examined each separate finding attacked, and have examined the evidence, and find that each of the said findings so attacked is supported by the evidence. However, there is another answer to this attack. The findings mentioned, each and all, were addressed to the second count of plaintiff's complaint. No attack whatever is made on the findings responsive to the allegations of the first count. Therefore, even though some of the findings on the second count are vulnerable to the attacks made, nevertheless the judgment may not be disturbed, as it is fully supported by the first count and the findings made thereon.

[8] In the trial court the appellant prepared and asked the trial court to incorporate certain paragraphs in its findings. The trial court refused. Thereafter appellant caused the proposed findings to be incorporated in the record and the ruling of the trial court is assigned as error. No such practice is authorized by law. The effect of the practice attempted was to convert the findings into a bill of exceptions or statement of the case. Of course, that is improper practice.

The last point made is that the findings do not support the judgment. This point is supported by the argument that the first part of the finding which we have numbered 11 is contradictory of the latter part of the same finding. A mere reading demonstrates that there is nothing in the point.

We find no error in the record.
The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for hearing in the Supreme Court, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, is denied.

We disapprove of that portion of the opinion wherein it is said: "As the trial was before the court, and not before a jury, it is patent that immaterial testimony could do no harm," as not embodying a correct statement of the law on the subject. Smith v. Westfield, 88 Cal. 374, 383, 26 P. 206; Rulofson v. Billings, 140 Cal. 452, 460, 74 P. 35; Title Ins. Co. v. Ingersoll, 153 Cal. 1, 9, 94 P. 94. As the case is one within the jurisdiction of, and originally appealed to this court, we have examined the record, and are convinced that appellant suffered no material prejudice because of the rulings of the trial court in the admission of testimony.

ZELLER v. MILLIGAN et al. (Civ. 4369.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 10, 1925.)

1. Notice ☞6—When party will be deemed to have actual knowledge of facts.

In view of Civil Code, § 19, where party has notice or information of circumstances which would put him on an inquiry which, if followed, would lead to knowledge, contemplated by section 1691 relative to rescission, or where facts were presumptively within his knowledge, he will be deemed to have actual knowledge of such facts.

2. Notice ☞6—What knowledge charges one with notice of facts within statute.

Knowledge which one obtains and the possession of which is urged as being sufficient within Civ. Code, § 19, to require further inquiry by such person, must be directly related to the ultimate knowledge in question, or the known facts must be such that to a person of ordinary care and prudence further inquiry would not only be suggested but imperatively demanded to the end that the truth with reference to the main fact may be disclosed.

3. Notice ☞6—To charge one with notice, facts must be such as ordinarily to excite inquiry with reference to particular fact which inquiry is designed to elicit.

To charge one with notice, the facts must be such as ordinarily to excite inquiry with reference to particular fact which inquiry is designed to elicit.

4. Vendor and purchaser ☞100—Party held not obliged to rescind promptly on discovery of misrepresentation relating to consideration, and not to matters inducing her to execute contract.

Where the misrepresentations of defendants as to alleged losses in the operation of a hotel, in which plaintiff had an interest, induced her to sell that interest, plaintiff, in order to protect her rights in the premises, was not obliged to rescind promptly on discovery of fraud pertaining entirely to value of consideration which she received, and not relating to matters which induced her to sell.

5. Contracts ⚡271—Generally act of rescission implies notice to other party to contract of intention and determination to extinguish contract.

Generally rescission requires notice to other party to contract of intention and determination to extinguish contract.

6. Contracts ⚡266(1), 271—Giving of notice to rescind and offer of restoration ordinarily is prerequisite to maintenance of action of rescission.

Giving of notice to rescind and offer of restoration ordinarily is prerequisite to maintenance of action of rescission, in absence of circumstances excusing notice and offer.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⚡101—Law abhors idle acts.

As respects vendor's duty to notify vendee of rescission, the rule applies that the law abhors idle acts.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⚡104—Party instituting action for rescission day after discovery of fraud held not required to give formal notice of rescission as condition to maintaining action.

Complaint in vendor's action for rescission, instituted day after discovery of fraud, held to disclose facts justifying plaintiff's failure to give formal notice of rescission as condition to maintaining action; defendants' rights not being changed or prejudiced by such failure.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⚡104—Circumstances shown by complaint praying for rescission held to justify plaintiff's failure to offer restoration of possession of property.

Circumstances shown by complaint praying for rescission held to justify vendor's failure to offer restoration of consideration before commencement of action for rescission.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Martha Zeller (a single woman) against J. R. Milligan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. A. Sloane and Harrison G. Sloane, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Leonard Wright, of San Diego, and L. N. Turrentine, of Escondido, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment "on the pleadings" in favor of defendants. The suit purported to be for the rescission of a contract wherein an accounting was prayed as auxiliary relief.

The main controversy between the appellant and the respondents appears to be regarding two points, namely: (1) Whether or not the attempted rescission of the contract was made by the plaintiff with sufficient promptness after discovery by plaintiff of the alleged fraud of the defendants; and (2) whether or not a notice of such rescission was given to the defendants, coupled with an offer to restore to defendants "everything of value" which plaintiff had received "under the contract."

The complaint filed in the action contains allegations, in substance, that plaintiff and defendant E. G. Norton were the owners (subject to a mortgage of approximately $48,000) of a certain hotel property which, by arrangement between them, Norton was managing, and upon its sale was to share in the profits derived therefrom. It is alleged that said Norton and defendants J. R. and J. L. Milligan entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff of the value of her interest in the equity of said property, to which end said Norton made to plaintiff certain false representations regarding the losses which said Norton stated were being sustained through the operation of the hotel, and which losses required an immediate sale of the property in order that anything of value might be saved to plaintiff and said Norton; that by reason of such false representations plaintiff entered into an agreement with said defendants to sell to them, and that she did sell to them, her interest in the equity in said property for the sum of $6,000, payable $200 in cash and the balance of $5,800 by a promissory note of E. G. Norton and his wife, Daisy Norton, secured by a fourth mortgage on certain property, and certain trust deed notes of the purported value of $5,000, which said defendants E. G. Norton and J. R. Milligan represented to plaintiff "were good, and that the same were of the actual value of $5,000; that said statements were made as representations of fact and were not given as opinions; that the said defendants further represented and stated that the same had always paid interest as called for under the terms thereof"; that, believing in said statements and relying solely thereon, plaintiff accepted the promissory note of said defendants, together with said collateral security, in full consideration for her interest in the equity in the property involved, but that, as a matter of fact, the said trust deed notes were of no greater value than the sum of $100, and that the fourth mortgage was thereafter rendered of no value by reason of the sale of the mortgaged property under a prior trust deed; "that the real facts concerning said promissory note and the said trust deed notes were not discovered by plaintiff until on or about May, 1922," at which time plaintiff "learned for the first time the true value of said collateral security," and at that time was informed that nothing had been paid upon the said trust deed notes, and that no interest had been paid thereon; "that said plaintiff first learned of the fraud practiced upon her in misrepresenting the financial condition of said hotel and actual value of her equity therein, on or about the 1st day of August, 1922"; that defendant Norton never made any accounting to plaintiff of his dealings in the operation of said hotel from the 8th day of May, 1920, to the 7th day of May, 1921, and that he has received and converted profits of said business in the sum of $1,000; that between the 7th day of January, 1921, and the date of the commencement of the action, to wit, August 2, 1922, defendants Milligan received and converted profits from the said hotel business amounting to the sum of $1,000; "that plaintiff is ready, able, and willing, and hereby offers, to restore to the said defendants the said sum of $200, the said promissory note, and the said trust deed notes, as they may be respectively entitled to receive the same; that plaintiff further offers to do equity toward any other defendant herein concerned;" that on and after the 10th day of July, 1922, defendants Brock and Robinson were in the exclusive possession of the hotel, and on the 1st day of August, 1922, plaintiff informed said last-named defendants of her election to rescind her agreement whereby said defendants Milligan were alleged to have obtained their apparent interest therein, and that such attempted rescission was based upon the fraud of the said defendants Milligan and Norton; that upon a proper accounting from defendants Milligan and Norton plaintiff would be entitled to receive a greater amount than the value of the trust deed notes, together with the sum of $200 in cash; "that through the fraudulent concealment of said defendants plaintiff was unable, prior to the commencement of this action, to ascertain what amount or what property the said defendants are in equity entitled to receive upon rescission; that to her best information and belief said defendants are entitled to nothing, and plaintiff is entitled to retain everything now in her possession in satisfaction of, or as security for, the amounts due her by said defendants; that the said defendants Milligan and Norton, since on or about August, 1921, have asserted conflicting claims upon said * * * trust notes and plaintiff had no information prior to the commencement of this action as to which of said defendants, if either of them, were entitled to receive the same; that by the actions of said defendants as aforesaid, the circumstances attending rescission herein have been complicated and the terms of an equitable rescission can be determined only by a judicial examination thereof." It is further alleged that on or about the 27th day of February, 1922, the said defendants Milligan and Norton "failed and neglected to pay their indebtedness which was secured by prior trust deed upon the real property mortgaged to this plaintiff as security for said note of $5,800; that thereupon, after due notice to said defendants, a sale was had by the trustee under such trust deed; * * *" also that defendants Lillian Milligan, Nancy Milligan, and Daisy Norton have no interest in the controversy "except as the wives" of the respective defendants Milligan and Norton.

The complaint also contains an allegation to the effect that any notice of rescission other than that given would have been an idle act; that none of the defendants suffered any injury or prejudice by reason of the delay in bringing the action. The action was commenced on August 2, 1922.

From the foregoing it will appear that the first intimation that plaintiff had of "the true value of said collateral security" was approximately 3 months before the action was commenced, and "that said plaintiff first learned of the fraud practiced upon her in misrepresenting the financial condition of said hotel and actual value of her equity therein on or about the 1st day of August, 1922," which was the day before she instituted proceedings against defendants. In addition thereto, it should be noted that on February 27, 1922, which was several months prior to such "discovery" by plaintiff, defendants Milligan and Norton failed to pay their indebtedness, which was secured by a prior trust deed upon the real property mortgaged to the plaintiff, and that said property was sold under foreclosure proceedings.

When the right to rescind exists, section 1691 of the Civil Code prescribes the mode of rescission which must be pursued. It is as follows:

"Rescission, when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by the use, on the part of the party rescinding, of reasonable diligence to comply with the following rules:

"1. He must rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind; and,

"2. He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so."

It is urged by appellant that the discovery by her 3 months before the action was commenced, of the true facts relating to the collateral security for the $5,800 indebtedness of defendants on account of the purchase price of plaintiff's interest in the equity in the hotel was not such knowledge as is contemplated by the statute. Section 19 of the Civil Code provides that—

"Every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact."

The primary question, then, is whether or not the failure of defendants Norton and Milligan to pay their indebtedness, which was secured by a prior trust deed upon the real property mortgaged to plaintiff as security for their note to plaintiff in the sum of $5,800, resulting in a foreclosure as to plaintiff's and defendants' rights in such mortgaged property, coupled with the discovery by plaintiff in May, 1922, "of the real facts concerning said promissory note and the said trust deed notes," were sufficient circumstances to put her "upon inquiry as to the particular fact" that she had been defrauded in the transaction by which she sold to defendants Norton and Milligan the property in question.

[1] As is said in the case of Lady Washington Consolidated Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 P. 809:

"As the means of knowledge are equivalent to knowledge, if it appears that the plaintiff had notice or information of circumstances which would put him on an inquiry which, if followed, would lead to knowledge, or that the facts were presumptively within his knowledge, he will be deemed to have had actual knowledge of these facts"—citing cases.

[2, 3] The difficulty encountered consists, not so much in ascertaining the general rule applicable to the inquiry, but in its application to the facts of the case. It is clear that the knowledge which one obtains, and the possession of which is urged as being sufficient to require further inquiry by such person, must be directly related to the ultimate knowledge in question; or, the known facts must be such that to a person of ordinary care and prudence further inquiry would not only be suggested but imperatively demanded, to the end that the truth with reference to the main fact may be disclosed. "The circumstances must be such that the inquiry becomes a duty, and the failure to make it a negligent omission." Tarke v. Bingham, 123 Cal. 163, 166, 55 P. 759, 760. To charge one with notice "the facts must be such as ordinarily to excite inquiry with reference to the particular fact which the inquiry is designed to elicit." 20 R. C. L. 350.

In the case of Wilkerson v. Thorp, 128 Cal. 221, 224, 60 P. 679, 681, the court, in discussing the point here under consideration, uses the following language:

"Constructive notice is a knowledge of such facts, that the party possessing such knowledge is conclusively presumed to know other things besides the facts which have been proven to have come to his knowledge. The information or knowledge of facts possessed by a party must be such that he is conclusively presumed to have notice of the main fact to which the constructive notice is invoked."

In the instant case the main fact was whether or not misrepresentation had been made regarding the financial losses in the operation of the hotel which were the inducement to plaintiff to enter into the contract of sale of her interest in the equity in the premises. The facts of which she acquired knowledge were, briefly, in substance, that a part of the security for the payment to her of the consideration for the transfer of her interest had failed, and that statements made by defendants Norton and Milligan to the effect that all interest payments, in connection with the trust deed notes affecting their security for the said debt owing to plaintiff, had been made, were untrue. In other words, the alleged losses in the operation of the hotel were what induced plaintiff to sell, and the later knowledge which she obtained had entirely to do with the consideration which she was to receive for the sale of her interest.

[4] It may be said that one who would deliberately make a misstatement as to one material fact affecting a transaction should be distrusted as to any and all other material statements affecting the matter, and that, because of the distrust thus engendered, the person interested in the truth of facts concerned in the transaction would be put upon inquiry regarding every fact involved therein; that is to say, his suspicions having been aroused because of one misrepresentation, it thereupon became his bounden duty thoroughly to investigate as to every other representation which in any way had induced the interested person to enter into the contract.

But the allegations of the complaint show that the representation as to the losses which were being sustained in the operation of the hotel and the consequent inability of the owners to meet payments which would become due on the property were what actually led plaintiff to enter into the agreement for the sale of her interest in the equity. Misrepresentations by defendants with reference to the securities for the payment to plaintiff of the consideration for the transfer, while intimately connected with the transaction, were entirely distinct from any misrepresentation regarding the losses arising from the operation of the hotel. It follows that, in order to protect her rights in the premises, plaintiff was not obliged to "rescind promptly" on the discovery by her of the fact relating to the payment of interest on the trust deed notes, or the fact that other security held by her had failed.

[5] As heretofore stated, the only allegation with reference to the notice of rescission, in substance, is that plaintiff informed defendants Brock and Robinson, who were in possession of the property, "of her election to rescind her agreement whereby defendants Milligan obtained their apparent interest therein, and that said rescission was based upon the fraud of the said defendants Milligan and Norton."

[6] The general rule is that the act of rescission by one party to the agreement implies some notice to the other party thereto of an intention and determination to extinguish the contract. McGue v. Rommel, 148 Cal. 539, 83 P. 1000, and cases therein cited; Brown v. Domestic Utilities Mfg. Co., 172 Cal. 733, 159 P. 163. Notwithstanding such rule, there are authorities to the effect that "the intention to repudiate sufficiently appears where the party seeking to rescind institutes against the other legal proceedings based upon a disaffirmance of the contract." 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 645, and cases cited. In this state, however, in view of the many decisions affecting the general subject of rescission, there can be no doubt but that ordinarily, in order that the action may be maintained, in the absence of circumstances excusing a preliminary notice of rescission and offer to restore to defendant everything of value received by the plaintiff, the complaint must contain an allegation, and the proof must show, that such notice has been given and such offer to restore has been made. Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 P. 369, 52 P. 797, where the authorities are reviewed; Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 531; Lupton v. Domestic Utilities Mfg. Co., 173 Cal. 415, 160 P. 241; Conlin v. Studebaker Brothers, 175 Cal. 395, 165 P. 1009; Richards v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 7 Cal. App. 387, 94 P. 393, where many authorities are cited; Crouch v. Wilson, 183 Cal. 576, 191 P. 916; Taylor v. Hammel, 39 Cal. App. 205, 178 P. 547.

[7, 8] In the leading case of California F. & F. Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 91 P. 593, the several exceptions to the general rule requiring a preliminary notice of rescission and offer to restore are stated, among which may be noted the following: (1) Where the plaintiff is entitled to retain that which he has received; (2) where the rights of the defendant can be fully protected by the decree, or where an accounting is necessary to determine the relative rights of the parties; (3) where, without any fault of the plaintiff, peculiar complications have arisen which make it impossible for plaintiff to offer full restoration.

It should be remembered that on a determination of the matter submitted to the trial court plaintiff was entitled to have taken at full face value each and every allegation contained in the complaint. With reference to the several exceptions just noted to the general rule requiring preliminary notice and offer to restore, an examination of the complaint shows that, as to the first exception, plaintiff is not only entitled to retain the $200 which she received on the sale of her interest in the equity of the hotel property, but also a considerable sum in addition thereto. As to the second exception, the rights of the plaintiff and the defendants regarding the executed instruments of the respective parties could be fully protected by the decree; and, assuming the truthfulness of plaintiff's allegations, an accounting between plaintiff and each of defendants Norton and Milligan was necessary to determine their respective rights. Regarding the third exception, still assuming the facts to be in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, without any fault of the plaintiff, peculiar complications existed with reference to a settlement of the conflicting claims among the several defendants as to the ownership of the trust deed notes held by plaintiff as collateral security. Finally, by the complaint plaintiff asserted her willingness and ability on a determination of the suit to fully restore to defendants everything of value which she had received from them and to do equity in the premises.

The instant action was commenced on the day following the discovery by plaintiff of the alleged fraud which had been practiced upon her by the defendants. The law abhors idle acts. A formal notice of rescission on the same day on which the suit was instituted would have given the defendants no information differing either in nature or extent from that contained in the allegations of the complaint; nor were defendants' rights in the premises in any manner changed or prejudiced by reason of the plaintiff's failure to give such notice.

[9] Adopting the language used by the Supreme Court in the case of California F. & F. Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 742, 91 P. 593, 596:

"We are therefore of the opinion that the circumstances shown by the complaint fully justify the failure of plaintiffs to offer to restore possession of the property before the commencement of the action, and bring the case within those classes of cases in which no such offer is necessary as a condition precedent to action."

The judgment is reversed.

GODEAU v. LEVY. (Civ. 4697.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞705(10)—Excessive speed must have contributed proximately to collision.

Mere fact that plaintiff's ambulance was traveling between 15 and 20 miles an hour at intersection, in violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 22, would not of itself constitute contributory negligence, but it must further affirmatively appear that such violation contributed proximately to collision.

2. Municipal corporations ☞706(5)—Finding violation of speed ordinance was not proximate cause of collision sustained.

In suit for injury to plaintiff's ambulance from collision, evidence held to sustain finding that collision was due solely to negligent acts of defendant, and that speed of ambulance, even if in violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 22, was not proximate cause of collision.

3. Appeal and error ☞907(4)—Assumed that trial court, in reaching conclusion as to responsibility for collision, was guided by use of diagram from which witnesses testified and which was not brought up on appeal.

In suit for damages to automobile from collision, where witnesses to accident illustrated their testimony before trial court on diagram, which was not brought up with record on appeal, it must be assumed that trial court, in reaching conclusion as to responsibility for accident, was guided to some extent by use of diagram.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Jules S. Godeau against Morton Levy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O'Brien & Murphy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Action for damages to property resulting from a collision between a motor ambulance belonging to plaintiff and defendant's automobile. The collision occurred shortly after 7 o'clock in the evening of April 30, 1921, at the intersection of Franklin and Fulton streets, San Francisco. The action was tried by the court without a jury. Plaintiff was awarded judgment in the sum of $577.75. The defendant appeals.

The sole point made by appellant is that respondent's right of recovery is barred because of the alleged contributory negligence on the part of the driver of respondent's ambulance. In this connection it is contended that the evidence of respondent shows that said ambulance was traveling between 15 and 20 miles an hour at said intersection in violation of section 22 of the state Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 220), which limits the speed of automobiles, when approaching or traversing an intersecting highway, to 15 miles an hour.

[1] Assuming, however, that said ambulance was traveling at that rate of speed at that point, such fact alone would not constitute contributory negligence. It is necessary that it further affirmatively appear that such violation contributed proximately to the happening of the accident. The trial court found against appellant on that issue upon a state of facts from which, we think, the inference may be clearly drawn that the speed of the ambulance had nothing to do with the cause of the accident.

[2] The substance of the evidence supporting the findings may be briefly stated as follows: The ambulance was being driven northerly along the easterly side of Franklin street. As it approached the intersection of Fulton street, both the gong and the siren were sounded. Appellant's automobile was traveling easterly down Fulton street, and as it approached the intersection of Franklin street was maintaining a speed estimated to be upwards of 30 miles an hour. After the ambulance entered the intersection, the driver thereof observed the fast approach of appellant's machine, which was then 50 or 60 feet westerly of the intersection and traveling a little to the left of the middle line of Fulton street. As the ambulance neared the center of the intersection, appellant's machine apparently headed directly toward said ambulance, making it necessary for the ambulance driver, in order to avoid being struck, to change his course slightly to the right. Appellant, being unable to prevent a collision by stopping his car, owing to the excessive rate of speed he was traveling, swung sharply to the left, as if to turn up Franklin street, and in doing so his machine swerved, the right rear end thereof striking the left rear end of the ambulance, injuring the taillight and fender of said ambulance and forcing it into an electric light pole, demolishing the radiator of the ambulance and quite generally wrecking the front end thereof. Following the impact, appellant's machine continued on for about 75 feet across Franklin street finally being stopped in a lot on the northeast corner of said intersection. It is apparent, we think, from the evidence above narrated, that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the collision was due solely to the negligent acts of the appellant, and therefore the finding of the trial court upon the issue of contributory negligence must be sustained. Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 221 P. 376; Rodgers v. Le Baron, 58 Cal. App. 665, 209 P. 216; Shank v. Blackburn, 53 Cal. App.

[3] Furthermore, witnesses to the accident illustrated their testimony before the trial court upon a diagram which has not been brought up with the record on appeal. It must be therefore assumed that the trial court, in reaching its conclusions as to the responsibility for the accident, was guided, to some extent at least, by the use of said diagram. Emerick v. Johnson, 64 Cal. App. 460, 221 P. 675.

The cases cited by appellant are distinguishable from the one before us, in that the circumstances of those accidents were such that, on appeal, it could be readily declared, as a matter of law, that the negligent acts relied upon as barring the right of recovery contributed proximately to the causes of the accidents, and that no reasonable inference could be drawn to the contrary. Here the evidence presents a situation fully justifying the inference that the alleged negligent act of respondent's driver, if committed at all, did not contribute to the happening of the collision.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS et al. (Cr. 842.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 27, 1925.)

1. Criminal law §696(4)—Accused's counsel, desiring that answers to particular questions be stricken, should have specified them in motion to strike.

Accused's counsel, who desired that answers to particular questions be stricken, should have specified them in motion to strike.

2. Criminal law §338(7)—Cross-examination as to use by accused of assumed names held improper.

Cross-examination as to use by accused of assumed names held improper, where there was no issue or dispute as to accused's true name, and no other circumstance justifying reference to assumed names.

3. Criminal law §338(7)—Questioning accused as to whether he had been arrested under another name held improper.

Questioning accused as to whether he had been arrested under another name held improper.

4. Criminal law §1036(2) 1044—Impropriety of asking accused whether he had not used assumed name and been arrested under another name held waived.

Impropriety of asking accused whether he had not used assumed name and been arrested under another name held not ground for complaint, where accused's counsel failed timely to object and to make specific motion to strike.

5. Criminal law §1169(1)—Erroneous reception in evidence of testimony that accused passed under other names held not reversible error.

Erroneous reception in evidence of testimony that accused has passed under other names held not a miscarriage of justice requiring reversal, where it did not appear verdict of jury was induced by the reception of the incompetent testimony.

6. Robbery §27(6)—Requested instruction as to accused's attempt in good faith to take money from witness under claim of title held properly refused as not justified by evidence.

Requested instruction, as to accused's attempt in good faith to take money from person of prosecuting witness under claim of title, held properly refused as not justified by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Frank Williams and George O'Neil were convicted of an attempt to commit robbery, and second named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. Hendricksen and A. R. Price, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JONES, Justice pro tem. The defendants were jointly charged with the crime of attempt to commit robbery. They were tried jointly, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged as to each defendant. The defendant Williams waived time for the imposing of sentence, and judgment was thereupon pronounced against him. The defendant O'Neil made a motion for new trial, which was denied, and from the order denying the motion, and from the judgment which followed, he has appealed.

On the evening of October 19, 1924, the defendants were with one Woolwine, the complaining witness, in the city of Sacramento. They were patronizing different saloons, and Woolwine became badly intoxicated. After midnight the three were seen by two policemen on M street, between Second and Third streets, and Woolwine was being supported by the defendants. Woolwine was pulling back from his two companions, and then the two officers saw Williams strike Woolwine a blow in the face, causing the latter to fall to the sidewalk. Officer Gorman testified that Williams looked in the direction he and his fellow officer were coming; that O'Neil had got on top of Woolwine; and that Williams holloed, "Look out, the bulls are coming," and started to walk away from his associates. He was placed under arrest by Officer Redding, while Gorman pulled O'Neil off of Woolwine. It was the testimony of Gorman that, as he pulled O'Neil up, the latter's hand came out of Woolwine's trouser pocket, and that he heard Woolwine say, "Take it all, but don't beat me." In rebuttal this same witness was asked the following question by the district attorney:

"Now, I will ask you if at any time the defendant O'Neil stated that the reason he was putting his hand, or going through Mr. Woolwine's pocket, was to get $5 that he claimed that Woolwine owed him?"

To this question the witness replied:

"He did, when we had him at the box up there at Third and L, there was the three standing there together; he says: 'I want this man taken in, too.' I says: 'We will take him as a witness; we have got to take him in.' That is the time he says that he owed him $5; he said that is the way he was going to get it."

When under cross-examination, the appellant denied that he had made the statement incorporated in the question of the district attorney, but admitted that he had told the officer that Woolwine owed him over $5; to bring Woolwine along; that he figured he had $5 coming to him as change.

The defendants did not deny that Williams had knocked Woolwine to the ground but they testified that Woolwine had become quarrelsome and had struck Williams, who returned the blow and then started to walk away to avoid further trouble. The appellant, according to his testimony, then bent over Woolwine to see if his head was cut, as, in falling he had hit a glass door and broken the pane; and, while bending over Woolwine, he fell on top of the prostrate man, from which position he was raised to his feet by the officer. He contended that he fell because of his intoxicated condition, but the officer and another witness would not concede that he was under the influence of liquor.

On this appeal the appellant contends that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to two questions asked the complaining witness on cross-examination; in permitting certain questions to be asked by the district attorney of the defendant Williams; in admitting the testimony of the witness Max P. Fisher; and in refusing to give an instruction requested by the defendants.

While the court might properly have allowed the two questions asked by counsel for defendants, yet it cannot be held that prejudicial error resulted, for, assuming that affirmative answers would have been given by the witness, yet it is difficult to believe, from an examination of the entire record, that a different result would have been produced by such answers.

[1] While under cross-examination the defendant Williams was asked by the district attorney, without objection, if he had not gone under several different names. His answer was, "No," as to each name specified. He was then asked "Weren't you arrested under the name of Johnson in Los Angeles in 1920?" to which he answered "No, no." Counsel for defendants then remarked, "Now, we submit, if your honor please, that that is improper cross-examination." After several similar questions had been asked, and had been answered in the negative, counsel for defendants then asked that "all the answers—questions and answers be all stricken out," which motion was not granted. The objection of counsel was interposed after the witness had answered. If he had then desired that the answers be not allowed to stand to these particular questions, he should have specified them in his motion.

[2-5] There can be no question that the questions asked the witness as to his use of assumed names did not, in this case, constitute proper cross-examination, as there was no issue or dispute as to his true name, and there was no other circumstance justifying them. People v. Mohr, 157 Cal. 732, 109 P. 476; People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 136 P. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881. The impropriety of asking the witness if he had been arrested under another name is too evident to call for the citation of authority, and had timely objection and a specific motion to strike been made, counsel's contention that the court had committed error in regard to these matters would have been of greater merit. The situation, however, as to the testimony of the witness Fisher, is somewhat different, for that witness, who was the identification expert of the Sacramento police department, was permitted to testify, over the objection of defendants, that Williams had passed by the names suggested. Some testimony was elicited from this witness on cross-examination which tended to show that the defendant had been arrested under other names. The court endeavored to limit the testimony of the witness to the matter of the use of other names, and, on motion, struck out the answers as to previous arrests. That the court erred in permitting the witness to testify, after timely objection had been made, that Williams had passed under the other names, there can be no doubt, and the question then arises: Did the error cause a miscarriage of justice? The evidence presented by the prosecution made a strong case against the defendants, and the case was not, so far as a reading of the record discloses, weakened by the explanations given by the accused men; in fact, it may be said that their evidence tended to corroborate the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution as to some of the vital points in the case. It therefore does not clearly appear that the verdict of the jury was induced by the admission of this incompetent testimony, and we are constrained to hold that no miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom.

[6] Defendants requested the following instruction, which the court refused to give:

"You are instructed that if you find that the defendant O'Neil attempted to take property from the person and possession of the prosecuting witness, and you further find that he believed in good faith such property to be his own and that he endeavored to take the same under claim of title in himself, he is not guilty of the crime charged."

This instruction was properly refused, as there was no evidence in the case to support it. The appellant, in explaining his close proximity to Woolwine when arrested, testified that, when stooping over Woolwine to see if his head was cut, he had fallen over because he was intoxicated. There is, in this explanation, no claim that he was endeavoring to recover property belonging to him, and he denied having made any statement that he was making such an effort, thus repudiating any such claim. No error, then, was committed by the court in refusing to give the offered instruction.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

SIMONS BRICK CO. v. HETZEL et al.
(Civ. 4322.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 25, 1925.)

1. Mortgages $\hookrightarrow$ 186(5)—Evidence that work was begun on lot before filing mortgage for record held sufficient to sustain judgment for lien claimant over mortgage.

In actions to foreclose mechanic's liens, evidence that work was begun on land in question before filing defendant's mortgage thereon held sufficient to sustain judgment giving lien claimants priority over mortgage.

2. Mechanics' liens $\hookrightarrow$ 168—"Commencement of work," giving subsequent incumbrancers notice of mechanic's lien, held to require work and labor, effects of which are apparent.

"Commencement of work" necessary to give notice of right to mechanic's lien, taking precedence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1186, over subsequent incumbrancers, requires some work and labor on ground, effects of which are apparent, such as beginning to dig foundation, or work of like description.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Visible Commencement of Work.]

3. Mechanics' liens $\hookrightarrow$ 168—Mortgages $\hookrightarrow$ 151(3)—Subcontractor held to have lien from date of commencement of work on building; mechanics' lien held prior to mortgage.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1186, relating to effect of mechanics' liens, provided for by section 1183, subcontractors performing labor and furnishing materials under contract between owner and contractor, are entitled to lien which relates back to time of commencement of work on building, so as to take priority over mortgage recorded subsequent thereto, notwithstanding failure to file original contract as required by section 1183.

4. Mechanics' liens $\hookrightarrow$ 95—Statute held not to differentiate between liens arising out of direct contract with owner and those accruing through contract between owner and contractor; "direct lien."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1313, providing that liens provided in that chapter should be "direct liens," term "direct liens" includes those arising under duly recorded contract as well as those where no contract has been filed for record, and no difference is made between liens arising from a direct contract with the owner and those accruing through a contract between the owner and the contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Lien.]

5. Mechanics' liens $\hookrightarrow$ 132(4)—Failure of subcontractor to file claim within 30 days after completion of work held not to render lien invalid.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing for time of filing claims of liens, fact, that subcontractor did not file claims for lien for record within 30 days after furnishing last work and material, did not render lien invalid, where lien claim was filed within 30 days after filing notice of completion, and 90 days had not elapsed from date of actual completion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Suits by the Simons Brick Company against Valentine Hetzel and others, by L. R. Anderson against G. C. Harbolt and others, by Campbell & Ward against the Harbolt Hotel Corporation and others, and by the F. E. Newberry Electric Company against Valentine Hetzel and others. In each suit the defendant Western Loan & Building Company cross-complained. Judgment for plaintiff in each suit, and cross-complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Bieksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richard J. O. Culver, G. C. De Garmo, and Glen Behymer, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The Harbolt Hotel Corporation was, on the 17th day of April, 1917, the owner of a certain lot in the city of Los Angeles, and on said day said company entered into a written contract with one Valentine Hetzel for the erection on said lot of a hotel building. Said contract was not filed for record in the office of the county recorder of said county until the 9th day of June, 1917. On April 30, 1917, said hotel company executed a mortgage upon said real property in favor of appellant, the Western Loan & Building Company, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $42,972.50, and said mortgage was, on the 7th day of June, 1917, duly filed for record in the office of the said county recorder. Thereafter, respondents performed labor and furnished material in the construction of said hotel building, under said contract between said hotel company and the said Hetzel. Failing to receive payment for said labor and materials, they filed liens for the respective amounts due them, and thereafter instituted their actions for the foreclosure of such liens. The court rendered judgment in favor of said lien claimants, the respondents herein, not only sustaining their liens but decreeing that said liens were prior and superior to the mortgage lien of the Western Loan & Building Company, the appellant herein.

[1] The court found that, prior to the execution and recordation of appellant's said mortgage, and on or about the 17th day of May, 1917, but prior to June 1, 1917, said contractor Valentine Hetzel, in pursuance of the said contract for the construction of said hotel, began the erection and construction of said building and continued work thereon until the early part of November of said year. Appellant contends that the construction of said building was not commenced until after its mortgage had been filed for record in the office of said county recorder, and it attacks the finding of the court that the said contractor began the erection of said building prior to the 7th of June, 1917, as unjustified by the evidence. In support of this contention, appellant refers to the testimony of F. H. Gentry and J. D. Brady to the effect that they visited the real property in question on the morning of the 7th day of June, 1917, for the purpose of seeing that work upon the building had not been commenced before the mortgage was recorded. These two witnesses both stated that they went upon said lot on said day and found no evidence of any work having been done on the building or indicating that the construction of said building had been commenced. And, furthermore, that there was no building material or machinery of any kind upon the lot at this time.

Appellant calls our attention to the fact that these two witnesses were the only witnesses who testified at the trial as to the appearance or condition of said lot on the 7th day of June, 1917, the date the mortgage was recorded, and that therefore their testimony is uncontradicted. But there was testimony that some time during the latter part of May or the first part of June, 1917, and one witness in one part of his testimony puts the time as two days before appellant's mortgage was recorded, a firm by the name of Faulkner & Hobson, as subcontractors under the original contractor Hetzel, were at work upon said lot, making excavations thereon to be used and which were actually used thereafter in the erection of said building; that said subcontractors excavated a trench along the front line of said lot about 60 feet in length and 3 or 4 feet in depth, and they spent two days in making such excavations, when they were stopped in said work because it was found that appellant's mortgage had not been recorded. Furthermore, that before these subcontractors had quit the premises, the witness F. H. Gentry, who represented appellant in certain matters and who testified that he went upon the lot on the morning of June 7, 1917, for the express purpose of seeing whether any work had been begun upon the building, visited the property and stated to the original contractor, Mr. Hetzel, "This work has to stop as the mortgage has not been recorded." He was informed by Mr. Hetzel that, "We are just quitting. Harbolt was here and told us about it." The subcontractors thereupon quit all work and removed all their machinery and tools from said lot. After the mortgage had been recorded they resumed the work of excavating for the building, but being unable to give the bond required of them, they ceased work altogether before finishing their contract.

[2] As to just what is meant by the term "commencement of work" and as to the amount and character of work necessary to be done upon a building in order to say that work has been begun thereon, we think the true rule is stated in Phillips on Mechanics' Liens (3d Ed.) p. 387, where it is said:

"What this law means is some work and labor on the ground, the effects of which are apparent—easily seen by everybody; such as beginning to dig the foundation, or work of like description, which every one can readily see and recognize as the commencement of a building."

Applying this rule to the evidence before the court in this action, we cannot say that such evidence is not sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that work was commenced upon the building prior to the time that appellant's mortgage was filed for record.

[3] Appellant's main contention on this appeal, however, is that the lien of its mortgage is superior and prior to the liens of respondents, even conceding that work was commenced upon the building before its mortgage had been recorded. Section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows:

"Effect of Liens. The liens provided for in this chapter are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement, or structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished; also, to any lien, mortgage or other incumbrance of which the lienholder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time the building, improvement or structure was commenced, work done, or the materials were commenced to be furnished."

In the case of McClain v. Hutton, 131 Cal. 132, 61 P. 273, 63 P. 182, 622, the Supreme Court, in construing the above section, held that where the contract between the owner and contractor was invalid by reason of the failure of the parties thereto to comply with section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, liens for labor performed and materials furnished, related back only to the time the work was done and the materials commenced to be furnished, and the court held that such liens were subsequent and inferior to the lien of a mortgage filed for record after the building had been commenced but prior to the time the work was done and the materials were commenced to be furnished. The court in this case further held that:

"Under this provision [section 1186, Code Civ. Proc.] the cases must be divided into two categories, distinguished by the existence, or nonexistence, of a valid contract. In the former case [where there is a valid contract] the priority of the liens is to be determined by the date of the commencement of the building; in the latter by the time the work was done, or the materials commenced to be furnished."

As we understand this decision, the court held that where there was a valid contract, liens thereunder related back to the commencement of the building, but where the contract was invalid the liens related back only to the respective dates when the work was performed and the materials were commenced to be furnished. The reason of the rule thus enunciated we think is apparent. Under section 1183, as it stood at the time McClain v. Hutton was decided, the failure to record the contract rendered it "wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case, labor done and materials furnished by all persons * * * except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." But, where the contract was duly filed for record, all liens against the building were based primarily upon the contract, and the labor and material covered by the liens were deemed to have been performed and furnished under said contract. The section therefore divided liens into two classes, those arising under a valid contract between the owner and the contractor, and those where the labor done and materials furnished were deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner. This latter class included all liens of subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers, when there was no valid contract of record, and each of these persons by section 1183 was given a lien by virtue of an implied contract between him and the owner. As far as his right to a lien was concerned, he occupied the same relative position to the owner as if the latter had not made any general contract whatever, but had personally and directly bought the materials and employed the labor used in the construction of the building. In such a case, each laborer and materialman would depend for his lien upon his individual agreement with the owner, and his right to a lien would only commence when he began labor upon, or commenced to furnish material for, the building.

The liens of respondents herein, however, rest upon a somewhat different basis. Since the decision of McClain v. Hutton, supra, and in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1313) section 1183 was amended, and as then amended it is still in force. In its amended form it differs materially in its requirements from what it did prior thereto. It now contains no provision that for failure to record the original contract between the owner and contractor, said contract shall be wholly void, or void at all, or invalid. Neither does it contain any provision that, when the contract is not filed for record, "the labor done and materials furnished shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner," nor any like provision. Under the section as it now stands, the contract, although not filed as required by the statute, is a valid and subsisting contract between the owner and contractor, and binding upon them and all persons furnishing labor or material for the building, except that when not recorded, the liens provided for by said section, except that of the contractor, shall not be limited by the amount of the contract price. All liens for labor done or materials furnished for the building primarily rest upon this contract and derive their validity therefrom. There is no contract, either express or implied, between the owner and the subcontractors, or others performing work or furnishing material for the building. Following, therefore, the reasoning of the court in McClain v. Hutton, supra, the liens of such persons, originating under and depending for their validity upon the original contract, would date back to the time of the commencement of work upon the building.

There is nothing in the decision of Roystone v. Darling, 171 Cal. 526, 154 P. 15, which in any way conflicts with this conclusion. In the last-named case the court held that section 1183 described two classes of liens. One where the required bond and contract had been filed, in which case the amount of the liens is limited to the contract price of the building; and the other class, where the bond and contract have not been filed, in which case the liens, other than that of the contractor, are not so limited. The latter class of liens, the court held, were direct and independent of any account of indebtedness between the owner and contractor, as this clause is used in section 14 of the Act of 1911, amending said section 1183 and other sections of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the subject of liens of mechanics and others. Appellant argues that as the court held that this class of liens are direct liens, then they are deemed to arise by virtue of a contract direct with the owner, and, therefore, they relate back only to the time the work was done or materials were commenced to be furnished. We find nothing in this decision that would warrant such a construction. In fact, the court expressed some doubt as to the exact meaning of the term "direct liens" as used in said act (page 537 [154 P. 15]) and it expressly refrained from any attempt to define the meaning of these words. In view of the language of the Supreme Court, we would hesitate to express an opinion as to just what was meant by this term.

[4] We are satisfied, however, that a "direct lien," as the term is used in the amendment of 1911, does not mean a lien arising by virtue of a contract, express or implied, with the owner, as distinguished from a lien where a valid contract was properly filed. In the first place, while the law prior to 1911 expressly provided for a class of liens which were deemed to arise by virtue of a contract direct with the owner, the amended law contains no such provision. In the second place, section 1183, as amended in 1911, provides that "the liens in this chapter provided shall be direct liens." The chapter referred to is entitled "Liens of Mechanics and others upon real property," and embraces all of the law of the state upon the subject of liens of mechanics and others for labor done and material furnished in the construction of buildings, and "direct liens," referred to in section 1183 comprehend all liens, including those arising under a duly recorded contract, as well as those where no contract has been filed for record. To hold that, by the use of the term "direct liens" in this section, it was intended to differentiate liens arising by virtue of a direct contract with the owner from those accruing through a contract between the owner and the contractor, would be to give this section a construction unwarranted by its context. There is nothing, therefore, either in the decision of Roystone v. Darling, or in said section 1183, that would justify this court in holding that upon the failure to file the original contract, as prescribed by said section, the liens relate back only to the time when the work and materials specified in the liens were done or commenced to be furnished.

The respondents in this action, having performed labor and furnished materials under a contract between the owner and contractor, are entitled to liens for such labor and materials; and as such contract was a valid contract, their liens relate back to the date of the commencement of the work upon the building. Their liens are therefore prior to that of appellant's mortgage, which was not filed for record until after the commencement of said work.

[5] Appellant makes a further contention that respondents, in order to perfect their liens, or to give them any vitality whatever, were required to file their respective claims of lien for record within 30 days after they had respectively furnished their last work and material. We think this contention is answered by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for the time of filing claims of lien. In a recent decision our Supreme Court has held, in a case where the contract between the owner and contractor had not been filed as required by section 1183, as amended in 1911, that a claim of lien filed within 30 days after the filing of notice of completion is sufficient, provided 90 days have not elapsed from the date of actual completion. Bird v. American Surety Co., 175 Cal. 625, 631, 166 P. 1009. Respondents, in filing their claims, met the requirements of said section 1187 as construed by this decision of our Supreme Court.

For the reasons hereinbefore expressed, judgment is affirmed.

5. Certiorari ☞71—Petitioner not entitled to recover costs against superior court for entering erroneous dismissal of appeal.

Petitioner for writ of certiorari held not entitled to recover costs against superior court for entering an erroneous dismissal of his appeal regularly perfected, where no application was made to superior court for relief.

Application by Roy C. Corrigan for certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court in and for the County of Solano, dismissing an appeal from justice court. Judgment annulled.

Lindauer & Horan, of Vallejo, for petitioner.

Russell F. O'Hara, of Vallejo, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. [1] Petitioner applies for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the superior court dismissing an appeal, on questions of law alone, from a judgment of the justice's court of Vallejo township, Solano county. Both the petition and the return show that the appeal was regularly perfected, and that it was argued upon the merits in the superior court by counsel for the respective parties and submitted to the court for decision of the questions of law involved therein. No motion to dismiss the appeal was made. The clerk's record shows the entry of a judgment dismissing the appeal. From affidavits presented at the hearing in this court, which cannot be considered, of course, for the purpose of impeaching the record, it appears that the court ordered the affirmance of the judgment, and the judgment of dismissal was inadvertently entered by the clerk.

In Buckley v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 119, 31 P. 8, it was held by a divided court that the writ of certiorari will not lie to annul a judgment of dismissal of an appeal, even though such judgment is "entirely without support in the law." The decision in that case, however, has been overruled. Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 474, 114 P. 978. See, also, Peacock v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 701, 126 P. 976; Lucchesi v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 229 P. 996; Hellner v. Superior Court, 61 Cal. App. 785, 215 P. 709; Terminal Railway v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. App. 586, 192 P. 116; Fest v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 95, 173 P. 610; Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 26 Cal. App. 289, 152 P. 957. "The dismissal of an appeal is in effect an affirmance of the judgment or order appealed from." Code Civ. Proc. § 955.

[2-4] A judgment of dismissal, however, implies that it is not a determination of the merits of the appeal. A dismissal applies "to a removal out of court prior to a judgment on the merits." 9 Cal. Jur. 595. "A dismissal of the appeal is nothing more or less than a refusal to proceed in the action." Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, su-

CORRIGAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SOLANO COUNTY. (Civ. 2959.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 22, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ☞670(1)—Affidavits not considered to impeach record on appeal.

Affidavits cannot be considered for purpose of impeaching record on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ☞803—Dismissal of appeal does not imply determination of merits.

A judgment of dismissal of an appeal implies that it is not a determination of the merits of the appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 955.

3. Appeal and error ☞803—Dismissal of appeal duly perfected is attempted abdication of jurisdiction which court must exercise.

Dismissal of appeal duly perfected is an attempted abdication of a jurisdiction which court must exercise.

4. Justices of the peace ☞166(5)—Superior court could enter judgment affirming judgment of justice court, where judgment dismissing appeal was void.

Where appeal from judgment of justice court was regularly perfected, and superior court ordered an affirmance, judgment of dismissal, inadvertently entered by clerk being void, superior court still had power to enter affirmance of justice's judgment in accordance with its original order.

pra. A dismissal of an appeal "duly perfected and diligently prosecuted * * * is in effect nothing more nor less than an attempted abdication of a jurisdiction which the court is bound in every proper case to exercise. It is, in other words, a refusal to decide a cause which it is the plain statutory duty of the court to decide." Edwards v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 710, 712, 115 P. 649, 650. Since the judgment entered by the clerk dismissing the appeal is void, and, according to the facts stated in the affidavits, it is not the judgment ordered by the court, it is still within the power of the superior court to enter a judgment affirming the judgment of the justice's court, in accordance with its original order. Edwards v. Superior Court, supra.

[5] In this case the superior court would doubtless have vacated the erroneous entry of dismissal of the appeal, if application had been made therefor. It will be the policy of this court in future to require that application be first made to the superior court for relief in similar cases. The petitioner is not entitled to recover costs from the respondent court or the judge thereof. Platnauer v. Superior Court, 33 Cal. App. 394, 165 P. 41.

The judgment dismissing the appeal from the justice's court is annulled.

GATES v. PENDLETON. (Civ. 4375.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District. Division 1, California. March 20, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 18, 1925.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 237(4)—Against one of parties originally made defendants not unauthorized.

Where action was dismissed as to all defendants excepting one before case came on for trial second time, judgment against the one held not unauthorized.

2. Evidence $\S$ 222(1)—Witnesses $\S$ 379(1)—Inconsistent statements of party may be considered as admission against interest as well as for impeachment.

Inconsistent statements of party to an action may be considered as admission against interest as well as for purpose of impeachment.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1099(3)—Holding that passenger in son's automobile might be found responsible for negligence of driver held law of the case.

Holding of Supreme Court that where automobile owner was asked to carry his father and fellow guests to entertainment, and declined invitation, but permitted his employé to drive the party, inference was warranted that father was in charge so as to be responsible for negligence of driver was law of the case on subsequent appeal, where jury could have found such facts.

4. Witnesses $\S$ 275(8)—Party called by adverse party may be examined by all parties.

A defendant called by plaintiff as a witness under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055, may be examined by codefendant represented by different counsel, under provisions of section 1846.

5. Evidence $\S$ 580—On second trial, testimony of deceased party on first trial admissible, though deceased dropped as party to suit.

In view of liberal construction required by Civ. Code, $\S$ 4; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 4, and in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1910, testimony of party called under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055, in former trial, and who had died prior to second trial, and as to whom case had been dismissed, could be received under section 1870, subd. 8, as being testimony of deceased witness in former action between same parties relating to same matter, there being no change as to parties affected.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 1050(1)—Merely cumulative evidence, even if calling for conclusion and hearsay, not reversible error.

In action against passenger in automobile as being responsible for injuries caused by driver, testimony of owner that he intrusted machine to defendant, even if calling for conclusion and hearsay, held harmless error as being merely cumulative.

7. New trial $\S$ 162(5)—Consent to remittitur signed by another than plaintiff's attorney with latter's authorization held sufficient.

Where plaintiff's attorney was temporarily absent from county, written consent to remittitur, required before court would deny motion for new trial, held sufficient when signed by attorney authorized to do so by plaintiff and his regular attorney, and afterwards ratified and confirmed by plaintiff in person.

8. New trial $\S$ 162(5)—Filing of required consent to remittitur in office of county clerk not ground for complaint.

Where court made conditional order requiring filing of written consent to reduction of judgment within certain fixed time, that consent was filed in office of county clerk held not ground for complaint.

9. New trial $\S$ 163(1)—That order denying motion was entered after regular office hours not ground for complaint.

Where trial court made conditional order that if plaintiff should file written consent to reduction of judgment new trial would be denied, that order denying motion was made and entered in minutes of court after regular office hours, on day fixed as date within which such consent had to be filed, held not ground for complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by W. W. Gates against C. W. Pendleton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, and Meserve & Meserve and C. W. Pendleton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas K. Case, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Because of personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in an automobile accident, he brought an action for damages against C. W. Pendleton, Sr., C. W. Pendleton, Jr., a man by the name of Houston, and a certain corporation.

The action has been twice tried. On the first hearing a motion for nonsuit was granted. An appeal from the judgment thereon rendered resulted in a reversal thereof. Gates v. Pendleton, 184 Cal. 797, 195 P. 664. Before the case came on for trial the second time C. W. Pendleton, Jr., died, and the action was dismissed as to all defendants excepting C. W. Pendleton, Sr. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

[1] Appellant's first claim for reversal in substance is that the action having been brought against several defendants, a judgment against one of such defendants is unauthorized. No authority in point is submitted by appellant, and we know of none which would sustain such contention.

It is next urged that the evidence shows that defendant was but a passenger in the automobile which collided with plaintiff, and that as such passenger defendant had no control of said automobile or its movements, or the driver thereof. It appears that one General C. F. A. Last was desirous of entertaining some of his friends at a certain clubhouse situated some distance outside of the city of Los Angeles, but that he did not have automobile transportation at his command sufficient to accommodate his intended guests in conveying them to and from the place where the clubhouse was located. Regarding the point under consideration, the testimony of C. W. Pendleton, Sr., on the second trial was to the effect that General Last "requested him to invite appellant's son (C. W. Pendleton, Jr.), to bring with him his automobile so that he, appellant's son, could take some of the guests to the place of celebration"; that at that time defendant's son was absent from home, but was expected to return on the morning of the day on which the trip was planned; that instead of talking with his son personally regarding the matter, C. W. Pendleton, Sr., sent word to his son by a young man who was in the son's employ, and that the result was that the son, being unable to attend the "celebration," in compliance with the request thus communicated, sent his automobile with the young man as the driver thereof. It was on the return trip from the clubhouse that the accident in question occurred.

When the case was tried the first time the testimony given by C. W. Pendleton, Sr., differed in its effect in certain important respects from that given by him on the second hearing. Apparently with that fact in mind, and for the purpose of impeaching the testimony given by said defendant on the second trial, counsel for plaintiff offered a part of the testimony given by defendant on the first trial as follows:

"A. Why, General Last suggested that if I knew of any one who had a car who could take a part of his party down to the place where we were going, he would invite him along as a guest; he would be very glad to have it, because he did not have enough automobiles arranged at that time to take the party, and I told him that my son had a car, and, while he was away, he was expected home early in the morning the day on which this excursion was fixed, and I would ask him to take us down, and I sent word to him by Tolle (the young man in the son's employ), as he left me at the corner, to tell my son and ask him if he would not go along and take a number of people that were there. Clarence (Tolle) came back alone, and said that my son, having just come home, told him that he had some things to attend to and would not go, but would let him have the car."

[2] While the general rule with reference to statements made by a witness which are inconsistent with the testimony of the witness is that such statements may be considered for the purpose only of reflecting upon the credibility of the witness, such rule does not wholly apply when the witness is a party to the action. Any statement so made by a party to an action may be considered, not only for the purpose of impeachment, but as an admission against interest as well. In the case of Hall v. Bark Emily Banning, 33 Cal. 522, plaintiff sued to recover the value of the contents of a trunk. On the trial plaintiff testified to the value of the property. Regarding such value, witnesses for the defendant testified to former statements made by plaintiff which were inconsistent with the testimony which she had given at the hearing of the action. Touching the effect of such testimony the court said:

"The latter testimony may be regarded in two aspects: First, as evidence tending to impeach the plaintiff as a witness; and second, as evidence of admissions of a party to the suit. Regarding the plaintiff as a witness, her declarations made out of court, differing from her statements as a witness in the case, tend to impeach her credit. And this is their only tendency. They are not competent evidence of any fact in issue. * * *

"The rule is settled beyond all controversy that the admissions or declarations of a party to a suit are admissible as evidence against the party making them. When given in evidence, they tend, as does other competent evidence, to prove the fact in issue to which they relate. We do not understand that the result of the permission given by statute to the parties to an action to testify in their own behalf, has blended in one, the different characters of party and witness, nor obliterated the distinction between admission of parties against interest, and statements out of court contradictory to their testimony at the trial."

[3] In the instant case we have one statement by defendant C. W. Pendleton, Sr., to the effect that General Last had requested said defendant to invite his son "to bring with him his automobile so that he, defendant's son, could take some of the guests to the place of celebration," and another important statement that General Last was desirous of having the son and his automobile for the purpose of conveying some of the guests, and that defendant had said that he would ask his son to take them down, and sent word to his son "to tell my son and ask him if he would not go along and take a number of people that were there."

Again referring to the case of Hall v. Bark Emily Banning, 33 Cal. 522, we find the rule laid down that, where the testimony given by a party to the action differs materially from his admissions, a conflict in the evidence is created. Assuming the correctness of such rule, the jury in the instant case had the right to believe the admissions of defendant, rather than the testimony which he gave. When the case was formerly before the Supreme Court (Gates v. Pendleton, 184 Cal. 797, 195 P. 664), the facts were assumed to be in accordance with the statements contained within defendant's said admissions, and it was held that in such circumstances, coupled with the further fact within defendant's knowledge (of which there is no dispute) that his son had declined the invitation to join the party, but had sent as a driver of the automobile the young man in his employ who had carried the message from the father to the son—the inference was reasonable that thereafter the father was in charge of the expedition, and was responsible for the negligence of the driver. It will thus be seen that the testimony adduced on the second hearing of the action, and which the jury had a right to determine presented the true facts in the case, was identical with the facts, when the appeal from the judgment based upon the ground of the motion for nonsuit in the first hearing was decided by the Supreme Court, as reported in 184 Cal. 797, 195 P. 664. As heretofore stated, the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court was in effect that on such facts C. W. Pendleton, Sr., was liable. In view of the fact that there is no substantial difference between the assumed facts in the action as presented on its first hearing and the facts which the jury undoubtedly determined to be true when the cause was heard the second time, the decision in 184 Cal. 797, 195 P. 664, became and is the law of the case, at least so far as the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment is concerned. Baird v. Baird, 193 Cal. 225, 223 P. 974; Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 163, 37 P. 147.

[4, 5] Complaint is made by appellant that the court erred to his prejudice in admitting in evidence on the second trial the testimony given by C. W. Pendleton, Jr., on the first hearing of the action. On the first trial the plaintiff called C. W. Pendleton, Jr., as a witness under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is appellant's contention that because that section provides, in part, that "such witness, when so called, may be examined by his own counsel," appellant, who was represented by different counsel from that representing C. W. Pendleton, Jr., was precluded from any examination of such witness. The statute, however, is entitled to a broader construction. In itself it contains the provision that "a party to the record * * * may be examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination, subject to the rules applicable to the examination of other witnesses"; and by section 1846 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that "a witness * * * can be heard only in the presence and subject to the examination of all the parties, if they choose to attend and examine." By considering the two statutes together, it is plain that the construction for which appellant contends is untenable.

Subdivision 8 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that evidence may be given upon the trial of "the testimony of a witness deceased, * * * given in a former action between the same parties, relating to the same matter."

It is urged that because death had removed C. W. Pendleton, Jr., as a party to the action, the statute which requires that in order that his testimony be admissible, the action must be "between the same parties" has no application to the instant facts. In other words, when C. W. Pendleton, Jr., gave his testimony the action involved persons differing from those affected by the action when his testimony was sought to be used in evidence.

The case of People v. Bird, 132 Cal. 261, 263, 64 P. 259, is authority for the statement that at common law the testimony of a witness given on a former trial of a case between the same parties was admissible for or against either party to the action, upon showing that such witness was either dead or without the jurisdiction of the court; and that before the adoption of the codes such rule was sanctioned and employed in this state (citing cases). Since the enactment of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure the courts have repeatedly construed that section in accordance with the common-law rule, and have uniformly adhered to the principle. Meyer v. Foster, 147 Cal. 166, 81 P. 402; Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 182 P. 281; Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 163, 37 P. 147; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 14, 27 P. 942, 49 Am. Rep. 679.

Section 1910 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"The parties are deemed to be the same when those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case, and a judgment or other determination could in that case have been made between them alone, though other parties were joined with both or either."

Considering such sections in connection with the provisions of subdivision 8 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, with reference to "the same parties," it is clear that "those between whom the evidence (of C. W. Pendleton, Jr.), is offered were on opposite sides" when the case was first tried, and that "a judgment * * * could in that case have been made between" the plaintiff therein and C. W. Pendleton, Sr., "though other parties were joined with either or both."

It is also apparent that a judgment against all the parties defendant in the instant action would have been equally effective as to each of them, and that on the payment thereof by any one of them no right in him to contribution by the others would have existed. While, strictly speaking, after the death of C. W. Pendleton, Jr., the action as then subsisting was not "between the same parties," in common sense and understanding there was no change as to the parties affected. It is a rule of construction that the provisions of the code "are to be liberally construed" with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. Section 4, Civ. Code; section 4, Code Civ. Proc. In the case of Briggs v. Briggs, 80 Cal. 253, 22 P. 334, it is declared that the long-settled and beneficial rule of evidence, like that which permits depositions taken in an action between two parties to be used in evidence in an action between the successors in interest of such parties, should not be abrogated by a strict construction of the language of the statute, and that the phrase "the same parties" should not limit the use of evidence otherwise admissible to those persons whose names appear of record in the action. See, also, Fredericks v. Judah, 73 Cal. 604, 15 P. 305, where an executor of a will was accorded the same rights as the testator would have had in the matter of the use of evidence given in a former action by a witness who had died before the hearing of the second action. The object of the statute in question was to make available to any party to an action the testimony of a witness given on a former hearing thereof when, because of the death of such witness, his testimony in person no longer would be possible. The construction for which appellant contends, if within the letter of the law, is surely without its spirit.

[6] But if it be assumed that plaintiff had the right to introduce in evidence on the second hearing of the action the testimony which was given by C. W. Pendleton, Jr., at the time the case was first tried, appellant urges the further objection (which was made at the time the testimony was given), that a part of such evidence was improperly admitted for the reason that it called for a conclusion of the witness, was hearsay, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The testimony to which such objection was thus made was as follows:

"Q. To whom, if any one, had you intrusted the machine? A. That day?

"Q. To your father at any time? A. Yes; to him and to Tolle."

The evidence shows that at no time had C. W. Pendleton, Jr., directly communicated with defendant C. W. Pendleton, Sr., regarding the matter. Apparently, with reference to the same testimony, the Supreme Court on the former appeal (Gates v. Pendleton, 184 Cal. 797, 800, 195 P. 664, 665, said:

"The statement of the son that he loaned the car to Tolle and his father cannot bind the latter unless he had authorized or requested Tolle to get the use of it for him, or unless, with knowledge that the auto with Tolle as its driver had been furnished to him by his son, he accepted the use and service so tendered."

Based on the evidence adduced on the first trial, and which evidence differed in no material respect from that which the jury had a right to accept on the second hearing, the Supreme Court ruled that "the father must have understood, what was the fact as shown by the son's testimony, that the car and driver were furnished for his use." At any rate, in view of the fact, according to the defendant's admission, upon which the jury necessarily acted in bringing in its verdict, that he had invited his son and had requested that he take several of the party to the "celebration," coupled with the fact that the son's automobile was sent to and used by defendant C. W. Pendleton, Sr., the objectionable evidence (if it can be so considered) given by the son to the effect that he had intrusted the automobile to his father on that occasion, was merely cumulative, and the error, even assuming it to be such, was harmless.

[7-9] It is finally contended by appellant that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. It appears that on the hearing of the motion the trial court made a conditional order to the effect that if within a certain fixed time plaintiff should file a written consent that the judgment be reduced in a certain amount, the motion for a new trial should be denied; otherwise that such motion be granted. Plaintiff's attorney was temporarily absent from the county where the action was tried at the time the order was made; but another attorney who (according to the several affidavits of plaintiff and his said attorneys) had been authorized both by plaintiff and by plaintiff's attorney to act in the premises, filed on behalf of plaintiff and his attorney the required consent, which consent was afterward ratified and confirmed by plaintiff in person. Thereupon the motion for a new trial was denied. Further question is raised by appellant because the written consent was filed in the office of the county clerk, and the order denying the motion for a new trial was made by the court and entered in the minutes of the court after regular office hours on the day fixed by the court as the date within which such consent had to be filed. In such circumstances we are unable to perceive any just cause for complaint on the part of defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

One, contending that another had violated rule prohibiting operator of automobile from turning from right side of highway to left, must prove facts which show violation, and trial court, in giving its instructions, should be asked to state all provisions of Motor Vehicle Act applicable, and not merely one of statutory elements.

4. Highways ⇐184(4)—Instruction, submitting law as to operation of vehicles in closely built up district, held erroneous as not sustained by evidence and leaving definition of closely built up district to jury.

Where defendant's negligence in automobile collision was based on alleged violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 1, as amended by St. 1919, p. 192, § 1, subd. 6, and section 20, subd. q, as amended by St. 1919, p. 214, § 12, providing that, in closely built up territory, vehicles cannot turn about and proceed in opposite direction, except at intersection, but no evidence was introduced to show that scene of accident was in a closely built up territory, as defined by the act, held that instructions submitting law applicable to operation of vehicles in closely built up district, leaving jury to define what constituted a closely built up district, and to determine whether accident occurred by reason of fact that defendant turned from right side to left side of highway was erroneous and highly prejudicial to defendant.

[1, 2] The respondents make a preliminary objection to the appeal being heard on the record which is before us. A proper understanding of that objection requires the statement of these preliminary matters: The verdict was filed February 14, the judgment was entered February 15, and notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed February 19, and the trial court made an order granting a new trial on April 18, all of said dates being in the year 1924. It will be noticed that the order granting the new trial was not made within two months after the verdict, and for that reason the order was ineffective. Code Civ. Proc. § 660. The record does not disclose that a notice of entry of judgment was given, nor does it disclose that a notice was given of the order granting a new trial. On May 9, 1924, the appellant filed a notice of appeal and requested that the evidence, etc., be transcribed. Thereafter the clerk's transcript was prepared, the reporter's transcript was prepared, and notice was given that the same would be presented for approval. On the day noticed written objections were presented opposing the certification of the record, and said objections were supported by the records and files of the trial court. Thereafter the trial court certified the record, and furthermore it certified the proceedings subsequent to the preparation of the transcript. No formal motion to dismiss this appeal has been made, but in his brief the respondent calls attention to the foregoing facts by way of objecting to a hearing in this court. The objection is without merit. The point was ruled in the case of Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 295, 297, 193 P. 943.

The trial court gave, at the request of respondent, certain instructions, and it denied or modified certain instructions requested by the defendant. The plaintiff pleaded negligence by using the same language as was before the court in Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 P. 663. The same language was used by the defendant in his cross-complaint. The accident complained of happened near the town of Gilroy in Santa Clara county. Neither party introduced any local ordinance, but both parties relied on the provisions of the general laws. Immediately before the accident, the plaintiff was traveling south, taking a new automobile to make a delivery thereof. It was the theory of the defendant that the plaintiff was traveling at an excessive speed, to wit, 40 or 50 miles per hour. Immediately before the accident, the defendant had been traveling north, and about the time that he came in front of the Catholic church, he turned from the right-hand side of the road to the left-hand side. In this movement it is the contention of the appellant that the turn was so made as to attempt to park his car facing the left-hand side of the street at right angles, whereas respondent contends that the appellant was describing an arc to proceed in the opposite direction.

The first instruction complained of is respondent's instruction 13.

"I instruct you that in deciding this case you are entitled to take into consideration the following facts:

"First: Whether or not defendant was driving his automobile on the right side of the highway.

"Second: Whether or not defendant turned from the right side of the highway to the left in a closely built up district, where there was no intersection of streets.

"Third: Regardless of the above two facts whether or not defendant was driving his automobile in a careful and prudent manner so as not to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property."

The second instruction complained of is respondent's instruction 15, which is as follows:

"I also instruct you that, if you find that defendant was not operating his automobile on the right side of the road as required by the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California above quoted to you, or that he suddenly turned his automobile from the right side of the highway to the left in a closely built up district, where there was no intersection of streets, he is then guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if said accident would not have happened, except for said act of defendant, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case."

[3] The appellant contends that there is no provision contained in the general statutes which prohibits the operator of an automobile from turning from the right side of a highway to the left. The respondent contends that there is. Both are partly correct and partly in error. Under the terms of the Motor Vehicle Act, then in force, the operator of an automobile should not in certain places turn from the right to the left side of the highway so as to proceed in the opposite direction. That rule is subject to several provisos and limitations. If a party contends that the rule has been violated, he must prove the facts which show the violation, and the trial court in giving its instructions should be asked to state all of the provisions of the statute applicable, and not merely one of the statutory elements. As neither party contends that the accident in question occurred in a business district, we shall not confuse the record by adverting to the statutory provisions applying thereto. Highways are roads and streets erected as such by the public. Pol. Code, § 2618. The trustees of a town may place conspicuously thereon at the boundary lines of certain parts of the town signs of sufficient size to be easily readable by a person using the highway, bearing the words and figures "20 miles speed limit," which words shall be printed in white letters on a red background. The parts of the town on which such signs may be placed are the territory thereof contiguous to a public highway, which is on the line of said highway not mainly devoted to business, where for not less than a quarter of a mile the dwelling houses and business structures on such highway average less than 100 feet apart. Such territory so marked with signs is by the statute defined as "closely built up." In a "closely built up" territory no vehicle shall be turned so as to proceed in the opposite direction except at an intersection of the public highway. Motor Vehicle Act, § 1 (Stats. 1919, p. 192, § 1, subd. 6), and section 20, subd. q. (section 12).

Bearing in mind the provisions of the statute just quoted, we shall pass to a consideration of the evidence. The evidence introduced showed the existence of some sign on the side of the highway near the point where the accident happened. But the evidence did not show whether the sign was erected by the trustees of the town of Gilroy, whether the sign was red with white letters thereon, or whether there were any letters on the sign. There was no evidence introduced showing whether there was any building within one-quarter of a mile of the Catholic church hereinabove mentioned.

[4] In this condition of the record it is manifest that the evidence introduced did not justify the trial court in giving any instruction regarding the law applicable to the operation of motor vehicles in "a closely built up district." Bearing in mind the calls of the statute governing the operation of a motor vehicle in "a closely built up district," it should first be stated that the trial court did not attempt to give any law on that subject except what is contained in respondent's instruction 13 and respondent's instruction 15.

As to instruction 13, it should be observed that there was no conflict whatever in the evidence, and the evidence was all to the effect that the defendant was driving his automobile on the right side of the highway, and also that the defendant was driving his automobile in a careful and prudent manner so as not to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property; and, furthermore, as we have shown above, it was the contention of both parties that the defendant did turn from the right side of the highway to the left side of the highway. Under these circumstances instruction 13 left the jury by its verdict to define what is "a closely built up district" and thereafter to find that the act of the defendant was committed in, or was not committed in, such a district. By reason of the verdict returned, it must necessarily be concluded that the jury found that the place where the accident occurred was "a closely built up district," whereas, as we have shown, there was not a particle of evidence in the record to support the finding.

Respondent's instruction No. 15, when compared with the provisions of the statute above quoted, contained all the vices that were contained in instruction 13 and an additional error which requires a reversal of the case. A mere reading of the instruction discloses that the instruction left to the jurors to define "a closely built up district," and then to determine whether the accident occurred by reason of the fact that the defendant turned from the right side to the left side of the highway at that point, and if so the instruction thereupon directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Of course, that was not the law, and, furthermore, it was highly prejudicial to the defendant. In view of the conclusions which we have reached regarding the giving of the foregoing instructions, it is not necessary for us to consider the alleged errors regarding the action of the trial court in refusing or modifying certain instructions proposed by the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

71 Cal. App. 717

BUSSENIUS et al. v. WARDEN. (Civ. 4321.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1925.)

1. Pleading ⚡345(1)—Plaintiff's failure to deny execution or genuineness of defendant's tax deed held not to entitle defendant to judgment.

In action to quiet title, failure of plaintiffs to file affidavit denying genuineness or due execution of defendant's tax deed to the property under Code Civ. Proc. § 448, held not to entitle defendant to judgment, since plaintiffs might have become owners of property, where their complaint was filed more than a year after date of deed.

2. Pleading ⚡129(5)—Plaintiffs held not to lose right to question legal effect of deed by admitting its genuineness and due execution.

In action to quiet title, plaintiffs, who by failing to deny admitted genuineness and due execution of defendant's tax deed to the property, did not thereby lose right to question its legal effect or to introduce evidence re-establishing their title.

3. Taxation ⚡758—Tax deed, reciting that property was "assessed," held insufficient to transfer title.

Tax deed, reciting only that property was "assessed," held insufficient to transfer title to purchaser, in view of Pol. Code, § 3771, as amended by St. 1919, p. 142, § 1; Pol. Code, § 3785b, as added by St. 1913, p. 558, § 4; Pol. Code, § 3786, and section 3787, as amended by St. 1917, p. 241, § 1; "assessed" not being equivalent to statement that property was assessed for taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assess.]

4. Taxation ⚡627—Sale of property for delinquent taxes held void, where delinquent list failed to state amount of penalties.

Sale of property for delinquent taxes to state was void, in view of Pol. Code, § 3764, as amended by St. 1913, p. 556, § 1, though notice of sale stated, as required by Pol. Code, § 3765, that, unless such taxes, together with costs and penalties, were paid, property would be sold, where delinquent list stated amount of tax and costs, but not amount of penalties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Robert G. Bussenius and another against Grace P. Warden. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Irving McKenna and Catherine A. McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Barker, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to quiet title. The plaintiffs are the owners of the described real property, unless their title has been divested by reason of a tax deed dated and executed on the 2d day of July, 1920, by the tax collector of the county of Los Angeles to Grace P. Warden, who is defendant and appellant herein.

The defense to the action was founded on said deed, of which a copy is annexed to the answer, as Exhibit A thereof. The plaintiffs did not, after receiving a copy of the answer, file with the clerk any affidavit denying the genuineness or due execution of the deed.

Section 448, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, when these conditions exist in the record of an action, "the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted." At the trial of the action appellant moved for judgment on the pleadings, and argued that, because of the admission of fact above stated, she was entitled to judgment in her favor. Appellant now contends that the court erred in denying said motion.

[1, 2] We think that the court did not err in denying the motion. Assuming that the deed vested title in the grantee at the time of its execution, it might be that the plaintiffs had become the owners of the property when, more than a year after the date of the deed, they filed their complaint in this action. Moreover, when respondents, by failing to deny, admitted the genuineness and due execution of the deed, they did not thereby lose the right to question the legal effect of the instrument, or their right to introduce evidence re-establishing their title, notwithstanding the existence and adverse effect of said deed.

[3] This property had been sold to the state for delinquent taxes of the year 1914, the tax sale taking place on the 1st day of July, 1915. Under the law existing at that time, and continued in force, with some changes of detail, in the year 1919, it was provided that, where property theretofore sold to the state for delinquent taxes has remained unredeemed for a period of five years, the tax collector, by following certain prescribed proceedings in connection with his annual delinquent tax sale shall sell such property at public auction to the highest bidder for cash. Pol. Code, § 3771 (Stats. 1919, p. 142). Section 3785b of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 558), provides that, when property has been sold to a purchaser at delinquent tax sale, other than the state of California, in pursuance of section 3771 of this Code, the tax collector must execute a deed to the purchaser, and that said deed "shall be in substance, and may be in form as follows: * * * That whereas the real property hereinafter described was duly assessed for taxation in the year 19— to — (stating name as on assessment-roll) and was thereafter on the — day of —, 19—, duly sold to — by —, tax-collector of said county of — for nonpayment of delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in said year 19—, and were a lien on said real property, the total amount for which the same was sold being —. * * * Now, therefore," etc. The last sentence of said section 3785b reads as follows: "The provisions of sections 3786 and 3787 of this Code are hereby made applicable to the deed herein provided for."

Section 3786 of the Political Code provides that such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is primary evidence of certain stated facts relating to assessment, equalization, levy, non-payment of tax, sale, nonredemption, that the person who executed the deed was the proper officer, and, where the real estate was sold to pay a poll tax or taxes on personal property, that the real estate belonged to the person liable to pay the tax. Section 3787, Political Code (Stats. 1917, p. 241), provides that such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is (except as against actual fraud) conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed. It is the contention of appellant that nothing was shown by respondent to overcome the prima facie title which she claims was vested in her by said tax deed, and that she is entitled to judgment in her favor on the findings of the court.

Respondents contend that the tax deed is void on its face because it fails to state a fact required by the statute to be stated in a deed of the kind in question. As we have shown, section 3785b, Political Code, requires that the deed "shall be in substance and may be in form as follows": The form then given recites, among other things, the fact that the property "was duly assessed for taxation." The deed under which appellant claims title, in its recital relating to this particular fact, omits the words "for taxation." The language of the deed, so far as pertinent to this objection thereto, is as follows:

"That whereas, the real property hereinafter described was duly assessed in the year 1914 to Ella L. Moody and was thereafter on the 2d day of July, 1920, duly sold to Grace P. Warden by W. O. Welch, Tax Collector of the County of Los Angeles, for nonpayment of delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year 1914. * * *

We think that the deed was not legally sufficient to transfer title. "It has uniformly been held in this state that a tax deed which misrecites or omits to recite any one of the facts required by the statute to be recited has no effect at all as a conveyance, the theory being that it is competent for the Legislature to prescribe the form of instrument which, as the result of a proceeding in invitum can alone divest the citizen of his title, and that where the statute prescribes the particular form of a tax deed, the form becomes substance, and must be strictly pursued, and it is not for the courts to inquire whether the required recitals are of material facts or otherwise." Henderson v. De Turk, 164 Cal. 296, 128 P. 747. While it is true that under section 3785b the "form" need not be absolutely that described in the statute, the prescribed facts must be stated in the deed. Property may be "assessed" for purposes other than taxation. Therefore a recital that the property has been "assessed" is not equivalent to a statement that it was assessed for taxation.

[4] The findings of fact, after declaring that the tax collector did execute and deliver to appellant a deed, the said exhibit A, further state that on June 30, 1915, the tax collector made and filed with the county clerk of Los Angeles county an affidavit of publication of delinquent tax list of that county for the assessment of the year 1914, which affidavit, among other things, stated that he had caused to be published a copy of the delinquent tax list of the year 1914, and that attached to the affidavit were true copies of the stated documents, of which publications were made at certain stated dates; that the said delinquent tax list, together with the affidavits, etc., were published on those dates, and that true copies thereof are as follows: (Here follow copies of the delinquent tax list, affidavits, notices and explanations as so published, in so far as the same affect or refer to the land described in the complaint.) The notice stated that the tax collector, on July 1, 1915, at the place and hour stated, "unless the taxes delinquent as appears by said list, together with the costs and penalties," were paid, would sell all said real estate upon which taxes were a lien, to the state of California. The part of the delinquent tax list referring to the property described in the said tax collector's deed to appellant is as follows:

"No.	Name and Description. Volume One. In Los Angeles City.	Amount.
2149	Ella L. Moody, G. W. Morgan's Sycamore Grove Tr., Lot 17, Blk 6."	5 71

The notice stated that the figures appearing opposite, following and last after each description of property in the list "were intended to, and do, represent respectively in dollars or in cents, or in dollars and cents, as the case may be, the amount due for taxes and costs, in the manner, as follows, to wit: When or where two figures appear therein, cents were intended to be, and are, represented; when and where more than two figures thus appear therein, cents were intended to be, and are, represented by the last two figures, and the figures occupying and appearing at the left of the said last two figures and separated therefrom by a space were intended to, and do, represent dollars, so that the amount due for taxes and costs in the respective cases aforesaid are thus expressed in dollars and cents."

Section 3764 of the Political Code, as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 556), provided, among other things, that the delinquent list to be published by the tax collector "must contain the names of the persons and a description of the property delinquent, and the amount of taxes, penalties, and costs due, opposite each name and description, * * *

The foregoing statement from the findings shows that said delinquent tax list failed to set forth the amount due for penalties; although the notice of sale stated (as required by section 3765) that, "unless the taxes delinquent, together with the costs and penalties, are paid, the real property upon which such taxes are a lien will be sold." It thus appears that, although the proposed sale was conditioned upon nonpayment of penalties, the delinquent list as published was defective, in that it failed to state the amount of those penalties. Respondents contend, and apparently there is no answer thereto, that by reason of this defect the subsequent sale to the state was void, and that consequently the deed relied upon by appellant was likewise void.

For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the title of the plaintiffs remains unaffected by any valid claims of the defendant in or to said real property.

The judgment is affirmed.

72 Cal. App. 151

EAMES et al. v. PHILPOT et al.
(Civ. 2852.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 2, 1925.)

1. Injunction $\S$ 118(3)—Complaint held sufficient to invoke power to enjoin continuing trespass on land.

Complaint, stating not merely legal conclusion that plaintiffs will suffer irreparable damages unless defendants are enjoined from removing wood from plaintiff's land, but that plaintiffs are owners and in possession of specified quantity of wood on their land, and that defendants have removed part and threatened to remove and dispose of all of it, held sufficient to invoke power of court of equity to enjoin continuing trespass.

2. Injunction $\S$ 52—Will lie against removal and disposition of wood from plaintiffs' land, to avoid multiplicity of actions against purchasers.

Injunction, against removal and disposition of wood from plaintiffs' land, will lie to prevent multiplicity of actions of claim and delivery or for value of wood against purchasers thereof from defendants, though legal remedy may be adequate for each single act.

3. Bankruptcy $\S$ 138(1)—Lessors held entitled to possession of wood, not paid for by lessee in default, though scheduled as asset in bankruptcy by lessee.

Lessors, reserving right to take possession of land and retain wood not paid for by lessee, on latter's default, held entitled to wood unpaid for immediately on lessee's voluntary surrender of lease and abandonment of possession after default, though lessee included wood in schedule of assets in bankruptcy, at least until trustee established, by proper court proceeding, his right to possession thereof, by reason of lessee's ownership at time of petition to be adjudicated bankrupt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Victor J. Eames and another against R. S. Philpot and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. W. Zagoren, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Fred J. Harris and Thomas B. Lceper, both of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiffs, on the 7th day of July, 1921, by a writing, leased to one Mrs. M. G. Wilson, a widow, for the term of two years, beginning with the 1st day of July, 1921, and ending on the 30th day of July, 1923, a certain specifically described quarter section of land situated in El Dorado county, and known as the "Silverthorn Ranch," at an annual rental of $350, of which, for the first year, the sum of $116.66 was paid on the day of the execution of the indenture, and the balance payable on the 1st day of November, 1921. By this lease the second party (Mrs. Wilson) was "granted the privilege of cutting cordwood on the east 80 acres of said premises," she agreeing that "she will, during the term of this lease, cut not less than 40 acres of all timber standing on either the north or south 40 acres of the east 80 acres of said described premises, but not in the center thereof, at her option." It was further stipulated in the lease that:

"Said cutting is to begin in the wood-cutting season, in the fall of 1921 and 1922, and not later than November 1st, and shall continue during the entire cutting season of each year of said term. Said second party agrees that not less than 40 acres shall be cut during the year of 1921, and not less than 40 acres cut during the year 1922. The party of the second part agrees to pay the parties of the first part 75 cents per cord, 4' x 4' x 8', for all pine and other soft wood so cut, and $1.50 per like cord for all oak and other hard wood so cut. All cord wood to be measured and paid for before being sold or removed from the premises."

The lease proceeds:

"It is understood that the foregoing provisions relating to the cutting and removal of wood on said east eighty (80) acres of the above-described premises is one of the material considerations for making of this lease, and any default in the performance of the specified terms and conditions by said second party shall, upon notice to them, give the first parties the right to terminate this lease, and to re-enter all of said premises and to remove all parties therefrom, and all considerations paid hereunder may thereupon, at the option of the first parties, be retained by them as settled and liquidated damages, it being hereby expressly agreed that it is impossible to ascertain the actual damage resulting from any breach hereof, and time is hereby expressly made the essence of this agreement."

It appears that the lessee failed to pay the rent specified in the lease as required by that instrument, and also failed to pay the lessor for wood cut on the premises as likewise required. After some discussion of and negotiations concerning these defaults on the part of the lessee, the parties, on November 19, 1921, entered into an agreement, reduced to writing, whereby the lessee surrendered her lease to the premises to the lessors. On the same date, the lessors executed in writing a release of the surrender of the lease. These documents were deposited in escrow in a bank in the city of Sacramento, with instructions that, if the lessee, on or before December 20, 1921, paid the amount of the rent in which she was then in arrears and stumpage, and performed some other acts not pertinent to this inquiry, the surrender of the lease by her was to be canceled or returned to her, and she to continue in possession of the premises under the lease as originally drafted and executed. The written release of the lessee from the effect of her surrender of lease set forth the instructions so given the bank. The lessee failed to meet the terms and conditions upon which her surrender of the lease was to cease to be of force. It appears, however, that the lessee and her husband (the former having, subsequently to the execution of the lease, intermarried with one Myron E. Sage) continued to hold possession of the premises, and that the plaintiffs (lessors) served or caused to be served upon the former a written notice, dated March 28, 1922, stating that rent in the sum of $233.44 was long past due, that the lessee had failed to pay for the wood cut by her on the premises, the sum due lessors for such wood being the sum of $255, and that the lessee in other respects breached the terms and conditions of the lease and demanding that the latter pay the rent due and for the wood cut within 3 days from the date of the service of said notice upon them, or, in default of such payments being so made, that they deliver to the lessors possession of the premises; that, in case the lessee, within the time stated in said notice, failed to comply with the one or the other of the alternatives so specified, the lessors would institute appropriate legal proceedings to oust them of such possession. A few weeks prior to the time of the service of this notice, an attachment, issued in a case brought against the lessee and her husband by one Keefe, in the superior court of Sacramento county, was levied on the wood cut by the lessee under the terms of her lease of the premises, and which lien still subsisted at the time of the service of said notice. It also appears that on the 19th day of March, 1922, the lessee and her husband filed a petition and schedule in bankruptcy in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, and on the same day were adjudicated bankrupts; that thereafter, at a meeting of the creditors of the bankrupts, the defendant Prior was appointed trustee of the estates of said bankrupts.

It further appears that the lessee and her husband had given a chattel mortgage on some stock then on the premises in question to two parties by the names of LeRoy and Bell, to secure a certain loan of money by the latter to the former and evidenced by a promissory note. This note, it seems, had fallen due, and proceedings to foreclose the mortgage instituted. LeRoy and Bell, pending the determination of the foreclosure proceedings, placed one Garvey in charge of the mortgaged stock on said premises. On the 18th day of April, 1922, the lessee and her husband packed all their household belongings and departed from the demised premises. On the 20th day of April, 1922, the plaintiffs put said Garvey in charge of said premises. On the 29th day of April, 1922, said Prior, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of the lessee and her husband, sold to the defendant R. S. Philpot all of the cut wood on the leased premises, the attachment lien on the wood, above spoken of, having been released. Said Philpot thereupon proceeded to remove said wood from said premises, and had taken therefrom six cords of wood when the plaintiffs brought the present action for an injunction to prevent the defendants, their agents, and assigns from removing any of said wood from said premises, and for judgment for the value of the wood removed therefrom by said Philpot. The complaint, after stating that the plaintiffs are the owners of the demised premises, and also of 177 cords of oak wood and 23 cords of pine wood, located on said premises, alleges as follows:

"That on the 4th day of May, 1922, the above-named defendants forcibly entered upon said premises and forcibly removed some of said wood from said premises; that plaintiffs refused to allow defendants possession of said wood and refused to allow them to remove same, but defendants, over the objection of plaintiffs, continued to remove said wood; that defendants threaten to and will, unless restrained by this court, remove all of said wood from said premises and will deprive plaintiffs of the possession and use of same.

"That the exact amount of said wood is unknown to plaintiffs at this time; that defendants are now removing said wood from said premises and hauling the same to the city of Sacramento, and there disposing of the same; that unless defendants are immediately restrained from so entering upon said premises and hauling said wood, plaintiffs will suffer great and irreparable damages; that such damages will result to plaintiffs before notice of application for an injunction can be served upon defendants.

"That the said pine wood is of the value of $5 a cord; that the value of said oak wood is $10 per cord."

An injunction pendente lite was issued upon the averments of the complaint and served upon the defendants.

A demurrer, on both general and special grounds, was interposed by the defendants to the complaint, and the same overruled by the court, whereupon the defendants filed an answer in which they specifically denied all the material allegations of the complaint, and affirmatively alleged that the lessee under the lease in question and her husband were, at all times mentioned in the complaint, owners of 100 cords of wood on said premises; that they petitioned to the United States District Court to be declared and adjudicated bankrupts; that they were so declared and adjudicated; that the creditors appointed defendant Prior trustee of said bankrupts; and that said Prior, as such trustee, on the 29th day of April, 1922, sold to defendant Philpot all said wood, and that the latter "is now the owner of and entitled to the possession of all said wood."

The court found in favor of the plaintiffs, and upon its findings rendered and caused to be entered judgment, making the temporary injunction permanent as prayed for and awarding judgment against Prior and Philpot in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $30 as for the value of the six cords of wood which it was found that Prior and Philpot wrongfully removed from the premises, as hereinabove indicated. The defendants have appealed from said judgment and support the appeal by a record prepared according to the requirements of the so-called alternative method.

The points made in support of the appeal are: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to show that the plaintiffs will or would suffer irreparable injury by reason of the alleged threatened acts of the defendants; (2) that the plaintiffs have an adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law; (3) that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

[1] 1. The defendants declare that there is no other statement in the complaint looking to equitable relief by way of injunction than that involved in the averment that the plaintiffs will, unless the defendants are enjoined from removing the wood, suffer "irreparable damages." Of course, such a statement, taken alone, is a mere legal conclusion, and, in the absence of a statement of facts substantiating or supporting it, would not justify a court of equity in extending its aid by way of preventive relief to a suitor for such aid. The complaint, however, goes further than merely stating the legal conclusion referred to. It alleges that the plaintiffs were and are the owners and in possession of a specified quantity of wood, located on land belonging to them, and that the defendants have removed a portion of said wood from said land, and threaten to move all of said wood and dispose of the same. This clearly presents a case in which a continuing trespass will be suffered by the complainants. We can think of no case in which the interposition of the injunctive power of a court of equity could more appropriately be invoked.

[2] 2. Counsel say, however (this is the point they secondly urge and which is virtually considered above), that the plaintiffs may resort to the action of claim and delivery and so recover the wood as it is from time to time taken from them, and thus they are afforded an adequate remedy at law. The complaint states that the defendants would, unless restrained from so doing, remove the wood and dispose of it, which averment means that they intended to put it on the market and sell it to such persons as might desire to buy it. It is hence obvious that it would be necessary to bring an action in claim and delivery against each of such persons as might purchase a portion of the wood from the defendants. The same would be true as to any action of law which might be brought to obtain, not the specific property, but only the value thereof. The case here clearly comes within the rule as it is announced by Professor Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, section 1357, as follows:

"If the trespass is continuous in its nature—if repeated acts of wrong are done or threatened—although each of these acts, taken by itself, may not be destructive, and the legal remedy may therefore be adequate for each single act if it stood alone, then also the entire wrong will be prevented or stopped by injunction, on the ground of avoiding a repetition of similar actions. In both cases the ultimate criterion is the inadequacy of the legal remedy."

McCabe*, 144 Cal. 233, 77 P. 915, 103 Am. St. Rep. 78; Danielson v. Sykes, 157 Cal. 686, 109 P. 87, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1024; Sailors' Union, etc., v. Hammond L. Co., 156 F. 454, 85 C. C. A. 16; Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Cunningham (C. C.) 103 F. 708.

The defendants cite the following cases as sustaining their view of the complaint: DeWitt v. Hays, 2 Cal. 463, 56 Am. Dec. 352; Gregory v. Hay, 3 Cal. 332; Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 47; Waldron v. Marsh, 5 Cal. 119; Mechanics' Foundry v. Ryall, 75 Cal. 601, 17 P. 703. None of these cases is in point here, as a perusal of the opinions therein will readily disclose.

[3] 3. The above statement of the facts is sufficient to show that the findings are well supported. As already shown, under the agreement of lease, the lessee was to forfeit her right to the possession of the premises thereunder upon her failure to comply with any of the vital terms thereof, and the lessors were thereupon entitled not only to enter into the possession thereof but, as stated, to retain whatever money that might have been paid by the lessee to them on account of the rent and also all the wood which had been cut, and for which the lessee had not paid plaintiffs at the rates stipulated by the lease. As seen, she was given by plaintiffs ample notice of her several defaults under the lease, and an opportunity after such defaults to comply with her agreement and so proceed according to the terms thereof. She did not avail herself of the privilege thus granted to her, but, to the contrary, not only voluntarily surrendered the lease and all the considerations thereof which had, in part, been performed by her, but later abandoned her possession of the premises and so forfeited all rights she might have claimed under the lease had she complied with the terms and conditions thereof. Under all these circumstances, the right to the possession of the premises and the considerations for the lease which had, in part, been performed by her, at once, or upon the happening of all those acts, reverted to the plaintiffs. The fact, if it was a fact (and it does not directly appear from this record that it was a fact), that the lessee included within her schedule of assets and liabilities in bankruptcy the wood in question did not and could not have the effect of divesting plaintiffs of the right to the possession or the possession of the wood. The lessee, it is quite obvious, had no right to include as among her assets in said schedule the property of others, and if she did do that with respect to the wood in question, the plaintiffs were nevertheless legally authorized to hold such possession until the trustee established, if he could, by a proper proceeding in court (by claim and delivery, for instance), that he was entitled by virtue of his office as such trustee to the possession of the wood by reason of the lessee's ownership thereof at the time she petitioned the federal court to be adjudicated a bankrupt.

In our opinion this appeal is wholly devoid of merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. RYAN v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO. (Civ. 4789.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1925.)

1. Judgment ⇨702—Judgment against municipality in matter over which state has conferred jurisdiction on municipality is binding on state.

When a judgment against an officer or agency of the state is pleaded as bar in proceeding instituted by state, latter is not bound by such judgment when it involves a purely state matter, but when it relates to matter of municipal concern, jurisdiction over which the state has committed to administration of a municipality, then such municipality represents the state, and judgment is binding and conclusive on state.

2. Judgment ⇨702—State's general interest in enforcement of laws does not constitute it a party in interest in proceeding to enforce such laws.

Though the state in its governmental capacity has a general interest in seeing that proper observance is accorded to all its laws, such general interest does not constitute state a party in interest in every proceeding instituted for purpose of enforcing such laws, or in determining whether they are complied with.

3. Judgment ⇨702—State held bound by judgment against board of trustees directing calling of special election for purpose of consolidation of cities.

The matter of consolidation of the city of East San Diego with city of San Diego, as provided by St. 1913, p. 577, being of municipal interest primarily, and as state has clothed board of trustees of city of East San Diego with authority to represent it in all consolidation proceedings, held that the state is bound by a judgment of court of competent jurisdiction, rendered against such board of trustees, directing it to call a special election pursuant to the consolidation statute, and is estopped from testing validity of such election by proceeding in quo warranto.

4. Judgment ⇨576(1)—Court held to have acquired jurisdiction in mandamus action to compel board of trustees to call election for consolidation of cities.

Where complaint in mandamus action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, alleged filing of a sufficient petition with board, requesting a consolidation of cities under St. 1913, p. 577, and its refusal to call election required by law, court acquired jurisdiction to determine whether or not a valid and sufficient petition had been filed, and, if on hearing it sought additional evidence, such error would not affect court's jurisdiction, and its judgment, even if erroneous, when not appealed from, was binding and conclusive upon parties thereto.

5. Mandamus ⇨172—Authority of court to compel calling of election as to consolidation of municipalities implies authority to determine whether necessary preliminary steps have been taken.

The authority with which the superior court is vested under St. 1913, p. 577, relating to consolidation of municipalities, to compel calling of election by board of trustees, submitting question of consolidation to electors, necessarily implies that court has authority to determine whether all necessary preliminary steps have been taken.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨34—Determination by board of trustees as to sufficiency of petition for consolidation conclusive, in absence of fraud.

The determination by board of trustees as to sufficiency of petition requesting consolidation of cities under St. 1913, p. 577, is final and conclusive, and superior court cannot go beyond or behind action of board, except in case of fraud.

7. Mandamus ⇨74(2)—If petition for consolidation of cities is valid, court's duty to issue writ of mandamus compelling board of trustees to act on petition as provided by law.

If in a mandamus action, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, to compel board of trustees to call election as to question of consolidation of cities, under St. 1913, p. 577, it was shown that a valid petition had been filed with board, court would not only have jurisdiction of the matter, but it would be its duty to issue writ, compelling board to act on petition in manner provided by law.

8. Courts ⇨1—"Jurisdiction" does not depend on rightfulness of decision made.

"Jurisdiction" is power to hear and determine, and does not depend on rightfulness of decision made.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Quo warranto by the People, on the relation of William Edward Ryan, against the City of San Diego. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Sloane & Sloane, F. G. Blood, and Crouch & Sanders, all of San Diego, for appellant.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., and Arthur F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The facts leading up to the judgment in this proceeding, it is conceded by appellant, are fairly summarized in respondent's opening brief, and as stated therein are as follows:

"On August 3, 1922, there was presented to the board of trustees of the then city of East San Diego a petition purporting to be signed by more than one-fourth of the qualified electors of said city, asking that an election be called upon the question of consolidating the cities of East San Diego and San Diego, which were adjacent. This petition was filed pursuant to the terms and provisions of the Municipal Consolidation Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 577, Deering's General Laws, Act 2383a). The petition was referred by the board of trustees to the city clerk of East San Diego, who was directed to investigate the sufficiency of the petition.

"On September 7, 1923, the clerk reported to the board of trustees that the petition 'showed a total of 733 sufficient signatures.' Thereupon the trustees by resolution declared the petition insufficient. Thereafter, during the month of October, 1922, Dora V. Drumhiller and Mattie Benbow, residents, electors, and taxpayers of the city of East San Diego, instituted a proceeding in the superior court of the county of San Diego, wherein the court was asked to issue a peremptory writ of mandate directing the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego to forthwith call a special election for the purpose of submitting to the electors of said city of East San Diego the question of consolidating the city of San Diego with the city of East San Diego, and on the 26th day of March, 1923, a judgment in said action was rendered by the superior court of the county of San Diego in favor of said petitioners, and a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued compelling the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego to call a special election, as petitioned for on the 7th day of September, 1922. In this proceeding the sufficiency of the petition was gone into by the court, and after the presentation of evidence the court determined that the petition had been signed by more than one-fourth of the qualified electors of the city of East San Diego. The court found that, while the trustees had not been guilty of actual fraud, nevertheless they had been guilty of abusing their discretion, in that they had arbitrarily disregarded names which should have been considered, and that this was done without warrant of law.

"Pursuant to this writ of mandamus the board of trustees called the special election which was held in the city of East San Diego on the 26th day of June, 1923, at which election a majority of the voters of East San Diego voted in favor of consolidating with the city of San Diego.

"Thereafter a special election was held in the city of San Diego on the 23d day of October, 1923, at which time the electors of the city of San Diego voted in favor of the question of consolidation, and on the 29th day of December, 1923, a certificate of said election and a record of the proceedings was filed with the secretary of state, and thereupon the city of San Diego proceeded to take over, assume, and exercise municipal jurisdiction over the territory formerly comprising the city of East San Diego.

"Thereafter, on the relation of one William Edward Ryan, the Attorney General of the state of California instituted this present proceeding of quo warranto to test the validity of the election held in East San Diego and to inquire into the authority of the city of San Diego to exercise municipal jurisdiction over the territory formerly comprising the city of East San Diego.

"In the court below the city of San Diego in defense of its jurisdiction presented two contentions: First, that the state of California, either on its own initiative or upon the relation of some taxpayer, was estopped to inquire into the validity of the election upon the grounds set forth in the complaint in quo warranto of the Attorney General, namely, the insufficiency of the petition, for the reason that the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the petition had been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction of the state of California, and that the question had become res adjudicata. Second, that the complaint in quo warranto did not state a cause of action in quo warranto. The court below held that the people of the state of California were bound by the former judgment, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the city of San Diego, from which judgment the relator now appeals."

In behalf of the appeal appellant contends: First, that the former judgment, if valid, was not an estoppel against the people of the state of California to maintain an action in quo warranto for the reason that the people were not parties to nor represented in said action; and, second, that the superior court of San Diego county was without jurisdiction in the mandamus proceeding, relied upon by the defendant as an estoppel in this action, to review the action of the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego in finding the petition for the consolidation proceedings insufficient for want of the required number of qualified signers.

In support of the action of the trial court in holding that the people of the state of California were estopped by the judgment in the mandamus action instituted by Dora Drumhiller and Mattie Benbow against the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego, respondent relies in the main upon the case of People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 P. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186, and other rulings of our Supreme Court following People v. Holladay. The Holladay Case was instituted by the Attorney General in the name of the people of the state upon the relation of one Bryant to determine the right of S. W. Holladay, the defendant in said action, to maintain certain buildings and fences upon a tract of land situated in the city and county of San Francisco, and claimed by the plaintiff in said action to have been dedicated to the public as a public square, and known as Lafayette Park. The defendant Holladay in his answer denied that the land in question had ever been dedicated to the public as a public square, and further alleged that prior to the beginning of said action by the people of the state of California he had instituted an action against the city and county of San Francisco to quiet his title to said tract of land, and that judgment had been rendered in said prior action, quieting his title to an undivided nineteen-twentieths of said land as against said city and county, and pleaded said judgment as a bar to the later action instituted in the name of the people of the state of California. On appeal the Supreme Court, in the course of the opinion rendered therein, on page 247 (29 P. 56) thereof asks the following questions:

"The pleadings in that case [San Francisco v. Holladay], being sufficient to put in issue the question of dedication involved herein, what is the effect of such judgment upon the rights of the present plaintiff? Are the people of the state thereby estopped from asserting that the defendant in that action, the city and county of San Francisco, did hold and now holds the legal title to the land in controversy in trust for the use of the people of the state as a public square?"

These questions are answered by the court in the following manner on page 249 of said opinion:

"We entertain no doubt that the city and county of San Francisco has the authority to maintain an action for the purpose of preserving the rights of the general public to the use of squares, or land claimed as such, within its limits, and that in such action it is authorized to put in issue the alleged rights of the people to such easement, and that the state itself is bound by the result of such litigation, if the same is not collusive. And we see no reason why these same rights might not also be tried and determined in an appropriate action in which the municipality might be a defendant—as, for instance, ejectment, where it had ousted the claimant from the possession; or by injunction, where it threatened to remove his buildings or trees or a portion of the soil from the land claimed by it as a public square—and the public would be bound by the final judgment therein if the action was conducted in good faith on the part of the city. The rule that the citizen shall not be twice vexed for the same cause of action is as binding upon the state as upon other litigants; and the Legislature, in conferring upon the city power to maintain and defend in the courts the rights of the state to streets and squares within its limits, must be presumed to have done so with reference to this well-known maxim, and to have intended that the state should be bound by the result of such litigation."

The case of People v. Holladay, supra, has been cited with approval in a number of later cases by the courts of this state.

People v. Smith, 93 Cal. 490, 29 P. 57, 247, was an action instituted by the people of the state of California upon the relation of one Chandler to remove certain obstructions upon land claimed to be a public street of the city of San Francisco. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed the judgment on the ground that a judgment rendered in a prior action in favor of Smith, the defendant, against the city and county of San Francisco, was a bar to said action instituted in the name of the people. The Supreme Court in this case said as follows:

"At the trial, among other matters, the defendant introduced in evidence the judgment roll in the action of A. B. Smith v. the City and County of San Francisco. * * * As one of its findings of fact, the court found that the allegations of the defendant's answer, as to the matters therein set forth with reference to the action brought by Smith (the defendant here) against the city and county of San Francisco, were true, but held that the people of the state were not a party to said action, and that consequently the judgment therein rendered was no bar to this action, and thereupon ordered judgment for plaintiff. This identical question was involved in the recent case of People v. Holladay, ante, p. 241, and there decided contrary to the views held by the trial court in this case. The judgment being a complete bar to the cause of action, it becomes unnecessary to examine other assignments relied upon. Upon the authority of People v. Holladay, * * * the judgment and order are reversed."

In Strand Improvement Co. v. Long Beach, 173 Cal. 765, 161 P. 975, the court, in discussing the effect of a judgment rendered against the city of Long Beach, uses the following pertinent language:

"The judgment is a determination, conclusive upon the city and the public, that the land in question is free from public use. * * * It bars both the city and the state," citing People v. Holladay, supra, and other cases.

In the late case of Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 110, 118, 199 P. 35, 39, upon the authority of People v. Holladay, supra, the court states the law upon this question as follows:

"Such a judgment declaring that property held by a city for public use is the property of a private individual is, after it has become final, conclusive upon the city and the public."

Two other late cases from our Supreme Court, although not decided directly upon the authority of People v. Holladay, are pertinent to the question before us, and they may aid in its solution. The first of these cases is Bernhard v. Wall, 184 Cal. 612, 623, 194 P. 1040. In this action the validity of certain patents to state school lands was involved. It became necessary for the court in this action to pass upon the effect of a judgment rendered in a former action against the surveyor general of the state, commanding him to receive and file an application to purchase said lands. In deciding this case the Supreme Court said:

"Unquestionably that judgment was a final adjudication of the right of Bernhard binding on the surveyor general in his official capacity. He is the state official in charge of all matters pertaining to the disposal of the public lands of the state. * * * In any proceeding against him to compel him to perform an official duty in disposing of the public land, he represents the state and the judgment rendered in such proceeding is in all respects binding and conclusive against the state to the same extent that it binds the officer in his official conduct with respect to the matter decided. Such a judgment bars the state from afterwards setting up to the contrary of what is there adjudicated."

In Reynolds v. Churchill Co., 187 Cal. 543, 546, 202 P. 865, 866, the court said in deciding a similar question:

"We have reached the conclusion that the mandamus proceedings are conclusive of the rights of the respondent to purchase the land under its certificates of purchase. In the mandamus proceedings the surveyor general of the state of California represented the state, and the judgment in the case as to the validity of the defendant's certificate of purchase is binding upon the state."

As against these authorities appellant has cited the following cases from the courts of our own state: People v. Rodgers, 118 Cal. 393, 46 P. 740, 50 P. 668; People v. Bass, 15 Cal. App. 62, 113 P. 655; People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 128 Cal. 477, 61 P. 86; People v. Beaudry, 91 Cal. 213, 27 P. 610; and also the following cases from other jurisdictions: Peck v. State, 137 N. Y. 372, 33 N. E. 317, 33 Am. St. Rep. 738; State v. Stock, 38 Kan. 154, 16 P. 106; State v. Burton, 47 Kan. 44, 27 P. 141. We will briefly refer to these cases. People v. Rodgers, supra, was an action instituted in the name of the people of the state of California by the Attorney General upon the relation of one Warren T. Drew for the purpose of ousting the defendant Rodgers from the office of the chief of police of the city of Sacramento. The court admitted in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Drew v. Rodgers, the latter case having been instituted by an elector of said city, named Drew (although of the same name, he was not the relator in the action of People v. Rodgers) to contest the election of Rodgers for the same office as that involved in the proceeding of People v. Rodgers. The Supreme Court held that this was error, as "the judgment was not between the parties to the present action, nor was it between the relator and the defendant."

People v. Bass, supra, was an action in quo warranto brought by the Attorney General, claiming that the defendant Bass had usurped and was unlawfully holding the office of supervisor of the county of Lassen. Bass filed an answer alleging that Leavitt, the relator, had, after a trial of an action entitled Bass v. Leavitt (instituted under section 1124, Code Civ. Proc., providing for the contesting of an election where the result was a tie vote), consented to the holding of a special election, and at said election became a candidate for said office, and claiming that by said acts and conduct "Leavitt had abandoned his contest then pending in the superior court, and was estopped from resorting to this or any other proceeding to gain possession of said office." The court, upon this state of facts, held, that the action then pending "is by the people who are entirely different parties from those who were parties to the contest, and who cannot be estopped by the conduct or acts of Leavitt, either in the original contest or subsequent thereto. He could not, by consenting to the special election, estop the people from disputing the declared result or from inquiring into the validity of the certificate given to Bass." We fail to find anything in either

People v. Beaudry, supra, or People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, supra, which is of any great service in the decision of the question now under consideration. In our opinion, if these cases can be considered as authorities in the present action, they are favorable to respondent's rather than appellant's contention. In fact, if we understand appellant's position correctly, the most that can be claimed for any of the authorities above referred to, from the courts of our own state, is that the principle contended for by appellant is recognized by the court in these cases.

Turning now to the authorities from other jurisdictions, cited by appellant, we will first consider the case of State v. Stock, supra, decided by the Supreme Court of the state of Kansas. In this case the question involved was the legality of an election called for the purpose of locating the county seat of Rush county. It was instituted in the name of the state, upon the relation of the Attorney General, against the county officers of said county, to compel them to remove their several offices from the town of La Crosse to Walnut City. As a defense to said action the defendants pleaded a judgment previously rendered in an action instituted by the state of Kansas upon the relation of an elector and taxpayer of said county, named Hammond, against F. E. Garner, county clerk of said county, for the purpose of compelling said county clerk to remove his office from Walnut City to the town of La Crosse. It was claimed in said action that the county seat of said county had been located at the town of La Crosse, and by said judgment it was decreed that the town of La Crosse was the legal county seat of said county, and said county clerk was directed to remove his office thereto, and thereafter to keep the same at said town of La Crosse. The Supreme Court of the state of Kansas held that the judgment rendered against the county clerk of the action brought against him in the name of the state of Kansas upon the relation of said Hammond was not a bar to the subsequent action brought by the state of Kansas upon the relation of the Attorney General against the county officers of said county. The real point considered and decided in that case was whether, in an action brought by the state upon the relation of the Attorney General, the state was concluded by a judgment rendered in an action instituted by the state upon the relation of a private person. The Supreme Court held that the prior action, instituted in the name of the state by a private person under the statute of the state of Kansas, permitting such an action to be brought by any elector who considered himself aggrieved by the result of any election held for the purpose of relocating the county seat, was a proceeding begun by a private person, and that the state was not concluded nor bound by the judgment rendered therein. No such question is involved in the present action. In the Kansas case, the question whether or not the county clerk represented the state, so that a judgment against him was binding upon the state, was neither discussed nor decided.

In the case of State v. Burton, supra, also decided by the Supreme Court of the state of Kansas, precisely the same point was before the court and decided by it upon the authority of State v. Stock, supra.

In Peck v. State, supra, the New York Court of Appeals held that the state was not bound nor estopped by a judgment rendered against the board of managers of the Buffalo state asylum. The action was brought to recover upon a claim for materials furnished in the construction of the asylum. A contract had been entered into between plaintiffs and the said board of managers, whereby plaintiffs agreed, for a stated consideration, to furnish said materials. A dispute arose between plaintiffs and said board of managers as to the amount due plaintiffs. As a result of said dispute, plaintiffs instituted an action and obtained a judgment in mandamus against the board of managers, requiring them to issue a certificate in favor of plaintiffs showing the amount due plaintiffs. Plaintiffs thereafter brought suit against the state to enforce their claim, and rested their claim upon the judgment rendered against the board of managers and the certificate of said board issued in compliance with the requirements of said judgment, and introduced no further evidence in proof of their claim. On appeal, a judgment in plaintiffs' favor was reversed, the court stating the law to be as follows:

"A state cannot be sued in its own courts, except by its consent; and this rule is founded upon public policy of great importance, and it would be greatly impaired, and could be largely nullified, if the state could be bound by judgments rendered against its agents or officers. Such judgments may bind the officers, and compel them to discharge their duties, and thus frequently they enable claimants to obtain payments of their claims against the state and other rights to which they are entitled by law. But the adjudication in such actions never estops the state on the principle of res adjudicata"—citing authorities.

Appellant insists that the rule enunciated by the New York court is applicable in the present case, and should be followed to the exclusion of the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of our own state. If there is any conflict between the decisions of the courts of other states and those from our own, it is of course the duty of this court to accept and follow the rulings of our own Supreme Court. We doubt, however, whether any such conflict exists. In the case of Peck v. State, supra, the controversy grew out of a purely and strictly state matter. The claim of the plaintiffs in that action represented a demand against the treasury of the state of New York. While it was based upon a contract, which the board of managers of the Buffalo state asylum had authority to make on behalf of the state, yet its payment, if finally adjudged by the court, rested with the state of New York, and must be made with state funds. It was therefore an action in the outcome of which the state was primarily and vitally interested, and in this respect it materially differs from the case of People v. Holladay, supra. In the Holladay Case the court held that the state had conferred upon the city of San Francisco jurisdiction over the public squares within its territorial limits, and that the ownership of such squares was a matter principally of municipal concern, and therefore that a judgment against said municipality as to the ownership of any particular piece of land claimed to be a public square was binding upon the state and the public. The other cases from our Supreme Court, and to which we have already alluded, were decided upon practically the same principle. In each of these cases the state had conferred upon the municipality, or officer, jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the controversy, and for that reason our courts have held that in any litigation involving such subject-matter the municipality, or officer, represented the state, and that the latter is bound by any judgment rendered against its representative. In our opinion, therefore, there is no conflict between the decision of Peck v. State, supra, and the rulings of the courts of our state.

[1-3] The rule to be drawn from these decisions would therefore appear to be that, when the judgment against an officer or agency of the state is pleaded as a bar in a proceeding instituted by the state, the state is not bound by said judgment when the same involves a purely state matter, but, when the judgment relates to a matter of municipal concern, and to a matter, jurisdiction over which the state has committed to the administration of a municipality or officer, then such municipality or officer represents the state in said action, and said judgment is binding and conclusive upon the state. In applying this rule to the facts in the present controversy, it becomes necessary to determine the nature of the subject-matter involved in the mandamus action. Was it a matter in which the state was chiefly concerned, and did the judgment in said action affect the state primarily and directly, or was it a proceeding in which the city of East San Diego was principally concerned, and will the result of said action more directly affect said city and its inhabitants? We think it quite evident that the controversy involved in said action was of but secondary concern to the state as a whole. The decision of the question involved therein, one way or the other, was of but little importance to the state at large. It is true that the state in its governmental capacity has a general interest in seeing that a proper observance is accorded to all of its laws by the people of the state, and particularly by its officers and such agencies as it has constituted for the better administration of such laws, but this general interest does not constitute the state a party in interest in every proceeding instituted for the purpose of enforcing said laws or of determining whether they are in all instances complied with. On the other hand, the only parties vitally and directly interested in the question of whether or not the cities of San Diego and East San Diego shall be consolidated, are these two municipalities and their inhabitants. If there are any benefits to accrue from such consolidation, such benefits will be reaped solely by the people of these two communities. At the same time, if there are any burdens growing out of such union, such burdens will fall to the lot of the people of the enlarged municipality of the city of San Diego. Neither the state at large nor any of its inhabitants, outside of those residing, or owning property, in said city, will be affected by the result of the proceedings to unite these two cities. The question is therefore, in our opinion, one of local concern rather than one of state interest. We think that the state has recognized this fact in the nature of the provisions adopted by it governing the consolidation of municipalities. The provisions made by the state of California upon this subject are those found in the act under which the proceedings here in question were instituted (an act to provide for the consolidation of municipal corporations, Stats. 1913, p. 577; Deering's General Laws [1923 Ed.] Act 5166, p. 1939). In this act it is provided that whenever a petition signed by one-fourth of the qualified electors of a city is presented to the legislative body thereof asking that such municipal corporation and any other municipal corporation contiguous thereto, designated in such petition and having a greater population, be consolidated, said legislative body shall call an election therein and submit to the electors thereof the question of consolidation. The act further provides that said legislative body shall cause notice of the holding of such election to be given to the electors of said city. Said legislative body shall establish voting precincts in said city to be used in said election and appoint election officers to conduct said election. It shall canvass the returns of said election and declare the result thereof, and cause a record thereof to be made in its minutes. If the result of said election is in favor of consolidation, the clerk of said legislative body shall make a duplicate copy of the record of said canvass and deliver the same to the clerk of the municipal corporation with which consolidation is sought. It then becomes the duty of the last-named municipal corporation to call and hold an election and submit to its electors the question of consolidation. It will thus be seen that by this statute a complete plan or scheme has been provided by the Legislature of the state for the consolidation of municipal corporations, in which the legislative bodies of the cities sought to be consolidated are clothed with all the authority necessary to carry into effect said plan or scheme. In the exercise of this authority, the legislative body of the city in which said proceedings have their inception is the agent of the state, and represents the state in every stage of the proceedings, from the time the original petition is filed with it until the final record of the canvass is made in its minutes. In the class of municipal corporations to which the city of East San Diego belonged, this legislative body is the board of trustees of said city. Our conclusion, therefore, upon this branch of the case is that, as the matter involved herein is of municipal interest primarily, and not of general state concern, and as the state has clothed the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego with authority to represent it in all consolidation proceedings, it is bound by the acts of its agent in such proceedings, and by any judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction rendered against said board of trustees directing it to perform the duties enjoined upon it by the statute providing for said proceedings.

[4, 5] The second point made by appellant is that the superior court of the county of San Diego was without jurisdiction in the mandamus proceeding to review the action of the trustees of the city of East San Diego in its determination that the petition for consolidation was insufficient for the want of the required number of qualified signers. The mandamus proceeding was directed against the board of trustees requiring them to call an election on the ground that a valid petition had been filed with said board, asking for the consolidation of the two municipalities. Upon the filing of such a petition the statute governing consolidation of cities, heretofore referred to, provides that said legislative body shall without delay call a special election and submit the question of consolidation to the electors of said city. Upon the failure of said legislative body to call said election, the superior court, upon complaint of any person aggrieved thereby, is authorized to compel said board to act upon said petition as required by law. This authority is conferred upon the court by section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure providing for the issuance of the writ of mandamus. Said section provides that such a writ may be issued by the court to any board to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins. As we have seen, the law specially enjoins upon the board of trustees the calling of the election when a valid petition has been filed. The authority with which the court is vested to compel the calling of the election by the board necessarily implies that the court has authority to determine whether all the necessary preliminary steps have been taken which would make it obligatory upon the board to issue the call for the election. In this case these necessary steps include a valid petition to be filed with the board of trustees. For the purpose of this decision we may concede that a valid petition, according to the terms of the statute and the rulings of our courts upon these and similar statutes, is a petition that has been found sufficient by the board of trustees. People v. Town of Loyalton, 147 Cal. 774, 82 P. 620; People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 P. 749; People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 P. 205.

[6, 7] The determination by the board as to the sufficiency of the petition was final and conclusive, and the court could not go beyond or behind the action of the board, except in case of fraud, and no charge of fraud was made against the trustees of said city of East San Diego. But the court, in order to determine whether it shall issue its writ of mandamus, must first ascertain whether there has ever been filed with the board of trustees a valid petition as provided by the statute and as defined by the above decisions from our Supreme Court. Unquestionably, if in such an action it be shown that a petition, valid in the sense we are here considering it, had been filed with the board of trustees, then not only would the court have jurisdiction of the matter, but it would be its duty to issue its writ compelling said board to act upon said petition in the manner provided by law. If the court is vested with jurisdiction to determine the fact that a valid petition has been filed, does it lose jurisdiction of the action upon proof of the fact that no valid petition has been filed? "Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine." 7 Cal. Jur. 584; Bennett v. Wilson, 133 Cal. 379, 385, 65 P. 880, 85 Am. St. Rep. 207; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 148, 51 P. 38. As was said by the court in Baines v. Zemansky, 176 Cal. 369, 373, 168 P. 565, 567:

"Under well-established principles of law it cannot be denied that if the Superior Court has jurisdiction, upon any possible state of facts, to prohibit or enjoin the registrar of voters from proceeding with such recall petitions in the manner prescribed in the charter, the sufficiency of the petition or complaint upon which that court acts, so far as the facts stated therein are concerned, cannot be inquired into by this court in this collateral proceeding, but that, on the contrary, its writs and orders must be upheld so far as this case is concerned, and can only be questioned when presented by way of appeal after the final judgment of said court in the cause."

[8] We have already seen that there was a "possible state of facts" upon which an action against the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego, to compel said board to call an election, might have been based. This state of facts consisted of the filing of a sufficient petition with said board, and its refusal to call an election as required by law. These facts were alleged in the complaint in the mandamus action, and by virtue thereof the court acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause of action as alleged. The court in such an action would have power to pass upon the question and determine whether or not a valid and sufficient petition had been filed and to render its judgment either that the writ issue or be denied, according to the facts of the case. We do not mean by this that the court could determine the sufficiency of the petition, except by accepting the determination already reached by the board of trustees. As we have already seen, the determination by the board of trustees, as to the sufficiency of the petition, was final, and the court must abide by such determination. If, however, the court, upon the hearing of said action, acted otherwise, and sought other and additional evidence upon this subject, this might be error on the part of the court, but it would not be such error as would affect its jurisdiction. Having acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause, it has power to decide the cause incorrectly as well as correctly. Dahlgren v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 622, 97 P. 681. "Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, and does not depend upon the rightfulness of the decision made." Sherer v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 653, 31 P. 565. As was said in the case of People v. Holladay, supra:

"The judgment in Holladay v. City and County of San Francisco, and which we hold to be equally binding upon the state as upon the city of San Francisco, was undoubtedly erroneous under the law as declared by this court, subsequently, in the cases of Sawyer v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 370, and Hoadley v. San Francisco, 70 Cal. 324, but its force as an adjudication of the rights of the parties thereto, and those in privity with them, is not affected thereby. Carr v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688."

The court also in the case of Baines v. Zemansky, supra, on page 373 (168 P. 567) states the rule to be:

"If that court has jurisdiction, it may decide the wrong as well as the right in the matter, and its decision is binding on all other persons, officers, and courts, save upon an appeal to the court having appellate jurisdiction of the cause."

The superior court of the county of San Diego, having jurisdiction to hear and determine said mandamus proceeding, its judgment therein, even if erroneous, when not appealed from, was binding and conclusive upon the parties thereto in the same respect as it would have been had said judgment been free from error.

The Attorney General relies with much assurance upon the cases of Baines v. Zemansky, supra, and Watts v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. App. 692, 173 P. 183, as well as on the other authorities cited in his brief in support of his second contention. We will only refer, and that briefly, to the two cases of Baines v. Zemansky and Watts v. Superior Court. The court in these two cases had under consideration proceedings which were in many respects similar to the mandamus action involved in the present case, and in each of these cases the court held that the superior court was without jurisdiction in the particular proceeding before it, but the proceeding involved in each of those cases is distinguishable from the one now before us in a very material and essential particular. Each of these proceedings was a direct attempt to have the court substitute its action for that of the officer in a matter in which the determination of the officer was final and conclusive. In other words, it was a direct attack upon the determination of the officer, whose action the statute made final and conclusive, and over whose action the court could have no jurisdiction under any possible state of facts. The action in mandamus, involved in the present proceeding, was directed against the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego, not to review the action of the board in reference to the petition filed with them, but was a proceeding directed against the members of said board to compel them to perform a duty enjoined upon them by law, to wit, the calling of an election, and was based upon a statement of facts which, if true, entitled the plaintiff therein to the relief prayed for. These authorities cannot be considered as controlling the action of the court in the present action, as they were decided upon a state of facts differing materially from those before us.

heirs cannot be maintained, and all heirs must join as plaintiffs, and heirs refusing so to join may be made defendants.

3. Death ⚡101 — Distribution of damages based on pecuniary loss to each heir.

While recovery in action by heirs for wrongful death is lump sum for all heirs, aggregating pecuniary loss of each heir who has suffered pecuniary loss by reason of death, yet distribution of damages recovered among heirs must be on basis of pecuniary loss to each.

4. Death ⚡101—Complaint by omitted illegitimate child for share in judgment for mother's death held not to state cause of action.

Complaint alleging that plaintiff was illegitimate child of deceased wife of defendant, that defendant recovered judgment for wrongful death of plaintiff's mother in action in which defendant had not joined plaintiff as party, and praying that plaintiff be declared part owner of judgment recovered for mother's wrongful death, without alleging that plaintiff attempted to intervene in death action, or that defendant acted fraudulently in excluding plaintiff as party, or that defendant knew of plaintiff's existence, does not state cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Edwardine Curtis Roach, a minor, by William Roach, her guardian ad litem, against L. Montague Drew. Judgment for defendant on demurrer to complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Perkins, of Visalia, for appellant.

Arthur H. Drew, of Fresno, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant's demurrer to the complaint herein was sustained, and judgment was entered in his favor. This appeal is from the judgment.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the illegitimate child of the deceased wife of defendant and "was born at the county of Los Angeles, state of California, on or about May 29, 1917"; that her mother "intermarried with defendant" on the 10th of January, 1921, and was thereafter his wife until her death; that on the 9th of December, 1922, plaintiff's mother was killed in an automobile accident, due to the negligence of the driver of the machine in which she was riding; that on the 4th of September, 1923, the defendant recovered judgment for damages for the wrongful death of plaintiff's mother, which judgment is in full force and effect and unpaid; that in the action in which the judgment was given the defendant herein did not make plaintiff a party, "and did not disclose the existence of plaintiff, and thereby did debar and prevent this plaintiff from commencing any action * * * for damages caused by the death of her mother"; that the defendant "refuses to account to this plaintiff for any part or por-

1. Death ⚡41—Action must be brought in names of persons to whom right of action is given.

Action for death must be brought in names of persons to whom right of action is given by Code Civ. Proc. § 377, giving heirs or personal representatives of persons negligently killed right of action for death.

2. Death ⚡42—All heirs must join as plaintiffs.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, providing that heirs of persons negligently killed may maintain action for wrongful death, action by portion of tion of the judgment * * * and refuses to admit that plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of said judgment or of any part thereof, but, on the contrary, claims the whole of said judgment and of all the rights and benefits thereof for his own use and benefit"; that the plaintiff has suffered damages by reason of her mother's death in a sum at least four times as great as that suffered by defendant; and that plaintiff and defendant are the only heirs of plaintiff's mother. The prayer is that plaintiff be adjudged to be the owner of and entitled to four-fifths of the amount recovered by defendant, less certain special damages, and that he be held as trustee thereof and required to pay to plaintiff four-fifths of any moneys which he may receive under the judgment, after deducting the amount of such special damages. It is not alleged that plaintiff attempted to intervene in the defendant's action for damages, or was in any manner prevented from becoming a party plaintiff therein. There is no allegation that defendant acted fraudulently in failing to make plaintiff a party to the action for damages or to disclose therein the existence of plaintiff as an heir of her mother. Neither is it alleged that defendant ever knew of plaintiff's existence. It cannot be inferred from the facts alleged that the defendant knew that his wife was the mother of an illegitimate child. Certainly no inference or presumption arises to that effect from the mere fact of the marriage. It would not be unnatural, under circumstances such as here disclosed, for a woman to conceal from her husband knowledge of the fact that she was the mother of an illegitimate child which had been born out of wedlock several years prior to their marriage.

[1-3] Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the "heirs or personal representatives" of a person whose death has been caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another "may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death."

"So far as the heirs are concerned, a single joint cause of action is given. The language of our statute permits no other construction. The right of action in such a case being entirely statutory, the action must be brought in the names of the persons to whom the right is given by the statute. * * * The cases from other states holding that the action may be maintained by one or more beneficiaries without joining all, are based upon statutes construed as giving the right of action to one or more for the benefit of all, just as our own statute gives the right to the personal representatives of the deceased for the benefit of all of the heirs. * * * An action by a portion only of the heirs is not the action authorized by our statute. All the heirs should therefore join as plaintiffs in an action by heirs, and, if the consent of any one who should be so joined cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant." Salmon v. Rathjens, 152 Cal. 290, 294, 92 P. 733, 735; Robinson v. Western States Gas, etc., Co., 184 Cal. 401, 410, 194 P. 39, 43.

"While there can be but one action brought or one recovery had either by the personal representative of the deceased or the heirs, * * * and while the recovery in such an action should be of a single 'lump sum' for all, * * * the total recovery to be had is the aggregate of the pecuniary loss of each of the heirs who has suffered a pecuniary loss by reason of the death of the deceased. * * * It is obvious that the distribution among 'heirs' of damages recovered by the statutory trustee must be upon the basis of the pecuniary loss of each." (Estate of Ricconi et al., 185 Cal. 458, 462, 197 P. 97, 98 [14 A. L. R. 509]).

In appellant's opening brief it is said: "For the purposes of this appeal plaintiff admits that the only damages alleged in the complaint (in defendant's action for damages) were for medical and burial expenses and for the loss by said L. Montague Drew of the services, society, comfort and care" of the deceased. Since the damages recovered were those only which the defendant herein suffered, and did not include those sustained by plaintiff herein, it is not perceived upon what principle of law the defendant can be deprived of any part of the amount recovered, in the absence of a showing of wrongful conduct on his part. If the defendant knew of the existence of plaintiff during the prosecution of his action for damages, he might be subject to an action for fraud in omitting her as an heir in his suit. Daubert v. Western Meat Co., 139 Cal. 480, 486, 69 P. 297, 73 P. 244, 96 Am. St. Rep. 154. In Parmley v. Pleasant Valley Coal Co. (Utah) 228 P. 557, 562, it is said:

"If * * * any number less than the whole number of heirs bring the action and willfully conceal the fact that there are other heirs, then those who recover damages are liable to the excluded heirs for their proportionate share of the estate, and may be liable for such further damages as the latter may have sustained."

[4] The demurrer was properly sustained on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

LIEBERMAN et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ORANGE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4944.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 26, 1925.)

1. Prohibition ⚡3(5)—Remedy by appeal from order appointing receiver held inadequate as affecting right to writ.

Remedy by appeal from order appointing receiver held inadequate as affecting right to writ of prohibition where the question involved was not merely whether the receiver appointed by the alleged void order should take or retain possession of the property, but in addition whether another receiver, appointed by another court, should have that possession in his stead.

2. Receivers ⚡35(3)—Order appointing person receiver, if void as to one petitioner for writ of prohibition, was void also as to other petitioners not parties to suit in which appointment was made.

On application for prohibition to restrain proceedings to punish petitioners for interference with possession of receiver, when only one petitioner was party to suit in which receiver was appointed, and others acted as her agents or under order of another court appointing another receiver, if the order appointing the first receiver was void as to her for non-compliance with mandatory requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 566, for want of notice and failure to give undertaking, it was void as to all petitioners.

3. Judgment ⚡497(1)—Generally validity of judgment of court of superior jurisdiction not subject to collateral attack, unless lack of jurisdiction appears on face of record.

Generally the validity of an order or judgment of a court of superior jurisdiction is not subject to collateral attack, unless lack of jurisdiction appears on face of record.

4. Judgment ⚡495(1)—When record shows what was done to acquire jurisdiction, it will not be presumed something additional or different was done.

To the general rule that a court of superior jurisdiction will be conclusively presumed, upon collateral attack, to have had jurisdiction to make an order or render a judgment unless the want of jurisdiction appears upon the record, there is an exception; that is, where the record purports to show what was done for the purpose of acquiring jurisdiction, it will not be presumed in aid of the court's action that anything different or additional was done.

5. Judgment ⚡495(1)—Petition held insufficient as basis for application of rule that, when record shows what was done, no presumption indulged that something different was done.

Petition held insufficient as basis for the application of the rule that, when the record purports to show what was done for the purpose of acquiring jurisdiction—that is, for instance, shows what service was had as a basis for the order made or judgment rendered—it will not be presumed in aid of court's action that anything additional or different was done.

6. Judgment ⚡480—Motions ⚡61—Rule against collateral impeachment of judgments applies generally to all varieties of judgments, decrees, or orders.

Rule against collateral impeachment of judgments applies generally to all varieties of judgments, decrees, or orders made by courts of competent jurisdiction in all kinds of judicial proceedings.

7. Judgment ⚡521—Writ of prohibition constitutes direct attack only when operation of order or judgment assailed is sought to be prevented by writ.

Writ of prohibition constitutes direct attack only when operation of order or judgment assailed is sought to be prevented by the writ.

8. Receivers ⚡59—Attack on order appointing receiver held not "direct attack," but collateral impeachment of order; "collateral attack."

Writ of prohibition to prohibit a threatened punishment of petitioners for contempt, for interfering with receiver's possession of property, was not direct attack on the order appointing the receiver, but merely a collateral impeachment of it, a direct attack on a judicial proceeding being an attempt to avoid or correct it in some manner provided by law; any proceeding provided by law for the purpose of avoiding or correcting a judgment being a "direct attack," while an attempt to do the same thing in any other proceeding is a "collateral attack," which will be successful only upon showing a want of power; an assault upon an order or judgment by means of a writ of review is a direct attack.

9. Mines and minerals ⚡104—Directors of oil corporation held to sustain trust relation to beneficial owners of aliquot shares of output of oil well owned by corporation.

Directors of oil corporation held to sustain trust relation to beneficial owners, by virtue of contracts with corporation, of aliquot shares of output of oil well owned by corporation.

10. Corporations ⚡553(8)—Violation by directors of oil corporation of corporate agreement with primary beneficiaries of oil output of well held to justify order appointing receiver.

Violation by directors of oil corporation of corporate agreement with primary beneficiaries of oil output of well, owned by corporation, held to justify order appointing receiver.

11. Corporations ⚡553(8)—Complaint held to state ample grounds for appointment of receiver of oil corporation.

Complaint of contract beneficiaries of oil output of well owned by defendant corporation, alleging fraud of corporate directors and conspiracy, in connection with trust fund, arising from a sale of such output, sequestration of past profits, deterioration in value of well by remaining idle, and praying for disposition of the well and the holdings in connection therewith, held to state ample grounds for the appointment of a receiver.

WORKS, J. A. J. Charle, one of the respondents in this proceeding, and others who are also among the respondents, commenced an action in the superior court for Orange county, also one of the respondents. In that cause, which will henceforth be called the Charle action, the defendants were a corporation named the Pacific Corporation, its directors, and various other natural persons, including Muriel Strode Lieberman.

It was alleged in the complaint in the Charle action that the plaintiffs and a large number of others, about 150 in all, "have purchased an interest in a certain lease and an interest in the production of a certain oil and gas well located on the premises described in said lease, known as Pacific Corporation oil well No. 16," which will hereafter be termed the oil well; that the plaintiffs sue for themselves and the others making up the 150 individuals; that certain named defendants, who will henceforth be called the directors, are the directors of Pacific Corporation, which will hereafter be called the corporation; that the corporation "has ceased to function as a corporation, and that" the directors were "its last-named officers and directors, and by reason thereof, and as provided by law, became the trustees for" the corporation; that prior to the time the corporation ceased to exist it was the owner and holder of certain oil and mining leases on certain particularly described lands, and had drilled thereon the oil well to an approximate depth of 4,000 feet; that thereafter the corporation divided the production of all gas, oil, and other hydrocarbon substances saved or produced from the oil well into small parts of units, each of which represented a 1/2160 interest in and to the production of the well; that these interests were by the corporation and directors sold to plaintiffs at the rate of $100 each; and that, prior to the time the corporation ceased to do business, it entered into a written contract with plaintiff Charle for the consideration of $1,000, whereby it agreed to sell to Charle 10/2160 parts of the gross production of all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances produced and saved from the well. A copy of this contract is attached to the complaint as an exhibit.

The agreement recites that the corporation owns a certain lease on the real property above mentioned, that the corporation has started the drilling of the oil well on the property, the same having been drilled approximately 4,000 feet and into the oil sand approximately 150 feet, and that it is the desire of the corporation to sell to Charle the 10/2160 parts above mentioned at the rate of $100 for each 1/2160 interest, and that Charle desires to purchase the same. After these recitals it is provided in the contract that the corporation does sell to Charle for $1,000, the receipt of which is acknowledged, the 10/2160 parts mentioned. It is further provided in the contract that the corporation "will continue drilling and such other operations as may be necessary to be done, and diligently prosecute the same until the said well is put on production, and producing oil in commercial quantities, or until it is determined by the party of the first part that no oil could be obtained by further drilling on said well." There are other provisions of the contract which need not be stated, as they are not material to a determination of the present appeal. The complaint further alleges that the corporation entered into a contract identical in form with that above mentioned with each of the plaintiffs, whereby they each purchased from the corporation certain of the units above specified and of an identical character with those purchased by Charle; each purchase being for a cash consideration, the amount of which is set forth in the pleading. It is also alleged that like units were sold for similar considerations to the other persons making up the 150 individuals, along with plaintiffs, in whose behalf the action is prosecuted. It is further alleged that the corporation and the directors sold in all approximately 800 of the units.

It is averred, also, that the corporation "further agreed to sell and market all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances as so produced from said well as aforesaid, and, after the sale thereof and the deduction of the chargeable proportionate share of each unit or interest in the cost of maintenance, operation, selling, and marketing of all oil and gas therefrom, to pay unto each unit holder the balance to which he was entitled as evidenced by said written agreement"; that the corporation did continue the drilling of the oil well "until oil and gas were found and discovered in paying quantities, and that said well as aforesaid was properly put upon production for the benefit of unit holders and said corporation as aforesaid"; that the corporation "failed to carry out the terms of its said contract with these plaintiffs, in that it failed to sell, market, and dispose of the oil and gas produced therefrom for the benefit of plaintiffs and other unit holders as provided in said contracts"; that the corporation, the directors, and certain other named defendants "collogued, confederated, and designedly entered into a conspiracy and did conspire to cheat, wrong, and defraud the plaintiffs and said unit holders out of their just rights of and from participating in the returns from the sale of the production" of the oil well as provided in the contracts already mentioned; that in furtherance of the conspiracy the corporation, the directors, and the other defendants last mentioned turned over unto a certain one of those defendants the management of the oil well and the sale of all oil and gas therefrom; that the defendant last mentioned "collected large sums of money from sales of oil and gas from said well as aforesaid; that the exact amount to these plaintiffs at this time is unknown"; that the defendant last mentioned "claims to have disbursed and paid out for the benefit of said unit holders large sums of money, all of which these plaintiffs are without knowledge, information, and belief, and therefore allege that said sums so paid out were not just and correct sums and not claims legally due or owing from" the oil well, but that those sums were due, if at all, from other wells of the corporation, and were debts, if any, of the corporation and not of the plaintiffs or of the oil well; that thereafter, and in furtherance of the conspiracy, the defendants who are alleged to have been parties to it turned over the management of the oil well and the proceeds of sales of oil and gas therefrom to two of the conspirators, "who took charge of the operations of said well and the production thereof, and who sold the oil and other products therefrom and received large sums of money from such sales," and that during a certain month the two defendants last mentioned collected and received approximately the sum of $24,000, all of which belonged to the unit holders of the oil well; that thereafter, and in furtherance of the conspiracy, "the said defendants as aforesaid turned over the management of said property and the sale of all oil and gas, and the proceeds therefrom," to a fourth party to the conspiracy, "who took possession of said property, sold the oil and gas therefrom, and received large sums of money from the sales of said oil and gas" from the oil well, amounting approximately to $125,000; that in furtherance of the conspiracy all of the conspirators, during four certain months, "received from the sale of oil and gas so sold from said well as aforesaid large sums of money, the amount of which at this time is unknown to these plaintiffs, but plaintiffs allege" that the sum so received was approximately $100,000, "and that the defendants nor any of them have rendered any accounts of the receipts or expenditures of such sum or sums"; that no account has ever been made to the plaintiffs or to any of the unit holders in and to the oil well by any of the conspirators, and that each of them "claim to have disbursed and paid out for the benefit of said unit holders large sums of money, all of which these plaintiffs are without knowledge, information, and belief, and therefore allege that some of said sums so paid out were not just and correct sums and not claims legally due and owing from" the oil well, but that those sums were due, if at all, from other wells of the corporation and were debts, if any, of the corporation and not of the plaintiffs or of the unit holders of the oil well; that the conspirators "have collected and received from the sale of oil and gas from said well since the same has been put upon production, the total amount" of $250,000, and that the conspirators have applied said sums to the use and benefit of the corporation and of themselves, "which sum or sums as so applied greatly exceed the proportion due the said defendants as unit owners or otherwise, or to which they or either of them were or are entitled, and which was and is the property of plaintiffs and other unit holders"; that one of the named natural person defendants has in his possession approximately $10,000 "as funds received from the sale of the units or interests to the unit holders in the production of said corporation, and of the sale of oil and gas from said well or otherwise, all of which is the property of the unit holders and defendant corporation"; that the conspirators "continue to collect the proceeds from the sale of oil and gas and other commodities from the said well, and appropriate the same to their own use, greatly in excess of their proportion to which they or either of them are entitled, all to the detriment of the business of" the oil well, "the interests and lawful rights of these plaintiffs, and other holders of units" in the oil well; that "at this time there is no one in authority to act for said corporation, or the unit holders" of the oil well, and that on a certain day the oil well was "closed down and not permitted to flow or is not at this time being pumped, nor is said well allowed to produce oil and gas"; that the oil well "is not being cared for; that the production of said well is not being conserved, but is allowed to go to waste, and the business of" the oil well "and the property and production thereof is being lost and destroyed; that the unit holders and plaintiffs herein have been and are now being sued in the courts of this state for claims and obligations claimed to be due from these plaintiffs as unit holders, all of which plaintiffs are without any information or belief as to the legality thereof; and that, unless a receiver be appointed, said well will deteriorate and become a total loss to plaintiffs and the unit holders in and to said well, and said unit holders will sustain irreparable losses and injury"; and that to conserve the production of the oil well to the plaintiffs and the assets of the unit holders in and to the well, and their interests in and with the corporation, it will be necessary that a receiver be appointed to take charge of and manage the business and conserve the production of the oil well.

The complaint closes with a prayer for an accounting of the business of the oil well "from the commencement thereof of all moneys received and paid out by said defendants and each and all of them in relation thereto"; that "a receiver of said property and business be appointed with the usual powers"; that the defendants be enjoined from interfering with the moneys, credits, properties, or effects of the oil well; that the property of the oil well "and the holdings in connection therewith, both real and personal, be sold, and the debts and liabilities, if any, be paid, and that the surplus thereof, if any, be divided among the unit holders according to their respective interests therein"; and that the plaintiffs be granted such further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable.

Upon the allegations of this complaint respondent court appointed one Ben E. Tarver, a receiver, for the purpose of taking charge of the property mentioned in the pleading, as well as of all the appurtenances, assets, and books of account pertaining thereto. The order appointing the receiver also directed him to operate the oil well and make sale of the oil produced therefrom.

After Tarver had entered upon the duties of his receivership, Muriel Strode Lieberman, one of the defendants in the Charle action, but not one of the alleged conspirators mentioned in the complaint therein, commenced a certain unlawful detainer action in the superior court for Los Angeles county. The subject of this action was the real property described in the complaint in the Charle action, and upon which the oil well was situated. In the unlawful detainer action the Los Angeles county court appointed one James M. Clune a receiver to take possession of the real property described in the complaint in both actions. After Clune had qualified as such receiver, he, one Howard Murche, and Roland G. Swaffield, an attorney for plaintiff in the Los Angeles county action, according to the allegations in a certain contempt proceeding now to be mentioned, forcibly ejected Tarver from his possession of the oil well as receiver in the Charle action. Proceedings were then instituted in the Orange county court for the purpose of punishing petitioners in this proceeding for contempt of court in invading the alleged possession of the court through its receiver. Thereupon petitioners filed their petition here for a writ of prohibition to prevent the Orange county court from meting out the punishment for contempt, on the ground that the order appointing Tarver receiver was void, and an alternative writ issued. Return was made by demurrer to the petition.

[1] It is contended by respondents that petitioners have an adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law by appeal from the order of the Orange county court appointing Tarver, and that they cannot therefore have the writ of prohibition. A question akin to the one here suggested has lately been passed upon by us in Campbell v. Superior Court, 228 P. 354. There the writ of prohibition was sought to prevent the appointment of a receiver, and, in denying the writ on the ground that the petitioner would have an adequate remedy without resort to the extraordinary powers of the court if a receiver were appointed, we said:

"If petitioner shall appeal from any order of respondent court appointing a receiver, that order will become innocuous upon the giving of an undertaking for the purpose of staying the operation of the order. The receiver cannot then enter upon the performance of his duties, and especially cannot take possession or control of the properties involved in the action, nor exercise dominion over them."

In our opinion in that case, however, we quoted an expression from Jacobs v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 364, 65 P. 826, 85 Am. St. Rep. 204, to the effect that—

There "might, perhaps, be exceptional facts in a case which would call for a writ of prohibition notwithstanding an appeal from an order appointing a receiver."

We think those exceptional facts appear in the present case, although we held that they did not appear in Campbell v. Superior Court. Here the question is not merely whether a receiver designated by an alleged void order shall take, or retain, the possession of property, but in substance at least, and in addition to that question, whether another receiver, appointed by another court, shall have that possession in his stead. An appeal from the order appointing Tarver, granting for the sake of argument that an undertaking on the appeal would serve to divest the possession already lodged in him as receiver, apparently would not have the effect to vest the possession in Clune, the receiver named by the Los Angeles county court. At any rate, if it did have that effect, and if Clune should take possession, or, now having possession, should retain it, he could maintain such possession only until the appeal were determined, if it should so happen that the order appointing Tarver were finally affirmed. In the meanwhile, Clune would have controlled and managed the property during the period without right, a situation which might possibly result in grave consequences, not only upon the score of the accounting then to be required of him, but in the matter of liability upon his bond as receiver, to say nothing of the possibility of questions arising under the law of damages in its various phases. If an appeal from the order appointing Tarver should not so operate as to entitle Clune to take possession or to remain in possession, and the appeal should result in a reversal of that order, then petitioner Lieberman would have been unduly postponed in her right to have the property in question in both actions lodged and kept in the possession of Clune. We are of the opinion that the exigencies of such a situation cannot, as a matter of law, justly await the determination of an appeal from the order appointing Tarver and the giving of an undertaking to stay the operation of the order. It appears to us, under all the circumstances above stated, and whether the appeal would smother or would protect Clune's right of possession as receiver, that it must be said that the remedy by appeal from the order appointing Tarver is inadequate, considering that question alone as affecting the right to the writ of prohibition.

[2] It is insisted by petitioners that the order appointing Tarver was void as to them, for the reason that it was made without notice to petitioner Lieberman, and without the giving, as required by section 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the case of an ex parte application for a receiver, of "an undertaking * * * to the effect that the applicant will pay to the defendant all damages he may sustain by reason of the appointment" of a receiver, "and the entry by him upon his duties, in case the applicant shall have procured such appointment wrongfully, maliciously, or without sufficient cause." It is to be observed in this connection that the petitioner Lieberman is the only one of the petitioners who was a party to the action in which the appointment of Tarver was made; the other petitioners all having been her agents only, or having acted in the matter constituting the alleged contempt only under the order of the Los Angeles county court appointing Clune receiver. Therefore, if the order appointing Tarver is void as to that particular petitioner on the grounds stated, it is also void as to the other petitioners. The requirement of section 566 is plain, and the enactment is mandatory. Van Alen v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 696, 174 P. 672. Does the section apply in the present instance?

[3] The order appointing Tarver recited that, "on due proof of service of motion, and on motion" of counsel for plaintiff and counsel for a defendant who appeared at the hearing, "it is ordered" that Tarver be appointed. It is insisted by respondent that this recital cannot be contradicted by petitioner Lieberman in this proceeding, and that she cannot be heard to assert the fact that no notice was given her. It is said that the present assault upon the order is a collateral attack, and that the recital is for that reason conclusive. It is also contended that the order is conclusive without the quoted recital, on the ground that on collateral attack the order, having been made by a court of superior jurisdiction, will be indisputably presumed to have been validly made; no lack of jurisdiction to make it appearing on the face of the record. We shall consider these two points in the inverse order; that is, we shall first view the order appointing Tarver as if it contained no recital as to notice. It is the undoubted rule that the validity of an order or judgment of a court of superior jurisdiction cannot be assailed by collateral attack on the ground that it was made in excess of jurisdiction, unless the lack of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record. To put the rule differently, the jurisdiction will be deemed to exist in the face of such an attack unless the record affirmatively shows that the tribunal had not jurisdiction to make the order or to render the judgment in question. This rule is so well established, and is so universally understood, that we do not scruple to state it without citation of authority. Really our only concern just here is to determine what constitutes the "record" contemplated by the rule in the present instance, and thereafter to ascertain what, if any, showing is made by that record concerning service or lack of service upon petitioner Lieberman of notice of the hearing at which Tarver was appointed. The first branch of this inquiry we shall settle by assumption. We shall concede, for the sake of argument, without deciding, that the files of respondent court in the Charle action may be searched for any return or affidavit of service of notice upon petitioner Lieberman, or for any entry or showing by constituted authority that no service was made, and that whatever is found upon that search, added to the text of the order itself, will constitute the record to be examined. What is there before us—and the question brings us to the second branch of the inquiry—as the result of such a search? Upon this head a most peculiar situation in many particulars is shown by the petition for the writ. The Charle action was commenced on March 31, 1924, and on that day a summons was issued, and the court made an order to show cause, returnable on April 11, why a receiver should not be appointed. This order, as it is averred, was served on a number of the defendants, not including petitioner Lieberman. It is to be understood, however, that the petition does not allege that there is on file any return, or that there is any other record, showing a service of the order on the defendants alluded to, nor is the source given of the information had by petitioners as to the service, but it is alleged only that it was made. On April 11 the court continued the hearing on the order to show cause to April 15, and on that date one Curry was appointed receiver. He thereafter qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office. On May 2 an alias summons was issued in the cause, and on the next day it was served on petitioner Lieberman. This was the first service upon her of any process in the action. On June 9 the court made an order determining that Curry had faithfully discharged his duties as receiver, that it was useless longer to continue the receivership, and exonerating Curry's bond given upon qualifying for the office of receiver. On June 11 petitioner Lieberman entered her appearance in the action by filing demurrer to the complaint. The court, on August 12, made a second order appointing Curry receiver, but he never qualified under that appointment. On September 12 an order was made vacating the second appointment of Curry and appointing Tarver. This is the order to which reference has heretofore so often been made. This last order, in addition to the matter already quoted as to "proof of service of motion," recited that it was made upon "the summons and complaint in this action and upon all the papers and proceedings heretofore served or filed herein."

[4, 5] There is an exception to the rule that a court of superior jurisdiction will be conclusively presumed, upon collateral attack, to have had jurisdiction to make an order or render a judgment unless the want of jurisdiction appears upon the record. This variant from the rule is that, where the record purports to show what was done for the purpose of acquiring jurisdiction, that is, for instance, shows what service was had as a basis for the order made or judgment rendered, it will not be presumed in aid of the court's action that anything additional was done. It has been tersely stated that "when the record shows what was done it will not be presumed that something different was done." 15 Cal. Jur. tit. Judgments, § 151. It is quite likely that this variant from the general rule preserving the sanctity of the judgments and orders of courts of superior jurisdiction from collateral attack would apply in the present instance if the order to show cause had been made returnable on September 12, the day upon which Tarver was appointed, or if the hearing thereon had been regularly continued from an earlier return day, fixed in the order, to that date, and if, in addition, the petition alleged that the records of respondent court showed that a service of the order had been made upon defendants other than petitioner Lieberman. Under such circumstances it probably could not be presumed that a service had been made upon her. But does the limitation upon the rule apply with the record of respondent court as we actually find it, assuming for the moment that the record shows what the petition alleges? We think not, for several reasons. In the first place, we cannot escape the conclusion that the order to show cause became functus upon the day upon which the first appointment of Curry was made. There was no attempt, by continuance or otherwise, to keep it alive after that date. In fact, it is doubtful whether it could have been kept alive, although we need not decide that it could not have been. The order contemplated a hearing at which a receiver was to be appointed unless cause should be shown why the appointment should not be made. Curry was appointed upon the date to which the return day was extended by continuance, and we are convinced, on the whole, that the order to show cause, and all notice given under it, expired with the making of the order appointing him. To state a parallel between the particular proceeding now in question and an action: The court had issued its process, the process had been served, the parties served had known their day in court, or could have been present, and the court had pronounced its judgment. It seems certain that no other receiver could have been appointed later without the service of other notice, or, in default of such service, without the giving of the undertaking required by section 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In addition to the showing upon which this conclusion is reached, we may look to later occurrences shown by the record. The receivership of Curry was terminated upon a finding that the necessity for a receiver no longer existed, Curry was discharged as receiver, and his bondsmen were exonerated. These conditions surely put an end to all proceedings for the appointment of a receiver under the order to show cause. The notice to the defendants who had been served with the order, which was made nearly six months from the first appointment of Curry, more than three months after the termination of his receivership, and exactly one month after the abortive attempt to appoint him the second time, could not therefore have furnished a basis for the appointment of Tarver, which would have bound even the defendants served. How, then, can it be said, having in mind the variant rule above stated, and overlooking a matter to be mentioned in the next succeeding paragraph, that there is any showing of record of anything done for the purpose of giving notice, to any defendant, of the proceeding or hearing which eventuated in the appointment of Tarver?

We have several times pointed out that there is no allegation in the petition that the record of respondent court in the receivership proceedings showed that service of the order to show cause was made upon any defendant. The pleading merely avers the fact of service upon some of them. Under what we have termed the variant rule, as already stated, it is only when the record of the court actually shows something that was done in an attempt to acquire jurisdiction, that it cannot be presumed that a different thing was done. The petition, then, is utterly insufficient as a basis for the application of the so-called variant rule.

It remains yet to consider the recital in the order appointing Tarver that it was made "upon all the papers and proceedings heretofore served or filed herein." We are of the opinion that it cannot be said that this language was intended to include, or that the court in using it had in contemplation, the service of the order to show cause said to have been made upon defendants other than petitioner Lieberman before the time when Curry was appointed, even if it were alleged that the files of respondent court showed that service was made upon them. This is so because of the considerations to which we have already adverted. The quoted language of the court, being part of the order appointing Tarver, as it was, cannot be so construed as to refer to papers or proceedings filed as precursors to the appointment of Curry. For the reasons we have stated, such papers or proceedings led up to that appointment only, and could have had no efficacy or force after the order appointing Curry was made, and especially after his receivership was terminated. Clearly, to our minds, it cannot be assumed that respondent court intended by its order appointing Tarver to refer to that defunct mesne process as a basis for the appointment. It is not to be forgotten, in this connection, that, as already pointed out, the petition does not allege that the record in respondent court shows a service of the order to show cause on defendants other than petitioner Lieberman.

It is to be noted, also, that in the language quoted from the order appointing Tarver, set forth in the next preceding paragraph, the reference is to papers or proceedings "served or filed." The use of the italicized conjunction makes the expression comport thoroughly with the idea that the court had before it, as a basis for the order appointing Tarver, "papers or proceedings" which were served but which were not filed. This being so, it must be assumed, under the general rule protecting the orders of courts of general jurisdiction from unwarranted collateral attack, that, if the quoted expression related to service at all, the service was made upon all interested parties, including petitioner Lieberman.

On the whole, and for the various reasons which we have considered, we are of the opinion that there was no attempt made by respondent court, in the "record" of the proceeding which ended in the appointment of Tarver, to show anything whatever as to what was done by way of service of process in that proceeding. Therefore that to which we have constantly referred as the variant rule can have no application.

It will be remembered that thus far, and in reaching the conclusion just announced, we have considered the order appointing Tarver as if the recital, "on due proof of service of motion," were not contained in it. As we have already noted, respondents, in addition to their claims as to the sanctity of the order from collateral attack when considered without the recital, take the ground that the recital itself closes the mouths of petitioners against the contention which they would make to the effect that no notice of the motion which eventuated in the appointment of Tarver was ever served on petitioner Lieberman. This point we need not decide. Whether we consider the term "service of motion" as sufficiently comprehensive to import a service of notice of motion, or whether we do not, we can see nothing in the recital which detracts from the views which we have expressed in our consideration of the order as if it contained nothing upon the subject of service.

[6] Petitioners insist, concerning the rule to the effect that the pronouncements of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not subject to collateral attack unless the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record, that it has no application to orders, but relates only to judgments. This contention is without merit.

"The rule against the collateral impeachment of judgments applies generally to all varieties of judgments, decrees, or orders made by courts of competent jurisdiction, in all kinds of judicial proceedings." 34 C. J. p. 514.

"The rule against collateral attack applies to orders and judgments made by the courts in special proceedings taken before them, although not in the nature of contested actions, or purely ex parte, provided the matter involves a judicial determination and carries the sanction of the court's authority." 34 C. J. p. 517.

Leaving these general statements, and looking to adjudications of our own Supreme Court, the rule has been applied to an order of sale of personal property in a probate proceeding, under a statute providing that the proceedings of probate courts should "be construed in the same manner, and with like intendments, as the proceedings of courts of general jurisdiction" (Halleck v. Moss, 22 Cal. 266); to an order of the probate court determining the amount of a stamp to be affixed to a will upon its being admitted to probate (Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 489); to an order made upon proceedings supplementary to execution, requiring a third party to pay to the plaintiff money in his hands which was the property of the defendant in the action (Bronzan v. Drobaz, 93 Cal. 647, 29 P. 254); to an order setting aside a judgment for the purpose of making corrections in it (Galvin v. Palmer, 134 Cal. 426, 66 P. 572); and to a judgment or order admitting a will to probate (Estate of Ryan, 177 Cal. 598, 171 P. 297).

[7, 8] Petitioners contend that the attack which they seek to make on the order appointing Tarver is not collateral but direct. In support of this view they cite Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, § 2. At the place cited prohibition is stated to be one of the methods by which a direct attack may be launched. Granting, what we need not decide, that this text contains a correct statement of the law, it can apply only when the operation of the order or judgment assailed is sought to be prevented by the writ. Here the endeavor is not to halt proceedings under the order appointing Tarver, but petitioners would prohibit a threatened punishment for contempt under a distinct proceeding based upon that order. It has been directly decided that such an attempt is a collateral and not a direct attack. Frey v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 421, 134 P. 733. Moreover, the present proceeding comes not within the recognized definitions of the term direct attack.

"A direct attack on a judicial proceeding is an attempt to avoid or correct it in some manner provided by law. * * * Any proceeding provided by law for the purpose of avoiding or correcting a judgment is a direct attack which will be successful upon showing the error; while an attempt to do the same thing in any other proceeding is a collateral attack, which will be successful only upon showing a want of power." Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, §§ 2, 3.

The same definition, in effect, will be found in another publication. 34 C. J. 520. As showing the application of the rule, it has been said:

"When we speak of a direct attack upon the judgment we usually refer to some proceeding in the action in which it was rendered, either by a motion before the court which rendered it, or an appeal therefrom, whereas an attempt to impeach the judgment by matters dehors the record is a collateral attack." Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 P. 1007.

To carry the same idea further, an assault upon an order or judgment by means of the writ of review is a direct attack. Gt. Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 P. 35. We are satisfied that the attempt here is not directly to render void or to set aside the order appointing Tarver, but merely to collaterally impeach it. Therefore, and notwithstanding what we have already said as to the inadequacy of the right of appeal when considering that question alone as affecting the right to the writ of prohibition, petitioners must find some means other than the present by which to attack the order.

[9, 10] The order is assailed on other grounds. It is contended that the complaint in the Charle action was insufficient as a basis for the appointment of a receiver. This point is divisible into two distinct questions. The first of these is founded upon several decisions of the Supreme Court, notably Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, and Elliott v. Superior Court, 168

Cal. 727, 145 P. 101, the contention of petitioners being that under the complaint the appointment of Tarver was an attempt, at the suit of those who were not stockholders, to deprive the directors of the possession and control of the property of the corporation, a possession and control which are lodged in the directors by law, and to intrust to a receiver the duty of operating it, which duty under the law cannot be taken from the directors. The appointment of receivers of corporations, however, has frequently been made in actions which to our minds are more nearly like the Charle action than are the cases relied upon by petitioners. The views expressed in Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 P. 788, California F. G. Ass'n v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 711, 97 P. 769, and Boyle v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 671, 170 P. 1140, L. R. A. 1918D, 226, seem to uphold the allegations of the Charle complaint as sufficient to support the appointment of a receiver. We need not be concerned over the fact that the plaintiffs in the action were not stockholders of the corporation. The facts alleged in the complaint were such as to show that the directors owed to them a duty similar to that which was owing to the stockholders. The plaintiffs were the beneficial owners of parts of—we might justly say of aliquot shares of—the output from the oil well. Not only were their rights under their contracts somewhat similar to the right to dividends which the stockholders enjoyed under the law, but, in point of priority at least, they were superior to that right. Undoubtedly the division to be made between the plaintiffs and those situated like them, of their part of the proceeds from the production of the oil well, must from time to time legally have been made before the right of the stockholders to dividends could attach. The directors were then charged with the duty of administering a trust in which, so far as the record here discloses, the plaintiffs in the Charle action were the primary beneficiaries. These considerations bring the action directly within the doctrine of Wickersham v. Crittenden, supra. It was there held that the right of a stockholder to the appointment of a receiver of a corporation may justly be founded upon the trust relationship existing between stockholders and directors, and the right to a receiver under the complaint there in question was upheld on the ground that the trust so existing had in that case been violated. The allegations in the Charle complaint showed a similar violation of trust. We cannot conceive a state of the law, under the enlightened principles which govern the exercise of the jurisdiction of courts of equity, which would deny the appointment of a receiver, under the allegations of the Charle complaint, merely upon the ground that the plaintiffs were not stockholders of the corporation. The difference between them and the plaintiff in the action which was the subject of consideration in Elliott v. Superior Court, supra, is at once apparent. Their situation was such as to appeal peculiarly to the ear of the chancellor. What great wrongs might they suffer if the appointment of a receiver were denied them, wrongs which must otherwise in a great measure go undressed.

[11] The allegations of the complaint in the Charle action are comprehensively set forth in the statement of facts at the outset of this opinion, and it is not necessary here to repeat them in considering the point of petitioners which is now under examination, but a few circumstances may be stated to show the similarity of that action with certain features of Wickersham v. Crittenden, supra, and the two other cases cited with it above. Intrinsically, the relief asked by the plaintiffs was made necessary by the acts of the directors and of those with whom it is alleged they conspired in violation of their trust. No substantial complaint was made against the corporation itself, although some of the allegations were in form directed against that entity. There was no attempt to wind up the affairs of the corporation, but only to dispose of the oil well "and the holdings in connection therewith." On this head it is contended by petitioners that the complaint must be regarded as if the conduct of the oil well were the sole business of the corporation, but we cannot adopt that view. There was no allegation to that effect. Not only so, but there were a few statements in the pleading which aid in justifying a contrary construction. The oil well was alleged to be known as the corporation's well No. 16; this averment tending in some degree to indicate that the corporation owned other wells. It was also alleged that certain debts paid out of the trust fund in which the plaintiffs were interested were due from other wells of the corporation, and were its debts and not those of the oil well. On the whole, then, we cannot accede to the contention of petitioners as to the interpretation which is to be placed upon the complaint in this regard. Pursuing further our endeavor to show features of the Charle action which are similar to those of the cases which we have cited, we observe that the averments of the complaint show by positive and decided allegation that the directors of the corporation, through the conspiracy alleged, are not only allowing the oil well to remain idle and thus to deteriorate in value, with the result that all income of the plaintiffs under their contracts is cut off and in future endangered, but that the past profits from their investments have been sequestered and appropriated. From these particular allegations, which we must, upon the demurrer to the petition, assume to be true, it is evident that it is impossible for the corporation to carry on to advantage that portion of its business relating to the oil well. The complaint seems to us to state ample grounds for the appointment of a receiver.

The concluding contention of petitioners, the second branch of their point that the complaint in the Charle action was insufficient to justify the appointment of a receiver, is that the suit "is essentially one for money so far as the material allegations of the complaint are concerned." This point has in a large measure been met by what we have already said, but, if it is not entirely so covered, we now dismiss it with the remark that in our view the complaint will bear no such limited construction as that contended for.

Demurrer sustained. The alternative writ of prohibition is vacated, and a peremptory writ is denied.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

PARKER et al. v. COLBURN, Commissioner of Public Health, etc., et al.
(S. F. 11029.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1925.)

1. Livery stable and garage keepers ⇨4½—

One desiring to erect public garage held required to procure permits from building inspector and city council.

Under Ordinance of City of Oakland, No. 418 (N. S.) §§ 2, 5a, before one may erect a public garage he must secure a permit from building inspector pursuant to building ordinances of city, and also a permit from city council authorizing the maintenance of a public garage, and neither is sufficient without the other; it being of no consequence which permit was first issued.

2. Livery stable and garage keepers ⇨1—

Charter held not to limit city's power to require permit to construct building for public garage.

Oakland City Charter, art. 9, § 51, subd. 11, does not limit power of city to adopt regulations requiring permit to construct or maintain a building to be used for business, such as public garage, lawful in itself, but which may under certain conditions be detrimental to public health, safety, comfort, and welfare, and irrespective of charter, city is vested with full power to make and enforce police regulations; such power being derived directly from Const. art. 11, § 11.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨622—Lawful business cannot be arbitrarily prohibited.

A lawful business properly conducted and located, not injurious to persons, property, or public welfare, cannot be arbitrarily prohibited by means of regulatory measures.

4. Nuisance ⇨5—No one has inherent right to conduct business constituting nuisance.

No man has an inherent or constitutional right to maintain a building or premises or conduct a business which is a nuisance, or which under certain conditions may become a nuisance.

5. Livery stable and garage keepers ⇨4½—
Ordinance regulating public garage held valid.

A public garage, because of inflammatory substances usually kept therein and unusual noises emanating therefrom, is such an institution as may be regulated and even prohibited in exercise of police power, and fact that discretionary power is vested in council to grant or refuse a permit to erect public garage does not render ordinance invalid.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨63(1)—Decision of legislative body as to necessity of regulatory measure conclusive.

The decision of legislative body as to necessity or reasonableness of a regulation is conclusive, unless it can be said that regulatory measure has no just or reasonable relation to object which it purports to carry out.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by M. Parker and another against Frank Colburn, Commissioner of Public Health and Safety of City of Oakland, and others, to enjoin enforcement of an ordinance regulating erection and maintenance of public garages. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellants.

Bernard Silverstein, John W. Collier, Sydney J. Silverstein, and Silverstein, Collier & Silverstein, all of Oakland, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This action was commenced to enjoin certain officials of the city of Oakland from enforcing an ordinance the alleged purpose of which was and is to regulate and control the erection and maintenance of public garages in said city. The defendants answered. The plaintiffs moved for judgment on the pleadings. The motion was granted, and a judgment of injunction as prayed for in the complaint was entered. From this judgment the defendants have appealed. On the motion for judgment it was admitted that on the 17th day of November, 1921, the plaintiffs acquired and now own certain parcels of real property in said city particularly described as lots 34 and 40 and a portion of lots 35 and 36 of the Pacific Theological Seminary tract No. 2. One parcel fronts on and is known as 3420 Telegraph avenue, one of the main business thoroughfares of said city. Located on this parcel is a one-story brick building, 60 by 100 feet in dimensions, and which has been used for 10 years or more as a public garage. The other parcel fronts on Elm street, a residential street, and abuts the first parcel at the rear thereof. Subsequent to the construction of the brick building on Telegraph avenue, two wooden sheds were erected on the Elm street property. These sheds were in the rear of said brick building, but were not physically connected therewith. They were about 16 feet wide, 10 feet high, were entirely open in front, and faced inwardly. They were used for the purpose of protection of automobiles from the rain and weather, and access thereto was gained through a large door in the rear of the brick garage. On November 21, 1922, the plaintiffs through their representatives made application to the building inspector of the city for a permit to erect a building to be used for public garage purposes, 50 by 100 feet in dimensions, one story in height, with metal skylight, a tar and gravel roof, and with an entrance on Elm street. Upon presentation of the plans and specifications for the structure the applicant was advised by the inspector that the ordinances of the city of Oakland required a permit from the city council before a person could lawfully construct a building to be used as a public garage. Upon assurance from plaintiffs' agent that the proposed structure was not a new building but merely an addition, with alterations and repairs, to the existing brick building fronting on Telegraph avenue, the inspector issued the building permit under the belief that the city ordinances did not in such cases require a permit from the city council in addition to the building permit. Plaintiffs immediately began to tear down the wooden sheds, and by the construction of forms prepared to pour cement for the foundation of the new garage building. Numerous protests were then presented to the city council, objecting to the construction of the new building. Pending the determination of said protest, the chief of the fire prevention bureau of the city submitted a report that he had visited the premises and ordered the work stopped on the ground that the permit had not been granted by the city council pursuant to the ordinance requiring the same; that the proposed structure was in reality a new garage (50 by 100 feet) facing on Elm street; that the location of the garage on Elm street was in a residential zone; and that the building permit theretofore issued calling for additions was merely a subterfuge, and recommended that the building permit be revoked.

On December 4, 1922, the commissioner of public health and safety recommended to the council that the building permit be revoked for the reasons specified in the report of the chief of the fire prevention bureau. The city attorney advised the council that the construction of the building on Elm street in the manner proposed was the construction of a new garage building in a new location, and that the owner should first secure a permit from the city council for the construction and maintenance of the same as a public garage. The council conducted a public hearing on the question of whether or not the building permit should be revoked. The plaintiffs were notified of the hearing and appeared. After such hearing the council adopted a resolution purporting to revoke the said building permit. Thereafter the plaintiffs made application to the superior court for a writ of review to annul the order of the council revoking said permit. The superior court annulled the order on the ground that the council possessed no authority to revoke the building permit, and its action in that respect was in excess of its jurisdiction. The plaintiffs resumed construction work on the Elm street lot, whereupon their contractor was arrested and charged with a violation of ordinance No. 418 (N. S.), in that he was proceeding with the erection of a building to be used as a public garage without first having secured a permit therefor from the city council as required by said ordinance. The present injunction proceeding followed. The plaintiffs have not obtained, nor have they applied to the council for, a permit to construct and maintain a public garage at the location of the proposed new structure, and the council has never been called upon either to grant or deny an application for such a permit.

Ordinance No. 418 (N. S.) was adopted February 13, 1913. Section 2 thereof as originally adopted, and as in effect at the time of the issuance of the building permit, provided as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation hereafter to conduct or maintain any building or premises to be used as a public garage * * * without first obtaining a permit therefor from the council, specifying the name of the permittee, the location of the premises to be used, and the amount of gasoline permitted; provided, however, that the council in granting or refusing such permit shall exercise a reasonable and a sound discretion, taking into consideration the character of the applicant, and the intended location."

This permit was in addition to the usual building permit required by another ordinance of the city.

It is alleged in the answer, and therefore also an admitted fact, that the plans and specifications presented to the building inspector called for the construction of a class C building under the provisions of the building ordinances of the city. In 1915 section 5a was added to said ordinance No. 418 (N. S.) providing as follows:

"All public garages hereafter erected shall be of class 'A' or class 'B' construction, except that public garages of class 'C' construction not more than one story high and having a cement floor will be permitted if all other provisions of this ordinance are complied with."

[1] It is alleged in the complaint that on the 21st day of November, 1922, the building inspector approved the application of the plaintiffs for a permit "to erect, alter, or repair the said building in the manner and form" provided by ordinance. The answer admits the approval of the application for a permit but alleges affirmatively that the said application was for a permit "not to make repairs or alter" the building but "to erect" a new public garage building. It is therefore also an admitted fact that the application was for a permit "to erect" a new building to be used as a public garage. By the terms of said section 5a the construction of a public garage building of the class C type was permitted only if all other provisions of said ordinance be complied with. One of the requirements of section 2 thereof was that it should be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation "to conduct or maintain any building or premises to be used as a public garage * * * without first obtaining a permit therefor from the council." Two things were therefore essential in order that the plaintiffs might lawfully proceed with the construction of the building and the maintenance of the premises to be used for the purpose of a public garage as proposed: (1) A permit from the building inspector pursuant to the building ordinances of the city; and (2) a permit from the city council authorizing the plaintiffs to conduct and maintain the establishment as a public garage. Neither was sufficient without the other. Under said section 5a the building permit to construct a class C building would be entirely ineffectual unless and until the permit from the city council was obtained to maintain the building as a public garage pursuant to section 2 of the ordinance. Assuming that the superior court correctly decided that the building permit when issued was beyond the power of the municipal authorities to recall it is the proper construction of the ordinances in effect at the time the building permit was issued that it was of no consequence as to which permit was first issued, but neither was effectual as authority to the plaintiffs to accomplish their purpose without also the issuance of the other. Ordinance No. 418 (N. S.) was amended subsequent to the issuance of the building permit so as to provide that a permit issued by the building inspector in accordance with the building ordinance of the city for any building described in ordinance No. 418 (N. S.) should be invalid until the additional permit had been secured from the city council. Counsel for plaintiffs indulge in much argument as to the purpose of this and other amendments to said ordinance adopted after the issuance of the building permit, but in view of our conclusions as to the requirements of the ordinances of the city at the time the building permit was issued it is not necessary to discuss the effect of the amendments.

[2] It is contended by plaintiffs that under the Oakland charter the city does not possess the power to require a permit for the use of a building for a lawful purpose; that its power is limited by the charter to the regulation of the construction and maintenance of buildings to the end that they may not be insecure or unsafe. The contention is based on section 51 of article 9 of the charter, and particularly on subsection 11 of that section (Stats. 1911, pp. 1584, 1585). The provisions referred to are as follows:

"Sec. 51. Except as herein otherwise expressly provided, the council shall exercise all the general powers of the city herein set forth and all powers now held by or that may hereafter be given to the city under the Constitution or the laws of the state; but only in the manner and under the conditions of this charter, and subject to all the provisions thereof. In addition to all such powers, the council, subject to the provisions and restrictions of this charter, shall have power: * * * (11). To regulate the construction of and the materials used in all buildings, * * * to prevent the erection and maintenance of insecure or unsafe buildings, * * * and to provide for their summary abatement or destruction.

It is insisted that the regulations governing the "construction" of buildings are embodied in the building ordinance pursuant to which the building permit was issued to the plaintiffs, and that by reason of the fact that the city was so authorized and has so acted it has, in effect, within its charter limitations, exhausted its legislative power on the subject, and that the use to which the building may be put after the building permit is issued and the building has been constructed is not the concern of the city and cannot be considered here. The contention is untenable for several reasons. There is nothing in the charter which limits the power of the city to adopt regulations requiring a permit to construct, or maintain a building to be used for a business, lawful in itself, but which may under certain conditions be detrimental to the public health, safety, comfort, and welfare. Such regulatory measures are enacted in the exercise of the police power. 18 Cal. Jur. 839, and cases cited. Subsection (1) of said section 51 of the charter provides that the city council shall have power "to make and enforce local, police, sanitary and other laws and regulations." But even in the absence of such a charter provision the city is vested with full power to make and enforce police regulations. Such power is derived directly from section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution. In re Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 P. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130.

But it is the contention of the plaintiffs that a public garage is a lawful business; that in the ordinance requiring the permit from the city council there are no prescribed standards or regulations applying indiscriminately to all existing or contemplated public garages, and that without such definitely prescribed standards and regulations the granting or refusal of such a permit is subject to the arbitrary whim and caprice of the council. It is the position of the defendants that under the law of this state the city has the power to require such a permit as a police regulation; that a reasonable discretion is vested in the council to grant or refuse the same, and that in the absence of a showing by the plaintiffs of unreasonable or unlawful or arbitrary discrimination on the part of the council in denying the permit they are not entitled to the relief sought in this action.

[3] It may be assumed that a lawful business properly conducted and located, not injurious to persons, property, or public welfare, cannot be arbitrarily prohibited, by means of regulatory measures. Application of Dart, 172 Cal. 47, 155 P. 63, L. R. A. 1916D, 905, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1127. Plaintiffs' counsel state that a public "garage business is surely a lawful business; it is not injurious to persons, property, or public welfare; otherwise the business itself wherever and however conducted would be a nuisance." But they have truly classified the plaintiffs' business in the statement immediately following, wherein they say: "True, the conduct of the business in certain localities or under certain conditions might become hazardous." If, therefore, its tendency be to increase the fire hazard in the particular locality, or be otherwise injurious to persons or property, it is subject to regulation or prohibition. Odd Fellows' Cem. Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 P. 987; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 520, 183 P. 230. No case seems to have arisen in this state involving the right to require a permit for the construction and maintenance of a public garage probably for the very obvious reason that, because of the inflammatory substances usually kept therein and the unusual noises emanating therefrom, it has been generally conceded that such a business was subject to regulation under the police power and might be prohibited in certain localities and under certain conditions. There are, however, numerous cases in other jurisdictions holding that public garages may, under certain conditions, be nuisances and subject to such regulation. Diocese of Trenton v. Toman, 74 N. J. Eq. 702, 70 A. 606; Hunter v. Wood, 277 Pa. 150, 120 A. 781; People v. Ericsson, 263 Ill. 368, 105 N. E. 315, L. R. A. 1915D, 607, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 183; People v. Village of Oak Park, 266 Ill. 365, 107 N. E. 636; In re McIntosh, 211 N. Y. 265, 105 N. E. 414, L. R. A. 1915D, 603; Ninth Street Improvement Co. v. Ocean City, 90 N. J. Law, 106, 100 A. 568; Schait v. Senior, 97 N. J. Law, 390, 117 A. 517; Myers v. Fortunato, 12 Del. Ch. 374, 110 A. 847; General Baking Co. v. Board, 242 Mass. 277, 136 N. E. 245; Storer v. Downey, 215 Mass. 273, 102 N. E. 321. The plaintiffs' comment on the cases in other states cited and relied on by the defendants is that in the main they involved the exclusion of public garages by zoning ordinances. But, if this were true as to all of them, such fact would not of itself avoid their effect as authority that a public garage is such an institution as may be regulated and even prohibited in the exercise of the police power. Zoning regulations are promulgated in the exercise of that power. Miller v. Board of Public Works (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 381.

The respondents endeavor to bring themselves within such cases as Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220, Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cem. Ass'n, 124 Cal. 349, 57 P. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75, and Matter of the Application of Dart, supra. The rules laid down in those cases support the conclusion that, where a business is lawful and has no injurious tendency, any ordinance requiring a license or permit must prescribe the standards or regulations applying indiscriminately to all who fall within the same class, and to which all similarly situated may conform. The rule is well stated in the Dart Case, where it is said in the concurring, which is in reality the majority, opinion, that:

"A law or ordinance by or under which a lawful occupation, in itself, when properly conducted, in nowise injurious to persons, property, or the public interest, may be absolutely prohibited at the dictation of any official body without cause than its own will or desire, is beyond the legislative power and to that extent void."

[4] As declared in Re Flaherty, 105 Cal. 558, 38 P. 981, 27 L. R. A. 529, the rule in such cases is "based upon the theory that the lawful, inherent rights of men cannot be entirely suppressed or destroyed by statute or ordinance, but can only be regulated, and that all regulations of such rights must be uniform." It is a commonplace that no man has an inherent or constitutional right to maintain a building or premises or conduct a business which is a nuisance or which under certain conditions may become a nuisance.

[5] There is a wide distinction between lawful occupations which have no injurious tendencies and those which are lawful in themselves, but which, because of their tendencies or their conduct under certain conditions or in certain localities, are likely to injuriously affect the public health, safety, comfort, or welfare. The necessity of regulating lawful occupations falling within the latter class was recognized in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 90, 11 S. Ct. 15, 34 L. Ed. 620, wherein the court said:

"Some occupations by the noise made in their pursuit, some by the odors they engender, and some by the dangers accompanying them, require regulations as to the locality in which they shall be conducted."

See Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 P. 714; Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 S. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018; In re Holmes, 187 Cal. 647, 203 P. 398. The business proposed to be conducted on said premises by the plaintiffs herein belongs to such classification, and the fact that discretionary power is vested in the council to grant or refuse a permit does not render the ordinance invalid. In Lieberman v. Van De Carr, 199 U. S. 552, 26 S. Ct. 144, 50 L. Ed. 305, in referring to cases involving the exercise of such discretion by administrative boards, the court said:

"These cases leave in no doubt the proposition that the conferring of discretionary power upon administrative boards to grant or withhold permission to carry on a trade or business which is the proper subject of regulation within the police power of the state is not violative of rights secured by the fourteenth amendment."

[6] It may be said with equal assurance that this discretion may be properly exercised when the power to exercise the same is lodged, not in a subordinate administrative board, but in the city council—the same public body which has ordained that the permit shall be required. See Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, 166 P. 348. Unless it can be said that the regulatory measure has no just or reasonable relation to the object which it purports to carry out, the decision of the legislative body as to the necessity or, reasonableness of the regulation is conclusive. Odd Fellows' Cem. Ass'n v. San Francisco, supra; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, supra. No question of arbitrary or unreasonable action on the part of the council in refusing a permit is here involved.

Wherefore it is concluded that under the law as applied to the admitted facts the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. MORRIS et al.
(Civ. No. 4989.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1925.)

1. Eminent domain $\Leftrightarrow$ 262(1)—Failure to serve codefendants with notice of intention to move for new trial not grounds for dismissing appeal from refusal thereof.

In condemnation proceedings, under Street Opening Act of 1903, providing for appeal from order denying new trial, § 13, which section is not expressly repealed by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended in 1915, 1917, 1923, failure to serve notice of intention to move for new trial on other defendants, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, will not constitute grounds for dismissal of appeal from an order denying motion.

2. Eminent domain $\Leftrightarrow$ 262(1)—Failure to give notice of intention to move for new trial may be sufficient reason for affirming order.

In condemnation proceedings, failure to give notice to other defendants of intention to move for new trial, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, although not a recognized ground for dismissing appeal from an order denying motion, may constitute sufficient reason for affirming order on consideration of appeal upon its merits.

Proceeding by the City of Los Angeles against Dan Morris and others and Annie F. Young for condemnation for street purposes. From an interlocutory decree, and from an order denying motion for new trial, defendant last named appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

W. W. Hyams and Meserve & Meserve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Donald M. Keith, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles (John A. Rush, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. [1, 2] In this action, the defendant Annie F. Young has appealed from an interlocutory decree of condemnation for street purposes of certain land owned by her. According to her notice of appeal she also has appealed or attempted to appeal from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The condemnation was sought to be obtained pursuant to the Street Opening Act of 1903 (Deering's Gen. Laws [1923 Ed.] Act 8198). According to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in the year 1915 (as well as under the amendments of 1917 and 1923), there is no right of appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. But, as provided by section 956, Code of Civil Procedure, the court on appeal from the judgment may review any order on motion for a new trial. But it is provided by section 13 of the Street Opening Act of 1903 (St. 1903, p. 376), that, in an action brought under that act, an appeal may be taken from any order granting or denying a new trial. Section 6 of the same act provides that:

"Said action shall in all respects be subject to and governed by such provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure now existing or that may be hereafter adopted, as may be applicable thereto, except in the particulars otherwise provided for in this act."

Counsel for appellants say that in this case they gave notice of appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, because they were not certain whether the enactment of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended, impliedly repealed the provisions of said section 13 of the Street Opening Act. For the purposes of decision of the present motion we shall assume (but without actually deciding the question), that the provisions of said section 13 remains in force, and that therefore appellant was entitled to appeal from the order denying her motion for a new trial, as well as to appeal from the judgment. Respondent has not elected to base its motion upon the ground that there is no right of appeal from the order denying a new trial, and we deem it unnecessary to give the point extended consideration at this time.

The notice of motion to dismiss and the motion as made request the court "to dismiss the appeal." In the motion itself respondent further asks that the court affirm the judgment. The sole ground of the motion is stated as follows:

"That it appears affirmatively from the record herein that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was directed to and served upon this plaintiff-respondent alone, and not upon any of the defendants, parties in interest herein, as required by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

Assuming the facts to be as stated in the motion, they do not furnish any reason for dismissing the appeal from the judgment. It also seems clear that the same facts, even if supported by the record, do not constitute a sufficient ground for dismissal of the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, assuming that such an appeal lies in any case. It is the rule that a failure to give notice of intention to move for a new trial is not a recognized ground for dismissing an appeal from an order denying the motion; although such failure might constitute a sufficient reason for affirming the order, when we come to a consideration of the appeal upon its merits. Turner v. Ten Winkel Co., 24 Cal. App. 213, 140 P. 1086; Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co., 146 Cal. 571, 80 P. 719.

The motion is denied.

EAGAN v. SYKES et al. (Civ. 4895.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 14, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨200—Veterinary in fire department continuing after adoption of charter held a "member of fire department," entitled to retirement on pension.

A veterinary, who was a member of the fire department prior to its charter, continued thereafter in the same capacity and at the same salary; held that he was a "member of the fire department" within San Francisco Charter, § 3, c. 7, art. 9, for the purpose of retirement on a pension.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Member.]

2. Municipal corporations ⇨200—Veterinary's status as member of fire department unaffected by private practice.

A veterinary engaged in private practice, thus contravening that portion of San Francisco charter providing that "no member or employee of the fire department shall be engaged in any other employment," held that, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, such action, while subjecting him to dismissal, did not ipso facto destroy his status as a "member" for purpose of retirement on a pension.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Wm. F. Eagan against Frank C. Sykes and others for a writ of mandate com-elling defendants, as Fire Pension Fund Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco, to retire plaintiff on a pension from the position of veterinarian in the fire department. From a judgment ordering the writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment ordering a writ of mandate to issue, compelling appellants, as fire pension fund commissioners, to retire respondent, William F. Eagan, from the position of veterinarian in the fire department on a pension of $50 a month.

Dr. Eagan was appointed to the position of veterinarian in the fire department on December 15, 1894. He served continuously in that position until the charter went into effect on January 8, 1900. From the time of the adoption of the charter in 1900 until November 25, 1921, the date of his application for retirement on a pension, Eagan continued to act as veterinarian of said department, and received a fixed compensation for his services as such.

[1] It is conceded by appellants that Dr. Eagan is entitled to be retired upon pension if he was an "officer or member" of the fire department within the meaning of those terms in section 3, chapter 7, article 9, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco. It is conceded that Eagan was a member of the fire department under the statute in force prior to the adoption of the charter, and that after the adoption of the charter he continued to render the same service and receive the same compensation as before. These facts make applicable the cases of Ahearn v. Davis, 184 Cal. 579, 194 P. 1008, and Hurley v. Sykes (Cal. App.) 231 P. 748, which dispose of appellants' contention that Eagan was not an "officer or member" of the fire department at the time of his application for retirement.

[2] The only other question argued upon appeal is as to the effect of the circumstance that Eagan did not devote all his time to his work in the fire department, but, in addition to such work, engaged in private practice of his profession. Appellants direct our attention to section 10, chapter 1, article 9, of the charter, which provides: "No member or employee of the fire department shall be engaged in any other employment." We think the most that can be said with reference to this matter is that Eagan subjected himself to dismissal for disobedience of this provision, but failure to perform one's duties in a given status cannot have the effect, ipso facto, of changing one's status, in the absence of any express provision of law to that effect. Appellants' argument upon this point amounts to such a contention.

There are no other matters requiring consideration, and the judgment is affirmed.

WALLIS v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 4952.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 31, 1925.)

1. Divorce ⇐210—Superior court had jurisdiction to make order for payment of alimony pendente lite after default entered.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 138, an action of divorce is still pending after default, and orders for alimony and maintenance and support may be made at any time from commencement of action until its final determination and expiration of time for appeal, and hence superior court had jurisdiction to make an order for payment of alimony pendente lite after default decree of divorce was entered.

2. Divorce ⇐269(8)—Superior court without jurisdiction to adjudge one in contempt for failure to obey an order not served on him.

Superior court was without jurisdiction to adjudge one in contempt for failure to obey an order for payment of alimony, in a divorce action, which was not served on him nor made in his presence and of which he had no knowledge.

3. Contempt ⇐66(7)—Presumptions not indulged in support of judgments in contempt.

Presumptions and intendments that judgment was based on sufficient evidence and all proceedings before court below were regular are not to be indulged in support of judgments in contempt.

Certiorari by Abijah Tucker Wallis to review a judgment of the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles and Hon. Walter Guerin, a Judge thereof, adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. Judgment vacated and set aside.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

George L. Hampton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Certiorari is here invoked to review the proceedings of the superior court of Los Angeles county, wherein petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of court for failure to comply with an order directing the delivery of a certain Velie automobile and the payment of money to petitioner's wife pendente lite, as attorney's fees, costs of suit, and for the maintenance and support of herself and minor child.

It is alleged in the petition of petitioner that he instituted an action for divorce, and that his wife was served with process, and appeared by counsel; that thereafter an amended complaint was served and filed, and, no demurrer or answer having been filed thereto, a default was entered on or about October 6, 1924. On September 24, 1924, pursuant to an order to show cause, which the petitioner alleges was not served upon him, the trial court signed, and on October 11, 1924, filed a written order, reading in part as follows:

"Upon reading the affidavit heretofore filed by the defendant here and upon hearing the evidence adduced in support of the order to show cause on file herein, on the 24th day of September, 1924, at 2:00 o'clock p. m., the defendant being personally present in court and represented by her counsel, Geo. L. Hampton, and the plaintiff having made no appearance at all, either personally or by counsel, it is hereby ordered," etc.

This order purported to be one requiring the plaintiff in the action, the petitioner herein, to pay certain sums as alimony and suit money, and to deliver the automobile to the defendant.

On October 28, 1924, the defendant filed her affidavit, reciting the fact of the issuance of said order, that the same was "duly served upon plaintiff as shown by the affidavit of service of said order on file herein," and alleging that plaintiff had failed to comply with any of its requirements. Citation was thereupon issued to petitioner, directing that he appear before said superior court on November 12, 1924, then and there to show cause, if any he might have, why he should not be punished for contempt of court for disobedience of the order of September 24.

Aside from the defendant's statement above quoted, there is no evidence whatever in the record of the order of September 24, 1924, for payment of alimony, etc., having been served upon the plaintiff, petitioner herein, and he alleges in his petition that in response to said citation he appeared and testified, among other things, that he had not been served with said order to show cause, or with the order made pursuant thereto, and that he knew nothing thereof. However, he was adjudged guilty of contempt of court for not having complied with the terms of the latter order.

It is contended that the defendant moved the lower court to vacate the default, but that her motion was denied; that thereafter she moved for leave to renew said motion, and was permitted to do so; but that, following further hearing, the same was denied. Petitioner therefore assigns as grounds for this proceeding the fact that the relief granted defendant by the order of September 24, 1924, was not sought until after default had been entered, and that the superior court then had no jurisdiction to so order; and, secondly, that upon the facts presented here and before the trial court that tribunal was without jurisdiction to adjudge him in contempt.

No briefs have been filed on behalf of either of the parties, though by stipulation and order additional time was allowed therefor. The only authorities cited are those presented by petitioner upon application for the writ of certiorari, and we do not feel called upon in every case to search records, which come to us without briefs or argument having been filed, to determine the merits of the contentions of the parties. McFadden v. Dietz, 115 Cal. 697, 47 P. 777; Suman v. Archibald, 116 Cal. 42, 47 P. 865; Altschul v. Alexander (Cal. App.) 224 P. 760.

However, the question of the jurisdiction of the trial court having been raised, and the allegations of the petition being neither denied by respondent nor refuted by the return made to our writ of certiorari, it appears that an important legal principle is necessarily involved, and that a proper disposition of the matter, in justice to the parties, requires its discussion and decision at this time. Schubert v. Lowe, 193 Cal. 291, 223 P. 550; Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 222 P. 838.

[1] We are not in accord with petitioner's contention in support of his first point that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make an order for payment of alimony pendente lite after default entered. Section 137 of the Civil Code provides:

"When an action for divorce is pending, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children, or to prosecute or defend the action."

Section 138, Civil Code, also provides that "during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing, or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children of the marriage," the court may make any necessary or proper order for their custody, care, education, maintenance, and support, "and may at any time modify or vacate the same." Such an action is still pending after default (Abadie v. Lobero, 36 Cal. 390, 400), and orders under the sections mentioned above may be made at any time from the commencement of the action until its final determination and the expiration of the time for appeal. (Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 87, 118 P. 445; Bruce v. Bruce, 160 Cal. 28, 116 P. 66; Ex parte Joutsen, 154 Cal. 540, 98 P. 391. It has also been held that such orders may be made ex parte. Ex parte Joutsen, supra.

[2, 3] The power of the trial court, therefore, to make the order complained of, dated September 24, 1924, cannot be doubted, but we think it was without jurisdiction to adjudge the petitioner in contempt for failure to obey an order which was not served upon him, nor made in his presence, and of which he had no knowledge. Young v. Su- perior Court (Cal. App.) 231 P. 347. Presumptions and intendments are not, as in the case of an ordinary judgment, to be indulged in support of judgments in contempt. Platnauer v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 463, 163 P. 237. The presumption that a judgment was based upon sufficient evidence, and that all the proceedings before the court below were regular, therefore does not apply; and a failure to show, otherwise than by mere innuendo, as against positive testimony to the contrary, that the petitioner had notice of the making of the order, or that he knew of its existence, must be held to have necessitated his discharge, and the order adjudging him in contempt of court was void for want of jurisdiction.

The judgment of the superior court here in controversy is therefore vacated and set aside.

PEOPLE v. CLINTON et al. (Cr. 1247.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 31, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ☞1073—When it is trial court's duty to execute certificate of probable cause for appeal stated.

It is the duty of trial court to grant a certificate of probable cause for appeal where a case is presented in which the existence of prejudicial error in the proceedings resulting in conviction is a debatable question, on which honest differences of opinion may exist, and the appeal is not merely frivolous or vexatious.

2. Criminal law ☞1073—Court of Appeals is empowered and obligated to grant certificate of probable cause for appeal, where trial court erroneously refuses to issue it.

Court of Appeals is empowered and obligated to grant certificate of probable cause for appeal, where trial court erroneously refuses to issue it.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

James Clinton and two others were convicted of burglary of the second degree, and they appeal and apply for a certificate of probable cause, which the trial court denied. Certificate ordered to issue.

See, also, 233 P. 78.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. The defendants in this case were convicted in the superior court of San Mateo county, Cal., of a felony, to wit, burglary of the second degree, and were sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison. They have appealed from the judgment of conviction to this court, and the appeal has been perfected. The trial court, on application by appellants, refuses to grant a certificate of probable cause for the appeal, and they have applied to this court therefor.

[1, 2] Where a case is presented in which the existence of prejudicial error in the proceedings resulting in conviction is a debatable question and on which honest differences of opinion may exist, and the appeal is not merely frivolous or vexatious, it is the duty of the trial court to grant such certificate, and, upon its refusal so to do this court has the legal power, and it is its duty, to grant relief. In the Matter of Harris Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 P. 547; People v. Gallanar, 144 Cal. 657, 79 P. 378; People v. Lane, 96 Cal. 597, 31 P. 580; People v. Ramirez, 63 Cal. App. 510, 219 P. 73; In the Matter of Mayen, 49 Cal. App. 531, 193 P. 813.

Upon an examination of the record in this case, we find such facts to exist. Upon such finding appellants, as a matter of legal right, are entitled to such certificate, and we therefore order that a certificate of probable cause for appeal in this case be issued.

PEOPLE v. HIGBEE. (Cr. 1258.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 6, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ☞1073—When accused is entitled to receive from trial court certificate of probable cause for appeal stated.

Accused is entitled to receive, from the trial court, a certificate of probable cause for appeal when the questions raised by the appeal are debatable and not frivolous.

2. Criminal law ☞1073—Appellate court will grant certificate of probable cause for appeal when trial court erroneously refuses to issue it.

Appellate court will grant certificate of probable cause for appeal when trial court erroneously refuses to issue it.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Merritt Higbee was convicted of burglary of the second degree, and he appeals and applies for a writ of probable cause, which the trial court denied. Writ granted.

See, also, 233 P. 79.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. [1, 2] The defendant in this case was convicted in the superior court of San Mateo county, Cal., of a felony, to wit, burglary of the second degree, and was sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison. He has appealed from the judgment of conviction to this court, and the appeal has been perfected. The trial court, on application by appellant, refused to grant a certificate of probable cause for the appeal, denied appellant a stay of execution until such time as the record on appeal should be filed in this court, and appellant has been removed to the state prison as a result of said judgment and sentence.

In the record before us, several matters in the proceedings leading to his conviction are indicated by appellant, upon which he has based his appeal, and which are claimed by him to constitute prejudicial error.

From examination of this record we are convinced that the questions raised by appellant are debatable and not frivolous, and therefore the trial court, having failed to grant the relief to which appellant was entitled, it is ordered that a certificate of probable cause for appeal in this cause be issued.

1. Trusts ☞328—Denial of motion to vacate order settling trustees' accounts held not abuse of trial court's discretion under evidence.

Evidence held to show that decedent's widow received notice of entry of decree settling testamentary trustees' accounts and adjudging persons to whom estate should be distributed, and had prior thereto been represented by counsel who were familiar with her claim and with facts, and, though she had no notice or knowledge of proceeding and had not appeared therein, court did not abuse its discretion in denying her motion to vacate such order, made nearly 6 months after she received notice of decree.

2. Appeal and error ☞948—Action of trial court in denying motion to vacate its order presumed correct, and burden is on appellant to show court abused its discretion.

All presumptions will be indulged in favor of correctness of court's action in denying motions to vacate its orders and decrees, and burden is on appellant to show that court abused its discretion.

3. Appeal and error ☞946—Appellate court will not interfere with exercise of discretion by lower court unless it plainly appears that discretion has been abused.

Appellate court will not interfere with exercise of discretion by lower court, unless it plainly appears that discretion has been abused.

4. Wills ☞775—Bequest in trust held to have lapsed on death of beneficiary and designated remainderman prior to time of distribution.

Where will directed executors, as trustees of gift to grandson, to invest principal, pay to him so much of interest as they deemed necessary and advisable for his support, and, upon his reaching age of 40, or sooner if deemed advisable, pay to him principal and accumulated profits, and provided further that, in event executors have not paid said share prior to grandson's arrival at age of 40, and he should die prior to such payment of his share, such share should go to his brother, held that, on death of beneficiary without payment of share, his brother having predeceased him, the legacy lapsed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Bertha Triest, deceased. From an order denying motion to vacate an order settling the accounts of Jesse E. Triest and others, trustees, and a decree terminating the trust and adjudicating distribution, Olga Koch and J. D. Lederman, administrator of the estate of Walter C. T. Koch, deceased, appeal. Affirmed.

J. Delmore Lederman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, Martin J. Dinkelspiel, and Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Appeal by J. D. Lederman, as administrator of the estate of Walter C. T. Koch, deceased, and Olga Koch, surviving wife of deceased, from an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, denying a motion therein, made by appellants to vacate an order settling the account of respondent trustees, under a trust created by the will of Bertha Triest, deceased, and a decree terminating the trust and adjudging the persons to whom, and the proportions in which, the trust fund should be distributed.

The facts are as follows: Bertha Triest died on April 18, 1914. By her will she bequeathed and devised the residue of her estate—the only portion in which appellants claim an interest—in equal shares to various children, and to Walter C. T. Koch and Frank L. Koch, her grandchildren, the share which their deceased mother, a daughter of Bertha Triest, would have taken had she been alive, and provided with reference to the share of said Walter C. T. Koch as follows:

"Fourth: I give, devise and bequeath all the rest, residue and remainder of my property, real and personal, of every kind and character * * * to my children, Julius S. Triest, Jesse E. Triest, Stella Koch, Irma T. Cahn, Martin Triest, Elsa T. Guggenheim, and my two grandchildren, Walter C. T. Koch and Frank L. Koch, as the representatives of and to take the share their deceased mother, Hilda Koch, would have taken had she been alive. * * *

"The part or portion thereof given to said Walter C. T. Koch is and shall be subject to the following conditions, to wit: I direct my executors to invest the part or portion of my estate hereby willed by me to said Walter C. T. Koch for the benefit of said Walter C. T. Koch, and to devote and pay over to said Walter C. T. Koch such of the income thereof for the support of said Walter C. T. Koch as in the judgment of my said executors is necessary and advisable for his support, the principal of said share, together with the accumulated profits thereon, to be paid over to said Walter C. T. Koch upon his reaching the age of forty (40) years, or sooner should my executors deem it advisable. In the event that my executors have not paid said share prior to the time said Walter C. T. Koch reaches the age of forty (40) years, and said Walter C. T. Koch shall die prior to the delivery of said share to him, I direct that his said share go to his brother, Frank L. Koch."

On May 24, 1914, the will was duly admitted to probate in said court, and Martin, Frank, and Jesse E. Triest were appointed as executors thereof, and duly qualified and acted. Thereafter, on January 11, 1916, the court distributed the portion of the estate in which Walter C. T. Koch was interested to the three trustees named in the will, who accepted the trust; the executors of the will not being discharged as such. One of them, Martin Triest, died on May 3, 1922, and the surviving trustees are among the respondents here. Said Frank L. Koch, one of the grandchildren, died on December 24, 1917, and the said Walter C. T. Koch on February 10, 1920, leaving surviving him his wife, appellant Olga Koch. No part of the principal of the trust fund in money or property had been paid or delivered by the trustees to Walter C. T. Koch at the time of his death, but portions of the income therefrom had been from time to time paid. Thereafter the surviving trustees, as such, on May 3, 1922, filed in said court their first account and report, and their petition for settlement thereof, the termination of the trust, and the determination by the court of the persons to whom and the proportions in which the trust fund should be distributed. The time for hearing the matter was duly set by order of the clerk of the court for May 17, 1922, who duly posted notices of such hearing in three public places in said city and county more than ten days before the day fixed, and no further notice was ordered by the court. (It is not contended here that the notices were legally insufficient.)

The matter was heard on that day, and thereafter an order approving the account was made dated May 17, 1922, and entered in the minutes of the court on July 15, 1922, and also the decree of the court dated May 17, 1922, and entered on July 17, 1922, in the minutes of the court, the latter describing the property of the trust fund, adjudging the trust terminated, and ordering that to the estate of Walter C. T. Koch, deceased, should be distributed one-twentieth thereof. Appellant Koch, who resided in the city of New York, was not present or represented at the hearing; and it is conceded that she had at the time no actual notice or knowledge of the proceedings, and that she had theretofore never appeared or been represented at any of the proceedings in the Triest estate. Appellant Lederman had not at that time been appointed administrator and was not representing appellant Koch. Thereafter, on January 5, 1923, after proceedings duly had, letters of administration on the estate of Walter C. T. Koch, deceased, were in said court issued to appellant Lederman, and on the same day notice of motion to be made on January 15, 1923—the order on which gives rise to this appeal—was served on attorneys for the respondents, supported by affidavits, one being an affidavit of merits, and a proposed unverified answer to the account and petition of the surviving trustees alleging that certain claimed expenditures in the account had not been made; that certain acts of the trustees had resulted in loss to the estate; that the legacy mentioned had not lapsed; and that the whole of the trust fund belonged to the estate of Walter C. T. Koch, deceased. The matter came on for hearing on the day fixed, was continued from time to time, affidavits in opposition were filed by the respondents, and the motion finally denied on June 11, 1923, the motion was served and filed within six months after the entry of the order and decree complained of.

It is the contention of the appellants that the order and decree sought to be vacated were taken as against appellant Koch through her excusable neglect, surprise, mistake, and inadvertence; that the motion was made within a reasonable time; that appellants acted with diligence in the premises, and that the motion to vacate made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure should have been granted; that the provision in the Triest will for Walter C. T. Koch created in him a vested interest to that extent in the residue of the estate which did not, in view of the facts then existing, revert to the Triest estate upon his death; that the whole of the trust fund belongs to his estate; and that the decree of the court determining that but one-twentieth thereof should be distributed to his estate and the balance to the surviving children of Bertha Triest was improvidently made, and deprived the estate of Walter C. T. Koch and appellant Koch of substantial rights.

Before any discussion of the merits of the claim of appellants for a greater portion of the trust fund than that adjudged by the decree, it must be determined whether the order of the court in denying the motion, and thereby holding that the motion was not made within a reasonable time after knowledge of the entry of the order and decree, was an abuse of its discretion in the premises, or, in other words, that there was a lack of evidence sufficient to sustain its conclusion. Watson v. Columbia Basin Development Co., 22 Cal. App. 556, 135 P. 511; Bond v. Karma Ajax Consolidated Min. Co., 15 Cal. App. 469, 472, 115 P. 254; Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 394, 90 P. 934.

[1] It appears from the affidavits filed by respondents that during the month of June, 1920, after the death of Walter C. T. Koch, an attorney at law—in one affidavit named O. T. Keppler and in another Tobias Keppler, a member of the law firm of Keppler & Lochman, with offices in the city of New York—called on the attorneys for the trustees and various of the residuary legatees under the Triest will in the city of San Francisco and negotiated during a considerable period for a settlement of the claim of appellant to the whole of the trust fund, on the theory advanced by him that the same had vested in Walter C. T. Koch, and that said appellant was his sole heir, the claim being then denied by respondents expressly on the ground that the legacy in question had lapsed; that said Keppler thereafter, during the month of July, 1922, further negotiated in person with Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, one of the attorneys for the trustees, at Atlantic City, N. J., to the same end, leading to no result, the California heirs and their attorneys in all interviews denying the right of appellant to more than the proportion decreed by the court. The fact of these interviews is not denied by appellants, nor the inference therefrom that Keppler then represented said appellant Koch, and the inference is supported by the affidavit of appellant Lederman that he was first consulted in the matter by a attorney of New York city, known by affiant as T. A. Keppler. Among the affidavits filed by respondents is that of Milton Dammann, an attorney at law, with offices in the city of New York, who represented respondents during the month of July, 1922, in connection with the claim of appellant Koch, in which he deposes that said appellant was then represented in another proceeding pending in New York by attorneys Strongman and Ward of New York city, and in which affiant, as attorney, was also interested, but not for appellant, and in which he also deposes that during said month he addressed two letters to said appellant, signed by him, at her then residence, 648 West 160th street in said city, the first dated July 13, 1922, and the second July 17, 1922, advising her of the fact that he then held for her a check of respondent trustees, payable to her order, in the sum of $659.63. The material portions of the letters are as follows:

"Re Estate of Bertha Triest.—I have received from Mr. Jesse E. Triest a check for a sum of money representing a share of the estate of Bertha Triest, with a request to see that it reaches you personally. If you will write me in reply to this letter giving me your present address I will see that the remittance is sent to you."

"Re Estate of Bertha Triest.—I acknowledge your favor of July 14th, 1922. We are in receipt of a communication from Mr. Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, attorney, San Francisco, Cal., inclosing check of Triest Company to your order for $659.63 the amount payable to you under a decree entered in the estate of Bertha Triest, in the superior court of the state of California, city and county of San Francisco, being one-twentieth of the lapsed legacy payable to Walter C. T. Koch, deceased. I am requested to hand you this check personally against your signature to a receipt prepared by Mr. Dinkelspiel which I inclose."

To these letters said appellant within a day or two replied by telephone, refusing to accept the money, and stating that the matter was in the hands of her attorneys, who would take care of her interests.

The facts stated in the foregoing affidavits are not denied by appellants, but appellant Koch, in her affidavit in support of the motion, states that she had no knowledge of the proceedings leading to the order and decree, or of the making or entry thereof, until November 15, 1922. We call attention to the foregoing to show that the court had ample evidence before it which, if believed, supported the conclusion that appellant Koch received notice of the decree of the court as early as July 20, 1922; that she was then and had prior thereto been represented by counsel, who were then familiar with the nature of her claim and the facts existing; that as early as June 20, 1920, she held the same theory of her rights in the trust fund as asserted in the motion. No reason was shown by appellants for the delay between July 20, 1922, and January 5, 1923, the date of filing the motion, except the fact that appellant Koch has never resided in California, and her allegation of want of knowledge of the facts until November 15, 1922, on which, as we have seen, the evidence would support the conclusion that she had such knowledge as early as July, 1922; further, that she was without means to employ counsel, though, as shown, counsel had undertaken long before to represent and continued to represent her in connection with the matter; and also that appellant Lederman recommenced negotiations with respondents during the early part of November, 1922, and the fact that it was proper to obtain letters of administration on the estate of Walter C. T. Koch before making the motion.

It is apparent from the record that the last negotiations for settlement were not commenced by respondents, and that they did not expressly nor impliedly consent to the delay. Appellant Lederman, as attorney for Mrs. Koch, was, as we may assume, unfamiliar with the situation when first consulted by Attorney Keppler, and was not advised of the knowledge of existing facts then possessed by Mrs. Koch and her New York attorney. Instead of being authorized to act he apparently was only empowered to negotiate; his principals knowing that negotiations had long since failed of result, and that respondents had for more than a year prior to July, 1922, elected to stand on their claimed legal rights, from which position they had not receded.

[2, 3] All presumptions will be indulged in favor of the correctness of the court's action, and the burden in all cases is upon appellant to make it appear that the court abused its discretion. The appellate court will not interfere with the exercise of discretion of the lower court, unless it be plainly made to appear that such discretion has been abused. Moore v Thompson, 138 Cal. 23, 70 P. 930; Smith v Pelton Water Wheel Co., supra. We cannot say from the whole record in this case that the superior court abused its discretion in holding, as it must have done, that the motion was not filed, all the evidence considered, within a reasonable time; and we are satisfied from the record that the evidence fully sustains the conclusion of the court that the motion should be denied.

[4] Without entering into a discussion of the reasons for our conclusion, we are further of the opinion that the construction placed by the trial court on the language of the will of Bertha Triest, and adjudging in effect that the legacy lapsed, was correct, and that the estate of Walter C. T. Koch, deceased, was given by the decree the proportionate share of the trust fund to which it was legally entitled.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellants' petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, is denied.

In view of the conclusion that the trial court was justified in holding, under the circumstances in evidence, that the application for relief was not made within a reasonable time, the question whether or not the legacy here in question lapsed is not necessary to the determination of this appeal, and we express no opinion thereon.

PATTERSON v. CITY OF LYNWOOD et al.
(Civ. 5071.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1925.)

Mandamus → Application for writ of mandate will be denied where matter in question has been adjudicated in another case and appeal taken.

An application for writ of mandate to compel city trustees to set a date for recall election will be denied, where another citizen has previously made the same application, a peremptory writ has been granted thereon by the superior court, and an appeal therefrom has been taken by the city trustees.

Application by Cochran C. Patterson for a writ of mandate to be directed against the City of Lynwood and others. Writ denied.

Carl V. Hawkins and Jonah Jones, Jr., both of Long Beach, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner made application to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate commanding respondent trustees of the city of Lynwood to provide for and set a date for an election, pursuant to certain petitions for the recall of Frank M. Downey, Chas. F. Reed, and Lars C. Anderson, as trustees of said city. The matter has been transferred to this court.

Since the city of Lynwood is a city of the sixth class and therefore can have only five trustees, the fact that the names of Downey and Reed are not found among the five names of persons sued as trustees of the city, may need some explanation; but the explanation is not contained in the petition.

It is not necessary to closely examine or analyze the facts alleged and relied upon to establish a cause of action. The petition shows that an action was brought by another citizen of Lynwood, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, to obtain a writ of mandate compelling the trustees of the city of Lynwood to call the election in accordance with these same recall petitions; that a peremptory writ has been ordered by the superior court, and that the trustees of the city have appealed from that decision.

Petitioner stated as his reason for making a separate and direct application to the Supreme Court, that he seeks to avoid the delay which he fears will be incident to the appeal in that case. He claims that the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal have original jurisdiction in cases of this kind, even when an appeal has been taken as to the same matter, and cites Scott v. Boyle, 164 Cal. 321, 128 P. 941, as authority for the proposition. In Scott v. Boyle, the Supreme Court allowed a writ of mandate to compel the payment of a salary of a municipal office, notwithstanding that the same questions of law were involved in a pending appeal in which the validity of the ordinance providing for said salary was to be considered. But it did not appear that the other case, which was an injunction suit, related to the same demand. It merely involved the validity of the same ordinance.

But in the case at bar, we have the petitioner's admission that the very matter at issue, to wit, the duty of the trustees of the city of Lynwood to provide for and set a date for the said recall election, has been adjudicated in an action in the superior court, and that the judgment in that case is now subject to an appeal. In view of these facts, and assuming that we would have the necessary jurisdiction to act on the merits of the petition, we think that one litigation of the same cause of action is enough. If the facts are such that the interest of the public is involved, and that the city is entitled to the earliest possible disposition of the appeal, some relief could be obtained by advancing that case on the calendar when it is ready for hearing.

For the reasons above stated, the petition is denied.

I concur: CURTIS, J.

PEOPLE v. GEORGE. (Cr. 1236.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1925.)

1. Criminal law § 699—Peremptory challenge may be predicated on manner of jurors' answer.

Although jurors' answers on voir dire indicate mental fairness, peremptory challenge may be predicated on manner of answer, without subjecting counsel to criticism of court.

2. Criminal law § 1037(2), 1055—Remarks of court concerning method of examining jury not considered, in absence of exception or requested instruction to disregard.

Although court improperly remarked that method of council in examining jury on voir dire and in exercising peremptory challenge seemed foolish and trifling with time of court, error would not be considered, in absence of exception or request that jury be instructed to disregard.

3. Criminal law § 1037(2)—Assignment of misconduct and request for jury to disregard ordinarily necessary.

Ordinarily assignment of misconduct and request that jury be instructed to disregard objectionable statements are necessary as foundation for complaint of misconduct.

4. Criminal law § 1169(11)—Testimony so prejudicial that it could not be cured by instruction held to require reversal in spite of failure to request instruction.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for lewd and lascivious acts with young girl, testimony in rebuttal of character witnesses that accused had been said to have committed similar acts with other young girls, which was objected to generally, held so prejudicial that effects could probably not be overcome by instruction to jury to disregard, and would require reversal, notwithstanding failure to request such instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Charles B. George was convicted of lewd and lascivious acts with a young girl, and he appeals. Reversed.

James C. Espey, of San Francisco (Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. Appellant was charged by indictment with the commission of a felony, to wit, violation of section 288 of the Penal Code, tried in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, convicted, sentenced to San Quentin, and has appealed from the judgment and the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant was accused of lewd and lascivious acts with a six year old girl named Etta Peterson. The offense was alleged to have been committed during the afternoon of April 9, 1924, in an outhouse situated on Hale street, a half block from the residence of Etta Peterson, who resided with her parents, her grandmother Louise Francen, and her sister Annie Peterson, aged four years, on Holyoke street, all in the city of San Francisco. Appellant is a married man, and had been residing with his wife and minor child in the city of San Francisco for about four years prior to the alleged offense. During the last two years of that period he had been in the employ of the United States as a mail carrier, and his route of delivery covered the portions of San Francisco in which the Peterson family on April 9, 1924, resided, and passed the Peterson house and the outhouse mentioned below. Previous to his employment by the government he had been in the military service of the United States for two years, having been discharged in 1920, and immediately thereafter married his present wife.

The testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution in its case in chief—who were Minnie Peterson, the mother; Louise Francen, the grandmother, Katherine Eisenhart, a policewoman connected with the police department of San Francisco, and said Etta Peterson—was, in substance, that on the afternoon of April 9, 1924, Etta Peterson and her sister Annie complained to their mother that a man had mistreated Etta that afternoon in an outhouse in the neighborhood situated in the yard of an unoccupied dwelling house, by placing his hands on her private parts; that on the Thursday following the mother and grandmother, in the presence of Etta and Annie, upon the arrival of appellant at the Peterson home in the course of his duties, charged the appellant with the offense, and the two children then identified him as the offender. Appellant denied the charge. Thereafter, on April 12, 1924, the date of the arrest of appellant, the witness Eisenhart, in the presence of Corporal Maher of the San Francisco police department, the mother, and the two children and appellant, asked the child Etta if appellant was the person who had taken her to the toilet. The child replied, "Yes," to which appellant made no reply. Louise Francen, the grandmother, testified that she visited with the child Annie the place of the alleged offense, and found on the floor a substance which she described as a "muss," and the mother testified that on the bloomers worn by the child Etta on April 9, 1924, were found on April 10, 1924, certain stains. No analysis of the substance found was made, and no evidence adduced of its character other than as above stated. The child Etta testified, describing acts done by the appellant, which, assuming her testimony to be true, constituted an offense under section 288 of the Penal Code; and further testified that after the acts described there remained on the floor of the toilet a substance, which she described. The child Annie was not called as a witness due to the fact of her tender age. No witnesses saw appellant with the children or the children or appellant at the toilet or within the lot in which the toilet is situated. Appellant at the trial denied the offense and called on his own behalf witnesses who testified that his reputation for morality had been good.

Appellant bases his appeal on numerous grounds, among which are certain conduct and rulings of the court and the conduct of the prosecuting officer, which he assigns as error. None of these do we consider to constitute error or find necessary to discuss except the following:

[1, 2] During the examination of certain jurors on their voir dire counsel for the appellant asked certain questions as to their state of mind with reference to appellant and to persons in his position under a like charge, and as to their freedom from bias and prejudice. The answers indicated mental conditions of fairness and impartiality, whereupon counsel for appellant challenged them peremptorily. The court thereupon remarked that this action meant that the answers indicated to counsel that the two jurors challenged were lying, and that his method of proceeding seemed to be foolish and trifling with the time of the court. Counsel replied that the manner in which jurors answered might have something to do with the exercise of a peremptory challenge. In this counsel stated the correct theory, and now assigns the remarks of the court as prejudicial misconduct.

The remark was not excepted to or assigned as error or misconduct at the time, and the court was not then or thereafter requested to instruct the jury to disregard it. We are of the opinion that had such action been taken by counsel, and the court had so instructed the jury, any possible prejudicial effect upon them would have been removed. Under these circumstances the defendant will not here be heard to complain of the alleged error.

A further contention is made by appellant as to certain conduct of the prosecuting officer in the course of the trial, as to which, although counsel for defendant failed at times to take and make proper exceptions or requests of the court, yet he insists was of such a nature that no action by the court or counsel could remove its prejudicial effect from the minds of the jury. The prosecuting officer in his opening statement to the jury said:

"The children came home. They gave the dime to the mother; they told the mother where they had received it, and a little while afterwards the younger of the two children told the mother that the older girl, Etta, was afraid of the mailman, and then the mother asked Etta what was the matter, and Etta began to cry."

To this counsel for appellant objected on the ground that any statement by the child Annie in the absence of appellant would be hearsay. The court sustained the objection and instructed the prosecuting attorney that the statement of the child Annie would have to be eliminated.

Counsel did not request the court to instruct the jury to disregard the statement made by the prosecuting attorney.

[3, 4] In rebuttal of the testimony of the character witnesses called by appellant the prosecution called Annie Lockhart and, immediately following her, Mrs. Peterson, the mother of Etta, who testified respectively as follows:

Testimony of Mrs. Lockhart:

"Mr. Hagerty: Q. Have you a little daughter by the name of Margaret Brandis? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How old is she? A. She was 9 last July.

"Q. Have you ever discussed the reputation of Charles George, the defendant in this case, for morality? A. With my little girl. He asked her to go into a lavatory—

"Mr. Espey: Just a moment. If the court please, I object to that line of examination of the witness in case which has nothing to do with the one with which the defendant is charged. This is not part of the res geste.

"Mr. Hagerty: All right.

"Q. Have you discussed the reputation of this man with your child Margaret Brandis for morality? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Have you discussed it with some other ladies in that neighborhood? A. Well, not with anybody.

"Q. Do you know a Mrs. Didier? A. I know a Mrs. Didier, yes.

"Q. Have you ever talked with Mrs. Peterson about the reputation of this man? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Have you talked with Mrs. Didier? A. Mrs. Didier, I don't know her—not for about two years ago.

"Q. Do you know what his general reputation for morality is in this community? Answer that, 'Yes,' or 'No.' A. No, sir; I don't.

"Q. Have you ever heard it discussed? A. Yes; I have.

"Q. And from that—from hearing that discussion of it, what would you say it was—good or bad? A. I would say bad."

Testimony of Mrs. Peterson:

"Mr. Hagerty: Q. Mrs. Peterson, do you know Mrs. Didier? A. Yes; Mr. Hagerty.

"Q. Do you know Margaret Brandis? A. Yes; I do. Q. Do you know Mrs. Anna Lockhart? A. Yes; I do.

"Q. Have you ever discussed with those people the reputation of this defendant for morality? A. Well, with Mrs. Didier, but not with Mrs. Lockhart and Margaret Brandis.

"Q. You understand what I mean by morality, as to a person being clean sexually and morally. You know what I mean? A. Well—

"Q. In other words, their reputation for morality, that is, that they believe in preserving decency in their conduct and in their actions and in their acts, and observing it. Do you understand that? A. Well, I don't quite.

"Q. Have you ever talked with either or any of those people relative to this defendant's reputation for interfering with little children outside of your own? A. No; I didn't. We don't know anything about that.

"Q. Where did you discuss this defendant with Mrs. Lockhart? A. Well, Mrs. Lockhart came to my house.

"Q. And your discussion with Mrs. Lockhart was on his reputation, wasn't it? A. Well, yes; she came to my house to tell me about her little girl.

"Q. And that was for conduct with a little girl, wasn't it?

"Mr. Espey: Just a moment, your honor. I wish to object at this time. I don't think—

"The Court: Sustained.

"Mr. Hagerty: I think you are right. I think I made a mistake in asking such a question.

"Mr. Espey: It is really to prejudice the jurors' minds.

"The Court: Sustained.

"Mr. Hagerty: Yes; and I ask, if your honor please, that I be forgiven myself about that. I don't like to do those things, but it was just through possibly an agitation of having met with a situation that I didn't expect to meet.

"Q. Now, in your discussion with Mrs. Lockhart, wasn't that discussion with reference to the morality of this defendant? A. Yes; it was.

"Q. And, having had that discussion with Mrs. Lockhart and the others, what would you say the reputation of this defendant was—good or bad? A. Well, I thought it was bad."

This testimony was not admissible on any ground. The objections, though general, sufficiently called the attention of the court and prosecuting officer to its incompetency. The latter expressly admitted the validity of the objection, and apologized to the court for eliciting the testimony. When we recall the nature of the case; the extreme danger, as shown by experience, of convicting men on the testimony of a child of the tender years of Etta Peterson, unless strongly corroborated by competent evidence, and how little is required to turn the scale in the minds of the jurors, naturally inflamed by the revolting character of the offense charged, we cannot but believe that this testimony did have a profound effect upon the jury, and that, as a fair probability, it outweighed in their minds the testimony of the appellant in denial, the evidence of his previous good character, his associations and employment, his domestic situation, and the inherent improbability that he, in view of these facts, would commit the crime charged. That the prosecuting officer throughout was fully aware that the questions and answers were incompetent we cannot but believe. The record shows and his position demands legal ability, of a high order on his part; and, while we cannot say that he was actuated by bad faith or by a desire to take an unfair advantage of appellant, yet he willfully persisted in questions of the same character, eliciting from the witness incompetent and prejudicial testimony, and the result of his overzealous desire to convict was the same as though this course was purposely followed.

It is true, as stated, that appellant's counsel did not in terms except to the acts, assign them as misconduct or request the court to instruct the jury to disregard the testimony; yet he did object to the whole line of testimony on the ground that it was hearsay, and did protest against it as designed to prejudice the jurors' minds. The matter was thus fairly called to the court's attention by the objections and protests of appellant's counsel and the apology of the prosecuting attorney.

It is the general rule that an assignment of misconduct and a request that the court admonish the jury to disregard the objectionable statements are necessary as a foundation for a complaint of misconduct in the appellate court (People v. Routh, 182 Cal. 561, 189 P. 436; People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 65 P. 295; People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 545, 117 P. 549; People v. Ye Foo, 4 Cal. App. 743, 89 P. 450; People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 143, 96 P. 401; Grossetti v. Sweasey, 176 Cal. 793, 169 P. 687; Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007); the reason for the rule being, as stated, that the trial court may be given an opportunity to prevent by suitable instruction the harmful effect on the minds of the jury. Where, however, the record fairly shows—as we think it does in this case—that the acts complained of are of such a character as to have produced an effect which, as a reasonable probability, could not have been obviated by any instructions to the jury, the absence of such assignment and request will not preclude the defendant from raising the point on appeal (People v. McDonald, 167 Cal. 551, 140 P. 256; People v. Edgar, 34 Cal. App. 459, 167 P. 891); and, according to the decisions cited, supra, and to the views of the court in People v. Frank, (Cal. App.) 236 P. 189. Such cases furnish ground for reversal; and where it fairly appears, as here, all the evidence considered, that the irregularities complained of in all probability largely influenced the jury in arriving at their verdict of guilty, such result is a miscarriage of justice. We conclude, after a full examination of the entire record, including the evidence, that such a case is presented, and that it is our duty to reverse the judgment. It is so ordered.

ARMSTRONG et ux. v. RAU et ux.
(Civ. 4374.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 15, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐714(1)—Facts outside record not considered on appeal.

That a trial judge was about to retire from office, and therefore prepared the findings in great haste, were circumstantial facts outside the record, and, although true, would not influence consideration on findings as written.

2. Appeal and error ⇐886—Appellate court cannot amend findings.

The Court of Appeal cannot amend findings of the trial court.

3. Trial ⇐395(2)—Finding held insufficient for award of damages.

In an action for damages for inducing plaintiffs to exchange properties by defendants' representation that their property was larger and more valuable than it actually was, a finding that, had the property been the size represented, "it would have been of the value of $9,360," without any additional statement of comparative values of both properties, was insufficient upon which to award damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by J. P. Armstrong and wife against Walter F. Rau and wife, for damages for inducing an exchange of properties by deceit. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rush M. Blodget and Victor T. Watkins, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George P. Adams and W. W. Orme, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This appeal is presented on the judgment roll alone. The action was brought to recover damages for deceit alleged to have been practiced by the defendants, whereby they induced plaintiffs to accept certain real property in San Bernardino county in exchange for other property owned by the plaintiffs in Los Angeles county. The complaint, without stating the value of any of the property involved in the transaction, alleged that the defendants represented that the quantity of land conveyed by them to the plaintiffs amounted to 55 acres, of which 35 acres were in bearing navel orange trees and 10 acres were in bearing Valencia orange trees, whereas in fact the quantity of land conveyed was only 44.59 acres, of which only 24½ acres were planted to navel oranges and only 9½ acres were planted to Valencia oranges, and that there were no other orange trees on said land. The complaint then alleged that, if the land and orange grove had existed in accordance with said representations, "it would have been of the value of $20,000 more than it then was worth or is now worth, to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $20,000."

The findings of fact declare that said representations were made as above stated, whereas in fact the acreage of the tract was only 44.59, of which less than 25 acres were planted to navel oranges and less than 8 acres were planted to Valencia oranges, and that there were no other orange trees on said land.

The answer, besides denying that defendants made the alleged statements, alleged facts showing certain visits made by the plaintiffs to the land in San Bernardino county and certain investigations made by them, and denied that the plaintiffs or either of them relied solely or at all upon the alleged or any representations or statements of the defendants. The findings, after referring to certain visits which the plaintiffs had made to said land, state:

"That it is not true that the plaintiffs or either of them made inquiry or personal investigation of said ranch except said visits, or inquired of friends or acquaintances as to the advisability of purchasing said ranch or as to the method or manner of ascertaining the size of acreage of orange ranch. And that it is true that the plaintiffs or either of them relied solely or entirely or at all upon their own judgment as to acreage or upon the advice of their friends or acquaintances or any of them in making the exchange for the said ranch."

In another part of the findings, however, it is stated that each of the plaintiffs at the time of the transaction believed all of the said statements and representations of the defendants, and relied wholly and solely thereon, and believed that the land described in said deed from the defendant to the plaintiffs embraced 55 acres of land, and that 45 acres thereof was planted in growing oranges as represented and stated by the defendants.

Upon the issue relating to the intention of the defendants to deceive, the court found that, at the time of said exchange of properties, the defendants knew that said land contained only 44.59 acres, and knew that there were less than 25 acres of navel oranges and less than 8 acres of Valencia oranges thereon, and knew their said representations and statements as to acreage so made to the plaintiffs as aforesaid were false and untrue, "and were not made by the defendants to the plaintiffs for the purpose of deceiving or defrauding plaintiffs, but nevertheless plaintiffs were deceived and defrauded thereby, and were thereby induced to make said exchange."

Upon the issue as to damages and amount of damages sustained by reason of the alleged deceit, the court without making any statement showing the comparative values of said properties, or any statement of their values other than as contained in the following quotation, found as follows:

"That, had said land embraced 55 acres, and had it contained 35 acres of navel oranges and 10 acres of Valencia oranges, as it was so stated and represented to the plaintiffs by the defendants, and as the plaintiffs each of them believed it to contain, it would have been of the value of $9,360, no part of which has been paid to the plaintiffs or either of them, or to any one for them or either of them or to or for the use of them or either of them."

[1-3] It is suggested by respondents that some of the findings to which we have referred were inadvertently made. In explanation thereof it is stated that the judge who tried the case had resigned and was about to retire from office, and that the findings were prepared in great haste. While these circumstances of excuse no doubt did occur, they are facts outside of the record, and in no way diminish our obligation to decide the case upon the findings as written. It is conceded, as it must be, that this court is without power to amend the findings. The court awarded damages in the sum of $9,360, with interest from the date of the transfer, and it is from this judgment that the defendants appeal. It is perfectly clear that the facts as found furnish no basis whatever for damages in the sum stated or in any amount. It may be that the judge intended to find that, if the property conveyed to the plaintiffs had been of the quantity and in the condition represented, it would have been of a value $9,360 more than the amount that it actually was worth. But on the record we do not know that fact. This alone is a sufficient ground for reversing the judgment. To the suggestion that a reversal on account of this defect would result in a miscarriage of justice, the obvious reply is that it would be a miscarriage of justice to award a large sum in damages without first establishing the facts which alone would control the amount of such damages.

There are several other questions presented in argument by counsel. For instance it is contended by appellants that, this being definitely an action at law for deceit, an intent to defraud is an essential element of the right to recover, and that, as the court found that there was no intent to defraud, judgment should have been for the defendants. Also it is contended that the judgment cannot stand because it does not appear that the quantity of land to be conveyed by the defendants constituted one of the principal conditions of the contract. And it is further contended that the court erred in allowing interest on the principal amount of the award from the date of the transfer. We deem it unnecessary to attempt a decision on these questions at this time.

The judgment is reversed.

PACIFIC STATES CORPORATION v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5003.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1925.)

1. Justices of the peace $\S$ 141(2)—Failure of justice to transmit fee paid to him to superior court did not deprive court of jurisdiction.

When defendant, appealing from justice court to superior court, had paid to justice fees, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 981, it was error to dismiss cause for want of jurisdiction because justice had failed to transmit fees to county clerk, when defendant, on learning, after expiration of time for appeal, of clerk's failure to file papers, again paid fee to county clerk.

2. Justices of the peace $\S$ 141(1) — Court could not divest itself of jurisdiction by erroneous order of dismissal.

When appellant had done all required of him under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 981, to place his cause before the superior court, and court had acquired jurisdiction, it could not divest itself of jurisdiction by erroneous order dismissing appeal because not presented in time.

3. Mandamus $\S$ 31—Mandamus held proper remedy to compel superior court to exercise jurisdiction.

When appellant had done all required of him under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 981, to place his cause before the superior court, and court erroneously dismissed cause because of failure to appeal within time, mandamus was an appropriate remedy to compel superior court to exercise jurisdiction.

Petition by the Pacific States Corporation against the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Hon. Hugh J. Crawford, Judge thereof, for writ of mandate to compel respondent to assume jurisdiction of, and hear and determine, an appeal from the justice's court. Writ granted.

Howard S. Lewis, Clarence E. Fleming, and John M. Martin, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

James McLachlan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In an action filed against petitioner herein in the justice's court of Pasadena township, in the county of Los Angeles, judgment was rendered in favor of Redman, plaintiff, against Pacific States Corporation, defendant. The corporation appealed. On motion of Redman the superior court dismissed the appeal upon the ground that the same had not been perfected within the time provided by law. Thereupon said corporation filed its petition in this court for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to exercise jurisdiction over said appeal, and to proceed to hear and determine said action upon its merits. The questions of law involved in this proceeding are raised by demurrer to the petition.

Section 981 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"No appeal effective unless fees for filing are paid. No appeal taken from a judgment rendered in a police or justice court in civil matters shall be effectual for any purpose whatever unless the appellant shall, at the time of filing the notice of appeal, pay in addition to the fee payable to the justice of the peace on appeal, the fees provided by law to be paid to the county clerk for filing the appeal and for placing the action on the calendar in the superior court. Upon transmitting the papers on appeal, the justice or judge shall transmit to the county clerk the sum thus deposited for filing the appeal in the superior court and for placing the action on the calendar. No notice of appeal shall be filed unless the fees herein provided for are paid in accordance with the provisions of this section."

In the Redman case the defendant, in perfecting its appeal, complied with the requirements of section 981, and actually paid to the justice all of the fees referred to in said section. The justice transmitted to the county clerk the papers on appeal, but omitted to transmit therewith the sum deposited by appellant for filing the appeal and for placing the action on the calendar in the superior court. A few days later the justice died without having transmitted said moneys to the county clerk. For this reason the clerk omitted to file the papers, and placed them in a pigeonhole, where the appellant was unable to locate them until the 26th day of October, 1923. On that day, and on demand of the county clerk, the corporation again paid the fees payable to the county clerk. Thereupon said cause was entered by the clerk on the docket of the superior court.

The sole question presented by counsel for determination relates to the ruling of the superior court that said appeal was not perfected until October 26, 1923, and that for that reason the superior court was without jurisdiction of the cause. It should further be explained that, according to the allegations of the petition herein, the defendant brought the case to trial within less than one year from October 26, 1923, the date of filing of the appeal in the superior court; that on that day, on stipulation entered in the minutes of the court, and at the special instance and request of the attorney for Redman, the cause was continued to January 15, 1925; that afterwards, on January 19, 1925, the court dismissed the appeal for want of jurisdiction of the cause, as hereinabove stated.

In another action wherein a similar question was presented for consideration this court said:

"Assuming, as claimed by petitioner, that the notice of appeal could not be deemed filed until payment of the fees in question was made, then, since it was left with the justice whose duty it was to file it upon payment of the fees, it should be deemed filed as of the date on which the fees were paid, and since this was within the thirty days after the rendition of judgment, it would seem to be a sufficient compliance." Simmons v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 252, 157 P. 817.

[1] It is a recognized principle in court practice that, where a party has done all that the law requires of him in any matter which is a part of the proceedings in an action, he should not be made to suffer by reason of the neglect of an officer of the court to perform an official duty in the completion of that particular proceeding in the action. Therefore we hold that, when the Pacific States Corporation had paid into the hands of the justice all of the required fees in connection with its notice of appeal, and had given its sufficient undertaking on appeal, the appeal was thereby perfected so as to vest jurisdiction thereof in the superior court. This jurisdiction could not be lost by the mere failure of the justice to transmit the filing fees to the county clerk.

[2, 3] It is a definitely settled rule that, where a court has jurisdiction of a cause, it should not be permitted by an arbitrary or erroneous order to divest itself of jurisdiction, but it should be compelled to proceed with the case to judgment. Mandamus is an appropriate remedy. Golden Gate Tile

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 11, 1925.)

Sheriffs and constables § 118—Constable liable for releasing goods, where sufficient undertaking against third party given.

Where plaintiff, in attachment proceedings, indemnified sheriff against third party claim by undertaking of two good and sufficient sureties, as required by Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by V. R. Cowsert against B. F. Stewart. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Loren A. Butts, of Fresno, for appellant.
Kitt Gould, of Clovis, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for $304 against him, as constable, in an action brought to recover damages because the defendant released an automobile from the lien of an execution issued upon a judgment secured by plaintiff against one Jack Zero.

The facts are presented by the findings, and are that the plaintiff had duly secured a judgment against Jack Zero in the sum of $299 and costs. Thereafter an execution was issued and delivered to the defendant constable, with instructions to levy said execution upon a certain Dodge commercial truck in the county of Fresno, state of California, and within the jurisdiction of said constable. The constable made the levy and took the truck into his possession under and pursuant to the writ of execution, and on the 16th day of June, 1923, posted notice of constable's sale to be held on June 22, 1923. On June 18, 1923, Michael Pecci claimed to be the owner of said truck and filed a third party claim and demanded the release of the truck. Thereupon the constable demanded of plaintiff an undertaking, pursuant to section 689, Code of Civil Procedure, of the state of California, in the sum of $1,500, which demand was complied with by plaintiff on June 20, 1923, by furnishing an undertaking in said sum signed by Kitt Gould and Rhoda M. Gould as sureties. On June 22, 1923, the defendant demanded a new undertaking giving as his reason that Kitt Gould was an attorney at law, and could not legally execute an undertaking. Plaintiff provided no other bond, and the constable released the truck, and the judgment in plaintiff's favor was never satisfied. The sureties upon the undertaking were good and sufficient sureties.

It would seem that a recital of these facts is all that is necessary to determine the appeal. The appellant argues that the constable had the right to declare the bond insufficient, regardless of the fact, and that the testimony shows that the sureties were, in fact, insufficient. The latter point is completely disposed of by the findings, which are supported by the evidence.

The former contention; i. e., that the constable may arbitrarily accept or reject a bond furnished under the provisions of section 689, Code of Civil Procedure, presupposes a construction of that section which would leave a litigant completely powerless and without legal right. The section itself provides that, in a situation such as was presented in this case, "the sheriff is not bound to keep the property unless the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, on demand, indemnifies the sheriff against such claim by an undertaking by at least two good and sufficient sureties," etc. Clearly, then, if the undertaking is furnished as provided, the sheriff is "bound" to keep the property. In the case of Kellogg v. Burr, 126 Cal. 38, 58 P. 306, it was said, in reference to the filing of a third party claim under section 689, Code of Civil Procedure, that the question of the sufficiency of the notice of such claim is a question between the sheriff and the plaintiff in attachment. "If the plaintiff found the notice which was the basis of the sheriff's demand for indemnity insufficient, he might refuse to give it, and thus place the responsibility of an improper release upon that officer." By the same reasoning, if the plaintiff in attachment properly complied with the demand for indemnity, as found in the instant case, and the sheriff, nevertheless, demanded another undertaking, plaintiff might refuse to give it, and place the responsibility for an improper release upon the officer. No other rule is compatible with reason and no other rule will insure an attaching creditor against arbitrary and illegal action upon the part of an attaching officer.

In the recent case of Arena v. Bank of Italy (Cal. Sup.) 228 P. 441, it was said:

"It would be idle to argue that the Legislature, in thus stating the specific requirements of a third party claim, the service of which upon the officer should supply the basis for his demand for indemnity, did not intend a substantial compliance with its terms as a prerequisite to such demand; and, while it may be still held to be true that the policy of the courts should be to protect public officers in the exercise in good faith of their function in relation to the levy of process upon the property of litigants, it must also be held that the courts, in so doing, must have some reasonable regard for the express provisions of the statute regulating and limiting their powers and duties in respect to such levies."

That case goes on to hold that, unless the third party claim complies in all particulars with the statute, it fails to furnish the officer with any basis for a demand upon the plaintiff for an indemnifying bond. Likewise, in the instant case, when the plaintiff has furnished a good and sufficient indemnifying bond, the officer has no basis for a demand for another undertaking. He is bound to hold the goods under the attachment and has no right to let the property go out of his hands, except in due course of law, and, if he does and it is lost, he is responsible to the plaintiff in the attachment for the amount of the debt. Sanford v. Boring, 12 Cal. 539.

McGOWN v. DALZELL. (Civ. 5161.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1925.)

1. Attorney and client ☞176—Contract merely for contingent fee gives attorney no lien or interest in judgment in absence of express agreement.

A contract, providing merely for a contingent fee for legal services in an action for, and which results in, money damages for his client, gives the attorney no lien or interest in judgment, in absence of terms constituting in legal effect a transfer of part of claim or judgment.

2. Attorney and client ☞123(2)—Client may transfer interest in judgment to his attorney by oral agreement.

A client may, after judgment, transfer an interest therein to his attorney by oral agreement, in view of Civ. Code, § 1052.

3. Attorney and client ☞124 — Antecedent services and advances by attorney sufficient consideration to support assignment of interest in judgment to him.

Antecedent services and advances by attorney in securing judgment were sufficient consideration to support oral assignment to him of interest therein after final judgment rendered.

4. Attorney and client ☞124—Agreement of client that attorney was to collect and deduct fee from judgment held assignment of interest therein.

Where, after final judgment was rendered in his favor, client agreed with his attorney that latter was to collect judgment and deduct fee therefrom, held, in view of entire transaction, that such agreement operated as assignment of interest in judgment to attorney to extent of his claim.

5. Attorney and client ☞123(2)—Attorney's interest in judgment, transferred to him by client, and assented to by judgment debtor, could not be extinguished by acts of client or debtor, or both.

Where a client assigned to his attorney an interest in a judgment, which assignment was assented to by the judgment debtor by his negotiating with attorney, the attorney's right in such judgment could not be destroyed by acts of client or debtor, or both.

6. Attorney and client ☞123(2)—Transfer by client to attorney of interest in judgment did not make judgment joint obligation.

Transfer by client to attorney of interest in judgment did not make judgment a joint obligation extinguishable by performance rendered to either within Civ. Code, § 1475.

7. Attorney and client ☞123(2)—Transfer by client of interest in judgment, assented to by debtor, created distinct and separate rights in attorney.

Transfer by client of interest in judgment to attorney, after final judgment, assented to by creditor, created distinct and separate rights in attorney which creditor was bound to observe.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by Malcolm McGown against William Dalzell. From an order permitting enforcement of execution after judgment, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

George F. Witter, of Oakland, for appellant.

Stanley R. Sterne, of Oakland, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. Appeal by Malcolm McGown and George F. Witter from a portion of an order of the superior court of the county of Alameda made after judgment entered in said court in the action of McGown v. William Dalzell and other defendants. The order was based on a motion to recall execution issued in said action.

The facts as shown by the record are as follows: Appellant, George F. Witter, an attorney at law, practicing his profession in the county of Alameda, was during the year 1918 employed by appellant McGown to commence and conduct the action above entitled, being one to recover a sum represented by a promissory note. The undisputed agreement between Witter and McGown was that Witter should receive a contingent fee of 25 per cent. of all moneys received by or through said action and out of the proceeds thereof, and that McGown should reimburse him out of any judgment recovered for all costs and expenses incurred and advanced by him. Thereafter judgment in the sum of $390.98, with costs in the sum of $95.56, was recovered in the superior court against all the defendants, except one R. H. Howk, who had deposited the sum of $1,763 of the amount represented by said note in court, and which sum was later paid to McGown. Certain of the defendants, including Dalzell, moved for a new trial, and, the motion being denied, they appealed to the Supreme Court. Thereupon McGown agreed to pay Witter, in addition to the contingent fee of 25 per cent., an additional sum of $250 and all costs and expenses incurred by Witter on the appeal, the whole to be paid out of any moneys procured through said judgment.

Thereafter, on April 7, 1919, the judgment was affirmed; the total amount thereof, including interest and costs, then being the sum of $558.28. Appellant Witter then claimed to be entitled to receive from this amount the sum of $471.09 as the unpaid balance of his fees and advances, the correctness of which claim, as to amount, was not disputed. An agreement was then made between Witter and McGown that Witter should collect from respondent out of the judgment said amount of his fees and expenditures, together with the balance of the judgment, for which latter sum he was to account to McGown. Witter thereupon notified respondent of the arrangement, who agreed to pay the judgment to Witter, and did pay to him sums aggregating $100, which Witter applied to his own account. After these payments respondent made frequent promises in response to demands by Witter, the negotiations continuing until May 19, 1919, at which time the amount of the judgment, with interest unpaid, was the sum of $458.28, of which Witter claimed to be the owner of an interest amounting to $371.09. The record shows that all parties at this time recognized and acquiesced in Witter's claim that he owned an interest in the judgment to the amount stated above, and all joined in various conferences in an endeavor to arrive at a method whereby respondent might dispose of certain property owned by him in order to meet the demand. After the date last above mentioned no further communications were received by Witter from McGown or respondent; and in fact it also appears from the record that at this same time McGown notified Witter that he elected to terminate their relations as attorney and client. However, no substitution of record has been made. Thereafter, on May 7, 1924, Witter caused execution to issue on the judgment, which was followed by a motion by respondent to recall the execution, the order on which motion is here complained of. Why a delay of nearly five years occurred between the date of the last interview between Witter and the others and the issuance of execution, the record is silent; but upon the hearing of the motion it appeared that in May, 1919, without the knowledge of Witter, and with the intent and purpose on the part of McGown and respondent to defraud him of his part interest in the judgment, respondent paid to McGown $350 in full satisfaction of the judgment, and on the same day McGown executed a release thereof. According to the evidence, however, it has never been satisfied of record.

The court, by its order, denied the motion to recall the execution, but further ordered that appellant McGown be permitted to enforce execution for the sum of $108.28, the difference between the sum of $458.28 and the sum of $350 paid by respondent to McGown.

Appellants contend that the order should have permitted the enforcement of execution for the sum of $371.09, the unpaid balance of that portion of the judgment claimed by Witter; that the legal effect of the original agreement covering his fees was to make him the owner of a designated part of the judgment to the extent that his contingent fee was unpaid, which amounted on the day when the attempted settlement was made between McGown and respondent to the sum of $112.39.

[1] The California authorities do not support this contention. We find no case that holds that a contract providing merely for the payment of an agreed contingent fee for legal services in an action for and which results in a money judgment, in the absence of other terms in legal effect constituting a transfer of a part of the claim or judgment, gives a lien upon or interest in the judgment. Mansfield v. Dorland, 2 Cal. 507; Russell v. Conway, 11 Cal. 93; Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 68 P. 581.

Appellant Witter further contends that the legal effect of the agreement that McGown made after the judgment had become final was to transfer to him an interest therein to the extent of his claim, with power to collect that and the interest of McGown therein; that respondent manifested his consent to the arrangement, and that such facts rendered the subsequent attempt to compromise and satisfy the judgment of no effect as against Witter.

[2-4] We are of the opinion that his position in this respect is supported by authority. It is a fair inference from the evidence that the agreement between McGown and Witter was intended by both to create more than a mere power, and was designed to accomplish more than simply to enforce the personal right of McGown, and was meant to secure Witter's claim by the transfer of an interest to that extent in the judgment. Such a transfer might be orally made. Smith v. Peck, 128 Cal. 527, 61 P. 77; Civ. Code, § 1052. The antecedent services and advances by Witter were a sufficient consideration therefor (Greenlee v. Los Angeles Trust & Sav. Bank, 171 Cal. 371, 153 P. 383); and from the entire transaction as shown by the record it is clear that the parties intended that an assignment of an interest in the judgment to the extent of Witter's claim should result (Goldman v. Murray, 164 Cal. 419, 129 P. 462; McIntyre v. Hauser, 131 Cal. 11, 63 P. 69).

[5-7] It appearing from the evidence that respondent, after the making of the agreement above described, made payments to Witter on account of the judgment, and that he negotiated frequently with Witter, as before mentioned, in an endeavor to arrange terms of payment to him, it may be reasonably inferred from all his conduct taken together that he assented thereto and recognized the right of Witter to such interest. Having thus assented, and McGown having made the agreement, the right could not be destroyed by either or both (Hackett v. Campbell, 10 App. Div. 523, 42 N. Y. S. 47; Barlow v. Lande, 26 Cal. App. 424, 147 P. 231), nor did the judgment by reason of the foregoing agreements become a joint obligation which might be extinguished by performance rendered to either (Civ. Code, § 1475; Leese v. Sherwood, 21 Cal. 151). The agreement and the assent operated to create distinct and separate rights in appellants which respondent was bound to observe.

It further appears from the record that appellant McGown has been paid by respondent a sum more than equal to his interest in the judgment, and that he has no further interest therein.

The judge of the superior court, in deciding the motion, drew from the evidence the foregoing conclusions of fact covering the agreement and the transfer thereby to Witter of an interest in the judgment. We think they find sufficient support in the evidence, and we are not inclined to disturb them. But we are of the opinion that the court's order should have provided that appellant Witter have and enforce execution for the sum of $371.09, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from May 14, 1919, and costs. It is therefore ordered that the cause be remanded to the trial court with instructions to modify the portion of the order appealed from in accordance with the views herein expressed, and, as so modified, the order is affirmed, appellant Witter to recover his costs on this appeal.

BAUMAN v. EDGAR. (Civ. 5064.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 25, 1925.)

1. Negligence ⚡122(1)—When defense of contributory negligence fails stated.

Defense of contributory negligence fails when defendant fails to prove either that plaintiff was negligent or that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

2. Highways ⚡184(2)—Finding as to negligence and freedom from contributory negligence in automobile collision sustained.

Evidence held to sustain finding that defendant motorist, going north in approaching an intersection, was guilty of negligence, and that plaintiff motorist, who was going east on cross street, and who had the right of way under Motor Vehicle Act, § 20 (St. 1919, p. 215), was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by August H. Bauman against B. J. Edgar. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Sea, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Oneal and Maurice J. Rankin, both of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $775 as damages for injuries received in a collision with the defendant's automobile. The cause was tried before the court, sitting without a jury, and all the allegations of negligence appearing in the plaintiff's complaint were found to be true, while the denials and allegations in defendant's answer were found untrue. The appeal is taken by the defendant from the judgment, and is presented upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The only ground urged by the appellant is that the trial court erred in holding that the plaintiff was not responsible for the collision because he had the last clear chance to avoid it.

The facts of the case material to the appeal are that at about 7:30 a. m. the respondent was driving his automobile east on Fremont avenue, in the county of Santa Clara, crossing the intersection with Saratoga road, which road runs north and south. The two roads are paved, and are of about equal width. At the same time the appellant was driving his automobile along Saratoga road approaching from the south and crossing the intersection of Fremont avenue going north. The plaintiff approached the intersection traveling at the rate of about 7 to 10 miles an hour, while defendant approached the intersection going at a rate of about 35 to 40 miles an hour. The vision of both drivers was obscured by a house and a row of trees standing on the southwest corner of the intersection. When the plaintiff arrived at a point 25 feet west of the westerly line of Saratoga road he could see south on Saratoga road a distance of about 30 feet, and as he looked in that direction he was unable to see defendant, as the latter had not yet come within his range of vision. He first saw defendant when the latter was approaching him at a high rate of speed and about 20 feet distant. Plaintiff continued to cross the intersection past the median line of the intersection running north and south before defendant's car arrived at the southerly line of the intersection. The defendant continued on his course across the intersection, and struck the car of the plaintiff towards the rear, just a little bit back of the center. The collision was with such force that plaintiff's car was thrown 30 feet from the point of collision, and came to a stop in a ditch along the side of the highway, having been turned completely around from the direction in which it was proceeding at the time of the collision. The testimony regarding the speed at which the defendant was proceeding is in some conflict, but there is uncontradicted testimony to the effect that with his brakes set and his wheels completely locked his car skidded a distance of 85 or 90 feet along the highway before it came into contact with plaintiff's car.

The facts which we have outlined are, with the exception noted, uncontradicted. In respect to the speed maintained by the defendant two witnesses testified to the fact that the plaintiff's car was struck in the rear, thrown a distance of 30 feet, and that defendant's car skidded a distance of 85 or 90 feet with brakes fully set and wheels completely locked. These facts corroborate the direct testimony that defendant was approaching the intersection at a speed of 35 or 40 miles an hour. The trial court's finding of the negligence of the defendant is amply supported by the evidence—a fact which is conceded on this appeal.

[1] The plea of the defendant that the plaintiff could have avoided the accident after he saw the danger is nothing more than a plea of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. This plea raises the question whether the facts are such as to constitute contributory negligence in law or whether the issue is one to be left to the court or jury on the evidence.

The rule in this regard is aptly stated in Gett v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 192 Cal. 621, 631, 221 P. 376, 380, where Mr. Justice Myers said:

"Contributory negligence is in this state an affirmative defense by way of confession and avoidance. By pleading it the defendant, in effect, confesses his own negligence and pleads by way of avoidance thereof that plaintiff's own negligence helped to produce his injuries. In this defense the burden is upon the defendant to prove two things: (1) That the plaintiff was negligent; (2) that such negligence was a proximate cause of the injuries complained of. If he fails to prove either of these things this entire defense falls."

[2] Applying the foregoing rule to the case before us, it is apparent that the defendant failed in both instances. The plaintiff had the right of way within the provisions of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 215, the statute in effect at the time of the accident). The defendant approached the intersection at a rate of speed prohibited by section 22 of the same act. The plaintiff had the right to assume that the defendant would observe the law. There is nothing in the record to show contributory negligence as a matter of law on the part of the plaintiff. There is some conflict in the evidence as to the rate of speed, and some conjectures have been made as to whether the plaintiff might have avoided the accident if he had done something different, but these are all matters of fact which the trial court was to determine from the evidence. There is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. EDWARDS. (Cr. 1092.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 1, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 28, 1925.)

1. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1023(12)—Order denying motion in arrest of judgment is not appealable.

An order denying a motion in arrest of judgment is not appealable.

2. Larceny $\hookrightarrow$ 13—"Taking" is essential to constitute larceny.

To constitute larceny, there must be a "taking," which must be against will of owner or at least without his consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Taking (In Larceny).]

3. Larceny $\hookrightarrow$ 14(1)—"Taking," to constitute larceny, must be against will of owner, but actual trespass is not necessary.

Though "taking," to constitute larceny, must be against will of owner, or a trespass to his possession, actual trespass or actual violence is not necessary, and fraud may take place of force.

4. Larceny $\hookrightarrow$ 14(1)—When "taking" within definition of larceny occurs stated.

A "taking," within definition of larceny, occurs when a person with a preconceived design to appropriate property to his own use obtains possession of it by means of fraud or trickery; fraud vitiating the transaction, and owner being deemed to retain constructive possession of the property.

5. Larceny ⚡14(1)—Owner must part with possession only to constitute larceny; owner does not part with title where accused obtains possession fraudulently.

Owner must intend to part with possession only of property taken, and not to pass title, to constitute larceny, but owner does not part with title where thing taken is delivered by owner to accused to be applied by latter to a particular purpose, and he, having obtained possession fraudulently with preconceived intention to appropriate property to his own use, does subsequently convert it to his own use instead of applying it to purpose contemplated by owner.

6. Larceny ⚡62(1)—Evidence held to warrant inference of a "taking" sufficient to constitute.

Evidence that defendant's representations that money obtained from owner was to be used for purpose of bribing investigating officers in criminal proceedings against her husband and brother-in-law were false, and that, when he obtained possession thereof, it was his intention to convert it to his own use, held to warrant an inference that there was a "taking" sufficient to constitute larceny.

7. Larceny ⚡17—"Asportation" of thing which is subject-matter of offense is essential to constitute larceny.

"Asportation" of thing which is subject-matter of offense is essential to constitute larceny, and, to constitute "asportation," thing taken must have been in entire or absolute possession of taker.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Asportation.]

8. Larceny ⚡17—Subsequent conversion by defendant of money, possession of which was obtained by fraud, held to constitute an asportation sufficient to constitute offense.

Where defendant acquired possession of owner's money, by fraud or trickery, intending not to devote it to purpose for which it was delivered to him, but to convert it to his own use, his subsequent conversion of it to his own use, though but for smallest appreciable length of time, constituted an "asportation" sufficient to constitute larceny.

9. Larceny ⚡63—Evidence held to warrant implied finding of conversion.

In prosecution for larceny, evidence held to warrant implied finding of conversion.

10. Larceny ⚡14(1)—Wrongdoer holds property without consent of owner, where possession originally obtained by fraud.

Where possession of the thing which is subject of larceny was originally obtained by fraud or trickery, wrongdoer holds property all the while without right and against right and without consent of owner.

11. Criminal law ⚡1159(4)—Court of review must accept testimony of prosecution's witnesses, where uncontradicted, as true on conviction.

Where defendant is convicted, testimony of prosecution's witnesses, where uncontradicted, must be accepted by court of review as true.

12. Larceny ⚡3(1)—Offense is complete when, to possession fraudulently acquired, there is added felonious intent.

When, to possession of thing which is subject of larceny fraudulently acquired, there is added the felonious intent, larceny is from that moment complete.

13. Larceny ⚡7—Thing taken and carried away should be property of another to constitute offense; "ownership;" "possession."

Thing taken and carried away should be property of another to constitute crime of larceny; "ownership" and "possession" being synonymous when considered as an element of larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ownership; Possession.]

14. Larceny ⚡8—Victim's possession of money was sufficient to make it subject of larceny, where defendant acquired possession by fraud.

Where defendant acquired possession of money by fraud, victim's possession, though money may have come into her hands illegally, was sufficient to make it subject of larceny, and ownership was properly laid in her.

15. Larceny ⚡3(2)—Felonious intent essential to constitute offense, and must exist at time of taking.

Felonious intent is essential to constitute larceny, and, where no actual trespass or violence is involved in original taking, it must exist at time of taking.

16. Criminal law ⚡1144(16)—Court of review must assume that jurors believed testimony of witnesses for prosecution.

On appeal from conviction, court of review must assume that jurors believed testimony of witnesses for prosecution.

17. Larceny ⚡57—Evidence held to warrant finding of existence of felonious intent to deprive owner permanently of her property.

In prosecution for larceny, evidence held to warrant finding of existence of felonious intent to deprive owner of her property wholly and permanently.

18. Criminal law ⚡1175—Defendant cannot complain of error in his favor.

In prosecution for larceny upon three counts, if defendant was wrongfully acquitted on first and second counts, error was in his favor of which he could not complain.

19. Criminal law ⚡878(3)—Court of review not required to reverse conviction on third count because defendant acquitted on other two counts.

In prosecution for larceny upon three counts, that defendant was acquitted on two of the counts did not require court of review to reverse his conviction on the third count.

20. Criminal law ⚡1165(3)—Defendant cannot complain where determination was more favorable to him than evidence warranted.

Defendant cannot complain where determination of his case was more favorable to him than evidence warranted.

21. Criminal law ⚡93—Defendant's offense held to constitute grand larceny and to be within jurisdiction of superior court.

Defendant's taking of $150 held to constitute grand larceny, and to be within jurisdiction of superior court, where offense occurred prior to amendment of Pen. Code, § 487, declaring that theft of property, value of which does not exceed $200, shall be petit larceny; such statute, as amended, when construed with Pol. Code, § 329, declaring, in substance, that amendment shall not affect penalty for any offense previously committed.

22. Larceny ⚡43—Testimony of deputy district attorney, as to his reasons for reducing charges against relatives of owner of money taken by defendant for such purpose, held admissible.

In prosecution for larceny of money, which owner had given to defendant to bribe investigating officers in criminal prosecution existing against her husband and brother-in-law, court did not err in permitting deputy district attorney to testify as to his reasons for reducing charges of grand larceny against owner's husband and brother-in-law to petit larceny, where her testimony warranted inference that defendant intended her to understand that he would seek to so influence investigating officers that, if her husband and brother-in-law were not ultimately released, they at least would be required to answer for only such charges as carried least possible punishment, and defendant introduced court records showing such charges were reduced.

23. Larceny ⚡43—Testimony held admissible as against objection that reduction in criminal charges was made subsequently to defendant's arrest, and after date when he was alleged to have committed last act of larceny.

In prosecution for larceny of money which owner gave to defendant to bribe investigating officers in criminal prosecutions pending against her husband and brother-in-law, testimony of deputy district attorney as to his reasons for reducing charges of grand larceny against such persons to charges of petit larceny was admissible, as against objection that reduction in charges was made subsequently to defendant's arrest, and after date when he was alleged to have committed last act of larceny.

24. Criminal law ⚡769—Refusal of instruction, directing attention of jury to matters which they would keep in mind without being reminded, is not reversible error.

It is not reversible error to refuse an instruction which merely directs attention of jury to that which every intelligent man and woman on the panel would doubtless keep in mind, without being reminded of it by the court.

25. Criminal law ⚡829(1)—Refusal of requested instruction, substance of which was covered by court's instruction, held not erroneous.

In prosecution for larceny, refusal of defendant's requested instruction held not erroneous, where substance was covered by court's charge.

26. Larceny ⚡7—Title to money, subject of larceny, would remain in owner until accomplishment of purpose for which she gave it to defendant.

In prosecution for larceny of money, which owner gave defendant to bribe investigating officers, in a criminal prosecution against her husband and brother-in-law, if, when owner parted with possession of her money, it was with purpose that it was to be used to bribe the officers, but that defendant should do so in a manner which he saw fit, title would remain in her until accomplishment of such purpose.

27. Larceny ⚡78—Instruction held properly refused as misleading.

In prosecution for larceny of money, which owner gave to defendant to bribe investigating officers in criminal prosecutions against her husband and brother-in-law, instruction that, if owner gave defendant money to prevent filing of additional complaints against such persons, jury could consider that fact, and that no additional criminal complaints were filed, and that, if consideration of such circumstances raised a reasonable doubt in their minds as to defendant's guilt he should be acquitted, was properly refused as being misleading.

28. Criminal law ⚡814(16)—Instruction relating to defendant's denial of accusatory statements in his presence held properly refused under the evidence.

Instruction concluding that, if denials by defendant of accusatory statements made in his presence, taken in connection with all other facts and circumstances, created a reasonable doubt in jury's mind, then they should acquit him, held properly refused under the evidence.

29. Criminal law ⚡829(16)—Instruction as to credibility of witness held properly refused, in view of given instruction.

In prosecution for larceny, instruction that if owner, before testifying, had been informed by district attorney that she had committed a felony, such fact could be considered by jury in weighing her testimony, and if, from a consideration thereof, a reasonable doubt was aroused in jury's mind as to defendant's guilt, he should be acquitted, held properly refused in view of court's instruction that, if she was promised certain immunity, such fact might be considered in determining her credibility.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

J. M. Edwards was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Randall, Bartlett & White and A. P. G. Steffes, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] Defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial. He also appeals from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, but, as that is not an appealable order, the appeal therefrom must be dismissed.

By an information containing three counts, defendant was charged with three separate acts of grand larceny. In the first count he was charged with the larceny of $500 on July 2, 1923; in the second count with the larceny of $250 on July 5, 1923, and in the third count with the larceny of $150 on July 27, 1923. In each instance the money was alleged to be the property of one Frances Benoit. Defendant was acquitted of the offenses charged in the first and second counts, and was convicted of the crime charged in the third count. It is from the judgment of conviction on that count that he appeals. He claims: (1) That the verdict of guilty is contrary to law and to the evidence; (2) that the court erred (a) in admitting certain evidence over his objection, (b) in giving a certain instruction, and (c) in refusing to give certain instructions requested by him.

An outline of the case, sufficient for an understanding of the points raised, may be stated thus: It was the theory of the prosecution that possession of each of the three sums of money was obtained from Mrs. Benoit by fraud and trickery. It seems that Mrs. Benoit's husband and the latter's brother had been arrested for grand larceny prior to the first act of larceny with which defendant was charged. Mrs. Benoit's testimony, epitomized and reduced to narrative form, is substantially this:

I had known defendant for about nine years. A few days after the arrest of my husband and brother-in-law, I called upon defendant at his home in Los Angeles. I told him that "the boys" were not guilty, and that I was worried over their arrest. I pleaded with him to help me. He said he would do the best he could, and would let me know later what could be done. At our first conversation defendant told me that it possibly would cost me something, but that he did not know how much. He asked me who the investigating officers were. I described them to him as well as I could. From the description which I gave, he said that they were officers B— and K—. I saw defendant again the next day. At this second conversation he said he would be able to assist me, but that it would cost me $1,000. I told him I did not have that amount, but I managed to get $500 of it at that time and gave it to him. (It is this sum of $500 which is described in count 1 as the subject-matter of defendant's first alleged act of larceny.) I asked him how he was going to help me. He said that the case was in the hands of the investigating officers, and that it would depend upon the evidence produced by them "as to how many counts and how much would be put against my husband." He said that "the less that was brought up against the boys the less they would have to answer for, or something to that effect." I asked him how he was going to use the $1,000. He said that it was not necessary for me to know—that he would use his own judgment in disposing of the money; that all that was necessary for me to do was to give it to him. He told me that he did not want any compensation for his services, that he was doing it merely for friendship's sake, "and that the money that I would give him would simply be to compensate the officers or the other parties interested, other than himself." Later he told me that he had seen the necessary people. Meanwhile I had telephoned to my sister for money, and she wired me $500. I gave defendant half of it—$250. (It was for the alleged theft of this sum that the charge in count 2 was made.) Defendant said he would trust me for the rest. He assured me that he was not going to use any of it for himself, but I told him that some time I would compensate him with something for helping me. I asked him again what he was going to do with the money, and he said I would have to leave it to his judgment—that it was not necessary for him to tell me. I understood the money had to be used to compensate the different officials that had something to do with the case against my husband and brother-in-law, for not prosecuting them. In a later conversation I had with defendant I asked him if he could not get the boys out of jail entirely. He said he did not know, but that he would try. He said that the investigating officers were the ones who had entirely to do with the cases against my husband and brother-in-law, and that what they said went. He assured me at every conversation I had with him that none of the $1,000 was to be for him—that he did not need it and did not want it.

The next sum which Mrs. Benoit testified she gave to defendant—the $150 referred to in the third count—was delivered by her to him, according to the testimony of the people's witnesses, under the following circumstances: Mrs. Benoit, it seems, had paid her husband's attorney the sum of $250. When she paid the attorney she told that gentleman that she needed the money—that she needed it to give to defendant. The attorney replied that, if she really stood in need of the money, he would pay it back to her in a few days. Accordingly, on July 27, 1923, the day of defendant's arrest, the husband's attorney, who meanwhile had revealed to the district attorney Mrs. Benoit's intention to deliver the money to defendant, repaid to Mrs. Benoit an amount equal to the sum which she had paid him. The money thus repaid to Mrs. Benoit consisted of certain bills, aggregating $250, the denominations whereof had previously been noted by the officers, who subsequently arrested defendant, though Mrs. Benoit does not seem to have had any inkling of that fact or of the fact that the district attorney had been notified of her intention to hand the money over to defendant. Indeed, there is nothing to indicate that Mrs. Benoit had any reason to believe that the bills which her husband's attorney delivered to her represented anything other than a sum of money to which she was lawfully entitled, although the officials had taken the bills from the treasury of the county of Los Angeles for the purpose of facilitating the entrapment of defendant. It seems that the district attorney, who was using the county's money for the purpose, had turned the bills over to the husband's attorney, who, in turn, delivered them to Mrs. Benoit; the latter evidently supposing the attorney was simply returning to her the sum of $250 which she previously had paid to him, and which he had promised to repay if she needed the money to make up the balance of the $1,000 which she had told the attorney she had agreed to deliver to defendant.

Mrs. Benoit's testimony regarding her last payment to defendant is substantially as follows:

After receiving the $250 from my husband's attorney, I called defendant on the phone and arranged to meet him in front of the county jail. He arrived there in his automobile. When we met I asked him if I could keep $100 of the amount to pay some debts. He said I could, and I then delivered him $150 in bills—bills which I had received from my husband's attorney.

Mrs. Benoit, it seems, delivered the bills to defendant while seated in his automobile with him. After handing the money over to him, she stepped from the car, whereupon defendant drove a short distance from the scene, with the bills in his possession, when he was arrested by the officers. Defendant, testifying as a witness in his own behalf, denied that Mrs. Benoit had paid him either the $500 or the $250—the amounts mentioned in the first and second counts of the information, and which, according to Mrs. Benoit's testimony, were the first and second payments which she made to defendant on account of the total sum of $1,000, which she said she had agreed to deliver to him. As to the $150, defendant admitted receiving this sum from Mrs. Benoit on July 27, 1923, in the form of bills, but testified that it was paid to compensate him for certain legitimate efforts which he claimed to have made on Mrs. Benoit's behalf in an honorable endeavor to assist her husband and brother-in-law.

Each of the two officers who had been deputed by their superiors to investigate the charges of larceny pending against Mrs. Benoit's husband and brother-in-law testified that at no time did defendant approach him with an offer of a bribe to induce him to refrain from preferring additional charges against the two brothers.

Defendant put in evidence the court records of the proceedings in the cases pending against Mrs. Benoit's husband and brother-in-law. These records showed that an information had been filed in the superior court against each of the accused, whereby each was charged with the crime of grand larceny, that each of them pleaded not guilty to that charge, and that subsequently each was permitted to withdraw his plea and to plead guilty to petit larceny. A deputy district attorney was then permitted to testify, over defendant's objection, that it was his duty to pass upon the dismissal of criminal cases and upon the reduction of charges of higher offenses to charges of lesser degree, and that the reason why the charges against Mrs. Benoit's husband and brother-in-law had been reduced from grand larceny to petit larceny was that the value of the property involved in the charges against the two brothers was found to be less than $50. Defendant objected to this testimony upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and upon the further ground that the reduction of the charges occurred subsequently to defendant's arrest, and after the date when he is alleged to have committed the last act of larceny.

Appellant earnestly insists that, with respect to the $150 for the theft of which he was convicted, none of the essential elements of larceny was shown to exist. Because of the earnestness with which this claim is presented, we shall take up each element of the offense, and show how the evidence warranted the jury in inferring the existence of each essential ingredient of the crime.

[2-5] To constitute larceny, the first essential is that there be a "taking" (18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 468); that is, the thing which is the subject of the crime must be taken from the possession of the owner into the possession of the thief. The taking, in order to support a charge of larceny, must be against the will of the owner, or at least without his consent; in other words, the act of taking must be a trespass against the owner's possession. Id. p. 469. Though the taking must be against the will of the owner or a trespass to his possession, still an actual trespass or actual violence is not necessary. Fraud may take the place of force. It is well settled that a taking, within the definition of larceny, occurs when a person, with a preconceived design to appropriate the property to his own use, obtains possession of it by means of fraud or trickery. In such case the fraud vitiates the transaction, and the owner is deemed still to retain a constructive possession of the property. 17 R. C. L. pp. 13, 14. Or, as has been said, "the fraud will supply the place of trespass in the taking, and so make the conversion felonious." People v. Shaw, 57 Mich. 403, 24 N. W. 121, 58 Am. Rep. 372.

It is essential in such cases that the owner shall intend to part with the possession only, and not to pass the title as well. If he intends to pass both the possession and the title, the transaction, though it may amount to the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses, will not constitute larceny. But the owner does not part with the title to the alleged thief, where the thing which is the subject of the theft is delivered by the owner to the accused, to be applied by the latter to a particular purpose, and the recipient of the property, having obtained the possession fraudulently with the preconceived intention to appropriate the property to his own use, does subsequently convert it to his own use instead of applying it to the purpose contemplated by the owner. 36 C. J., pp. 778, 779; People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 P. 131; People v. Schwartz, 43 Cal. App. 696, 185 P. 686. Thus, in People v. Schwartz, supra, we held it to be larceny where money is fraudulently obtained by the defendant for the ostensible purpose of using it to bribe a public official, but, instead of devoting it to that purpose, he converts it to his own use. In cases of that character the accused receives only the possession of the money, while the title remains in the owner until the money shall have been delivered by the defendant to the official whom the owner supposes is to be bribed by the defendant as the corrupting intermediary.

[6] Tested by the foregoing, it must be held that the evidence in this case was sufficient to justify the implied finding of a "taking" sufficient to constitute larceny. According to the testimony of the complaining witness, the $150 was a part of the larger sum of $1,000 which appellant represented to her would be used by him for the purpose of bribing the investigating officers. True, appellant told Mrs. Benoit that it was not necessary for her to know how he was going to use the money; but it is a reasonable inference from all of his statements to her that he intended her to understand that the money was to be used by him in some way to corrupt the investigating officers, though it was not necessary for her to know precisely how it was to be thus used.

While it is true that Mrs. Benoit testified that she told appellant that she expected some time to compensate him for the efforts which she supposed he had made on behalf of her husband and brother-in-law, her testimony is to the effect that she did not give him the $150 as compensation for any services, but that she delivered that sum to him solely for the purpose of enabling him to carry out his representation that he could and would bribe the investigating officers.

That appellant's representations were false, and that, when he obtained possession of the money, it was his intention to convert it to his own use and not to devote it to the purpose for which he ostensibly was receiving it, are facts which well may be inferred from the testimony of each of the investigating officers to the effect that at no time had appellant approached him with a corrupt suggestion. It will be recalled that Mrs. Benoit testified that appellant told her that these two officers were the men "who had entirely to do with the case against my husband and brother-in-law, and that what they said went." These facts warrant the inference that the possession of the $150 was obtained by appellant from Mrs. Benoit by fraud, with a preconceived design not to devote the money to the purpose for which it was delivered to him, but to convert it to his own use—in short, that there was a "taking," within the law of larceny.

[7, 8] The second essential element in the crime of larceny is the asportation of the thing which is the subject-matter of the offense (18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 496); that is, the taking must be followed by such a carrying away or asportation as to supersede the possession of the owner for an appreciable interval of time, be it ever so short (Id. p. 498). To constitute asportation, the thing taken must have been in the entire or absolute possession of the taker. Id. Where, as in the instant case, the accused acquires possession by fraud or trickery, intending when he acquired the possession not to devote the thing to the purpose for which it was delivered to him but to convert it to his own use, his subsequent conversion of it to his own use, though it be but for the smallest appreciable length of time, is such a complete, independent, and absolute possession and control of the thing, adverse to the rights of the owner, as to be tantamount to that asportation which occurs in those cases where the original taking and carrying away involved an act of trespass by actual violence. Here appellant, when the money was delivered to him by Mrs. Benoit, had its entire and absolute possession for an appreciable period of time before his arrest, and during that interval he converted it to his own use.

[9-12] Appellant strenuously insists that the evidence affords no warrant for the implied finding of a conversion. With this contention we cannot agree. After having accepted the money, appellant put it in his pocket and drove away from the scene. As we have pointed out, there is evidence to support the implied finding that, at the time when he acquired possession of the money, he took it with the preconceived intention to convert it to his own use. He was therefore a wrongdoer from the beginning, and in contemplation of law the wrongful act was continuous. In cases such as this, where the possession was originally obtained by fraud or trickery, the wrongdoer holds the property all the while without right, and against the right and without the consent of the owner. State v. Coombs, 55 Me. 477, 92 Am. Dec. 610. There is nothing to indicate that appellant experienced a change of heart after he received the money—there is nothing to indicate that his intention to convert it to his own use ever wavered. The reasonable inference is therefore that, when he received the money into his possession, he took it and carried it away with the intention to keep it as his own. The conversion was then complete. It matters not how short the interval may have been between the manual taking of the money and its conversion to appellant's use. In fact, these acts were practically simultaneous in their occurrence. If the testimony of the people's witnesses be true—and with respect to the charge in the third count we are bound to accept it as true, in view of the nature of the verdict—appellant took the bills into his possession, put them in his pocket, and drove away with them, intending all the while to appropriate them to his own use. The very instant that he did this there was a conversion of the money. The rule is that when, to possession fraudulently acquired there is added the felonious intent—that is, the purpose to deprive the owner of his property wholly and permanently, without color of right or excuse, and to make it the property of the taker without the owner's consent—the larceny is from that moment complete. State v. Coombs, supra.

[13, 14] The third essential element in the crime of larceny is that the thing taken and carried away should be the property of another (18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 498); that is, some one other than the taker must have in the thing taken a general or special property right, which is invaded by the trespass committed in the taking. Considered as an element of larceny, "ownership" and "possession" may be regarded as synonymous terms; for one who has the right of possession as against the thief is, so far as the latter is concerned, the owner. 36 C. J. p. 757. Since appellant acquired possession of the money by fraud and chicanery, he held it all the while without right, and as against him Mrs. Benoit had the right of possession. State v. Coombs, supra. It is of no consequence that the legal title to the bills was in the county. The actual status of the legal title to the stolen property is of no concern to the thief. Mrs. Benoit's possession, though the bills may have come into her hands illegally, was sufficient to make them the subject of larceny, and the ownership was properly laid in her. State v. Pigg, 80 Kan. 481, 103 P. 121, 18 Ann. Cas. 521; 36 C. J. p. 758.

[15-20] The fourth and last, essential of larceny is the felonious intent (18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 500); that is, the taking and carrying away must be with an intent, without claim or pretense of right or justification, to deprive the owner of his property wholly and permanently (Id.). And where, as here, no actual trespass or act of violence is involved in the original taking, the felonious intent must exist at the time of the taking. People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 P. 892; 15 Cal. Jur. p. 908. If the jurors believed the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution—and on this appeal we must assume they did—they were warranted in deducing the inference that appellant, when the bills were delivered to him by Mrs. Benoit, took them and carried them away, with the intention, then or previously fully conceived, to convert them to his own use as soon as he should obtain their possession, and to exclude Mrs. Benoit from all further dominion over them. Such purpose, amounting as it did to an intent permanently to deprive the owner of her property without any claim or pretense of right or justification therefor, constituted the requisite felonious intent.

Our conclusion from the foregoing is that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the existence of each and every element of the offense charged against appellant in the third count of the information.

It is earnestly urged that the verdict of guilty on the third count is repugnant to, and wholly inconsistent with, the verdicts of not guilty on counts 1 and 2, and that therefore the verdict on the third count is contrary to law. We cannot accept the contention thus earnestly made. The several counts in the information relate to three separate and distinct transactions—transactions which were alleged to have occurred on different dates, and to involve the theft of different sums of money. It may be conceded, for the purpose of the argument, that under the evidence the jury had as much reason for finding appellant guilty on the first and second counts as it had for finding him guilty on the third; but, even so, the fact remains that the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict on the third count, and we must conclude that the jurors were convinced of his guilt thereon. If the jurors paltered with their oaths and with the law, they must make their own peace with conscience. If appellant was wrongfully acquitted on the first and second counts, the error was in his favor, and he cannot be heard to complain. The fact that the jurors relieved him on two counts does not oblige this court to relieve him on the third. State v. Hund, 115 Kan. 475, 222 P. 766; State v. Brown, 114 Kan. 699, 220 P. 174; State v. Brundige, 114 Kan. 849, 220 P. 1039; Weinecke v. State, 34 Neb. 14, 51 N. W. 307. Griffin v. State, 18 Ohio St. 438; Boone v. United States, 257 F. 963, 169 C. C. A. 113; Carrigan v. United States (C. C. A.) 290 F. 189. In the case last cited it is said:

"A verdict that is apparently inconsistent affords no basis for reversal of a judgment predicated thereon, when the evidence is sufficient to support either of two separate offenses."

Addressing himself to a like objection, advanced by the defendant in Boone v. United States, supra, Judge Trieber expresses the view of the court thus:

"It is a well-known fact that juries frequently hesitate to return verdict of guilty on a large number of counts, when the punishment which may be imposed on each count is as severe as that provided for violations of this statute (the minimum punishment on each count is 5 years). They therefore satisfy their consciences by a verdict of guilty on one or two counts, and not always on the counts supported by the strongest evidence."

In State v. Brundige, supra, the court says:

"Undoubtedly the defendant was guilty of both burglary and larceny or he was not guilty of either. But the failure to convict him of larceny as well as of burglary was an error in his favor of which he cannot effectively complain."

It is the settled law of this jurisdiction that a defendant cannot complain where the determination of his case was more favorable to him than the evidence warranted. People v. Coulter, 145 Cal. 69, 78 P. 348; 8 Cal. Jur. p. 563.

[21] It is claimed that the superior court had no jurisdiction to try appellant on the offense charged in the third count, for the reason that when the information was filed, October 13, 1923, section 487 of the Penal Code had been so amended that, when read in connection with the following section, the theft of property, the value of which does not exceed $200 is declared to be petit larceny. The offense of which appellant was found guilty was committed prior to August 18, 1923, the date when the amendment became effective. On July 27, 1923—the date when appellant committed larceny of the $150—the crime was grand larceny; for section 487, as it then read, made it grand larceny to steal and carry away property having a value in excess of $50. Therefore, at the date of the commission of the offense charged in the third count, the theft of the bills was a felony punishable by imprisonment in the state prison—a crime of which the superior court has jurisdiction.

There is nothing in section 487, as amended, to indicate an intention to interfere in any manner with the punishment of any offense previously committed, or with the procedure relating to the trial of such offense. The amended section must therefore be construed in connection with section 329 of the Political Code. When so construed, the effect is virtually to add to section 487, as amended, a proviso declaring, in substance, that the amendment shall not affect the penalty incurred for any offense previously committed. People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 440, 26 P. 597, 29 P. 61; People v. Davis (Cal. App.) 227 P. 494. From this it follows that, notwithstanding section 487 had been amended at the time when the information was filed, appellant nevertheless was liable to the punishment which the law provides as the penalty for grand larceny. His offense, therefore, was a felony, and the superior court had jurisdiction. To sustain his contention appellant cites People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104. But, as pointed out by Mr. Justice McFarland in the McNulty Case, 93 Cal. 440, 26 P. 597, 29 P. 61, the reasoning of the Tisdale Case is no longer applicable; section 329 of the Political Code having been amended in an important particular since that case was decided.

[22] It is claimed that the court erred in permitting the deputy district attorney to testify as to his reason for reducing the charges of grand larceny against Mrs. Benoit's husband and brother-in-law to charges of petit larceny. It is urged that this testimony was irrelevant and immaterial. The objection is based upon the assumption that appellant's representations to Mrs. Benoit amounted to no more than statements that he would use the money to prevent the filing of additional charges, and not that he would use it to bring about a reduction of the charges then pending. But Mrs. Benoit, as we have shown, testified that appellant told her "that it would depend entirely upon the evidence produced by the investigating officers as to how many counts and how much would be put against my husband," and that "the less that is brought up against the boys the less they would have to answer for"; also that he told her that he would try "to get the boys out of jail entirely." This testimony warrants the inference that appellant intended that Mrs. Benoit should understand him to mean that he would seek so to influence the investigating officers that, if the husband and brother-in-law were not ultimately released, they at least would be required to answer for only such charges as carried the least possible punishment. Moreover, if it was appellant's understanding that Mrs. Benoit's testimony meant that his representations to her amounted to no more than a statement that he would use the money merely to prevent the filing of additional charges, it may pertinently be asked what his purpose was in introducing the court records to show that the charges of grand larceny were reduced to accusations of petit larceny. If he did not intend that the jurors should be inoculated with the idea that he had carried out his part of the compact by causing a reduction to be made in the charges as originally brought, then why did he introduce these records in evidence? It was incumbent upon the prosecution to show that the several sums of money delivered to appellant were not used by him to accomplish the purpose for which he received them. The action of the deputy district attorney in accepting pleas of guilty to petit larceny, if not explained by that officer, might well have warranted the jury in finding that appellant had in fact used the money in the manner he had agreed. The testimony, therefore, was relevant and material.

[23] It is claimed, however, that the testimony is objectionable upon the further ground that the reduction in the charges was made subsequently to appellant's arrest, and after the date when he was alleged to have committed the last act of larceny. There is no merit in this contention. If the money had been applied by appellant to the purpose for which he ostensibly received it, and if, as a result thereof, he had corruptly brought about the acceptance of pleas of guilty to the lesser charges, it would be possible for his initial act of corruption to have occurred long before the men were permitted to plead guilty to petit larceny. If the district attorney's acceptance of these pleas had in fact resulted from appellant's corrupt use of the money, the train of events which led thereto might readily have been put in motion by an act of corruption initiated by appellant and, so far as he is concerned, consummated by him, long before his arrest and prior to the commission of the last act of larceny with which he was charged.

It is claimed that the court erred in charging the jury that, so far as the present case is concerned, grand larceny is committed when the property taken is of a value exceeding $50. For reasons already stated, the recent amendment of section 487 of the Penal Code did not operate to bar the punishment which previously had been prescribed for acts of larceny committed before the amendment became effective. Hence appellant, if guilty as charged in the third count, was punishable as for grand larceny, and the court therefore very properly charged the jury that, so far as this case is concerned, grand larceny is committed when the value of the property taken exceeds fifty dollars.

[24, 25] We find no prejudicial error in the rejection of the instructions requested by appellant. The first refusal of which appellant complains is that of an instruction to the effect that, if the jurors believed that Mrs. Benoit gave defendant the $150 in recognition of his efforts in her behalf, they should find him not guilty. That appellant would be entitled to an acquittal if the money was intended to compensate him for any aid which he may have rendered Mrs. Benoit is a proposition which must be apparent to every person of common intelligence and experience. It is not reversible error to refuse an instruction which merely directs the attention of the jury to that which every intelligent man or woman on the panel would doubtless keep in mind, without being reminded of it by the court. 8 Cal. Jur. p. 631. Moreover, the substance of the requested instruction was set forth in the court's charge, the jury having been expressly instructed that it would not be larceny if defendant received the money from Mrs. Benoit pursuant to a promise that she would pay him for his efforts in behalf of her husband.

[26] Appellant requested, and the court refused, an instruction to the effect that, if the prosecuting witness gave the money to defendant "with the understanding that he was to do with it as he saw fit in accomplishing the desired purpose," then it must be held that she intended to pass the title, and in that event defendant could not be found guilty of larceny. This requested instruction is not a rigorously accurate statement of the law. It does not necessarily follow that the title would pass to appellant if the money was given to him "to use as he saw fit in accomplishing the desired purpose." The "desired purpose" for which the money was given by Mrs. Benoit was the corruption of the investigating officers. If, when Mrs. Benoit parted with the possession of the money, it was her purpose that it should be used by appellant to bribe the officers, but that he should do so in a manner which he saw fit, the title would remain in her until the accomplishment of the purpose for which she gave him the money, i. e., until its final delivery by appellant to the officers whom she was led to believe were to be bribed. People v. Delbos, supra; People v. Schwartz, supra; 36 C. J. pp. 778, 779. It is a reasonable inference from Mrs. Benoit's testimony, considered in its entirety, that bribery was the only purpose to be accomplished by appellant's use of the money, even though, in accomplishing that purpose, he was to use the money "as he saw fit."

[27] Appellant requested an instruction to the effect that, if Mrs. Benoit gave him the money to prevent the filing of additional complaints against her husband and brother-in-law, the jury had the right to consider that fact, and the further fact that no additional criminal complaints were filed, and that, if the consideration of these two circumstances raised a reasonable doubt in their minds as to defendant's guilt, he should be acquitted. This instruction was calculated to mislead the jury, whose duty it was to consider, not alone the circumstances especially singled out and specifically referred to in the requested instruction, but every circumstance in the case which might have a legitimate bearing upon the question of whether appellant had secured possession of the money by fraudulent representations. The requested instruction is based upon the erroneous notion that appellant's representations, as testified to by Mrs. Benoit, amounted to no more than statements by him that he would use the money to prevent the filing of additional charges. Appellant erroneously assumes that his representations, as testified to by the complaining witness, entirely excluded any idea that he was to use the money to secure a reduction in the pending charges. But, as we already have pointed out, the complaining witness testified that appellant told her that "the less that was brought up against the boys the less they would have to answer for"—language well calculated to lead Mrs. Benoit to believe that it was appellant's intention to use the money to bring about a reduction of the pending charges, as well as to prevent the filing of additional complaints.

[28] Another of the instructions requested by appellant, but refused by the court, would have charged the jury to the effect that accusatory statements made in the presence of an accused, which are not denied by him, are admissible in evidence solely for the purpose of enabling the jury to know his attitude in the face of such statements, and that such statements are not evidence of the truth of the matters stated therein. As an abstract proposition, this part of the requested instruction is a correct statement of the law. The vice of the instruction is in its concluding sentence, where we find these words:

"Therefore, I instruct you that if the denial by the defendant of the accusatory statements made in his presence, taken in connection with all the other facts and circumstances of the case, create a reasonable doubt in your mind, then you should acquit the defendant."

This language assumes a fact not borne out by the evidence. It implies that appellant denied all of the accusatory statements made in his presence. Such, however, is not the case. Some, at least, of the statements made in his presence were neither admitted, nor denied by him. When asked what he had to say as to some of them, he replied, "I have nothing to say."

[29] Appellant requested the court to give an instruction to the effect that, if Mrs. Benoit, before testifying in the case, had been informed by the district attorney that she had committed a felony for which she could be sent to the penitentiary, that fact could be considered by the jury in weighing her testimony; and that "if, from a consideration of such statements, you find such statements were made, or a reasonable doubt is aroused in your mind as to the guilt of the defendant, then you should acquit him." If this language means anything, it means that the defendant should be acquitted under either of these two alternatives: (1) If the jury found that such statements were made to Mrs. Benoit by the district attorney; or (2) if a reasonable doubt be aroused in the jurors' minds as to defendant's guilt. Manifestly, appellant would not necessarily be entitled to an acquittal if the jury found the first alternative to be true. The mere fact that Mrs. Benoit had been advised by the authorities that she had committed a crime and was threatened with punishment therefor would not necessarily invalidate all of her testimony. Moreover, the court gave an instruction as follows:

"You are instructed that, if you believe from the evidence that the prosecuting witness was promised certain immunity for her husband or herself, then such fact is a circumstance which may be considered by you in determining her credibility."

This instruction went as far as the court could possibly be expected to go in singling out a particular witness and advising the jury as to what circumstances might be considered by it in weighing her testimony.

We find no substantial error in the record. Appellant had a fair trial, and there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

The appeal from the order denying defendant's motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed. The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SMITH v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. et al.
(Civ. 5014.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ☞628(1)—Delay in filing transcript beyond statutory period not justified.

Where fee for filing transcript, required to be paid in advance under Pol. Code, § 752, was not paid more than 3 months after expiration of time for filing, with full knowledge of appellant and his attorneys, delay held not excusable under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and appeal dismissed.

2. Appeal and error ☞628(3)—Respondent not estopped to take advantage of default in filing transcript.

Where respondent wrote letter impliedly consenting to few days further delay in filing brief, he was not estopped to take advantage of appellants' default in filing transcript, in view of showing that at time letter was written he understood that transcript had been filed.

3. Appeal and error ☞800—Filing of delayed transcript, after notice of motion to dismiss, but prior to hearing, held no defense.

Filing of delayed transcript, after notice of motion to dismiss appeal, but prior to hearing of motion, held not to constitute defense to motion, except where reasonable grounds excusing delay might be established.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Charles Edgar Smith against the Title Insurance & Trust Company and another, as executors of estate of Emil Firth, deceased. Judgment for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Geo. D. Meiklejohn, C. H. Scharinkow, and Augustus Tilden, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Elias V. Rosenkranz, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. [1] Respondents on February 9, 1924, served and filed notice of motion to dismiss the appeal "upon the ground that neither the transcript on appeal nor appellant's opening brief" were served or filed within the time prescribed by law and the rules of the court. The appeal is from a judgment entered after the court had sustained a demurrer to the third amended complaint, in an action to recover on a money demand against a decedent's estate. As it appeared from the clerk's certificate that the appeal should have been made to the Supreme Court, the same was transferred to the Supreme Court, whereupon the Supreme Court made its order retransferring the cause to this court. Thereafter the motion to dismiss was brought on for hearing, and was submitted on March 13th. As the time for filing brief does not begin to run until the transcript has been filed, the only delay which we need to consider is the delay in filing the transcript.

Notice of appeal from the judgment was filed in the superior court on the 27th day of September, 1924. Therefore the time for filing transcript expired on November 6, 1924.

The motion is based upon the certificate of the county clerk and upon an affidavit of Elias V. Rosenkranz, attorney for respondent. In this affidavit it was stated that appellant served on defendants his transcript on appeal on December 12, 1924, and deposited said transcript with the clerk of this court on the 17th day of January, 1925, but down to, and including, February 9, 1925, had not paid the filing fee therefor, and the transcript remained unfiled; that as early as the 8th day of December, 1924, affiant had informed the attorney for appellant that he would move to dismiss the appeal, "unless the transcript as corrected is served upon me within the next few days"; that on the 30th day of January affiant addressed a letter to plaintiff's attorney stating that, unless the opening brief was served and filed within the next week, he would make a motion to dismiss the appeal.

Affidavits in opposition to the motion were made by Augustus Tilden, one of the attorneys for appellant, and by R. M. Ferguson. Tilden stated that, "seasonably after the perfecting of the appeal," he made an agreement with a printing company which agreed to print and file the transcript in due time; that it had in its employ a Mr. Ferguson, who claimed to be qualified to superintend the printing and filing of the transcript according to the rules, and affiant relied upon him so to do; that on the day when the filing was due Mr. Ferguson reported to affiant that the transcript was not ready for filing; that affiant instructed Ferguson to procure an extension from Rosenkranz; that later on the same day Ferguson reported to affiant that Rosenkranz had granted such extension on certain conditions as to the contents of the transcript; that affiant agreed to these conditions, which increased the size of the transcript by about 83 pages; that the extension granted was not in writing and not definite as to time; that pending the printing of the transcript some delay in providing for payment of the same was experienced; that on January 24th Mr. Ferguson reported to affiant that the transcript had been paid for and filed, but that the filing fee had not been provided for; that a few days later Ferguson reported to affiant that appellant had assured Ferguson that the filing fee would be forwarded by him immediately to the clerk; that a few days later Ferguson reported to affiant that the clerk of this court had informed him that, while he had no record of the receipt of the fee, he was not aware of the delinquency of any fee of any transcript filed by Mr. Ferguson; that in fact Ferguson had inadvertently deposited the transcript with the clerk of the Supreme Court, and his inquiry as to the payment of the fee was inadvertently directed to the clerk of the Supreme Court; that immediately after January 24th affiant commenced the preparation of the opening brief; that on February 2d affiant received from Mr. Rosenkranz the letter referred to in the Rosenkranz affidavit; that affiant industriously tried to comply with the terms of the Rosenkranz letter; that by the end of the week ending February 7th affiant had prepared and placed in the hands of the printer about two-thirds of the brief; that on February 7th or February 9th, prior to service of the moving papers on this motion, affiant had "notified Mr. Rosenkranz' office" of the progress made in preparing the brief and assuring its filing in the early part of the ensuing week.

From a counter affidavit of Mr. Rosenkranz the following appears: That on about the 15th day of November Ferguson did inform affiant of his employment to print the transcript on appeal, and asked for an extension of time for the service and filing thereof; that affiant told Ferguson that he was willing to wait for several days upon the printer for the preparation of the transcript, and did request that certain pleadings be included in the transcript; that Ferguson agreed to have the transcript printed and served and filed within the next few days; that about November 20th the transcript was served upon affiant by the printer, and that the same contained a number of errors; that on November 22d affiant addressed a letter to Tilden requesting the correction of said errors and a re-service of the same as corrected, and insisted that the matter be taken care of promptly; that the transcript was not served upon affiant until December 12th, 4 days after said letter of December 8th; that said transcript was not actually left with the clerk of either the superior court or the Supreme Court until January 17th, and no fee was paid; that affiant did not know that no fee had been paid until a few days prior to serving and filing the motion to dismiss herein; that affiant, in making his demands concerning the prompt filing of appellant's brief, was ignorant of the fact that the transcript had not been filed; that affiant, on January 30th, wrote his letter to Tilden demanding the filing of the appellant's opening brief within the next week, but said brief was not served on affiant until the week following the period allowed by the letter; that the transcript on appeal contains only the judgment roll, and could seasonably have been prepared within a week.

The fee for filing transcript was not tendered to the clerk by respondent until the 21st day of February. Filing has been withheld to await disposition of this motion.

Appellant contends that he should be relieved from the consequences of his delay in filing transcript, and that he should have the benefit of the principle recognized by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the court may, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, where the case is appropriate for such relief; and that in a case where such relief would be granted directly on motion the court should refuse to dismiss the appeal. Appellant refers to Chapman v. Bank, 88 Cal. 419, 26 P. 608, and Barbour v. Flick, 121 Cal. 425, 53

P. 927, as cases in which the stated principle was applied in the denial of motions to dismiss appeals. In Chapman v. Bank the delay in filing transcript was only 10 days beyond the time limited by the rules, and had been occasioned by the fact that the attorney for appellant had been called out of the state by reason of the illness of his mother. The court held that appellant should be relieved from the consequences of his delay. In Barbour v. Flick the motion was based upon a delay in filing brief, which delay had been caused by excusable mistake in counsel's understanding of a stipulation concerning the brief.

The facts shown by the record and affidavits herein establish a case of persistent neglect in the prosecution of the appeal, without satisfactory extenuating circumstances. The attorneys for appellant, and appellant himself, continued their delay after they had full knowledge of the lack of payment of the filing fee and the lack of filing of the transcript. Section 752 of the Political Code expressly requires the collection, in advance, of a fee of $10 for the filing of a transcript on appeal.

[2, 3] There is no merit in the suggestion that respondents are estopped to take advantage of the default because of the letter of Rosenkranz to Tilden, in which he impliedly consented to a few days' further delay in the filing of the brief for appellant. The affidavit of Rosenkranz shows that at the time he wrote that letter he understood that the transcript had been filed. Where a delayed transcript has been filed prior to the hearing of the motion to dismiss, but not until after notice given of motion to dismiss, such filing constitutes no defense to the motion, with a possible exception when the facts establish the existence of reasonable grounds excusing the delay. Carter v. Paige, 77 Cal. 64, 19 P. 2. Appellant has made no showing, within this rule, of legal excuse for his delay. Erving v. Napa Valley Brewing Co., 16 Cal. App. 41, 116 P. 331.

The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Suit by the Central Savings Bank of Oakland against Thomas Coulter and another.

Judgment against the named defendant, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Butler & Van Dyke, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, and McLaughlin & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $18,070.98, with interest, against the defendant Thomas Coulter and Howard D. Kerr, as undisclosed principal and agent, respectively, as the balance due after the sale of certain lands included within a certain trust deed executed in favor of the plaintiff to secure the repayment of the sum of $40,000 and such other liens, incumbrances, taxes, etc., as might be incurred in protecting the title to the premises covered by the trust deed. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, Thomas Coulter, as principal, and dismissed as to Kerr, as agent of the defendant Coulter. From this judgment the defendant Coulter appeals.

It appears from the record that on or about the 18th day of September, 1919, the appellant entered into a written contract with one Hoffman, by which he agreed to exchange certain land in Sacramento county, and to pay Hoffman $41,300 in cash, in return for a conveyance of about 730 acres of land situated in Colusa county. A few days after the execution of this agreement, the appellant entered into a written contract with the defendant Kerr, wherein it is recited that whereas said Coulter had authorized the said Kerr to negotiate the agreement for the exchange of properties herein referred to, the said Coulter agreed, upon said exchange being perfected and the agreement being performed by Hoffman and his wife, there would be due to the said Kerr the sum of $500, for and on account of his services in negotiating said exchange, which sum Coulter agreed to pay Kerr.

The appellant transferred his lands mentioned in the agreement to Hoffman, but the deed by the Hoffmans conveying their Colusa county land was executed in favor of Kerr, Kerr taking the title in place of Coulter. The deed from Hoffman to Kerr was placed in escrow with the San Francisco Title Company, pending negotiations to secure a loan for the sum of $40,000. These negotiations undertaken by Kerr, resulted in the plaintiff in this case loaning the sum of $40,000 and taking as security a deed of trust upon the Colusa county lands transferred by Hoffman to Kerr, as aforesaid. This deed of trust was executed and delivered on or about the 17th day of November, 1919. On the following day the appellant paid to Kerr the sum of $500 on account of commissions earned, as per the agreement for payment of services hereinbefore mentioned and, at the time of taking conveyance by Kerr of the Hoffman lands and premises, Kerr executed a deed covering the same lands in favor of Blanche Brown, a daughter of the appellant Coulter. This deed was delivered to Coulter, held by him, never recorded, but was apparently a method taken to secure Coulter.

On the 18th day of December, 1919, the record shows that the appellant entered into a written contract with Kerr, by the terms whereof the appellant agreed to sell to Kerr and Kerr agreed to purchase from the appellant, all and singular the Colusa county lands included within the terms of the deed executed by the Hoffmans to Kerr, and then standing upon the records in the name of Kerr. This agreement, among other things, sets forth that the land was subject to the $40,000 indebtedness to the plaintiff in this case, which indebtedness Kerr agreed to assume and to pay. The sale to Kerr was effected early in the month of January following, the record title to the Hoffman lands being finally conveyed by Kerr to one Stormer. Upon the trial of the action both oral and written testimony was offered in evidence. The oral testimony was to the effect that Kerr was acting as the agent of Coulter in the transfer of the lands, and securing the loan of $40,000 with which to carry out the agreement between Coulter and Hoffman, and that the title was taken in the name of Kerr, to facilitate the transaction and that the ownership of the land was, at all times, vested in Coulter. Upon this testimony and the written instruments, to which we shall hereafter refer, the court found and entered its judgment that Kerr was the agent of Coulter, and was acting for him in that capacity at the time of the execution of the trust deed and the securing of the loan from the plaintiff in this action; that Coulter was, in truth and in fact, the principal in the transaction undisclosed to the plaintiff at the time the negotiations were being had; that the indebtedness was in fact Coulter's indebtedness; that the transaction was managed, as heretofore set forth, in order to consummate the deal between Coulter and Hoffman; that the record shows the agency and, also, a ratification of the execution of the trust deed, and that such facts sufficiently appear by written evidence. It is admitted by the appellant in this case that there is sufficient oral testimony to support the findings of the trial court, but that oral testimony is incompetent to establish the agency or trust relation existing between Coulter and Kerr and that the written evidence introduced is insufficient to comply with the statute of frauds. To support the contentions of the appellant, four propositions are set forth:

(1) The contract sued upon was a negotiable instrument, and an undisclosed principal cannot be held liable upon it.

(2) The contract sued upon was one required by law to be in writing, and hence an agency to execute it could neither be created nor proved, except by a written instrument.

(3) The contract sued upon being one which could only be authorized by a written instrument creating the agency, its execution could only be ratified with like formality.

(4) A contract made by a person intending to contract on behalf of a third party but without authority cannot be ratified by the third party so as to render him liable to be sued thereon, where the person who made the contract did not profess to be acting on behalf of a principal and contracted in his own name.

The note given by the defendant Kerr evidencing the terms to represent the $40,000 obtained by loan from the plaintiff, was dated the 17th day of November, 1919, is in the usual form of a promissory note, but concludes with this statement: "This note is secured by a deed of trust dated the 17th day of November, A. D. 1919." The deed of trust executed by the defendant Kerr to secure the said loan of $40,000 from the plaintiff is dated November 19, 1919, refers to the $40,000 obtained by the defendant Kerr from the plaintiff in this action, and then proceeds to convey the Hoffman lands as security for the repayment of the said sum of $40,000, with interest setting forth the usual and ordinary covenants contained in trust deeds.

[1] The note and deed of trust being executed, as just indicated, the appellant proceeds to argue that the note in question is a negotiable instrument, and, hence, is one upon which an undisclosed principal cannot be charged. A number of cases are cited in the briefs submitted by counsel, decided in states other than California, directly and emphatically holding that a note in the form as appears in this case, though secured by a trust deed, is a negotiable instrument. Two very strong cases supporting this view of the law are cited, to wit: Blumenthal v. Jassoy, 29 Minn. 177, 12 N. W. 517, and Thorp v. Mindeman, 123 Wis. 149, 101 N. W. 417, 68 L. R. A. 146, 107 Am. St. Rep. 1003. In these cases other Eastern authorities are cited supporting the same doctrine.

It would serve no useful purpose to review the authorities cited by counsel in support of the rule followed in other states, by reason of the fact that the Civil Code of the state of California and the many decisions of both the Supreme and Appellate Courts establish a contrary doctrine. Section 1642 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

"Several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together."

Beginning with the case of Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 P. 1110, and down to the most recent decisions of our own courts, it has been consistently held that a note and mortgage are to be construed together as constituting one agreement or instrument, and as said in that case of the note, "being inseparably connected with the mortgage, and affected by the conditions contained therein, the note is not negotiable." In Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonnemann, 157 Cal. 192, 106 P. 715, 21 Ann. Cas. 1279, the holding of the court is expressed in slightly different language, "the note and mortgage are one inseparable contract." In support of these declarations of the law the following cases are in complete harmony. Flinn & Treacy v. Mowry, 131 Cal. 481, 63 P. 724, 1006; Frost v. Alward, 176 Cal. 691, 169 P. 379; McAuliff v. McFadden, 42 Cal. App. 505, 183 P. 870, that such a note is not a negotiable instrument, we may cite the further cases of National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 P. 881; Kohn v. Sacramento R. Co., 168 Cal. 1, 141 P. 626; Metropolis Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 147 P. 265; Crocker Nat. Bank v. Byrne & McDonnell, 178 Cal. 329, 173 P. 329; Pitman v. Walker, 187 Cal. 667, 203 P. 739; Stoner v. Security Trust Co., 47 Cal. App. 216, 190 P. 500; W. P. Fuller & Co. v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191 P. 1027.

Admitting that such was the law of California prior to the adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instrument Act, it is further contended that such is no longer the law of this state. It is also contended that section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure providing that there can be only one recovery on account of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by a mortgage upon real property is inapplicable to the case at bar, and that the cases which we have cited are therefore not controlling. It is insisted that the section refers only to notes secured by mortgages, and has nothing to do with notes secured by trust deeds. As we view this case, we do not need to decide this question. The authorities which we have cited most emphatically hold that all the writings executed at the same time, as a part of the same transaction, and referring to the same subject-matter, are to be considered as one instrument. In other words, they are all read together. The face of the note, given in this case, specifically states that it is secured by a trust deed, dated the same day, and the deed of trust refers to the same note, and incorporates the note into its terms and conditions. Thus whether there may be or may not be more than one action, or more than one form of action to enforce the collection or payment of a note secured by a trust deed, is immaterial, as affecting the negotiability of a note stating on its face that it is secured by a trust deed, if that trust deed contains terms and conditions which destroy the negotiability of the note, to secure the payment of which it is given. Sections 3082 to and including section 3085 of the Civil Code define what instruments must contain in order to be negotiable. Among other things, there must be an unconditional promise or order to pay a sum certain in money, with interest at a definite time or by installments; may have a provision accelerating the due date with exchange, costs, and attorney's fees; the instrument must be payable on demand at a fixed or determinable future time; the time of payment may be on or before a certain specified event which is certain to happen. It is also provided that an instrument payable on a contingency is not negotiable. That the deed of trust set forth in the record violates many of the terms of the Uniform Negotiable Instrument Act of this state plainly appears by an analysis of its provisions. This analysis is set forth so succinctly in the respondent's brief that we take the liberty of quoting it in full:

"(a) It provides for the payment of further advances and all sums now or hereafter owing by the makers.

"(b) It provides for the payment of 'all taxes and assessments.'

"(c) Of all other charges and incumbrances now or hereafter appearing as a lien upon the property.

"(d) Of all expenses and attorney's fees expended by the creditor in any action affecting the property or the title thereto.

"(e) Of all sums expended by the creditor in settling or compromising of any adverse claim; or,

"(f) Of all sums expended by the creditor on account of taxes, assessments, etc.

"The deed of trust provides that the entire sum, secured by the deed of trust, may be declared due, 'if default be made * * * in the payment of any of the other moneys herein agreed to be paid,' or 'if breach be made in the performance of any obligation for which this deed of trust is a security.' This means that the entire sum secured becomes due, not alone in one year, nor upon the happening of an event 'which is certain to happen,' but (a) if the maker fails to pay any taxes; or, (b) if he fails to pay any assessments; or, (c) if he fails to pay any charge or incumbrance; or, (d) if he fails to repay any expenses or attorney's fee expended by the creditor in any action involving the property or the title; or, (e) if he fails to repay any sum paid in settlement or compromise of any adverse claim; or, (f) if he fails to repay any sum expended by the creditor on account of taxes or assessments."

We conclude that the note under consideration is a nonnegotiable instrument, and that the appellant's objection to testimony based upon the alleged negotiability of the note in question is not well founded.

[2] It is next insisted that there is no writing showing agency on the part of Kerr, and that his agency terminated on the 22d day of September, 1919. This contention is based upon the fact that the agreement on the part of Coulter to pay Kerr $500, by reason of his services, is dated as of that day. There seems to us no real merit in this contention. The instrument to which we are referring reads, exclusive of the date and the address:

"Whereas, on this day of September, 1919, you were authorized to negotiate an agreement of exchange between ourselves and W. H. Hoffman and Evelyn Hoffman (his wife) of the following described property: (Here follows a description of the lands then belonging to the appellant situated in the county of Sacramento). Evidence of said exchange being agreement made on the 18th day of September, 1919, between ourselves and W. N. Hoffman and Evelyn Hoffman (his wife).

"We now hereby agree that, upon said exchange being perfected, and said agreement performed by said Hoffman and his wife, there will be due you for your services for negotiating said exchange the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars, and we now hereby agree to pay you the said sum of $500 when said exchange has been finally consummated." (Signed by the appellant.)

Following the execution and delivery of this instrument, all the proceedings to which we have heretofore referred in relation to the carrying out of that agreement, the part performed by Kerr, Hoffman, and Coulter, respectively, were taken and had and the agreement referred to in this instrument finally consummated on the said 17th day of November, 1919, on which date the deed of trust, given by Kerr to the plaintiff, was executed, and on the following day the appellant paid to Kerr the sum of $500 agreed to be paid, as we have just stated. We think this writing sufficiently evidences the existence of the agency and trust relation existing between the appellant and Kerr during the entire time covered by the negotiations.

[3, 4] As we have seen, the trust deed in favor of the plaintiff was executed by Kerr during the time the record title stood in the name of said Kerr, and it is insisted by appellant that there is no admissible testimony in the case showing any authority for the execution of such deed or ratification of the act of Kerr. In making this contention, we think the appellant overlooks or minimizes the written agreement dated the 19th day of December, 1919, entered into between Coulter and Kerr. This transaction took place shortly after the consummation of the negotiation to which we have been referring. This agreement sets forth the following:

"Received from Howard D. Kerr five thousand dollars ($5,000) on the purchase of that certain piece of realty situate in the county of Colusa, state of California, to wit: (Here follows a description of the property covered by the trust deed, and at that time standing in the name of Kerr) at the price of seventy thousand three hundred (70,300) dollars, balance of the purchase money of fifteen thousand dollars, to be paid in gold coin, within 20 days, or as soon thereafter as the papers can be arranged for transferring said property. It is hereby understood that there is a $40,000 loan now on the said property held by the Central Savings Bank of Oakland, which the purchaser assumes and agrees to pay. * * *

"Upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money, I hereby agree to give and grant deed to the above property, with a good title. * * *

Dated the 19th day of December, 1919, signed by Thomas Coulter and Rowena Belle Coulter, and at the bottom of said agreement appears the following:

"I hereby accept the terms of this contract, and agree to purchase the said property and pay therefor the amount as set forth." (Signed, Howard D. Kerr.)

This is a plain, unequivocal statement or acknowledgment by both Coulter and Kerr that the ownership of the property in question was vested in Coulter. If the contention made herein that Kerr was the owner of the property and not the agent of Coulter, and acting for him in the negotiation of the loan, the question necessarily occurs, why he (Coulter) should be agreeing to sell the land to Kerr, and Kerr agreeing to buy from Coulter lands actually vested in Kerr? We think there is but one answer to this question. The agency is clearly shown and the ratification of the act of the agent established by the writing.

Appellant relies upon the case of Keighley Maxsted & Co. v. Durant, 1 B. R. C. 351, to the effect that an undisclosed principal cannot be held liable upon any obligation by reason of ratification. Whatever may be the law in other jurisdictions, such is not the law here. Section 2310 of the Civil Code allows just such a ratification. That section reads:

"A ratification can be made only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer an original authority for the act ratified, or where an oral authorization would suffice, by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof."

[5-7] Ratification is equivalent to a previous authority. 1 Cal. Jur. p. 776, § 68. Here we have a previous appointment in writing of the agent, and acceptance of the benefits, a statement in writing of the ownership of the property during the period covered by the obtaining of the loan, and then an agreement in the same writing that the purchaser shall assume and pay the mortgage, which has been executed for the benefit and purposes of the seller of the land, and which enabled him to consummate his deal with the Hoffmans. The record does not show, so far as we have been able to discover, what became of the deed executed by Kerr to the daughter of the appellant, but we assume, as stated by counsel in argument, that that deed was subsequently destroyed. The ratification is not strictly formal in its terms, but we think it sufficiently direct and positive, in substance, to comply with the statute. The rule in this state is well established that the contract of an agent, who deals in his own name without disclosing that of his principal, is the contract of his principal, and the principal is liable thereon. 1 Cal. Jur. 856, § 133. In all such cases where the agency is shown to exist, the rule is that the writings showing ratifications will be liberally construed. 2 Corp. Jur. p. 492 et seq. The fact that the trust deed was made in the name of the agent, instead of the principal, does not limit the application of the rule relating to subsequent ratification. 2 Corp. Jur. p. 522; Garcia & Maggini v. Colvin, 53 Cal. App. 79, 199 P. 1113; Cook v. Newmark Grain Co., 54 Cal. App. 283, 201 P. 615. Other California cases might be cited to the same effect, but we deem these sufficient.

We think the written testimony in this case sufficient to comply with the statute of frauds, and that the testimony supports the finding of the trial court.

All transactions referred to herein having been had, and the note and deed of trust involved in this action having been executed and delivered prior to the amendment of section 3265, Civil Code (Stats. 1923, p. 193), the law of this case has been considered and set forth as of the date of the execution and delivery of said note and deed of trust.

The judgment is hereby affirmed.

ALTAMIRANO v. CHEO. (Civ. 2987.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 9, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 8, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)—Finding of trial court, in accounting as to reasonableness of partners' expenditures in farming agreement, conclusive.

Where one of conditions in oral agreement for joint working of leased farm land was that defendant should advance expense money against a final settlement, held, in action for accounting, that the trial court's finding, as to the reasonableness of such expenditures, was conclusive.

2. Partnership ⇨328(3)—Evidence held sufficient to support finding of conclusive settlement of partnership farming agreement.

In an action for accounting under a farming agreement, evidence held sufficient to support finding of a conclusive settlement between partners, though there was evidence justifying a finding to the contrary.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1) — Determination on conflicting evidence for trial court.

In an action for accounting on a partnership farming agreement, determination on conflicting evidence of partners was for the trial court.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨135—Ploughing on land reverts at termination of lease.

Ploughing, left on land at termination of a single cropping season lease, becomes the property of the landlord.

5. Partnership ⇨81—Partner need not account for ploughing left on land, when re-leasing alone in good faith.

A lessee in good faith of farm lands, worked the previous year on a single cropping season lease, need not, in the absence of express agreement, account to his partners of the previous year for the value of ploughing then left on the land or for part of crop raised thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Bert Altamirano against Louis Cheo for an accounting. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Steele, of Oakland, for appellant.

Joseph D. Malloy, of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action for an accounting. The defendant was given judgment for costs of suit, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The defendant is a farmer, and for a number of years the plaintiff and Joe Youritch were in defendant's employ as farm hands. In the fall of 1921, the three men rented 600 acres of land in San Joaquin county for the cropping season of the following year, and during the term of the lease they farmed the same under an oral agreement to the effect that defendant would furnish the required machinery, implements, and equipment, and plaintiff and Youritch would do the necessary work in the production of crops; the profits to be divided equally. The defendant was to advance whatever money was necessary to conduct the farming operations and to be reimbursed, without interest, out of the proceeds of the crops. According to defendant's testimony, he received from the sale of farm products the following amounts: Hay, $917.58; barley, $1,271.11; and stubble, $189. There remained in his possession 1,750 sacks of wheat belonging to the partnership. He expended in behalf of the enterprise the sum of $4,721.98. The plaintiff paid certain partnership expenses and, during the year, received $150 from the defendant on account thereof.

November 10, 1922, the three men met together to adjust their partnership affairs. The defendant and Youritch testified that the former there presented a complete written statement of his receipts and disbursements, and that the plaintiff agreed to all the items thereof. The plaintiff and Youritch sold their interests in the wheat on hand to the defendant at what was stipulated at the trial to be the market price thereof. The net profits were then computed upon the basis of the foregoing receipts and disbursements, taking into consideration the amount defendant agreed to pay for the wheat. The defendant thereupon gave checks to plaintiff and Youritch for their respective shares of such profits. They cashed their checks and departed shortly after the settlement, the defendant going to Oakland and Youritch to Los Angeles. "Some two or three weeks afterwards" the plaintiff called upon defendant and demanded a further adjustment of the partnership affairs, but the defendant refused to accede to the demand. The defendant testified that the adjustment of November 10th was a complete settlement of the partnership affairs, except as to 90 acres of summer-fallow plowing which will be later considered; that "everybody was satisfied"; that plaintiff "was afraid I was giving him too much money on the settlement."

[1, 2] Youritch also testified that the parties made a complete settlement of the partnership affairs. Material parts of the foregoing testimony were contradicted by the plaintiff. He testified that at the time of the settlement he said to defendant, "I had forgot a book I had at home. * * * 'If you wait a few days longer I will get that book; we will come up and we will straighten the matter out.' He says, 'All right, * * * any time you want to, come up here'"; that the defendant desired to settle for the amount he paid plaintiff "and I wouldn't stand for it." Youritch testified that at the time of the settlement the plaintiff said he forgot his book, "but he says he don't think the bills run over $100; he says 'You put in $100 for my expenses, that be O. K.' * * * He said he forgot his books, but he could come close; he said he guessed $100, he don't think it is any more than $100, about $100." At the trial the plaintiff testified that he had paid out $315.70 towards the expenses of the partnership. The defendant testified that the plaintiff paid out only $125 towards the expenses, and that the defendant repaid that sum in the aforesaid $150 admittedly paid to plaintiff prior to the settlement. While the determination of the conflict in the testimony was for the trial court, it may be observed that there is one feature of the settlement which tends strongly to support the conclusion reached by the court. There is no claim that Youritch had paid any part of the expenses of the enterprise. Yet the proceeds of the venture, after deducting the expenses thereof paid by defendant, were divided equally among the three partners. If the plaintiff was entitled to reimbursement for the expenditures which he now claims to have made, then the amount thereof should have been deducted from the proceeds before division, and it would follow that the defendant paid Youritch more than his just share. It is not probable that the defendant would have made such payment to Youritch, if the parties understood that the plaintiff was to be further reimbursed by defendant. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the expenditures made by the defendant are reasonable in amount, but the trial court's determination thereof is conclusive on appeal. The evidence is ample to support the findings of the court upon the theory that the partners made a complete settlement of the partnership affairs among themselves, as well as upon the theory that the settlement was just and fair, although, as pointed out, there is evidence upon which contrary findings could have been made. An agreement between partners by which they settle their partnership affairs may be set aside for fraud or mistake, but the plaintiff made no attempt to prove either fraud or mistake; his claim being that no settlement was agreed to by him.

[3] The parties summer-fallowed 90 acres of land on which no crop was raised, the land apparently being too wet to plow until it was too late to raise a crop thereon. Plaintiff testified that it was agreed that "if the ranch had been rented out to some outsider, he (defendant) was to sell that summer fallow to them, and whatever he got for the summer fallow was to be divided between the three of us, and, if it was not, that he was to put it in the coming year and we were to divide that." The defendant testified that he did not agree to farm the 90 acres the following year, but that he said, "I will try to sell this off, if I can sell it we will divide the profit"; that "I tried to sell it, and I couldn't sell it to no one"; that the owner "took the land back and rented her to me again after the first of the year." Defendant's testimony in this respect is corroborated by that of Youritch. Here again the determination of the conflict in the evidence was for the trial court.

[4, 5] The lease to the partners was for a single cropping season. Any plowing left on the land at the end of the term became the property of the landlord. If, as stated by defendant, the owner retook possession and the defendant thereafter, in the succeeding year, in good faith, took a lease of the land and farmed it, without having agreed with the plaintiff and Youritch to do so or to pay for the plowing or divide the profits, he was not under obligation to account to them for the value of the plowing or for a part of the crops raised on the land. The question of his good faith was for the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

W. S. SMITH & SON et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5159.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1925.)

Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Industrial Accident Commission's award on competent evidence affirmed.

Where testimony was conflicting, Industrial Accident Commission's award, based on competent evidence, should be affirmed.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1913, p. 279), by Caroline H. Rountree, employé, opposed by W. S. Smith & Son, employer, and the Aetna Life Insurance Company, insurer. To review an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission, the employer and insurer bring certiorari. Award affirmed.

E. L. Stockwell and J. M. Wallace, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for respondent Rountree.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

CASHIN, J. Certiorari directed to the Industrial Accident Commission to review the proceedings resulting in an award made by the Commission, to Caroline H. Rountree, and against Aetna Life Insurance Company, a corporation, the insurer of W. S. Smith & Son, the petitioners herein.

Caroline H. Rountree was, on the 1st day of July, 1923, in the employ of petitioners W. S. Smith & Son. She alleged in her claim for compensation, under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, that on that day in the course of her employment she fell from a horse, striking her head upon the ground, and receiving injuries which proximately caused a retinal hemorrhage in the left eye and permanent diminution of vision. The Commission made and filed its findings of fact and award in her favor against petitioner, Aetna Life Insurance Company, holding petitioner liable for the entire disability. Thereafter the Commission denied a rehearing of the matter.

Petitioners claim that the evidence does not justify the findings of fact, that the findings do not support the award, that the injuries, if any, were an aggravation of an existing disease, and that the Commission, in holding petitioner liable for the entire disability, acted in excess of its powers.

After an examination of the whole record in this case, we find that there was a conflict in the testimony, and that the conclusions of the Commission are based on proof supported by competent evidence. We are therefore of the opinion that the award should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

STEINECK, Deputy Labor Com'r, eto., v.
COLEMAN. (Civ. 4953.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨791—Motion to dismiss appeal not considered, where grounds for dismissal were not suggested in previous similar motion.

Motion to dismiss appeal, on the ground that appeal was taken for sole purpose of delay, and was frivolous, would not be considered, where, on a previous motion to dismiss the appeal, no reference was made to such ground.

2. Appeal and error ⇨757(1)—Brief must contain such portions of record as party desires to call to attention of court.

Legislature in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 748), by striking from Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, addition made in year 1919 (St. 1919, p. 261), providing that no appeal should be decided adversely to any party for failure to print in his brief portion of record in support of his points, reaffirmed its original enactment that parties must print such portions of record as they desire to call to the attention of the court.

3. Appeal and error ⇨935(2)—Order appealed from presumed justified, where record incomplete.

Where appeal was taken from order denying motion to vacate default judgment, and appellant failed to set forth in his brief notice of motion, affidavit, proposed answer in full, or counteraffidavit of respondent, order appealed from would be presumed to have been justified.

4. Appeal and error ⇨757(1) — Appellant's failure to print affidavit in brief relieved respondent of printing counteraffidavit.

On appeal from order denying motion to vacate default judgment, failure of appellant to present in opening brief affidavit in support of motion relieved respondent of presenting in his brief counteraffidavit.

5. Pleading ⇨85(4)—Demand for bill of particulars does not extend time for answer.

Serving on adverse party demand for bill of particulars, under Code Civ. Proc. § 454, does not of itself extend time for answer.

6. Judgment ⇨143(3) — Refusal to relieve from default judgment was not abuse of discretion.

Though mistake of attorney, in believing that filing demand for bill of particulars extended time for answer, may under some circumstances have entitled client to relief under

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, it was not abuse of discretion, where it appeared that defendant had intentionally evaded service of summons to refuse to relieve client from default judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by W. E. Steineck, Deputy Labor Commissioner, Bureau of Labor Statistics, assignee, against Will H. Coleman. From an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion dismissed, and order affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. B. Edler, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. [1] Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal from the order denying motion to vacate judgment, upon the ground that the appeal is taken solely for the purpose of delay and is frivolous. By an order made some time ago the court granted a motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal from the judgment, and denied a motion made at the same time to dismiss the appeal from the order. The grounds stated for the present motion might have been suggested in connection with the former motion, if respondent had elected to include them. This alone is a sufficient reason for declining to consider such motion at this time.

Respondent further moves for an order affirming the order denying the motion to vacate judgment, on the ground that appellant has not, in his brief or in any supplement thereto, printed any portion of the record. It is true that the opening brief for appellant does not contain quotation or copy of any part of the record. The reply brief of appellant, which has been filed pending the decision of this motion, does contain some quotations or copies from the transcript. Since the case has been submitted on the merits at the same time that this motion was submitted, we shall assume that appellant has now, although tardily, complied with section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it is provided that, in the case of an appeal taken upon a typewritten transcript, the parties must in filing their briefs "print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

[2] But we take occasion here to suggest that failure to comply with this statute by printing a sufficient part of the record to enable the court to determine the merits of the questions presented for decision is, in its probable results, somewhat analogous to the failure of a litigant to obtain a sufficient bill of exceptions. In the year 1919 (St. 1919, p. 261) the Legislature made an addition to section 953c which practically destroyed its effect by directing, among other things, that an appeal should not be decided adversely to any party for failure to print in his brief the portion of the record or any part thereof in support of his points. Following that amendment, and referring directly thereto, the Supreme Court held that the statute requiring the printing in the briefs of the record and evidence relied upon in an appeal "must be regarded as one for the convenience of the appellate tribunals, and for that reason directory only, and should be disregarded by the court wherever substantial justice requires it to be done." People v. Woods, 190 Cal. 513, 517, 213 P. 951, 953. Thereafter the Legislature, apparently disapproving the policy indicated by the amendment of 1919, struck out from section 953c the addition which had been made thereto in 1919 (Stats. 1923, p. 748). It thus appears that the Legislature has reaffirmed its original definite enactment that parties to an appeal, although excused from printing their transcripts (when the record is made up under said section 953c), "must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

[3] Turning now to the briefs, and to the portions of the record printed therein, what do we find? We are informed by counsel that the appeal is from an order refusing to relieve the defendant from a judgment taken against him through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of his attorney. (Said attorney was not his present attorney herein.) It is indicated that the judgment had been entered upon default, and that the motion was supported by an affidavit of the facts upon which the moving party relied. But in the opening brief of appellant we are not furnished with a copy of the notice of motion or of the affidavit. Neither is there printed any copy of the answer which the defendant proposed to file. In the reply brief there are set forth some paragraphs of the complaint and a part of the proposed answer, which purports to deny "generally and specifically each and all of the allegations" of said paragraphs of the complaint. And in the reply brief appellant finally has also printed the affidavit in support of the motion to vacate judgment. But in so doing appellant fails to set forth the counteraffidavit on the part of respondent, to which our attention should have been called in a full and appropriate presentation of the record. "It is a well settled rule of law that, where evidence is omitted from the record, this court must presume that the omitted evidence fully justified the order appealed from, although the evidence contained in the record itself is insufficient." Berri v. Rogero, 168 Cal. 736, 741, 145 P. 95, 97.

In this decision we are assuming that the answer, verified, and tendered with the motion, states a defense, and "meets all the requirements of an affidavit of merits." Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353.

[4-6] Since the affidavit in support of the motion to vacate judgment was not presented to this court by appellant in his opening brief, respondent in preparing his brief was not under any obligation to present the affidavit used on his behalf in the court below. In view of these circumstances, we have examined said counteraffidavit made by the attorney for respondent. From the facts therein stated it appears that the defendant intentionally and for some time successfully evaded service of summons and complaint in this action, and thereby caused delay in the prosecution thereof; that the defendant had admitted that plaintiff's assignor had performed labor and services for him during a period of three and one-half months, and that he had not paid anything whatever for said services. The action is one to recover an amount alleged to be due for said services. The motion to obtain relief against default for failure to answer was based upon the claim, as set forth in an affidavit of the person who was defendant's attorney at that time, that he had served on plaintiff a demand for a bill of particulars, and believed that, as a matter of law, his time to answer was extended by virtue of such demand until after the furnishing of such bill of particulars. It seems to be admitted that the serving of such demand did not of itself extend the time for answer. Code Civ. Proc. § 454. While such mistake of law on the part of the attorney of the defendant might under some circumstances serve as a justification for relief under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, nevertheless the court on the hearing of the motion was entitled to take into consideration all of the facts presented, in order to determine whether or not the default had been suffered as the result of excusable delay, or was a part of a policy of intentional delay on the part of the defendant. The court in acting upon the evidence in this manner did not abuse its discretion therein.

The motion to dismiss appeal from the order denying motion to vacate judgment is dismissed. The order is affirmed.

PACIFIC ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION v. GOODMAN. (Civ. 4371.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 1, 1925.)

1. Bills and notes ⚡497(5)—Where title of payee of check was defective in fact, burden was on plaintiff indorsee to prove itself a holder in course for value.

In an action on a check, where title of payee was defective in fact, within Civ. Code, §

3136, burden was cast on plaintiff indorsee, under section 3140, to affirmatively prove that it acquired title as a holder in due course for value, in view of sections 3133, 3137.

2. Bills and notes ⚡356—Indorsee's acceptance of check conditionally from his debtor payee for collection not payment of debt constituting indorsee a purchaser for value.

Where plaintiff indorsee conditionally accepted check from his debtor payee, with understanding it was to be collected and applied on debtor's existing account, such acceptance of the check did not operate as actual payment on the debtor's account, constituting indorsee a purchaser for value, in view of Civ. Code, § 3135, and indorsee held check subject to defenses available against payee.

3. Bills and notes ⚡352—Surrender to payee of his dishonored checks in return for third party's check not consideration for such third party's check.

Where plaintiff surrendered to payee his dishonored checks, in exchange for check of third party, such surrender was not, under the circumstances, the payment of a valuable consideration for such third party's check.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Acceptance Corporation against S. B. Goodman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Shenk, J., not participating.

H. C. Millsap and N. J. Kendall, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Loewenthal, Collins & Loewenthal, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him for the amount due on a check of $3,000, made by him and delivered to plaintiff's assignor. We have not been favored with any brief or argument on behalf of respondent.

Apparently it is a fact, and we shall so assume, that as against the Pacific Motors Corporation, named as payee in the check, the defendant at all times has had a good defense. The trial court, however, determined that the plaintiff is a holder of said check in due course and for value. If the record supports that decision, the judgment must be affirmed.

The payee's title to the check was defective, within the meaning of the Civil Code title relating to negotiable instruments, by reason of the fact that the payee negotiated the instrument to the plaintiff in breach of faith and under such circumstances as amounted to a fraud on the part of the payee. Civ. Code, § 3136. It is admitted that respondent took the check under conditions sufficient to establish its position as a holder in due course in all respects, except that appellant contends that respondent did not receive the check for value or without notice of infirmity in the instrument or of the defect of the payee's title. Civ. Code, § 3133. To be charged with notice of such infirmity or defect, respondent must have had knowledge thereof, or knowledge of such facts that its action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith. Civ. Code, § 3137.

The facts relating to the negotiation of the check by the payee to plaintiff are as follows: The Pacific Motors Corporation being indebted to the plaintiff, its president, Mr. Kux, on June 18, 1920, delivered to plaintiff several checks of the Pacific Motors Corporation, drawn on a bank in San Francisco. The bank advised plaintiff that there was not sufficient money to pay these checks. Thereupon an officer of plaintiff telephoned Kux in Los Angeles and advised him about said unpaid checks. In reply, Kux stated that he was working on a deal in Los Angeles and expected to leave that night for San Francisco, and would bring an amount of money to plaintiff the following morning. Accordingly Kux did go to San Francisco and brought with him the check which he had obtained from defendant, and on behalf of the payee indorsed and delivered the same to the plaintiff. We are unable to discover, in the circumstances shown by the stipulation of facts, that the plaintiff did not take the check in good faith, and without notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the payee.

There is only one question remaining. Was the plaintiff one who acquired the check for value? At the trial it was stipulated that at the time of delivery of the check to the plaintiff it was understood that the account of Pacific Motors Corporation should be credited with the amount of the check when the check was collected; that the check was received, presented to the bank upon which it was drawn, and not paid; that the delivery and acceptance of the check was not to affect the account in any way until paid; that the check was not delivered or received in payment of the account, or in payment of any part of the account; and that the account never was credited with any sum whatever by virtue of the execution of the check. It was further stipulated that certain testimony given in a deposition of Mr. Levin, vice president of plaintiff, was true. In that testimony Mr. Levin said:

"At the time Kux gave me the Goodman check he told me that he wanted me to return the checks which I had and which were refused payment by the bank, and I thereupon delivered to him three or four checks which he had previously given me, aggregating about $3,000, drawn on the Anglo-Paris & London National Bank."

[1] At this point it is of importance to take into consideration the question as to which party must carry the burden of proof upon the issue of fact. Since the title of the payee named in the check was in fact defective, the burden was thereby cast upon the plaintiff to prove that it acquired the title as holder in due course. Civ. Code, § 3140. It follows that the plaintiff is required to affirmatively prove that it took the check for value.

[2] Appellant contends that, according to the record herein, it is established that the check was accepted by plaintiff as a conditional credit or for collection, and that those facts are insufficient to constitute the plaintiff a bona fide holder for value and in due course. We are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained. The rule appears to be established by authority that the taking of a note, either of the debtor or of a third person, for a prior existing debt, is no payment, unless it be expressly agreed to take the note as payment, and that, upon failure to pay such note, the creditor may ignore it and sue upon the original debt. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Bentel, 166 Cal. 473, 477, 137 P. 25. So here, by way of direct application of the rule above stated, it must be held that taking from plaintiff's debtor a check of a third person to plaintiff's debtor does not operate as payment of the debt to plaintiff unless plaintiff agreed to take the check as payment. Manifestly, this was not done in the present case. The original debt of the Pacific Motors Corporation to plaintiff remained unaffected by the transfer of the check, and was thus to remain until actual payment of the check. Under such circumstances the indorsee of the check has not become a purchaser for value. Oppenheimer v. Radke & Co., 20 Cal. App. 518, 129 P. 798. Concerning actual payment of the consideration, as a condition essential to the position of one claiming to be a bona fide purchaser, Mr. Pomeroy says:

"It is further settled that there must be actual payment before any notice, or, what in law is tantamount to actual payment, a transfer of property or things in action, or an absolute change of the purchaser's legal position for the worse, or the assumption by him of some new, irrevocable, legal obligation." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 751.

Section 3135, Civil Code, reads as follows:

"Where the transferee receives notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same before he has paid the full amount agreed to be paid therefor, he will be deemed a holder in due course only to the extent of the amount theretofore paid by him."

[3] The consideration for the transfer of the check by the payee to plaintiff was purely conditional. It amounted to nothing more than an agreement at a future date to credit the account of the payee with the payment of $3,000; said date being concurrent with and dependent upon the collection of the Goodman check. Since payment of that check was refused, and since the infirmity and defect in the title of the payee was thereupon promptly disclosed, prior to the passing of any consideration from the plaintiff on account of the indorsement of the check to it, we are of the opinion that plaintiff holds the check subject to the original defenses which defendant had against the payee. We think that the surrender by plaintiff, to the payee, of its own dishonored checks, in exchange for the check of appellant, was not, under the circumstances, the payment of a valuable consideration for appellant's check.

The judgment is reversed.

MURPHY et ux. v. BOERICKE & RUNYON CO. et al. (Civ. 5089.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 2, 1925. Opinion Modified and Rehearing Denied May 1, 1925.)

1. Druggists ⇨10—Evidence of sale of stale medicine held inadmissible because barred by limitation.

In action against drug company for sale of medicine claimed to have harmed plaintiff, testimony of former sale of stale medicine, occurring more than year prior to filing of suit, and for which medicine claimed to be harmful had been exchanged, held error under Code Civ. Proc. § 340.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1170(7)—Inadmissible evidence of sale of stale medicine prejudicial.

In action against drug company for sale of medicine claimed to be injurious, evidence of former sale of stale medicine by a porter, which was inadmissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 340, held not within scope of Const. art. 6, § 4½, being prejudicial, especially in view of its emphasis in instructions covering requirement for drug stores to have licensed pharmacists.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by John H. Murphy and wife against the Boericke & Runyon Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Brittain & Weise, F. S. Brittain, and J. H. Weise, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

William Klein, Reed M. Clarke, Alvin Gerlack, Clayton H. Garvey, and Alex. Sheriffs, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them for $3,000 in an action brought by the plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the defendants by reason of the sale by them to Mrs. Murphy of certain medicine, which the jury has found greatly injured her health.

Appellants assert that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict against them. We are relieved, however, of the task of discussing this contention, and stating, in detail, the evidence appearing in the record, because we have come to the conclusion that, aside from the soundness of this position, the judgment must be reversed for manifest error in the admission of testimony with reference to events which occurred more than one year before the bringing of the action, and which were barred, therefore, by the provisions of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure. We shall state herein only such portion of the evidence as is necessary to explain the situation with reference to this testimony.

[1, 2] On May 15, 1921, between 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning, the plaintiff John H. Murphy went to the drug store of the defendant Boericke & Runyon Company in San Francisco, Cal., to purchase for his wife a medicine to be used as a spring tonic. Mr. Murphy asked for "Rhus-Tox of the 30th" and a bottle of sulphur. It appears that defendant manufactured no preparation known as "Rhus-Tox of the 30th," but no explanation of this was made to Murphy, and the person in charge of the drug store sold him two bottles of medicine, one marked "Rhus-Tox 3X" and the other marked "Sulphur." Mr. Murphy delivered this medicine to his wife. She used it as directed for a few days. Both plaintiffs testified that the Rhus-Tox so purchased did not appear to be in good condition; that the pellets were lumped together so that it was difficult to determine the dosage, and that the medicine appeared to be stale and old. Because of these facts, Mrs. Murphy discontinued the use of the medicine after a few days, and on June 11, 1921, she took the medicine back to the drug store and saw Mr. Breckenfeld, a registered pharmacist employed by defendant company. She explained her objection to the medicine which had been sold to her husband. According to her testimony he told her that the medicine had been sold to Murphy by the porter, who was the only person in charge of the store at the hour of the morning when it was bought, and that a mistake had been made; that it was stale medicine which was kept for physicians. He told her not to take any more of that medicine, and gave her other medicine to take its place. There was other testimony in the record to the effect that the man who had furnished the first medicine did not appear to be familiar with the stock, and had searched for considerable time before he could find the medicine furnished to Murphy, and all of this testimony was offered in an attempt to place before the jury the fact that medicine had been dispensed by the defendant through its porter, and not through a registered pharmacist.

The complaint was not filed until June 8, 1922, so that everything in connection with this incident of May 11, 1921, was barred, and objections were duly and properly insisted upon at the trial. The substitute medicine furnished to Mrs. Murphy on June 11, 1921, by the registered pharmacist employed by defendant, according to all the testimony in the record, is the medicine which caused her injury, if either of the medicines furnished by the defendant caused it, and only with reference to the furnishing of such medicine was she permitted to offer testimony because of the bar of section 340 Code of Civil Procedure. There is no dispute about this matter, and counsel for respondents maintains in his brief that damages are only sought by reason of the action of the second medicine furnished. But respondents contend, and the trial court proceeded upon the theory, that the testimony of the earlier incident was admissible under the case of Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642. There recovery was sought for negligence of a physician in setting a broken bone. It appears that the break occurred in March, 1912, and defendant was employed to treat the injury. The healing process was not satisfactory, and defendant separated the surfaces of the bone during April, 1912, and again set the plaintiff's leg. It was for negligence in the latter operation that recovery was sought. Recovery for the earlier treatment was barred by the statute, and it does not appear that plaintiff sought to show such earlier treatment was negligent. The evidence of the original break and the treatment that followed was admitted merely to explain conditions at the time the negligent treatment was administered, and this evidence was necessary to determine what should have been the proper treatment under the circumstances. No recovery was had because of the earlier treatment.

In the instant case, if the testimony regarding the incident of May 11, 1921, had merely been to the effect that plaintiffs had purchased medicine which was not satisfactory, and upon taking it back to the drug store had been furnished with the objectionable medicine from which the evil consequences flowed, it would have come within the reason and intent of the case last cited. But here we have a situation where great stress was laid upon the fact that the original medicine was old and stale, and had been furnished by a porter, and a mistake had been made—all facts tending strongly to convict the defendants of negligence, and to greatly prejudice their cause before a jury, and all facts which, so far as any recovery by plaintiffs is concerned, were absolutely immaterial. It is useless for counsel for respondents to contend upon appeal that no recovery was sought for negligence occurring on May 11, 1921. Not only was testimony showing such negligence repeatedly put before the jury so that it must have influenced their judgment, but it was emphasized to them by the following instructions:

"It is incumbent upon every pharmacy * * * for the sale * * * of drugs, medicines * * * to have in charge thereof at all times a registered pharmacist or an assistant registered pharmacist.

"It is unlawful for the owner of a drug store to leave the same at any time in charge of any person not a duly licensed and registered pharmacist. * * *

"Any sale of drugs by an unregistered clerk from which injury proceeds is prima facie evidence of negligence."

"The court instructs you as a matter of law that if you find from the evidence that the defendants sold or permitted to be sold to the plaintiffs any drugs * * * by an unregistered pharmacist * * * and such * * * drug so sold to plaintiff was the approximate cause of the injury complained of, then * * * the court instructs you that as a matter of law the defendants were guilty of negligence."

An examination of the transcript of the testimony shows that there was absolutely no evidence in the record to which these instructions could possibly be applicable except evidence relating to incidents which were barred by the statute. With these instructions given to the jury, and with the large amount of evidence appearing in the record which was inadmissible and most prejudicial to which they refer, we are not impressed with the argument that the general instruction to the effect that no recovery could be had for negligence occurring prior to June 8, 1921, corrected the erroneous impressions given to the jury.

The error in the admission of this testimony is not within the scope of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution; it permeates the entire fabric of the case, and it appears to be very probable that the jury arrived at their verdict by reason of the very facts which furnished no basis for a recovery.

The judgment is reversed.

FIRPO v. MURPHY et al. (Civ. 5000.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 1, 1925.)

1. Brokers ⇐42—Statute regulating licensing of salesmen construed.

St. 1919, p. 1252, and amendment St. 1921, p. 1294, are construed to be for protection of the public and under the various provisions of the act (St. 1919, p. 1256, § 10, subd. 4, and sections 1, 2, 17-20, and section 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1295, § 1), real estate broker is charged with knowledge of whether his salesman has a license, and no business can be conducted by broker through a salesman until a license is procured by him, or, where there has been a change in the employment of the salesman, a reissue of his license.

2. Contracts ⇐107—Statute made for protection of public renders contract in violation thereof void.

A contract in violation of a statute made for the protection of the public is void, and a penalty prescribed for a violation of such statute is the equivalent of an express prohibition and renders a contract in violation thereof void.

3. Brokers ⇐42—Commission not recoverable when made through unlicensed salesman.

Where real estate broker employed salesman who had been duly licensed as a salesman for another firm, but who was not licensed as employee of broker, broker could not recover commission for securing of lessees of apartment house through such salesman, in view of act regulating brokers and salesmen (St. 1919, p. 1252, amended by St. 1921, p. 1294).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by E. Firpo against Leland S. Murphy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover a broker's commission. The complaint recites that defendants became indebted to plaintiff's assignors, Rucker & Tarp, a copartnership, in the sum of $770 for and as a commission for the securing of lessees of a certain apartment house.

The complaint was demurred to upon the ground that it did not sufficiently appear therefrom whether, at the time the alleged cause of action arose, plaintiff's assignor or its salesman, who handled the transaction, were duly licensed under and pursuant to the provisions of the act of the Legislature regulating such brokers and salesmen, approved May 27, 1919. Stats. 1919, p. 1252, amended in 1921; Stats. 1921, pp. 1294, 1295. The demurrer was overruled.

Defendants, answering, denied specifically the allegations of the complaint, and as a second defense alleged on information and belief that neither plaintiff's assignor nor its salesman, who it is alleged rendered the entire services, had a registered license to transact business under or pursuant to the act mentioned. Judgment went in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

It is admitted that a tenant was obtained and a lease executed. As ground for reversal, however, defendants claim that, as the evidence shows without conflict that the transaction was handled by a salesman employed by Rucker & Tarp, who held no license, that plaintiff therefore cannot recover, as the contract is unlawful and contrary to the policy of express law. They also claim that, as the contract was not in writing, no recovery can be had thereon. Lack of evidence to sustain the amount of the judgment is also assigned as error. If there is merit in defendants' first contention, the other objections raised become unimportant. The evidence shows without conflict that one Thomas L. Ricks was employed by Rucker & Tarp as a salesman. He had previously been employed as such by another firm in the year 1922, and was duly licensed as a salesman for such firm. He entered the employ of Rucker & Tarp about October or November of that year, but no surrender of his license as a salesman of his former employer was ever had as provided for by statute. Under his new employment he acted as salesman to negotiate leases and the sale of real estate. In the performance of these duties he procured employment from defendant Murphy to obtain a tenant for a certain apartment house owned by him. He was instructed by his employers to carry on the negotiations between the parties and come to an agreement. The only connection that Rucker & Tarp, his employers, had in the transaction was that they kept in touch with the negotiations as reported by Ricks.

After the tenant had been obtained and the lease executed, there was a dispute between the owner and Rucker as to the amount of the compensation to be paid; there being no express agreement by the parties upon the subject. There is evidence in the record to show that Murphy was willing to pay the sum of $500, but objected to paying the amount equivalent to the first month's rent which it seems was the rate fixed by the real estate board's schedule. The negotiations for the lease were commenced in December, 1922, and they were completed and the lease executed on January 26, 1923. At no time during this period did Mr. Ricks hold a license in accordance with the terms of the statute hereinafter referred to. Ricks made no attempt during the month of January, 1923, to obtain a salesman's license for that year, nor until the following February, nearly a month after the transaction was closed. It may be said in passing that licenses under the act automatically expire at the close of each calendar year. They do not run from year to year, but a new license is issued for each year. If no application, therefore, is made on or before January 1st, a salesman has no license for the coming calendar year merely because he held one during the preceding year. Stats. 1919, p. 1256, § 10, subd. 4.

Other provisions of the act controlling the situation are as follows: Section 1, defining real estate brokers and salesmen, provides in substance that it shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, or corporation to engage in the business or act in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman in this state without first obtaining a license therefor. Section 2 defines a real estate salesman, among other things, to be one who is employed by a broker or others in their interest "to lease or offer to lease" any real estate "as a whole or partial vocation." By section 17 of the act it is made a criminal offense to act as such salesman without a license. Section 18 makes it unlawful for any licensed broker to pay a commission for performing any of the acts specified to any person who is not a licensed broker or salesman. Section 19 permits the commissioner to temporarily suspend or permanently revoke a license for a violation of certain provisions of the act. Section 20 denies to any person, copartnership, or corporation engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman the right to maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section 2 without alleging and proving that such person, copartnership, or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose. Section 11, as amended (Stats. 1921, p. 1295, § 1), provides that the license of both broker and salesman shall be "prominently displayed" in the office of the broker, and that the license authorizes business only at the location named in the license; it further provides that the salesman's license shall remain in the possession of the employing broker until it is canceled or the employment terminated; that, when the salesman leaves the broker's employ, the broker shall return the salesman's license to the commissioner for cancellation. It also declares that a change of location without notification to the commissioner, and the issuance of a new license, automatically cancels the license previously issued.

[1] It is therefore manifest from the various provisions of the act that the law charges the employer with knowledge of the fact whether his salesman has or has not a license, and contemplates that no business can be conducted by a broker through a salesman acting in his behalf until a license is procured by him or reissued when there has been a change in the employment of the salesman. The statute in question is one designed for the protection of the public. It is in keeping with the statutes of a similar character regulating the pawnbrokerage business, and certain professions.

[2] Whenever a statute is made for the protection of the public, a contract in violation of its provisions is void. The pawnbrokers act provides that it is a misdemeanor to carry on the business of pawnbroker without a license. Pen. Code, §§ 338, 339.

While there is no express declaration in these sections that the transactions condemned are unlawful, or that no recovery shall be had thereon in the event that the provisions are violated, still it has been held that they, being designed for the protection of the public, and a penalty prescribed for a violation thereof, that such penalty is the equivalent of an express prohibition, and that a contract made contrary to the terms thereof is void, and further that whenever the illegality appears, whether the evidence comes from one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. Levinson v. Boas, 150 Cal. 185, 88 P. 825, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 661.

So, also, it has been held that a physician or surgeon, who is employed before he has procured the certificate required by the laws of this state regulating the practice of medicine, cannot recover any compensation for the services rendered before the procuring of the certificate upon any contract, express or implied, the contract being illegal and against public policy.

The principle is in accord with the positive provisions of our Civil Code, which makes that unlawful which is either contrary to the express provision of law or contrary to the policy of express law, though not in terms prohibited. Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 P. 880; Civ. Code, § 1667.

The rule is universally established that, where a broker fails to procure the license required by law to carry on his business, he cannot recover commissions for acts as such. Whitfield v. Huling, 50 Ill. App. 179; Richardson v. Brix, 94 Iowa, 626, 63 N. W. 325; Yount v. Denning, 52 Kan. 629, 35 P. 207; Buckley v. Humason, 50 Minn. 195, 52 N. W. 385, 16 L. R. A. 423, 36 Am. St. Rep. 637.

In some of the states courts have allowed the recovery of a commission by a non-licensed broker where the license laws are enacted solely as revenue measures, in which case it has been held that such laws have no effect on the rights of the parties inter se.

[3] That situation is not here presented. The cause of action here relied upon is founded on the violation of a state law. Plaintiff's assignor, having carried on its business in violation of law, any rights arising out of such unlawful transaction, can form no proper cause of action.

Counsel for respondent seeks to avoid the effect of his rule by claiming that, plaintiff's assignor, having so far as it was concerned complied with the requirement of the act with reference to its license, its assignee can properly maintain the action. If such a contention could be maintained, it would in a measure destroy the very purpose of the creation of the act.

The partnership did violate the law in failing to see to it that its salesman had a license before it permitted him to do business in its behalf. The interest of the copartnership in the transaction is tainted with all the illegality which the statute gives to it, and the assignee takes the cause of action subject to its infirmities.

The judgment is reversed.

CONSOLIDATED PIPE CO. v. SAME.
(Civ. 4370.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1925.)

1. Mines and minerals — 117—Lien claimant held not entitled to prosecute judgment against owner.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, gives one performing labor and furnishing materials, in connection with drilling of oil well on leased property, only a lien on owner's property, and does not impose a personal liability on owner.

2. Mortgages — 151(3)—Rights under trust deed, recorded before mechanic's lien, held superior to that of lien claimant.

Where trust deed was of record before labor and material liens of plaintiffs under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, attached to property held that, under section 1186, rights of trustees and beneficiary under trust deed were superior to that of plaintiffs' lien.

Consolidated actions to foreclose mechanics' liens by Sam Beard and the Consolidated Pipe Company against the Lancaster Midway Oil Company and others. From decrees of foreclosure, which denied personal judgment against owners, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bowker & Sheridan, of Ventura, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In these consolidated actions, the plaintiffs obtained a decree foreclosing liens held by them, under the Mechanic's Lien Law, on account of work done and labor furnished in performance of contracts made by the plaintiffs with defendant Lancaster Midway Oil Company in connection with the drilling of an oil well on property leased to the company. The lease was made by defendants Francesco Vacca, Giuseppe Vacca, and Pasquale Vacca, who owned the property subject to a recorded deed of trust made by the owners to defendants Gianini and Pedrini, as trustees under a deed of trust given to secure a loan made to the owners by defendant Bank of Italy. The plaintiffs have appealed from those portions of the decree of foreclosure, whereby the court refused to allow a personal judgment against the defendant owners of the land, and from that portion of the decree, which adjudged the right, claim, or lien of the defendant Bank of Italy, under its deed of trust, to be prior and superior to the liens of the plaintiffs.

[1] In support of their demand for personal judgment against the owners of the land, appellants rely upon that part of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure which, after stating that persons, performing labor upon a mining claim, or upon any real property worked as a mine, have a lien thereon for the value of such work or labor done or materials furnished, declares that every contractor or other person, having charge of any mining or work or labor performed in and about such property, either as lessee or under a working bond or contract thereon, "shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter."

We are satisfied that the effect of said section 1183 is limited to the establishment of a lien upon the owner's property, under the stated conditions, and does not extend to the point of imposing personal liability upon the owner as a party to the contract. There is nothing in the decisions cited (Higgins v. Carlotta Gold Mining Co., 148 Cal. 700, 81 P. 758, 113 Am. St. Rep. 344; McClung v. Paradise Gold Mining Co., 164 Cal. 517, 129 P. 774) tending to support the contention that the owners are made personally liable for the debt.

[2] The trust deed was recorded prior to the execution of the lease, and prior to the transactions between appellants and the oil company. The fact, that the Bank of Italy, by its vice president, indorsed on the lease a consent to the execution and delivery of the lease, did not constitute a waiver of the priority of its lien as against persons furnishing labor or materials to the lessee.

The trust deed being of record before the liens of appellants attached to the property, the prior right of the trustees and of the bank is clearly recognized by section 1186, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides only that "the liens provided for in this chapter" are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the structure was commenced or work done or materials were commenced to be furnished, and to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance of which the lienholder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time when the structure was commenced, work done, or materials commenced to be furnished. We have found no reason or authority tending to support the claim of appellants that the provisions of said section 1186 do not apply to claims like the present claims, arising under section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOLDENER et al. v. HOWARD. (Civ. 4913.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 15, 1925.)

I. Appeal and error ⇨907(3)—Findings of trial court are binding on appeal on judgment roll, where evidence not in record.

Implication that vendor was obligated to put vendee in possession of premises on exercise of option to purchase was overcome, where on appeal on judgment roll it appeared that trial court had found that option to purchase the land had been given subject to rights of a tenant in possession; there being no evidence before the appellate court, the findings of the trial court must be taken as true.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨334(5)—Amount paid for option agreement held not recoverable on failure to exercise option.

A written contract was executed giving an option to purchase certain real estate and the consideration therefor paid. At the time the option matured the possessory rights were in a tenant. Held, that under the findings of the trial court that it was not intended by the agreement to provide for possession of the premises upon the exercise of the option, which was never exercised, though vendor was ready, able, and willing to perform, the amount paid for the option could not be recovered on the ground of want of consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Ferdinand Holdener and another against Edward A. Howard. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Cary Howard, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover the sum of $500 paid by plaintiffs upon an option to purchase certain lands.

The complaint in substance alleges that defendant on December 5, 1919, entered into a written contract with plaintiffs and one Dettling whereby in consideration of the sum of $500 he agreed to give such parties the right, privilege, and option to purchase on May 5, 1920, for the sum of $24,700, certain real estate, upon terms set forth in the option agreement. Plaintiffs and Dettling were engaged in the dairy business and in the conduct thereof owned a large herd of milk-producing cattle, and were desirous of purchasing the property for use in their business. The complaint recites it was intended by the agreement to provide for the possession of the property, and that defendant was so informed and knew that the proposed purchasers did not and would not desire to acquire the land or any part thereof except that they would obtain immediate possession upon the exercise of the option.

It is then alleged that plaintiffs knew that there was some party other than defendant in possession of the lands either as tenant or otherwise, and that they were informed that defendant would be able to oust the tenant and obtain possession of the premises prior to May 5, 1920. That, believing such statement, the sum of $500 was paid by them for the purchase of the option, and that defendant thereafter commenced a suit to recover the possession of the property, but judgment went against him; the tenant's right to possession in the premises being established in him up to and including September 30, 1920—a period beyond the time fixed for possession under the option agreement. Then follows an allegation of assignment by Dettling of his interest in the agreement to plaintiffs.

Defendant, answering, admitted that the parties entered into a written contract whereby, in consideration of the sum of $500, he did give to plaintiffs and Dettling an option to purchase the lands in question in accordance with the terms of a written agreement, and not otherwise.

The answer denies that the contract provided for or was intended to provide for possession of the premises by the proposed purchasers upon the exercise of the option, and it avers oral negotiations preceding its execution to the effect that the proposed purchasers well knew that a tenant was in possession thereof, and that the lease under which he held had not by its terms then expired, and that the option agreement was entered into subject to the possessory rights of the tenant.

The trial court found, among other things, in substance that it was not true, as alleged in the complaint, that it was ever intended to provide for possession of the premises by the vendees upon the exercise of the option to purchase, but, on the contrary, defendant informed them that he would and could not make any agreement as to possession, and that the option was given subject to the possessory rights of the tenant of which rights they were thoroughly familiar.

The judgment was that the plaintiffs take nothing by the action.

Plaintiffs appeal on the judgment roll alone, and they claim that the findings do not support the judgment. The option agreement contained, among others, provisions to the effect that plaintiffs should keep the premises insured and pay the taxes on the lands, and that they would not nor permit any other person to commit waste or damage to the buildings located on the premises or to the wood or standing timber located on the land. Appellant argues that these provisions clearly indicate that possession at the time of the exercise of the option was contemplated by the parties, as it would be unreasonable to require the plaintiffs to pay the insurance and taxes and protect the buildings and timber from damage and waste unless they were to be entitled to the use and enjoyment of the property.

In support of this contention we are cited to the case of Pierce v. Edwards, 150 Cal. 650, 89 P. 600. It is there held in substance that a written contract for the sale and purchase of real estate which by its terms provides that the vendor agrees to sell certain land to the vendee for a specified sum and to deliver the same on a specified date, and the vendee agrees to take the land and pay the amount so specified, imposes the obligation on the vendor to put the vendee in the actual physical possession of the land, and until such possession is tendered the vendee is not in default. It is there further held that the fact that the purchaser knew at the time of the contract that the land was in the possession of the tenants cannot be considered in construing the contract so as to make the obligation to deliver one subject to the lease.

[1] Here, however, the findings of the trial court expressly negative any such implication. Defendants by answer set forth the oral negotiations surrounding the execution of the agreement. As the evidence is not before us, we must take the findings as true. Appellants further claim that there was a total failure of consideration, as the defendant was at no time in a position to make delivery upon the day stipulated by reason of the existence of the lease.

It is true that a vendor must be ready at all times during the life of an option contract to convey an unclouded title, and that he cannot insist upon a forfeiture if he is unable to perform the contract on his part for want of title, as there is in such a case a complete failure of consideration.

[2] Here, however, there is an express finding that the contract set forth in the complaint did not nor was it intended to provide for possession of the premises upon the exercise of the option which the trial court further found was never exercised, although defendant was ready, able, and willing at all times to perform.

The claim of appellants, therefore, that they were entitled to actual possession is contrary to the express findings on the subject, which in the absence of evidence, are here controlling.

All the allegations of the complaint which are essential to plaintiffs' right to recover are found by the trial court to be untrue.

There being no evidence before us, these findings must be taken as true.

This being so, it follows that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

3. Payment ⚡41(1)—Law will make applications of indefinite payments in manner most just and equitable.

Where indefinite payments are made by a debtor to a creditor, to whom he owes different obligations, and neither party makes any application of payments, law will make application most just and equitable.

4. Payment ⚡42—Court held to have properly applied payment, received by assignee of contract of sale, to interest owing assignor; "prorate;" "adjust."

Under assignment of contract of sale of real property, providing that it was subject to a "prorating of interest, * * * to be adjusted when interest is received," where certain sum was placed to credit of assignee, without any directions whatsoever, held that, under Civ.

Code, § 1479, court properly construed provision to mean that interest should be paid as soon as assignee received sufficient moneys on contract to discharge it; "prorate" meaning to distribute, as well as allot, and "adjust" meaning to fix, to arrange, to ascertain and settle.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Richard A. Joy and another against Arthur F. Rousseau. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing & Wild, of Fresno, and Gavin McNab and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This action was begun to secure judgment for the sum of $7,035.28 on account of interest accrued on a certain contract of sale of real property from the last prior interest date to the date of the assignment of the contract of sale; said sum being claimed as the pro rata to which the plaintiffs were entitled out of payments aggregating the sum of $15,000. The record discloses the following:

On or about March 8, 1918, one Dr. Charles M. Pusey, being the owner of a certain vineyard situate in the county of Fresno, contracted with Alfreda Verwoert for the sale thereof for the sum of $123,000, payable in installments. On the 30th day of July, 1919, the said Verwoert agreed to sell, subject to the first-named contract, the same real property to George Noroian for the sum of $200,000, payable in installments. On or about August 12, 1920, the said George Noroian, by an instrument in writing agreed, subject to the previous contracts, to sell and convey the same property to the Planters' Company, a corporation, for the sum of $365,000, payable partly in cash, the remainder in installments. Thereafter and prior to the transactions had with the defendant herein, the said George Noroian transferred his interest in the agreement herein referred to and the profits to be received therefrom to the plaintiff Richard A. Joy. Thereafter, and on or about the 7th day of April, 1921, the said Richard A. Joy sold and transferred to the defendant Arthur F. Rousseau, all and singular, his interests in and to said lands and premises; the contract relating thereto and the profits to be realized therefrom. In the agreement executed between the plaintiffs and the defendant there appears the following:

"In consideration of the payment and agreements herein contained by said party of the first part, said parties of the second part agree to transfer and assign by good and sufficient instruments, such as may be required by counsel of the party of the first part, all the right, title, and interest of George Noroian, and his wife, derived by them under said agreement, dated July 30, 1919, and all the benefits to be derived by said George Noroian and his wife, pursuant to said agreement of August 12, 1920, hereby guaranteeing that such interests shall be in accordance with the representations herein contained and shall be subject to the provisions of said agreements of March 8, 1918, July 30, 1919, and August 12, 1920, and subject to a prorating of interest on said last-named agreement as of this date, to be adjusted when interest is received."

Thereafter, and during the months of August and September, there was deposited with the French-American Bank, to the credit of the defendant Arthur F. Rousseau, the sum of $15,000, by one E. Y. Foley, to which the Planters' Company had assigned the crops growing on the premises covered by the agreement to that value, with the direction to deposit the same to the credit of the defendant. After learning of the deposit of said sums to the credit of the defendant, the plaintiffs demanded of the defendant payment of interest on the assigned contract, calculated up to the date of the assignment thereof, claiming that the contract provided for such payment. The defendant, alleging that he had received no amounts as interest, declined payment, and thereupon the plaintiffs instituted this suit and recovered judgment for the amount claimed. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The whole controversy hinges around the interpretation of the following words in the clause of the contract heretofore quoted, to wit:

"And subject to a prorating of interest on said last-named agreement as of this date, to be adjusted when interest is received."

The court interpreted these words to mean that payment of the interest accrued on the agreement transferred and assigned by the plaintiffs to the defendant should be paid as soon as the defendant received sufficient moneys on said contract to discharge the same. On the part of the defendant it is contended that the accrued interest on the contract at the date of the assignment was not to be paid until he, the defendant, had received from the Planters' Company moneys specifically paid as interest. The $15,000 herein referred to was paid by Foley from the proceeds of the crop grown by the Planters' Company to the French-American Bank, and directed to be placed to the credit of the defendant without any directions whatsoever. The testimony in the transcript, we think, shows that no designation or further application of such payments had been made by the defendant at the time of the beginning of this action. It appears that some time elapsed, after said moneys were deposited to the credit of the defendant, before the defendant knew the exact amount thereof. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff claiming one interpretation of the contract, and the defendant a different one, oral testimony was introduced and admitted of the surrounding circumstances of the transaction and of the conversations which took place between the plaintiff Richard A. Joy and the defendant, at the time of the execution of the contract, and at the time the words which we are considering were inserted in the contract. It appears, from an inspection of the record and by the testimony, that the contract, as first drawn, did not contain the last-quoted words; but the same were inserted by the defendant, at the time the conversation was had concerning the prorating of the interest and the time of its payment. The transcript shows that, at the time of the execution of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff, Richard A. Joy, asked the defendant: "What about the interest I am to receive? Didn't you agree to pay me the interest on this contract?" The defendant replied: "Yes; we have agreed that I should pay this interest to Mr. Joy." Mr. Joy then asked, "When am I to get this interest?" and the defendant answered, "As soon as there is any money paid, I will give you your money." There was some other testimony as to prorating the attorney's fees, etc., which is immaterial here.

[1, 2] The defendant claims that this testimony is not admissible, under the rule that a written contract cannot be altered by parol evidence. In relying upon this contention, we think the appellant has misconceived the purpose of the testimony. Where the language used is ambiguous, or fairly susceptible of either one of two interpretations contended for, such testimony is always admissible for the purpose of construing the agreement, according to the true intent of the parties at the time of its execution. Under this rule, not only the surrounding circumstances, but the conversations of the parties, may be introduced in evidence and considered by the court. In Balfour v. Fresno C. & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876, this question is fully considered and the law thus stated:

"For the purpose of determining what the parties intended by the language used, it is competent to show not only the circumstances under which the contract was made, but also to prove that the parties intended and understood the language in the sense contended for; and for that purpose the conversation between and the declarations of the parties during the negotiations at and before the time of the execution of the contract may be shown"—citing Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1860, 1861; Atlanta v. Schmeltzer, 83 Ga. 609, 10 S. E. 543; Keller v. Webb, 125 Mass. 88, 28 Am. Rep. 209; Long v. Long, 44 Mo. App. 141; Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365, 3 Am. Rep. 471.

The rule also seems to be that, where the debtor has made no designation, the creditor, if entitled to make application, must make the application before suit is brought. Haynes v. Waite, 14 Cal. 446; United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. Ed. 199; Pierce v. Knight, 31 Vt. 701. The court, not only interpreted the contract according to the expressed views of the parties at the time of the execution of the agreement, but also followed, as fully as may be, the provisions of section 1479 of the Civil Code, wherein it is specified that the court shall make application of payments, where the parties have not so done, as follows: (1) Of interest due at the time of the performance; (2) of principal due at that time; (3) of the obligation earliest in date of maturity; (4) of an obligation not secured by a lien or collateral undertaking; (5) of an obligation secured by a lien or collateral undertaking.

On the part of the appellant it is contended that the court had no authority so to do. To support this allegation considerable argument is made upon the meaning of the word "due," it being contended that there was not any interest due on the contract in question, either at the time of the assignment thereof, or at the time of the deposit of the said $15,000 to the credit of the defendant. It is true that the time of payment of either interest or of any installment of principal had not arrived, when the moneys just referred to were so deposited to the credit of the defendant. That date was fixed at a considerable time subsequent to the receipt of the $15,000. The word "due" has a double meaning. In 19 Corpus Juris, p. 818, we find the following definition given of this word:

"According to the consensus of judicial opinion, the word has a double meaning: (1) That the debt or obligation to which it applied has by contract or operation of law become immediately payable; (2) a simple indebtedness, without reference to the time of payment, in which it is synonymous with 'owing,' and includes all debts, whether payable in present or in futuro. In its larger sense the word is often used to cover liabilities, matured and unmatured, or as importing an existing obligation, whether the time of payment has arrived or not."

To the same effect are a number of other definitions there given, and numerous authorities cited in support thereof. See, also, Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Carle, 133 Cal. 409, 65 P. 951, where the double meaning of the word is also considered. A somewhat similar case is presented in that of Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 P. 514. The note there involved was dated June 25, 1885, and the interest made payable annually. On October 10th of the same year the defendant paid $800 on the note without anything being said as to whether the same should be applied to the interest or principal. The court said:

"Conceding, in favor of the defendant, that the payment was to be applied first to the interest, it will be so only as to interest up to the date of the payment. The balance of the payment must be applied to the principal. The law will not apply it to future or unearned interest."

In the case at bar, at the time of payment, the interest claimed by the plaintiffs had been entirely earned. In 30 Cyc. 1249, § 11, the text, in relation to interest where payments are made without designation or election, reads:

"Except where otherwise agreed, a payment made on an indebtedness consisting of principal and interest, not applied by either the debtor or creditor, will be applied first to the interest due and then to the principal. If neither principal nor interest is due, some cases hold that the payment must be applied to the principal, but the weight of authority holds that it should be applied to the extinguishment of principal and such proportion of interest as has accrued on the principal so extinguished."

And further, where the rights of third parties are involved, the text reads:

"So, where the court is called upon to appropriate payments, the equities of third persons, although not controlling, should be considered. Of course, the parties cannot apply a payment to an invalid debt," etc.

[3] In Murdock v. Clarke, 88 Cal. 384, 26 P. 601, the court holds that, where the rules prescribed by section 1479 of the Civil Code are not sufficient, the application must be made according to equitable principles. The law is thus stated:

"It is the settled rule in this country, wherever the common law prevails, that where indefinite payments are made by a debtor to his creditor, to whom he owes different obligations, and neither party makes any application of the payments, the law will make the application in such a manner, in view of all the circumstances of the case, as is most just and equitable, and will best protect and maintain the rights of both parties,"—citing a number of cases.

[4] We think in this case an equitable application of the rules set forth in section 1479 of the Civil Code has been made. Were we to hold otherwise, it would be possible for the entire principal of the contract to be paid, and the plaintiffs debarred from obtaining or collecting a cent of the interest agreed to be paid them under the terms of the contract which we have quoted. The words "pro rata" and "adjusted" have double meanings. The word "prorate" means to distribute as well as allot. In the agreement under consideration, the active form of the word is used, the expression being "prorating of interest." The word "adjust" means to fix, to arrange, to ascertain and settle, and, "when used in reference to a liquidated claim, it has the meaning of settle in the sense of pay." 1 C. J. 1247.

For the purpose of ascertaining also the meaning in which these words were used, we think the oral testimony hereinbefore referred to was admissible. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; JONES, Justice pro tem.

CURRAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR FRESNO COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 5167.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 13, 1925.)

1. Contempt ⚡54(1)—Affidavit supporting order to show cause held not required.

Order to show cause why attorney should not be punished for contempt of court while cross-examining witness need not be supported by affidavit, because not served until after close of trial, where based on facts within immediate knowledge of court, who delayed action only because of possible prejudicial effect on jury.

2. Contempt ⚡63(4)—Facts on which attorney was adjudged guilty of contempt held fully stated in court's order.

All facts on which defendant's attorney was adjudged guilty of contempt of court while cross-examining witness in criminal case held stated, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1211, in court's order containing questions asked by him, district attorney's objections, court's remarks and orders, his replies, objections, and assignments of error in full, and court's findings.

3. Contempt ⚡6—Language of exception to court's remarks held not contemptuous.

Attorney's statement, "I take exceptions to your honor's remarks and assign them as error," following court's statement that it was entirely unbecoming for attorney to use word "guess" in questions to witness being cross-examined by him, held not contemptuous, but within his legal right and duty.

4. Contempt ⚡20—Attorney's refusal to obey court's order to be seated, and conduct further cross-examination of witness from chair, held not contempt.

Attorney held not guilty of contempt in refusing to obey court's order to be seated, and conduct further cross-examination of witness from chair.

5. Evidence ⚡42—Judicial notice of necessity of movement of counsel between his desk and witness stand in examining witness.

That examination of witness often requires near approach of counsel and movement between his desk and witness stand are matters of common knowledge, of which appellate court takes judicial notice.

6. Contempt ⚡67—No presumptions or intendments against petitioner for certiorari to annul order adjudging him guilty of contempt.

No presumptions or intendments can be indulged against petitioner on certiorari to annul order adjudging him guilty of contempt of court.

7. Contempt ⚡6—Attorney held not guilty of contempt in standing and walking between court and jury while cross-examining witness, after court ordered him to be seated.

That attorney, after court directed him to be seated and conduct further cross-examination of witness from chair, stood and walked between court and jury during such examination, held not to warrant order adjudging him guilty of contempt of court, in absence of finding that acts were done in disorderly, contemptuous, or insulting manner, where witness was seated between court and jury.

8. Contempt ⚡6—Intonation of voice and vehemence of, or physical attitude in, making objections insufficient to support order adjudging counsel guilty of contempt.

Intonations of voice, vehemence of objections, or physical attitude in making them, in hotly contested criminal case, will not alone support order adjudging defendant's counsel guilty of contempt of court, where occasion and language used were proper.

Certiorari by Frank Curran to review and annul an order of the Superior Court in and for Fresno County and Denver S. Church, Judge thereof, adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt of court. Judgment annulled and vacated.

Richard K. Stewart, F. E. Cook, B. M. Benson, and Frank Curran, all of Fresno, and Frank J. Blake, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. R. Lovejoy, Dist. Atty., and C. M. Ozias, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Fresno, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Petitioner was by the superior court of Fresno county adjudged guilty of contempt of court and ordered to be punished by the imposition of a fine in the sum of $100 and imprisoned in the county jail of that county for the period of one day. Petitioner contends that the court, in so adjudging and punishing him, exceeded its jurisdiction, and by this proceeding asks this court to review and annul the action of the superior court.

The alleged contempt occurred on February 19, 1925, during the trial of the case of the People v. Griffin, a criminal action, in which defendant Griffin was charged with a felony, and who was represented as counsel by petitioner. The record shows that during the cross-examination by petitioner of a witness for the prosecution certain questions were asked by petitioner, certain answers given by the witness, and that certain proceedings were had by the court, which were as follows:

"Q. Now, after you went on this dirt road, where did you go? A. Went back to the store.

"Q. Now, wait a minute. You say you went on this dirt road a mile and a half? A. Yes.

"Q. That is another one of your guesses, isn't it? A. I don't understand you.

"Q. That is another one of your guesses, isn't it? A. Well, I know the county pretty well.

"Q. I mean, as to distance? A. It would have to be approximately.

"Q. It might have been more? A. It might have been a little bit more, or a little bit less.

"Q. You have no way of fixing that at all? A. Not without actually measuring it.

"Q. You didn't actually measure it? A. No.

"Q. After you were on the dirt road, where did you go? A. I came back onto the pavement in the city of Clovis.

"Q. How far was that from the dirt road when you struck the—rather, how far was it from the city when you struck that pavement that leads into Clovis? A. The streets are paved on Fifth street two blocks east of the railroad track; across the railroad track it is not paved, and we strike the pavement again in the city proper.

"Q. How far was it from the city of Clovis that you came on the paved highway that you speak about? A. It was within the city limits.

"Q. It was within the city limits? A. Yes.

"Q. All right. How long were you with Mr. Whiton? A. About 15 or 20 minutes, perhaps.

"Q. About 15 or 20 minutes? A. Yes.

"Q. Is that a guess? A. That is a guess; yes.

"Q. Now, whereabouts was it that you met this car that you speak of? A. It was on what we call the Flume road.

"Q. It was on what you call the Flume road? A. Yes.

"Q. Is that a paved road? A. No.

"Q. Was it the Flume road that I asked you about, the name of that dirt road, that you said you didn't know? A. No, sir.

"Q. You were on some other road besides the highway and the dirt road? A. I have given you the four roads that I was on.

"Q. What was that third road that you were on, then? A. The third road, the third turn we made, brought us onto the Flume road.

"Q. How far did you travel on that? A. About a mile and a half to a mile and three-quarters, approximately.

"Q. That is another one of your guesses, isn't it? A. Yes.

"Q. All right. How far had you been traveling on that Flume road before you came by this car? A. Approximately half a mile.

"Q. That is another guess? A. Yes.

"Mr. Lovejoy: If the court please, I object to that kind of language to the witness, 'That is another guess.'

"The Court: It is entirely unbecoming to an attorney to use that language to a witness.

"Mr. Curran: I take exception to your honor's remarks, and assign them as error.

"The Court: You sit down in that chair while you are questioning the witness.

"Mr. Curran: I have a perfect right to stand up, and I assign your honor's remarks as error, and prejudicial to this defendant.

"The Court: Will you sit down?"

"Mr. Curran: The Supreme Court has said that I have a perfect right to stand up, and I will not sit down. I will conduct this cross-examination on my feet, as is customary.

"The Court: After the court is adjourned this evening, you remain in court.

"Mr. Curran: All right.

"Q. Now, what was the last question before I was interrupted?"

At the time of the adjournment of court on that day, the court by order continued further consideration of the matter until the conclusion of the trial of the criminal case. This trial terminated on February 25, 1925. Petitioner had withdrawn from the criminal case on the same day of the incident described, and during the further proceedings in the trial was not present in court. Defendant Griffin was found guilty by verdict of the jury, and on February 28, 1925, the judgment of the court in that case was pronounced. Thereafter on the 2d day of March, 1925, the court made its order, directing that a citation—which was not supported by affidavit—be issued, requiring petitioner to appear before the court on March 6, 1925, "to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court for contemptuous and offensive conduct in open court and in the presence of the court while engaged in the cross-examination of Henry F. Good on the 19th day of February, 1925." On March 6, 1925, the matter was regularly continued to March 7, 1925, when petitioner appeared before the court, and, after a hearing, the court made its order in writing, the material part of which, after reciting the facts and the portion of the stenographic report of the examination of the witness Good hereinbefore set forth, was as follows:

"From said statements so made by you at that time in open court and to the court, the court finds that the said statements above outlined were disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent to the court on your part; that the same were made during the sitting of this court, and in the immediate presence and view of the court, and directly tended to interrupt the proceedings of said court, and to impair the respect due to the authority of said court. The court further finds that said statements addressed to the court were spoken in a very loud, combative, and antagonistic tone of voice, and that by reason of said statements so made and expressed by you the court finds that said attitude and intonations and loud expressions by you were disorderly, contemptuous, and insulting to the court, and were made during the sitting of this court, and in the immediate presence and view of this court, and directly tended to interrupt its proceedings and to impair the respect due to its authority. And the court further finds that at said time, notwithstanding the court ordered you to sit down and proceed with the cross-examination of said witness, that you not only refused to do so, as mentioned above, but that you did not obey the order of the court in that respect, but continued for a period of 20 minutes to remain on your feet, and to stand and walk in a position directly between the position of the court and the jury; that said conduct was disorderly, contemptuous, and insulting to the court, and committed during the sitting of this court, and in the immediate view and presence of the court, and that the same directly tended to interrupt its proceedings and to impair the respect due to its authority."

Upon these findings the court adjudged petitioner to be guilty of contempt of court, and imposed the punishment mentioned, which judgment was entered in the minutes of the court. Petitioner thereupon filed in this court his petition for a writ of review, which was granted, made returnable on March 25, 1925, and the execution of the judgment of the superior court stayed pending the decision of this court.

[1] Several objections are made by petitioner to the sufficiency of the proceedings leading up to the judgment of the court. It is contended by petitioner that the court, by failing to act at the time when the alleged contempt occurred and to then adjudge petitioner to be in contempt, lost jurisdiction to proceed summarily against petitioner, and that any subsequent proceedings, based on an occurrence in the immediate view and presence of the court, must be founded upon an affidavit filed and an order to show cause or attachment issued. No affidavit was filed in this case, but the matter was regularly continued to the close of the trial, and the court two days thereafter caused to be issued and served the citation mentioned above.

The occurrence on which the contempt proceeding was based was in the immediate view and presence of the court. The action of the court thereon, as shown by the record, was delayed only by the situation created by the pendency of the trial mentioned above and a proper consideration of the possible prejudicial effect on the jury of a further reference to the matter during the trial. The action of the court thereafter was timely. The order to show cause was based on facts within the immediate knowledge of the court, and needed no affidavit to support it, and the court, as to the form and manner of its procedure, retained jurisdiction to act. Lamberson v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 458, 91 P. 100, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619.

[2] Petitioner also contends that the order of the court does not recite the facts on which petitioner is thereby adjudged guilty of contempt of court. Section 1211, Code Civ. Proc. The order, the material portions of which are set forth in this opinion, contains the questions asked by petitioner of the witness, the objections by the district attorney, the remarks and orders of the court, the replies, objections, and assignments of error by petitioner in full, and also the finding by the trial court therein:

That the "statements addressed to the court [by petitioner] were spoken in a very loud, combative, and antagonistic tone of voice; * * * that said attitude and intonations and loud expressions by you were disorderly, contemptuous, and insulting to the court; * * * that at said time, notwithstanding the court ordered you to sit down and proceed with the cross-examination of said witness, you did not obey the order of the court in that respect, but continued for a period of 20 minutes to remain on your feet, and stand and walk in a position directly between the court and the jury; that said conduct was disorderly, contemptuous, and insulting to the court."

It thus appears that all the facts on which the court proceeded to judgment are set forth in the order, together with other statements which petitioner contends are conclusions not supported by facts shown by the record.

[3] Petitioner further contends that a consideration of the whole record shows that the acts of petitioner, which are made the basis of the contempt proceedings, do not constitute contempt. It is clear from a reading of the record that the questions addressed by petitioner to the witness were proper on cross-examination, were in no sense insulting or degrading, and the replies elicited directly tended to lessen the weight of the previous testimony of the witness. Nothing in the record shows that the physical attitude or acts of the petitioner up to the time when the district attorney interposed an objection to the use of the word "guess" in the questions by petitioner were in any way offensive to the court. Upon the objection, however, the court remarked to petitioner that "it is entirely unbecoming an attorney to use that language to the witness," upon which petitioner took an exception to the remark or ruling of the court in the following language:

"I take an exception to your honor's remarks, and assign them as error."

In so doing petitioner was entirely within his legal right and duty. It was necessary and proper for him to except to and assign as error any remark of the court which in his opinion tended to prejudice him or his client in the minds of the jurors, and we cannot say from the record that the exception was frivolous. The language used by petitioner was not in itself insulting, but was brief and directly to the point.

[4] Then followed immediately an order by the court, directed to petitioner, requiring him to be seated and conduct the further cross-examination of the witness from his chair. This order the petitioner refused to obey, as shown by the portion of the record hereinbefore set forth. No reason appears from the record for the order of the court requiring the petitioner to seat himself and conduct the examination from that position.

It has always been assumed that the orderly conduct of a trial permits, if not requires, counsel in presenting his case, whether directly to the court or jury, or indirectly to them through the examination of witnesses, to stand, if only as a mark of respect; indeed, the effective cross-examination of witnesses has been shown by experience to require that he do so; and we think that in the premises the order of the court was unconsciously in excess of its proper authority; that it was due to a momentary forgetfulness of the rights of the petitioner as an officer of the court in the discharge of his duty to his client and the public, and was not made necessary or proper by any preceding act or misconduct on the part of petitioner.

The California cases of In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 P. 478, and Platnauer v. Superior Court of Sacramento, 32 Cal. App. 463, 163 P. 237, present situations similar in fact to the case at bar. In each of these cases the petitioner had not, preceding the order of the court that he sit down, been guilty of any act, nor had any situation arisen at the trial, that made the order necessary or proper in the orderly conduct of the proceedings. The conclusions of the trial court in these cases that the conduct of petitioners was boisterous and offensive was held by the appellate court to mean no more than that petitioners persisted in addressing the court in violation of the order of the court, that the refusal was justified by the facts, and that petitioners were not guilty of contempt of court.

[5-7] The only remaining questions are whether the findings of the court—first, that after the order made by the court that petitioner be seated and conduct the examination of the witness while seated, petitioner "continued for a period of 20 minutes to stand and walk in a position directly between the position of the court and the jury"; and, second, the finding that the statements of the petitioner to the court "were spoken in a loud, combative, and antagonistic tone of voice"—are findings of fact which, in view of all the facts shown by the record, will support the judgment. We find from the record that the language used by the petitioner in his objections and assignments of error was altogether proper; his refusal to be seated and to conduct in that position the further examination of the witness, in the absence of other conduct making the order to be seated legally justifiable, were not facts upon which alone the court had jurisdiction to adjudge him guilty of contempt. That petitioner, in the further conduct of the examination after the court directed him to be seated, stood and walked between the court and the jury, might be a sufficient fact on which to predicate the judgment in this case, were it not also the fact that the witness under examination was seated between the court and the jury. That the examination of a witness often requires the near approach of counsel, and that such examination necessitates movement between the desk of counsel and the witness stand in the conduct of trials, are matters of common knowledge, and of which this court takes notice without proof. This, in connection with the rule that no presumptions or intendments can be indulged against petitioner, and that the court in its order does not find that the manner in which the acts were done was disorderly, contemptuous, or insulting to the court, but simply the fact of the doing of the acts was so, leads us to the conclusion that the facts found in this connection did not legally constitute contempt of court.

[8] The second finding, namely, that the remarks addressed by the petitioner to the court were spoken in a loud, combative, and contentious tone of voice, and that such loud expressions and intonations were disorderly, contemptuous, and insulting to the court, can refer only to the statements heretofore shown in the order and taken down by the shorthand reporter at the time. As the court said in the case of Platnauer v. Superior Court, supra, page 475, 163 P. 242:

"If, in discharging his duty, he [counsel] happens to be persistent or vehement, or both, in the presentation of his points, he is still, nevertheless, within his legitimate rights as an attorney, so long as his language is not offensive, or in contravention of the common rules of decorum and propriety."

While the courts in other jurisdictions have held that the tone of voice and attitude of counsel in making on proper occasions proper statements to the court may constitute contempt, yet we are reluctant to extend the rule farther than was done in the Platnauer and Shortridge Cases, supra, and to hold that, the occasion and the language being proper the intonations of the voice, the vehemence of the objections or the physical attitude of counsel in making them would alone support the conclusion of the judge that such behavior was disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent toward the court, and tended to interrupt the due course of the trial, and thus subject the offender to a judgment of fine and imprisonment. The relations between court and counsel may and often do during the course of a trial become strained; mutual conditions of irritation may be created in the heat of debate, leading to tones and demeanor which in other situations would clearly manifest contempt, but which, under the conditions often existing in a hotly contested criminal case, such as is indicated by the record here, should lead to no such conclusion. Much must be pardoned under the circumstances to the infirmities of human nature, and as much to the liberty of speech, which cannot in court always insure the employment of expressions coldly precise and unmarked by tones indicating excitement or even anger.

We are of the opinion that the facts on which the court acted in adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt do not, all the evidence considered, constitute contempt of court, from which it follows that the order and judgment were beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore void; that the judgment must be annulled and vacated; and it is so ordered.

LARSON v. LARSEN. (Civ. 5087.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 3, 1925.)

1. Evidence ⇨129(5)—Commission of act not proved by commission of similar acts.

Commission of an act cannot be proved by showing commission of similar acts by same person at other times and under other circumstances.

2. Evidence ⇨134—Commission of act proved by commission of similar acts, where state of mind is in issue.

Where commission of an act is conceded and state of mind is in issue, it is permissible to show commission of similar acts by same person at other times and under other circumstances.

3. Evidence ⇨134—When evidence of commission of similar acts admissible to negative innocent intent stated.

Where doing of wrongful act is conceded, and innocent intent is in issue, doing of same or similar act on other occasions is admitted in evidence to negative innocent intent.

4. Criminal law ⇨369(1)—When proof of commission of independent crimes not competent stated.

It is not competent to prove commission of independent crimes by defendant, evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with crime charged.

5. Criminal law ⇨369(1)—Evidence held inadmissible to show defendant's disposition to commit similar offenses, or as corroborative of testimony as to proof of offense charged.

Evidence to prove commission of independent crimes is inadmissible, either to show disposition of defendant to commit such offense as he is charged with, or as corroborative of testimony directed to prove specific offense for which he is on trial.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1048(6)—Admitting testimony of similar acts held prejudicial, in view of circumstantial evidence only.

Where plaintiff relied almost entirely on circumstantial evidence to prove defendant's alleged assault by shooting him with a shotgun, permitting cross-examination of defendant as to other similar acts on his part held prejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by John Clyde Larson, by his guardian ad litem, against P. A. Larsen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, and G. B. Helm, of Turlock, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and Dan F. Conway, all of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $5,000 in an action for damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff is a boy 13 years of age and sued by his guardian ad litem, charging that the defendant willfully, unlawfully, and wrongfully assaulted him on August 15, 1922, at defendant's ranch near the city of Fresno, by shooting plaintiff with a shotgun, causing the injuries enumerated in the complaint. In view of the conclusion we have reached with reference to the action of the trial court in admitting certain testimony over objection, we shall not discuss the facts of the case more fully than is necessary to show the effect of such testimony.

The defendant denied the shooting. The evidence offered by plaintiff was largely circumstantial. Defendant owned a vineyard near Fresno. Plaintiff went upon this property and was attempting to pick some grapes, when he received a charge of birdshot in his legs, the shot scattering from his knees down. He testified that after he was shot, he saw a man about 50 or 60 feet away from him with a gun in his hand. He said this man was tall, slim, and had dark clothes on. The deputy sheriff told of visiting the home of defendant after the shooting, and that the defendant denied he had fired at the boy; that the deputy sheriff found apparently fresh tracks from approximately the spot where the plaintiff said he saw the man standing with the gun to the home of defendant. There were also other tracks all over the orchard, where some one had been plowing. The case of plaintiff had to rest upon the inferences to be drawn from these and a few other circumstances, such as the evasive and rather hostile attitude of the defendant when questioned about the matter, except for the testimony which furnished the ground for the main attack upon appeal. That testimony was given under the following circumstances:

The defendant was called as a witness for plaintiff, under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. After he had denied knowledge of the shooting, he was asked:

"Q. You had used your gun prior to the 15th of August of last year for the purpose of shooting at other boys who came in there, in your vineyard, had you not?"

The question was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the objection was overruled. Defendant was then asked:

"You shot at other parties before that time, didn't you? A. No, sir. * * *

"Q. Didn't you shoot at another boy there in your orchard with your shotgun? A. No, sir.

"Q. Prior to the 15th of August. A. No, sir.

"Q. You did not? A. No, sir; not that year.

"Q. How is that? A. Not that year.

"Q. Not that year? Did you do it the year before? A. Well, I have tried to scare boys a couple of times with it.

"Q. Answer the question. Did you shoot toward boys with your shotgun the year before, out there at your orchard? A. I tried to scare them a couple of times.

"Q. What did you do in trying to scare them? Did you discharge the shotgun toward them? A. I shot in the air.

"Q. Do you know whether or not you hit them? A. No; I didn't.

"Q. How many boys did you shoot at prior to the 15th of August, last year, with the shotgun? A. I couldn't tell you.

"Q. How is that? A. I couldn't tell you.

"Q. Can you approximate, and tell about how many you shot at? A. No."

A witness was then called, who testified, over objection, that he had seen defendant on two occasions prior to the shooting of plaintiff, lying behind a fallen tree in his vineyard with a shotgun in his hand. The next witness was asked if he had ever seen Mr. Larsen in his vineyard with a shotgun. Over objection, he answered that he had. He was asked if he had ever seen defendant shoot any one and answered, "Yes." "Q. Who did he shoot?" Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. Objection overruled, and examining counsel told to avoid leading questions.

"Q. When was this? A. It was in the year 1921, along about either the first or the last of July. I don't remember which.

"Q. Who was the boy that you saw Mr. Larson shoot? A. An Armenian boy."

This was objected to by counsel as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the objection overruled. The questions and answers then continued, eliciting the details of the shooting of a boy a year prior to the injury to plaintiff.

[1-3] It is a fundamental rule of evidence that you cannot prove the commission of an act by showing the commission of similar acts by the same person at other times and under other circumstances. Such evidence is simply not relevant; it does not tend to prove the issue. There is a change in the rule, where the act is conceded and the state of mind is in issue. In such a case, the ordinary doctrine of chances is apt to assist materially in coming to a decision. Greenleaf on Ev. (16th Ed.) vol. 1, § 14q, p. 71. Where the doing of a wrongful act is conceded, and the innocent intent is in issue, the doing of the same or a similar act upon other occasions is admitted in evidence to negative innocent intent. The limitations of this use are: (a) That the wrongful act itself is conceded, or otherwise proved to be done, and the evidence is used only to negative innocent intent; and (b) the other acts must be of the same or a closely similar sort, and not widely separated in time, in order to exclude an innocent explanation. Id. p. 72.

The case of Martinez v. Planel, 36 Cal. 578, was an action to recover damages for negligence of defendant in the management of his hotel, by reason of which the plaintiff fell and was injured. Evidence was offered that other guests of the hotel had fallen in the same passageway shortly before the accident to plaintiff. Upon appeal, it was said that it was error to admit such testimony.

"That was res inter alios acta—a collateral issue, which the defendants could not be required to try in this case. If it was competent for the plaintiffs to prove that other persons had met with like accidents at the same place, it would be competent for the defendants to rebut it, and there would be no end, or might be no end, to the issues tried. The rule is too well established to need more than a citation of authorities" (citing authorities).

Respondent cites numerous authorities to the effect that the rule involved here does not vary with the criminal or civil character of the action; that it is more frequent in criminal actions to have an issue as to intent, motive, etc., but that whenever these matters are issues in civil cases, the same evidentiary rules apply. There seems to be no doubt about that question. The ultimate question is one of relevancy, and it is unaffected by the nature of the proceeding. But that does not justify the rulings of which complaint is made. The difficulty in the instant case is that intent is not in issue. The very doing of the act is the only issue between the parties. Upon that issue, evidence of similar acts a year before the occurrence of the incident under investigation is not helpful. In the case of Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 281, 201 P. 599, 603, it was said:

"Evidence as to the previous conduct and habit of the conductor as to sitting down and talking to passengers was improperly received, not only because of the fact that the matter was not in issue, but also because of the fact that his habit was not competent" (citing cases).

[4, 5] It has been repeatedly held that it is not competent to prove the commission of independent crimes by the defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged. People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 P. 43; People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 P. 169; People v. Glass, 158 Cal.

650, 112 P. 281; People v. Valliere, 127 Cal. 65, 59 P. 295. Such evidence is inadmissible either to show a disposition on the part of the defendant to commit such offenses as he is charged with or as corroborative of the testimony directed to the proof of the specific offense for which he is on trial. People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 P. 500.

[6] It is apparent that this objectionable line of testimony must have been highly prejudicial to the defendant, and in view of the fact that the judgment against him is based almost entirely upon circumstantial evidence, we are not prepared to say that, exclusive of the objectionable testimony, the record shows that justice has been done between the parties.

The error, therefore, compels a reversal of the judgment. It is so ordered.

WOODWORTH v. TOWN OF SEBASTOPOL
et al. (Civ. 2892.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 4, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 1, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations § 330(4)—Proceedings for improvement held not void because requiring use of patented materials.

Proceedings for improvement of streets under St. 1911, p. 730, and St. 1915, p. 1441, were not void because they required contractor to purchase patented materials at fixed price, where named manufacturer thereof stipulated to furnish successful bidder materials ready for use; use thereof being authorized by St. 1911, p. 767, § 79, subd. 6.

2. Municipal corporations § 330(4)—License agreement of manufacturer of paving materials construed most strongly against it.

License agreement of manufacturer of patented materials for street paving, stipulating to furnish materials to successful bidder for street improvement, at any time within four months from date, or at any time thereafter till offer was withdrawn, is construed most strongly against manufacturer.

3. Municipal corporations § 330(4)—Whether time for completion of improvement was reasonable held question of fact.

Where manufacturer stipulated on August 22, to furnish patented materials to successful bidder for street improvement at any time within four months, or at any time thereafter till offer was withdrawn, and after contract was executed on November 8, successful bidder had but 44 days for completion of work, whether time allowed was reasonable was a question of fact.

4. Municipal corporations § 330(4) — That patented materials for improvement could be bought from no one but controller of license held immaterial.

Fact that in proceedings for improvement of streets patented materials therefor could be bought from no one but controller of license thereof was not material.

5. Municipal corporations ⚙️339(3)—Specification requiring damage from unforeseen difficulties to be borne by contractor held not unwarranted burden.

Specifications for street improvement, providing that all loss or damage from unforeseen construction or difficulties, which may be encountered in prosecution of work, shall be borne by contractor, held not to impose unwarranted burden on him rendering proceedings void.

6. Municipal corporations ⚙️533—Retention of warrants by owner and omission of name from verification in recording return held immaterial.

Where verified return on warrant under Improvement Act 1911, § 25, as amended by St. 1921, p. 309, § 2, and section 27, clearly showed by whom it was made, fact that superintendent of streets in recording return omitted affiant's name at beginning of verification, and that owner of warrant retained possession of same after record thereof, held not fatal to validity of return or record thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Injunction by C. W. Woodworth against the Town of Sebastopol and others to restrain the issuance of street improvement bonds. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Page, of Oakland, for appellant.

G. W. Libby, of Sebastopol, and H. C. Symonds, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the defendants from issuing bonds for the cost of the improvement of certain streets in the town of Sebastopol. Judgment was entered in favor of defendants, and plaintiff has appealed. The resolution of intention to make the improvement stated that the work would be done under the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730) and amendments thereto and that serial bonds to represent unpaid assessments would be issued in the manner provided by the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1441) and amendments thereto. The record does not disclose the terms of the contract under which the improvement was made.

[1] Appellant's first point is that "the proceedings are void because they require the contractor to purchase materials from Warren Bros. at a fixed price, thereby preventing competitive bidding." The "objection * * * is not that a patented material is specified, but that the proceedings are so framed that only one person or firm can be dealt with." The resolution of intention prescribes that the streets shall be graded, a water-bound macadam four inches in thickness placed thereon, upon which shall be laid a 2-inch pavement of "asphaltic concrete, with 1½ inches of Warrenite Bitulithic wearing surface." A subsequent clause reads as follows:

"Attention is called to Warrenite Bitulithic license mixture agreement of Warren Bros. Company, of Boston, Mass., in relation to the above-described work, and dated August 22, 1921, and on file in the office of the town clerk of said town of Sebastopol."

The agreement referred to in the resolution of intention is in the general form of that considered in Warren Bros. Co. v. Boyle, 42 Cal. App. 246, 257, 183 P. 706. It recites that it is deemed advisable by the board of trustees to use Warrenite-Bitulithic pavement; that the company is the owner of the patents covering the use of the materials therefor; that "competitive bidding in the letting of contracts is deemed advisable," and contains the following:

"Warren Bros. Company hereby proposes and agrees to furnish to the town of Sebastopol, and to any bidder to whom a contract may be awarded, and who shall enter into a contract with said town of Sebastopol, to pave said roadways with the Warrenite-Bitulithic pavement, and to the owners of lots and lands proposed to be assessed for the improvement of said roadways in said town of Sebastopol, hereinafter designated as property owners, who may elect to take the work and enter into a contract to pave said roadways with the said Warrenite-Bitulithic pavement, at any time within four (4) months from this date, or at any time thereafter until this offer is withdrawn, or an amended proposition is filed with the proper authorities, the following material ready for use, as specified and required under and by said specifications and service, with the right to use any or all of the patents, trademarks, or trade-names now owned or which may hereafter be owned by Warren Bros. Company, necessary to lay said pavement."

The agreement stated the price per ton at which the material would be furnished and provided:

"The execution of the contract for the said work * * * shall bind the undersigned Warren Bros. Company to this agreement."

Certain parts only of the specifications appear in the record. It appears that the following clauses, and in the order here given, are contained therein:

"Bitulithic Cement.—Bitulithic cement is produced under the direction, laboratory supervision of, and using ingredients approved by Warren Bros. Company * * * Warrenite-Bitulithic wearing surface, gravel aggregate—one and one-half inches. Wearing Surface.—On the foundation prepared, as hereinbefore specified, shall be laid the Warrenite-Bitulithic wearing surface described below, so as to have a thickness of one and one-half inches after thorough compression. Said wearing surface shall be composed as follows: [Then follow specifications of the ingredients to compose such wearing surface and the methods of producing, laying and rolling the same.]”

The board of trustees duly advertised for bids for making the proposed improvements and received five bids therefor. On the 14th of October, 1921, a resolution was adopted awarding the contract to the successful bidder. On the 8th day of the following November, this bidder entered into a contract with the superintendent of streets to do the work. There is no contention that the work was not properly done in strict compliance with the specifications.

Nicolson Pavement Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699, contains language implying that the governing board of a municipality, in ordering public improvements, cannot specify the use of a patented material which is not available to bidders for the work. In Page's California Street Laws, § 128, referring to the case cited, it is said:

“Subsequent cases have confined the doctrine within narrow limits, and from statements of the courts in later cases, there is some question as to whether the early cases would now be followed even within the limits.”

To hold that patented materials cannot be specified would be to “exclude all methods of paving which were patented, even though such method, because of its superiority, or even because of its cheapness, would be specially advantageous to the owners of lots liable for the expense of paving, as well as the municipality charged with its maintenance.” Perine C. & P. Co. v. Quackenbush, 104 Cal. 684, 688, 38 P. 533.

See, also, 19 Cal. Jur. 181; Vale v. Boyle, 179 Cal. 180, 186, 175 P. 787; Sarver v. Los Angeles, 156 Cal. 187, 189, 103 P. 917; Warren Bros. Co. v. Boyle, 42 Cal. App. 246, 258, and note at page 247, 183 P. 706.

The Improvement Act of 1911, § 79, subd. 6, provides:

“The words ‘paved’ or ‘repaved,’ as used in this act, shall be held to mean and include pavement of stone, whether paving blocks or macadamizing, or of bituminous rock or asphalt, or of iron, wood or other material, whether patented or not, which the city council shall by ordinance or resolution adopt.”

In the absence of such a statutory provision authorizing the use of a patented material, it is said that:

“Where * * * the owner of the patent has stipulated with the city that the patented article will be furnished to the successful bidder, without a reservation, the authorities uphold the right to make the contract”—citing several cases. Great Northern R. Co. v. Leavenworth, 81 Wash. 511, 142 P. 1155, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 239, 243.

[2, 3] The license agreement is dated August 22, 1921. The resolution of intention was adopted August 26, 1921. It fixed September 19th as the day upon which objections to the proposed improvement would be heard. Bids for doing the work were opened and the contract awarded October 14th and the contract was executed November 8th. Appellant contends that Warren Bros. Company agreed to furnish material during a period of four months only from August 22, and that therefore the contractor was allowed but 44 days after the execution of the contract in which to purchase the specified materials from the company. It is argued that, under such circumstances, no one could safely bid for the work without further assurance from the company that it would furnish such materials after the expiration of the 4-month period, an assurance which the company could give or refuse at its pleasure, and that therefore free competitive bidding was not possible. In view of the circumstances under which the license agreement was executed and filed, the nature of the work to be done, and the length of time required to take the statutory steps leading up to the execution of the contract, it is somewhat uncertain whether the limitation of four months relates to the furnishing of the materials or to the execution of the contract to do the work. Under familiar rules of construction, the license agreement is to be construed most strongly against the company. If it be construed in accordance with appellant's contention, however, it cannot be held on this appeal that 44 days was not a reasonable time within which to complete the work. Neither the terms of the contract nor the extent of the work to be done are shown. Nor was any evidence produced to show the length of time which was reasonably necessary for the completion of the work.

[4] Whether or not the time allowed was reasonable is a question of fact and not of law. It does not appear within what time the work was actually completed, but it was shown that the company at no time withdrew its offer to furnish the required materials at the price stated in the license agreement. The fact that such materials could be purchased from no one but the company is not material, otherwise patented materials could not be used, even though authorized by the statute, because the owner of a patent can always control the production and the price of the article patented.

[5] The specifications provide:

“All loss or damage arising from any unforeseen construction or difficulties, either natural or artificial, which may be encountered in the prosecution of the work, shall be borne by the contractor.”

Appellant contends that the proceedings are void because the foregoing provision imposes “an unwarranted burden upon the contractor in regard to damages”—citing Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 662, 67 P. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213. In Stanwood v. Carson, 169 Cal. 640, 650, 147 P. 562, 566, a provision substantially the same as that of which complaint is here made was held not to invalidate the proceedings. In that case it is said:

"The early tendency toward a rigid strictness in these matters which has found expression in some of the cases, such as Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 664 (57 L. R. A. 213, 67 P. 1061), has been much relaxed by later decisions, and wisely so, because it became apparent that a strict enforcement of the street law to its very letter often resulted in depriving street contractors, who had honestly performed their work, of their just compensation. The inevitable result was that subsequent contracts would not be undertaken by such contractors owing to the hazard arising from such strict construction, excepting at largely increased prices, and, in consequence, while in an individual case a property owner might through some technicality escape paying what he should in equity have paid, property owners generally would be compelled to pay excessive prices because of the imminent peril of total loss which confronted contractors."

[6] The act provides for the issuance of a warrant by the superintendent of streets, authorizing the contractor to demand and receive from property owners the amounts of their several assessments for the cost of work done. Section 25 as amended provides:

"The warrant shall be returned to the superintendent of streets within thirty days after its date, with a return attached thereto signed by the contractor or his assigns or some person in his or their behalf, verified upon oath, stating the nature and character of the demand. Thereupon the superintendent of streets shall record the return so made with the record of the warrant and assessment either in the margin of said record or in the same book with and immediately following the record of the assessment; * * * and shall sign the record. * * * If any contractor shall fail to return his warrant within the time and in the form provided in this section, he shall thenceforth have no lien upon the property assessed." Stats. 1921, p. 309, § 2.

The required return was made in this case, and the superintendent of streets recorded the same and signed the record thereof. The original return was then delivered to the agent of the contractor's assignee, who took it away with him. Appellant urges that the statute requires the warrant and the return attached thereto to be filed and left with the superintendent of streets, and that therefore the foregoing acts did not constitute the return required by the statute. The statute does not expressly provide that such warrant and return shall be filed, and appellant's argument is based upon the use of the words "returned" and "return" as used in the act. No authorities are cited, except such as relate to returns of writs or processes in judicial proceedings. The warrant was the contractor's evidence of his right to collect unpaid assessments. That right did not cease with the return required by the statute. Section 27 of the act provides that, at any time after the period of 35 days from the date of the warrant, the contractor or his assigns "may sue, in his own name, the owner of the land, lots, or portions of lots, * * * and recover the amount of any assessment remaining unpaid," and that, in any suit so brought, "the said warrant, assessment, certificate and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and nonpayment, shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment and of the prior proceedings and acts of the superintendent of streets and city council upon which said warrant, assessment, and diagram are based, and like evidence of the right of the plaintiff to recover in the action." It cannot be presumed, in the absence of an express provision to that effect, that it was the legislative intent to require a contractor to surrender possession of the evidence of his right of action.

The verified return, in so far as material here, is as follows:

"J. B. Piatt, being duly sworn, says he is the agent of the assignee of the contractor named in the annexed engineer's certificate, assessment, diagram and warrant. * * * United States National Bank of Portland, Oregon, by J. B. Piatt, Agent."

In the record of the return made by the superintendent of streets, the name "J. B. Piatt" at the beginning thereof was omitted. Subsequent to the recording of the return, upon the hearing of the appeal of plaintiff and others to the board of trustees, the board adopted a resolution directing the superintendent of streets to correct the error in the record by inserting therein the name of "J. B. Piatt." The superintendent thereupon made the correction.

In A. P. Hotaling v. Brogan, 12 Cal. App. 500, 107 P. 711, the court had under consideration an affidavit which was signed "A. P. Hotaling & Co. By R. M. Hotaling, President." The court said:

"That the affiant affixed the corporate name, followed as it is—'By R. M. Hotaling, President,' does not change the fact, clearly appearing, that he, Hotaling, personally made the affidavit and was the one who subscribed and swore to it. * * * Nor do we doubt that the test suggested by respondent is here met, namely, that the affidavit must 'be so clear and certain that an indictment for perjury may be sustained upon it if false.'"

The fact that the superintendent of streets omitted the affiant's name at the beginning of the affidavit in the record of the return is not deemed fatal. Even with the name so omitted, the affidavit clearly shows by whom it was made. To hold that the omission is fatal would be to return to the technical strictness condemned in Stanwood v. Carson, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

Charles L. Gilmore and Work & Ashby, all of Sacramento, for petitioner.

J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., and W. A. Green, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Petitioner prays for an order of this court directing and commanding the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Sacramento, and Hon. Charles O. Busick, as judge thereof, to hear and determine a certain petition filed in said court by the petitioner herein, in a certain action tried in said court, entitled the "People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. C. D. Stowe, Defendant."

The record before us shows the following: That the petitioner herein, on the 4th day of February, 1925, pleaded guilty to an information charging him with the crime of driving an automobile upon a public highway in the city of Sacramento, while under the influence of intoxicating liquor; that, after the entry of said plea, the defendant asked that he be granted probation, which request, after hearing, was denied by said court and on the 11th day of February, 1925, the said court, the Honorable Charles O. Busick, presiding, rendered judgment against the defendant and pronounced sentence to the effect that the defendant be imprisoned in the state prison of the state of California, as provided by law, for the offense of which he pleaded guilty; that thereafter, and on the same day, the said court made its order that a commitment issue in accordance with said sentence, and that, in pursuance of said order and judgment, a commitment was duly issued, directed to the sheriff of the county of Sacramento, commanding him to deliver the person of the said defendant to the warden of the state prison at San Quentin, in execution of said judgment and sentence; that thereafter the defendant regularly, and in the manner provided by law, appealed from the judgment of said court entered in said cause to the Appellate Court of the Third District of the state of California; that thereafter, and without filing any record on appeal in said cause, upon motion of defendant, the appeal theretofore taken by him from the judgment of said superior court to said District Court of Appeal was duly dismissed, by order of said District Court of Appeal, in and for the Third Appellate District; that thereafter, and on or about the 25th day of February, 1925, after notice regularly given upon verified petition filed therein, said defendant moved said superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Sacramento, to set aside the judgment and sentence theretofore entered against him in the cause hereinbefore referred to; that the said superior court and the said Hon. Charles O. Busick, presiding therein, then and there refused and still refuses to entertain or pass upon said motion, upon the ground that the said superior court's jurisdiction over the cause of the People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. C. D. Stowe, Defendant, on the charge hereinbefore referred to no longer existed, and that said superior court no longer had jurisdiction to alter, amend, or vacate said judgment, or modify the sentence pronounced in said cause.

In the presentation of this case a large number of authorities have been called to our attention relative to the power of a trial court to amend, vacate, or modify its judgments prior to the time when actual execution thereof has been begun; that is, prior to the time when the defendant has been actually delivered to the custody of the officer, whose duty it is, under the laws of the state, to execute the sentence and judgment of the trial court. These cases, while practically presenting an unbroken line of authorities on the subject, are for the reasons hereinafter stated, inapplicable, and need not either be stated or considered herein.

A recital of the facts contained herein shows that the petitioner regularly appealed to this court from the judgment of the trial court, and that upon his motion said appeal was dismissed. By section 955 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that "the dismissal of an appeal is in effect an affirmation of the judgment or order appealed from, unless the dismissal is expressly made without prejudice to another appeal." This, of course, relates specifically to a civil action, but the same principle, as we shall subsequently show, applies as well to criminal cases. Upon the appeal being dismissed, the judgment becomes a final judgment, not simply of the trial court, but of the court to which the appeal was taken, unless it is otherwise controlled or limited as therein stated.

In the case of United States v. Howe (C. C. A.) 280 F. 815, 23 A. L. R. 531, it is held that a trial court has no power, even during continuance of the term at which it was rendered, to alter or amend a judgment after it has been affirmed by an appellate court. After considering the power of trial courts in general to amend, alter or change judgments before execution thereof has been had, the court uses the following language, which we think decisive in this cause:

"Another restriction upon the power to alter or amend a judgment is that such power does not exist after the judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court. In the federal courts, after an appellate court has decided a case brought before it on writ of error, it sends its decision down to the court below, whose proceedings have been reviewed, by means of a mandate which directs that court to enforce or reverse and set aside the judgment as the case may be; and the jurisdiction of the court below, which was lost by the suing out of the writ of error, is reacquired when such a mandate is filed with it. Now we understand it to be well-established law that a judgment which the appellate court has affirmed, and by its mandate directed the court below to enforce, cannot thereafter be altered in any way by the lower court, and that irrespective of whether the term was extended or not. In Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, vol. 13, p. 850, it is correctly laid down that 'the judgment of the appellate court cannot be modified or vacated by the lower court on the remand to it of the case, nor can the lower court alter or modify the judgment originally entered by it.' In the case of Re Sanford Fork & Tool Co., 160 U. S. 247, 255, 40 L. Ed. 414, 416, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291, 293, the Supreme Court said: 'The circuit court is bound by the decree as the law of the case, and must carry it into execution, according to the mandate. That court cannot vary it, or examine it for any other purpose than execution, or give any other or further relief, or review it, even for apparent error, upon any matter decided on appeal, or intermeddle with it, further than to settle so much as has been remanded.' The above statement of the law is alike applicable to civil and criminal cases, and the fact that the term has been extended is quite immaterial. The judgment which was before this court was in law disposed of and finally settled by our decision, and is the law of the case beyond the power of the court below, which must carry it into execution according to the mandate. Sibbald v. United States, 12 Pet. 488, 492, 9 L. Ed. 1167, 1169."

[1] In a note accompanying the report of this case are a number of decisions of state courts to the same effect. To the same effect is the case of Meyer v. Kohn, 33 Cal. 484, also the case of Kirby v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 604, 10 P. 119. Irrespective of whether a trial court may or may not amend, alter, or modify a judgment in a criminal case before execution thereof has been had, which we do not decide, it is clear that jurisdiction to do so after the judgment has become, in effect, a judgment of an appellate court, does not exist.

The petition for a writ of mandate is denied.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; JONES, Justice pro tem.

On Application for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] The petitioner, in his application for a rehearing herein, calls attention to the fact that the appellant, in his appeal in the case of the People of the State of California v. C. D. Stowe, dealt with in the opinion of the court herein, did not perfect his appeal according to the provisions of section 1247 of the Penal Code and that under the provisions of said Code, after the time had expired for taking the requisite steps specified to be taken after filing his notice of appeal, the law automatically dismissed appellant's appeal, irrespective of the order of dismissal entered by the court, and that under such circumstances the cases relied upon as to modifying the judgment after affirmance or after dismissal, when an appeal had been taken, are inapplicable. We think that when the notice of appeal was filed the jurisdiction of the trial court in relation to the judgment was transferred to the District Court of Appeal, and that whether the dismissal of the appeal was accomplished, either by operation of law, or by the order of this court, the judgment from which the appeal had been taken became final, and that the principle as to the lack of jurisdiction to modify or change a final judgment in the trial court, as set forth in the opinion heretofore filed in this case, applies. These matters were considered but not set forth in the opinion of the court.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

72 Cal. App. 160

PEOPLE v. BOOTH et al. (Cr. 1237.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 3, 1925.)

1. Robbery $\S$ 24(3)—Evidence held ample to identify defendants as perpetrators of robbery.

Evidence held ample to fully identify defendants as perpetrators of crime of robbery.

2. Robbery $\S$ 24(3)—Minor discrepancies and inaccuracies held not to affect positive identification of defendants.

In robbery prosecution, where there was ample evidence to identify both defendants as perpetrators of crime, minor discrepancies and inaccuracies in testimony of witnesses held not to affect their positive identification.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 622(1)—Question whether separate trial should be granted is discretionary.

When two or more defendants are jointly charged with public offense, question whether separate trial should be granted under Pen. Code, § 1098, is within trial court's discretion.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 622(1)—Fact that, in joint trial, confession or other evidence is admissible as against one defendant only, does not entitle defendants jointly charged to separate trial.

Fact that, in joint trial, confession or other evidence may be admissible as against one and not against other defendant, does not of itself entitle defendants, jointly charged, to separate trial.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 686(1)—Permitting prosecution to reopen case is discretionary.

Permitting prosecution to reopen its case is within sound discretion of trial court.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 706—Witnesses $\S$ 337(5)—Defendant not testifying may not be questioned as to conviction of felony, but if he testifies he may be asked for purpose of impeachment.

Where, under Pen. Code, § 1025, defendant was charged with prior conviction to which he had pleaded guilty, district attorney had no right to refer to prior conviction where defendant had not taken stand in his own behalf, but, where he later became witness, it then became proper to ask him if he had been convicted of felony for purpose of impeachment.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(2)—Erroneous admission of evidence of facts, subsequently proved by defendant's testimony, is harmless.

Erroneous admission of evidence of facts subsequently proved by defendant's testimony, is harmless.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 369(2)—Testimony that automobile used in robbery had been stolen rightfully received.

As automobile was instrumentality in commission of robbery, and ownership thereof became question as to manner in which defendants obtained its possession, there was no error in admitting testimony to show that it had been stolen; it being positively identified with defendants, both before and immediately after robbery.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 369(2)—Evidence of independent and distinct crime, if necessary to prove crime charged, is admissible.

Although, in general, proof of independent and distinct crime than that charged is not admissible, yet, if evidence of another crime is necessary and pertinent to proving of crime charged, it is admissible.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(6)—Defendant's substantial rights not affected by misconduct of district attorney in address to jury.

In robbery prosecution, in view of convincing character of evidence against defendant, misconduct of district attorney in summing up case referring to other crimes committed by defendant held not to affect defendant's substantial rights.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 742(1)—Truth of alibi was for jury.

In robbery prosecution, where defendant's witnesses testified that he was in another city at time crime was committed, truth of such alibi evidence was for jury.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(5)—District attorney's comments on defendant's failure to testify held not miscarriage of justice.

In view of convincing evidence of defendant's guilt of crime of robbery, misconduct of district attorney in commenting on his failure to take the stand and testify held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(6)—Misconduct of district attorney in cross-examination of defendant held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

In robbery prosecution, misconduct of district attorney in asking defendant if he had not met codefendant in prison held, in view of overwhelming evidence of guilt, not to have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

14. Criminal law $\S$ 1036(1)—Objection to admission of evidence necessary to require review thereon.

Objection to admission of evidence is necessary to require review of ruling thereon.

15. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(5)—Objection to volunteered statement of witness, withdrawn from jury, held without merit.

Where witness volunteered, in response to question as to circumstances of arrest, that he had gone to place where defendant was apprehended to arrest another, and that defendant gave assumed name, and, on motion, statement was stricken, error assigned on admission of statement was without merit.

16. Criminal law $\S$ 519(4)—Confession held free and voluntary.

Where defendant voluntarily sent for district attorney and made full statement of all circumstances in connection with crime, without inducement or intimidation, defendant merely asking that he be sent to institution different from where codefendant would be incarcerated, it was not inadmissible as not being free and voluntary.

17. Criminal law ⚡532(2)—Question whether confession is free and voluntary ordinarily addressed to court.

Question as to whether confession is free and voluntary is ordinarily one of fact addressed to trial court, and considerable discretion must be allowed in his determination thereof.

18. Criminal law ⚡518(2)—Fact that defendant was not advised of constitutional rights held not to make confession involuntary or render it inadmissible.

Where defendant voluntarily sent for district attorney and made full statement of circumstances of crime, fact that he was not advised as to his constitutional rights to remain silent, and was not told that confession would be used against him, did not make it involuntary or render it inadmissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Ernest Booth and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

F. M. Pearce, of Oakland, for appellant Huston.

Ernest Booth, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Appellants herein were jointly accused by information with the crime of robbery. The offense was alleged to have been committed on May 19, 1924, at about the hour of 1:30 p. m. At that time it is charged that both defendants did unlawfully, and through use of force and fear, take and carry away from the person of one Eugene McCormick personal property consisting of the sum of $2,000 lawful money of the United States, which personal property belonged to the Oakland Bank, a corporation.

The information further charged both defendants with a prior conviction of a felony. They were jointly tried, and both were found guilty. Motion for a new trial was made on behalf of both defendants. These motions were denied.

The case of the prosecution rests entirely upon the identification of the defendants as being the perpetrators of the crime.

[1] Several grounds are relied upon for a reversal of the judgment. Both of the defendants claim that the evidence upon the subject of their identification is weak and far from satisfactory, for which reason the errors complained of are highly prejudicial to them. An examination of the record shows that their identity was fully and completely established.

It appears therefrom that upon the day above mentioned the officers of the Allendale Branch of the Oakland Bank were held up and robbed by two men, one of whom was colored. The robbery was committed in broad daylight, and neither of the perpetrators of the crime was masked. Huston engaged the attention of the manager by pointing a pistol at him, while his accomplice threatened the assistant manager and demanded from him and obtained the money stolen. Both these officers positively identified the defendants upon their arrest, which took place shortly after the robbery.

They were both further identified by other witnesses. A lineman employed by the Federal Electric Company recognized both of them as being the participants in the crime, and pointed them out from among other prisoners at the jail where they were confined.

Defendant Huston was further identified by two witnesses who were engaged in business in the immediate vicinity of the bank, and from one of whom he had made small purchases on two occasions just prior to the robbery.

[2] Some of the witnesses disagreed as to the color of the clothing worn by Huston and upon the question whether or not he was smoothly shaven. There was also a discrepancy in the testimony relative to the probable age of Booth. These minor discrepancies and inaccuracies in no manner affected the positive identification of defendants. As was said in People v. Connelly (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 374, such discrepancies are bound to occur in attempts to reproduce descriptively the features of defendants from mental pictures, but where, as here, they are brought into the presence of the witnesses, and each one identifies them as the persons who committed the crime, such identification is sufficient. In the case last cited it is further said that ordinarily the power to accurately describe human features is with most persons a limited one, and therefore on questions of identification, except in special instances, much must depend upon the intelligence and honesty of the person called upon to make the identification. The wife of defendant Booth interviewed one of the witnesses and discussed his testimony with him. The district attorney sought to show that an attempt had been made to induce this witness to change his testimony. On their cross-examination two of the witnesses became less positive in their identification with reference to defendant Booth. Notwithstanding this fact, however, there is ample evidence in the record to fully identify both defendants as the perpetrators of the crime.

It also appears in evidence that after his arrest Huston, of his own volition, had sent for the district attorney and voluntarily made a full and complete statement of the facts of the case, implicating Booth as his accomplice, a matter hereinafter discussed. We will consider the different points raised by appellants separately. Appellant Booth has filed a brief in his own behalf, in which he cites several grounds of misconduct and error which he claims justify a reversal.

[3] It is first urged on his behalf that the trial court abused its discretion in not granting to him a separate trial. Under the provisions of section 1098 of the Penal Code, when two or more defendants are jointly charged with any public offense, whether felony or misdemeanor, they must be tried jointly, unless the court orders separate trials. In ordering separate trials, the court in its discretion may grant a separate trial as to one or more defendants, and a joint trial as to the others, or may order any number of the defendants to be tried at one trial, and any number of the others at different trials, or may order a separate trial for each defendant. The question of whether or not a separate trial should be granted is left within the discretion of the court.

[4-6] The claim that the court abused its discretion in denying appellants' motion is based principally upon the fact that it had knowledge that Huston had made a confession implicating Booth, which would be received in evidence, though it was inadmissible as to him. The mere fact that in a joint trial a confession or other evidence may be admissible as against one and not against another does not of itself entitle defendants jointly charged to a separate trial. 16 Cor. Jur. p. 787. If this were so, joint trials could seldom if ever be had, for this question must of necessity constantly arise with defendants placed in such a situation. The matter of granting a severance is one within the discretion of the trial court. To hold otherwise would be to render nugatory, in most cases, the very purpose of the act. The jury was properly instructed upon the subject, for it was told that the evidence was admitted solely against defendant Huston. We conclude therefore, that there is no merit in this objection. Complaint is next made that the court abused its discretion in permitting the prosecution to reopen its case. This is a matter also within the sound discretion of the trial court. People v. Oxnam, 170 Cal. 211, 149 P. 165. Error is further claimed by reason of the action of the district attorney in commenting upon the fact that defendant had suffered a prior conviction.

[7] Appellant was so charged, to which he had pleaded guilty. The district attorney had, under these circumstances, no right to refer to the prior conviction, as the defendant had not at that time chosen to take the stand in his own behalf. Pen. Code, § 1025.

Here, however, he later became a witness on his own behalf, and it then became proper to ask him if he had ever been convicted of a felony for the purpose of impeachment. 8 Cal. Jur. p. 647. The question was asked, and defendant admitted that he had suffered such a conviction. Erroneous admission of evidence of a fact subsequently proved by defendant's testimony is harmless. People v. Bennett, 65 Cal. 267, 3 P. 868; People v. Collins, 75 Cal. 412, 17 P. 430. Moreover, the matter of his prior conviction was already in evidence, a witness having testified that he had made defendant's acquaintance in San Quentin.

[8, 9] It is again claimed that the court erred in admitting testimony to show that a Cadillac coupe used in the perpetration of the robbery had been stolen. This machine was positively identified as the one in which both defendants were seen prior to the commission of the robbery and the one in which they drove away from the scene of the crime. The automobile was an instrumentality in the commission of the offense, and its ownership became an important and material question as going to prove how or in what manner defendants obtained the possession thereof. The fact that it had been stolen from the owner was a circumstance that made possession by the defendants possible, and proof of this fact was rightfully received. It is true that the jury might have inferred that the defendants had stolen the car; still this fact did not warrant the exclusion of the evidence. Although in general proof of an independent and distinct crime than that charged is not admissible, yet, if the evidence of another crime is necessary and pertinent to the proof of the crime charged, it is admissible. People v. Rogers, 71 Cal. 565, 12 P. 679; People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 P. 153.

[10] Misconduct of the district attorney in his address to the jury in summing up the case against defendant is assigned as error. The remarks complained of had reference to other crimes committed by defendant. They were ordered stricken from the record, and the jury instructed to disregard them. Under these circumstances, and considering the convincing character of the evidence against defendant, we cannot say that his substantial rights were affected thereby, or that there has been miscarriage of justice.

[11] And, finally, our attention is drawn to the fact that this defendant attempted to prove an alibi. His associates and his wife and her sister testified that Booth was in San Francisco at or about the time when the crime was committed. The truth of this evidence was a matter for the jury to determine. By their verdict it is manifest they rejected it.

[12] Defendant Huston cites us to the misconduct of the district attorney in several particulars, as constituting error. He first complains that comment was made by that officer upon the fact that he did not take the stand and testify. It appears from the record that the court immediately admonished the jury to disregard the remark, and later fully instructed it upon the subject.

Misconduct of district attorneys in this particular has so often been condemned by the appellate courts that it seems strange that they should persist in committing this error. Here, however, the evidence of defendants' guilt is of such a convincing character that we cannot say that the incident resulted in a miscarriage of justice. People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 116, 193 P. 92.

[13] Further misconduct of this officer in asking defendant Booth if he had not met Huston at San Quentin is assigned as error. An objection to the question was sustained. While the question might imply a previous criminal record, what we have said with reference to the error just discussed applies with equal force to this objection.

[14, 15] Reception of evidence, to the effect that at the time of his arrest Huston gave an assumed name, is complained of. The record shows that no objection was interposed to the question. In this connection further error is assigned for the reason that the officer, in detailing the circumstances of the arrest, testified that he had gone to the place where defendant was apprehended, for the purpose of making the arrest of one Clark for grand larceny. The statement was volunteered by the witness in response to a question asking for the circumstances under which the arrest was made. Upon motion it was stricken from the record. There is therefore no merit in this objection.

[16] In conclusion, defendant Huston claims that his confession was not free and voluntary, and evidence of the same should not have been admitted. The record shows conclusively that defendant voluntarily and of his own accord sent for the district attorney and made a full statement of all the circumstances in connection with the crime. The confession was made without any inducement or intimidation; Huston merely asking that he be sent to an institution different from where his codefendant would be incarcerated, as he had threatened to kill him.

[17, 18] The question as to whether a confession is free and voluntary is ordinarily one of fact addressed to the trial court, and a considerable measure of discretion must be allowed in the determination thereof. People v. Siensen, 153 Cal. 387, 95 P. 863. It appears in this connection that defendant was not advised as to his constitutional rights to remain silent, and was not told that the confession would be used against him. This fact did not make the confession involuntary or render it inadmissible. People v. Clark, 28 Cal. App. 735, 153 P. 980. And this is especially so where, as here, the record as a whole, and aside from the confession, so convincingly indicates the guilt of the defendant. No other questions are presented.

From what we have said, it follows that the judgments against defendants should be, and each of them is hereby, affirmed.
